Such water sprinkling is frequently observed in poltergeist cases. Thomas P. Barkas published an account of interesting observations in the British newspaper Newcastle Chronicle in 1874. He witnessed water production in a private séance circle in both the dark and the daylight. During the séance a planchette and the surface of the table were covered, in less than a minute, by water drops. He placed his hat, crown downward near the center of the table and placed a sheet of clean paper in the hat. In three minutes it was found covered with waterdrops. Another time, he and his fellow experimenters tried the height at which the water fell by holding a large piece of paper at an elevation. Drops fell under the paper only until it was lowered eighteen inches. At that height they formed on the sheet. The experiment took place in broad daylight.

Seven sitters of Mme. L. Ignath fervently prayed, on the control's instruction, before a picture of the Madonna of Sixtin, after which tears appeared in the eyes of the portrait and ran down the painted cheeks (Zeitschrift für Parapsychologie, June 1932).

Reports of chemical phenomena in séance rooms must be treated with caution. A smell like phosphorus may indeed indicate the presence of that chemical, but it may have been introduced by a fake medium. The true facts of some of the remarkable phenomena claimed in cases from past history may never be found, and skepticism should be used in measuring past claims in light of modern experiment and investigation.

Cherniack, Louis (1908–)

Physician, Department of Internal Medicine, Winnipeg Clinic, Canada, beginning in 1947. He was born November 23, 1908, and studied at the University of Manitoba (M.D., 1932; B.Sc., 1934). He was a member of the Royal College of Physicians, London (1936); a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, Canada (1947); and a fellow of the American College of Chest Physicians (1952). He served with the rank of lieutenant colonel in the Royal Army Medical Corps from 1940 until 1947.

Cherniack took a parapsychological interest in the phenomena of mediumship.

Cherubim

An order of angels, often represented as figures wholly or partly human and with wings proceeding from the shoulders. The first mention of these beings was in connection with the expulsion of Adam and Eve from the Garden of Eden, and they are frequently spoken of in later biblical history. Sometimes the cherubim have two or more faces, and sometimes are of composite animal form.

Chesed

The Jewish Kabalist name for mercy. (See also Kabala)

Chesme

A cat-shaped well (or fountain) spirit or nymph of the Turks. She was said to lure youths to death much in the same manner as the Germanic Lorelei.

Chevalier, Marie George (1889– ?)

A retired engineer and director of experiments for the Association Française d'Etudes Métapsychiques. Chevalier was born September 30, 1889, in Bar-le-Duc (Meuse), France, and studied at Dijon Academy, receiving bachelor's degree in science (1908) and arts (1909). He also graduated in 1914 from the Ecole Centrale des Arts et Manufactures. Chevalier served as lieutenant in the French army in World War I, and as captain in World War II. He was awarded the Cross of the Legion of Honor.

Reports of his investigations in psychokinesis and telepathy of sensation appeared in Sciences Métapsychiques and Cahiers Métapsychiques. He was author of La Morte, cette illusion (1953), and co-author with Bertrand de Cressac Bachelerie of La Métapsychique—problème crucial (1960).

Chevaliers de l'Enfer

According to French demonologists, these are demons more powerful than those of no rank, but less powerful than titled demons—counts, marquises, and dukes. They may be evoked from dawn to sunrise and from sunset to dark. (See also counts of hell)

Chevreuil, Leon Marie Martial (1852–1939)

French painter, author, and Spiritualist, born March 27, 1852. Chevreuil studied at the University of Poitiers and the Ecole des Beaux-Arts, Paris. His book On ne meurt pas (1916) was awarded a prize by the Académie des Sciences, Paris. He also wrote Le Spiritisme dans l'Eglise (1923) and contributed articles to Revue Spirite and Psychica. Two of his paintings deal with Spiritualist themes. He died in December 1939.

Chevreul, Michel Eugene (1786–1889)

French chemist, expert on color theories, researcher on animal fats (culminating in discovery of margarine), Michel Eugene Chevreul was born on August 31, 1786 in Angers, France. Chevreul conducted experiments on behalf of the French Academy of Science on divining by means of a pendulum. In his book De la baguette divinatoire (1854) he concluded that the movements of a pendulum in response to questions are the result of involuntary muscular movements in the hand induced by mental processes.

"Chevreul's pendulum" is often cited to disprove the reality of the information obtained by such devices as pendulums or divining rods, much as Michael Faraday's similar explanations for table-turning in Spiritualist séances. Although it seems likely that Chevreul was correct in his investigation of some of the mechanisms of pendulum divining, and also in his assumption that mental processes may affect the pendulum movement, there is equal evidence of paranormal information obtained by the pendulum or divining rod when suggestive factors are not operating.

Chevreul's scientific discoveries made him an international treasure, which was made evident on his 100th birthday celebration given by France and England and his funeral held at Notre Dame Cathedral. He died on April 9, 1889 at the age of 102.

Sources:

Bird, Christopher. The Diving Hand. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1979.

Ch'i

A Chinese term for life energy or spirit (Japanese ki), comparable with the Hindu yoga term prana. Although deriving from the breath, ch'i, like prana, is transformed by the metabolism into subtle vitality that follows certain channels in the body, and it is related to the state of health of an individual. In the recently revived ancient Chinese systems of acupuncture and acupressure, these subtle energy flows are modified by inserting needles or by specific pressures at certain body points, resulting in improved health or the alleviation of physical disorders.

In the Asian system of martial arts, ch'i is directed by willpower to specific points of the body, resulting in apparently paranormal feats of strength and control. (See also breathing)

Sources:

Palos, Stephan. The Chinese Art of Healing. New York: Herderand Herder, 1971.

Tohei, Koichi. The Book of Ki: Coordinating Mind and Body in Daily Life. San Francisco: Japan Publications, 1978.

Chiaia, Ercole (d. 1905)

Distinguished Italian psychical researcher to whom Cesare Lombroso, P. B. Bianchi, astronomer G. V. Schiaparelli, Theodor Flournoy, Prof. Porro, and Col. Rochas owed their introduction to the phenomena of Spiritualism. It was Chiaia who first introduced the phenomena of the famous medium Eusapio Palladino to the European scientific world in 1888 when he invited Lombroso to conduct investigations.

Chibbett, Harold (1900–1978)

Founder of The Probe, a pioneer British group of investigators of psychic and occult phenomena. Chibbett was born February 19, 1900, in England. He was a member of the first London science-fiction club and a friend of Eric Frank Russell, whom he met in 1942 and with whom he shared an interest in Fortean phenomena.

Chibbett spent some fifty years meeting occultists and collecting data on unusual phenomena. At his own expense he maintained a postal chain letter to spread information on Forteana, and during his investigations he met such famous individuals as occultist Aleister Crowley, psychical investigator Harry Price, and Kuda Bux, a fire walker. His correspondents included scientists and occultists.

Chibett suffered from ill health for some years and died February 23, 1978, after a heart attack.

Chicago and Midwest Psychic Guide

Annual Who's Who of individuals and organizations in Chicago and the Midwest. Last known address: 2517 W. 71st St., Chicago, IL 60629.

Chidananda, Swami (1916–)

Prominent Hindu mystic, leading disciple of the late Swami Sivananda, (1887–1963) and Sivananda's successor as head of the Divine Life Society of Rishikesh, India. Born Sridhar Rao on June 24, 1916, Chidananda was the son of Srinivasa Rao, a prosperous landowner in southern India. From an early age, Sridhar's life was influenced by Anantayya, a friend of his grandfather's, who told him inspiring stories from the Hindu religious epics Ramayana and Mahabharata and implanted the ideal of spiritual realization. He attended an elementary school at Mangalore, and in 1932 went on to the Muthiah Chetty High School at Madras, where he became a distinguished scholar. In 1936 he entered Loyola College (B.A., 1938), where he became familiar with and sympathetic to Christianity.

Rao's family had a strong tradition of charity and service to the sick and needy, and Sridhar gave special attention to the lepers in his district. He built huts for them on the vast lawns of his home and attended personally to their needs. He became engrossed by the teachings of Sri Ramakrishna and Swami Vivekananda, visiting their monastery at Madras and taking part in services. In his own neighborhood he organized spiritual instruction for young people.

In 1936 a strong desire for spiritual development led him to leave home and study in the ashram of a sage near the sacred mountain shrine of Tirupathi. His parents persuaded him to return home, but he had already set himself the goal of renunciation. In 1943 he obtained permission from Swami Sivananda to join his ashram at Rishikesh in the foothills of the Himalayas. In 1947 he founded a yoga museum at the ashram, presenting the philosophy of Vedanta and yoga development in simple pictorial form. He was put in charge of the charitable dispensary and also delivered lectures at the Yoga Vedanta Forest Academy that was established in 1948; at that time he was appointed general secretary of the Divine Life Society. He became vice-chancellor and professor of rajah-yoga instruction.

During the following year, he was initiated into the order of sannyasa as a renunciate by Swami Sivananda on July 10. He organized branches of the society in different parts of India and in November 1959 traveled to the United States to propagate the teachings of Yoga Vedanta. He also lectured in South American countries and made a brief tour in Europe, returning to Rishikesh in March 1962. In April 1962 he made a pilgrimage to southern India, visiting holy places and delivering spiritual lectures. Ten days after his return, in July 1963, Swami Sivananda died. In August 1963 Swami Chidananda was elected his successor as president of the Divine Life Society and chancellor of the Yoga Vedanta Forest Academy.

Swami Chidananda has made a deep impression upon thousands of devotees by his ascetic and saintly life. His wide background knowledge of Christian religious teachings has intensified his ecumenical outlook. In addition to his many official tasks at the Rishikesh ashram, he has served the lepers of the district and was elected by the government authorities to the Leper Welfare Association. In recent years he has made occasional tours in the United States and Europe, but spends most of his time in Rishikesh.

Sources:

Divine Life Society. An Apostle of India's Spiritual Culture: Souvenir Released on the Auspices of the Sixtieth Birthday Anniversary of H.H. Sri Swami Chidaananda. Shivanandanagar, India: Divine Life Society, 1976.

Chidananda, Swami. Destiny of Man. Shivanandanagar, India: Divine Life Society, 1989.

———. Path to Blessedness. Shivanandanagar, India: Divine Life Society, 1975.

———. The Philosophy, Psychology, and Practice of Yoga. Shivanandanagar, India: Divine Life Society, 1984.

———. Truth that Liberates. Shivanandanagar, India: Divine Life Society, 1993.

Children of God See The Family

Children of Light

The Children of Light is a post-New Age organization founded in the early 1990s by Ron Baker and Robert Baker. Ron Baker grew up in North Carolina and by the time he entered college he was conflicted by two career choices that led him to choose a double major, pre-med and the performing arts. The latter won out in the short run, and following his graduation from Baylor University he pursued his master's and doctorate at Cincinnati College–Conservatory of Music. Through the 1980s he traveled and sang in opera and stage musicals. He also took the opportunities provided by his travels to study with a variety of alternative healers, from shamans to Reiki masters. He also developed some psychic awareness, including the ability to feel the symptoms from which others suffered. In 1990 his to career brought him New York where he met Robert Baker.

Canadian Robert Baker grew up in a Christian Science home, his grandmother being a practitioner. As a young man he moved to New York City to pursue a career as an actor. He eventually became the make-up artist for the New York City Opera. In 1987 he joined the opera company in a tour of Asia. While in Bali in December he had a near-death experience. As many had before him, during the experience, he traveled to the light and was told that he needed to learn how to love. The experience began a period of intense spiritual searching and development. Then in 1990, while meditating, he fell into a trance. Upon awakening, Baker was told by those with him that he had been channeling an entity named Gabriel. Shortly thereafter, he met Ron Baker.

Working together, the two combined their interests and skills to produce a process of ascension, a process of individual awakening and healing described as transcending the limitations of the ego and opening to Soul Consciousness. The process begins with a review of one's life and the breaking of negative mental and emotional conditionings that hold one in the past. Each person is then initiated into the various levels of Reiki healing, which becomes the basis of the personal development classes that include an introduction to prosperity consciousness and kundalini. The ultimate goal is seen as the opening to new levels of cosmic energy and the development of what is termed Soul Consciousness.

The process of individual development occurs within what is seen as a planetary movement toward ascension that began with the Harmonic Convergence of 1987. This process will culminate with a radical shift of consciousness affecting all of humanity around 2012. The transition period will be broken into segments of time for awakening (1992–98), purification (1999–2001), and integration (2002–12). The Bakers also lead tours to sacred sites around the world and organize worldwide meditations as part of the ongoing efforts contributing to the transition of consciousness among humans.

The Children of Light may be contacted through its Internet site at http://www.childrenoflight.com/. It offers a number of cassette tapes containing the channeled messages of Gabriel and the organization's own teachings and instructional material.

Sources:

Children of Light. http://www.childrenoflight.com/. June 10, 2000.

Children of the Night

Organization for "mature and discriminating afficionados of the vampire genre in art, cinema, literature, and mythology." Membership included nine issues of the "coven" journal of stories, poems, artwork, and film and book reviews and a pen pal network. Last known address: c/o Thomas J. Strauch, 9200 S. Avers Ave., Evergreen Park, IL 60602.

Childs, Edward (ca. 1869)

Early English private medium, introduced to Spiritualism by Mrs. Thomas Everitt. Childs reportedly demonstrated direct voice and direct writing phenomena and played musical instruments without contact.

Chimayo

Chimayo, a small town in rural New Mexico, is the site of a world-famous healing shrine now located within the Roman Catholic Church called El Sanctuario de Chimayo. In a small room adjacent to the main altar is a small hole containing mud that is believed by the many who come to the room to possess healing powers. The many crutches and braces that have been left at the church by those who have reported a healing attest to the mud's power. It appears that the mud is a remnant of the active volcanic past of the area. The oldest Native American legends remember the region as a land of hot springs and geysers. At one time there was a healing hot spring at Chimayo that had dried and left only the mud behind. The site has been inhabited for at least 900 years and the Tawa people used the mud as a healing remedy over the centuries.

The Catholic Church moved into New Mexico with the Spanish colonists. In 1818 a proposal to build a church at Chimayo was accepted and construction began. Interestingly enough, it was modeled on a similar church in Guatemala where an older shrine built around healing mud had previously been erected. The Guatemala healing shrine is associated with a wooden crucifix. The church in Chimayo has a carved crucifix that reproduces the one in Guatemala.

Little research has been done on the mud to see if it possesses any unique properties that promote healing, though the majority of healings that have been reported are not of the kind that appear to respond to a medicine. Thus, healings have been attributed to the spiritual environment of the church or to what doctors term the placebo effect. The idea of using mud placed on the body for healing has biblical roots; Jesus was noted to have cured a blind man by placing dirt moistened with spittle on his eyes (John 9:6).

Sources:

Borhegyi, Stephen. "The Miraculous Shrines of Our Lord of Esquiplas in Guatemata and Chimayo, New Mexico." Il Palacio 63, no.3 (March 1953).

Kay, Elizabeth. Chimayo Valley Traditions. Santa Fe, N. Mex.: Ancient City Press, 1987.

Trento, Salvatore M. Field Guide to Mysterious Places of the West. Boulder, Colo.: Pruett Publishing, 1994.

Chimes

Long-established Spiritualist journal that merged into the Psychic Observer in the 1970s. For a period it was published as the Psychic Observer and Chimes and served as the periodical for the National Spiritual Science Center. It was edited by Henry Nagorka and published by the church's ESPress imprint in Washington, D.C. The magazine ceased publication in the mid-1980s.

CHINA

Magic & Superstition

Although systems of magical practice were uncommon in ancient China, there have been many instances of the employment of magical means and the belief in a supernatural world peopled by gods, demons, and other beings. One writer comments:

"Although the Chinese mind possessed under such a constitution but few elements in which magic could strike root and throw out its ramifications and influence, yet we find many traces giving evidence of the instinctive movement of the mind, as well as of magical influence; though certainly not in the manner or abundance that we meet with it in India. The great variety of these appearances is, however, striking, as in no other country are they so seldom met with. . . .

"It is easy to understand from these circumstances wherefore we find so few of these phenomena of magic and the visionary and ecstatic state, in other parts of the East so frequent, and therefore they are scattered and uncertain. Accounts are, however, not wanting to show that the phenomena as well as theories of prophecy were known in more remote times. Under the Emperor Hoei Ti, about 304 A.D., a mystical sect arose in China calling themselves 'the teachers of the emptiness and nothingness of all things.' They also exhibited the art of binding the power of the senses, and producing a condition which they believed perfection."

Demonism and Obsession

The Chinese of former times were implicit believers in demons whom they imagined surrounded them on every hand. One writer states, "English officials, American missionaries, mandarins and many of the Chinese literati (Confucians, Taoists and Buddhist believers alike) declare that spiritism in some form, and under some name, is the almost universal belief of China. It is generally denominated 'ancestral worship.'" "There is no driving out of these Chinese," stated the missionary Father Gonzalo, "the cursed belief that the spirits of their ancestors are ever about them, availing themselves of every opportunity to give advice and counsel." And Justus Doolittle notes,

"The medium consulted takes in the hand a stick of lighted incense to dispel all defiling influences, then prayers of some kind are repeated, the body becomes spasmodic, the medium's eyes are shut, and the form sways about, assuming the walk and peculiar attitude of the spirit when in the body. Then the communication from the divinity begins, which may be of a fault-finding or a flattering character. . . . Sometimes these Chinese mediums profess to be possessed by some specified historical god of great healing power, and in this condition they prescribe for the sick. It is believed that the ghoul or spirit invoked actually casts himself into the medium, and dictates the medicine."

And in his work China and The Chinese (1869), John L. Nevins observes,

"Volumes might be written upon the gods, genii and familiar spirits supposed to be continually in communication with this people. The Chinese have a large number of books upon this subject, among the most noted of which is the 'Liau-chai-chei,' a large work of sixteen volumes. . . . Tu Sein signifies a spirit in the body, and there are a class of familiar spirits supposed to dwell in the bodies of certain Chinese who became the mediums of communication with the unseen world. Individuals said to be possessed by these spirits are visited by multitudes, particularly those who have lost recently relatives by death, and wish to converse with them. . . . Remarkable disclosures and revelations are believed to be made by the involuntary movements of a bamboo pencil, and through a similar method some claim to see in the dark. Persons considering themselves endowed with superior intelligence are firm believers in those and other modes of consulting spirits."

W. J. Plumb, a public teacher in Chen Sin Ling, states: "In the district of Tu-ching, obsessions by evil spirits or demons are very common." He further writes that "there are very many cases also in Chang-lo." Again he comments:

"When a man is thus afflicted, the spirit (Kwei) takes possession of his body without regard to his being strong or weak in health. It is not easy to resist the demon's power. Though without bodily ailments, possessed persons appear as if ill. When under the entrancing spell of the demon, they seem different from their ordinary selves.

"In most cases the spirit takes possession of a man's body contrary to his will, and he is helpless in the matter. The kwei has the power of driving out the man's spirit, as in sleep or dreams. When the subject awakes to consciousness, he has not the slightest knowledge of what has transpired.

"The actions of possessed persons vary exceedingly. They leap about and toss their arms, and then the demon tells them what particular spirit he is, often taking a false name, or deceitfully calling himself a god, or one of the genii come down to the abodes of mortals. Or, perhaps, it professes to be the spirit of a deceased husband or wife. There are also kwei of the quiet sort, who talk and laugh like other people, only that the voice is changed. Some have a voice like a bird. Some speak Mandarin—the language of Northern China—and some the local dialect; but though the speech proceeds from the mouth of the man, what is said does not appear to come from him. The outward appearance and manner is also changed.

"In Fu-show there is a class of persons who collect in large numbers and make use of incense, pictures, candles, and lamps to establish what are called 'incense tables.' Taoist priests are engaged to attend the ceremonies, and they also make use of 'mediums.' The Taoist writes a hand, stands like a graven image, thus signifying his willingness to have the demon come and take possession of him. Afterward, the charm is burned and the demon spirit is worshipped and invoked, the priest, in the meanwhile going on with his chanting. After a while the medium spirit has descended, and asks what is wanted of him. Then, whoever has requests to make, takes incense sticks, makes prostrations, and asks a response respecting some disease, or for protection from some calamity. In winter the same performances are carried on to a great extent by gambling companies. If some of the responses hit the mark, a large number of people are attracted. They establish a shrine and offer sacrifices, and appoint days, calling upon people from every quarter to come and consult the spirit respecting diseases. . . .

"There is also a class of men who establish what they call a 'Hall of Revelations.' At the present time there are many engaged in this practice. They are, for the most part, literary men of great ability. The people in large numbers apply to them for responses. The mediums spoken of above are also numerous. All of the above practices are not spirits seeking to possess men; but rather men seeking spirits to possess them, and allowing themselves to be voluntarily used as their instruments.

"As to the outward appearance of persons when possessed, of course, they are the same persons as to outward form as at ordinary times; but the colour of the countenance may change. The demon may cause the subject to assume a threatening air, and a fierce, violent manner. The muscles often stand out on the face, the eyes are closed, or they protrude with a frightful stare. These demons sometimes prophesy.

"The words spoken certainly proceed from the mouths of the persons possessed; but what is said does not appear to come from their minds or wills, but rather from some other personality, often accompanied by a change of voice. Of this there can be no doubt. When the subject returns to consciousness, he invariably declares himself ignorant of what he has said.

"The Chinese make use of various methods to cast out demons. They are so troubled and vexed by inflictions affecting bodily health, or it may be throwing stones, moving furniture, or the moving about and destruction of family utensils, that they are driven to call in the service of some respected scholar or Taoist priest, to offer sacrifices, or chant sacred books, and pray for protection and exemption from suffering. Some make use of sacrifices and offerings of paper clothes and money in order to induce the demon to go back to the gloomy region of Yanchow . . . As to whether these methods have any effect, I do not know. As a rule, when demons are not very troublesome, the families afflicted by them generally think it best to hide their affliction, or to keep those wicked spirits quiet by sacrifices, and burning incense to them."

An article in the London Daily News gave lengthy extracts from an address upon the Chinese by Mrs. Montague Beaucham, who had spent many years in China in educational work. Speaking of their spiritism, she said, "The latest London craze in using the planchette has been one of the recognized means in China of conversing with evil spirits from time immemorial." She had lived in one of the particular provinces known as demon land, where the natives are bound up in the belief and worship of spirits. "There is a real power," she added, "in this necromancy. They do healings and tell fortunes." She personally knew of one instance that the spirits through the planchette had foretold a great flood. The Boxer uprising was prophesied by the planchette. These spirits disturbed family relations, caused fits of frothing at the mouth, and made some of their victims insane. In closing she declared that "Chinese spiritism was from hell," the obsession baffling the power of both Christian missionaries and native priests.

Nevius sent out a circular communication for the purpose of discovering the actual beliefs of the Chinese regarding demonism through which he obtained much valuable information. Wang Wu-Fang, an educated Chinese, writes:

"Cases of demon possession abound among all classes. They are found among persons of robust health, as well as those who are weak and sickly. In many unquestionable cases of obsession, the unwilling subjects have resisted, but have been obliged to submit themselves to the control of the demon. . . .

"In the majority of cases of possession, the beginning of the malady is a fit of grief, anger, or mourning. These conditions seem to open the door to the demons. The outward manifestations are apt to be fierce and violent. It may be that the subject alternately talks and laughs; he walks awhile and then sits, or he rolls on the ground, or leaps about; or exhibits contortions of the body and twistings of the neck. . . . It was common among them to send for exorcists, who made use of written charms, or chanted verses, or punctured the body with needles. These are among the Chinese methods of cure.

"Demons are different kinds. There are those which clearly declare themselves; and then those who work in secret. There are those which are cast out with difficulty, and others with ease.

"In cases of possession by familiar demons, what is said by the subject certainly does not proceed from his own will. When the demon has gone out and the subject recovers consciousness, he has no recollection whatever of what he has said or done. This is true almost invariably.

"The methods by which the Chinese cast out demons are enticing them to leave by burning charms and paper money, or by begging and exhorting them, or by frightening them with magic spells and incantations, or driving them away by pricking with needles, or pinching with the fingers, in which case they cry out and promise to go.

"I was formerly accustomed to drive out demons by means of needles. At that time cases of possession by evil spirits were very common in our villages, and my services were in very frequent demand. . . ."

The missionary Rev. Timothy Richard writes in response to Nevius's circular:

"The Chinese orthodox definition of spirit is, 'the soul of the departed'; some of the best of whom are raised to the rank of gods. . . . There is no disease to which the Chinese are ordinarily subject that may not be caused by demons. In this case the mind is untouched. It is only the body that suffers; and the Chinese endeavour to get rid of the demon by vows and offerings to the gods. The subject in this case is an involuntary one. . . .

"Persons possessed range between 15 and 50 years of age, quite irrespective of sex. This infliction comes on very suddenly, sometimes in the day, and sometimes in the night. The demoniac talks madly, smashes everything near him, acquires unusual strength, tears his clothes into rags, and rushes into the street, or to the mountains or kills himself unless prevented. After this violent possession, the demoniac calms down and submits to his fate, but under the most heart-rending protests. These mad spells which are experienced on the demon's entrance return at intervals, and increase in frequency, and generally also in intensity, so that death at last ensues from their violence.

"Now we proceed to those, who involuntarily possessed, yield to and worship the demon. The demon says he will cease tormenting the demoniac if he will worship him, and he will reward him by increasing his riches. But if not, he will punish his victim, make heavier his torments and rob him of his property. People find that their food is cursed. They cannot prepare any, but filth and dirt comes down from the air to render it uneatable. Their wells are likewise cursed; their wardrobes are set on fire, and their money very mysteriously disappears. Hence arose the custom of cutting off the head of a string of cash that it might not run away. . . . When all efforts to rid themselves of the demon fail, they yield to it, and say 'Hold! Cease thy tormenting and we will worship thee!' A picture is pasted upon the wall, sometimes of a woman, and sometimes of a man, and incense is burned, and prostrations are made to it twice a month. Being thus reverenced, money now comes in mysteriously, instead of going out. Even mill-stones are made to move at the demon's orders, and the family becomes rich at once. But it is said that no luck attends such families, and they will eventually be reduced to poverty. Officials believe these things. Palaces are known to have been built by them for these demons, who, however, are obliged to be satisfied with humbler shrines from the poor. . . .

"Somewhat similar to the above class is another small one which has power to enter the lower regions. These are the opposite of necromancers, for instead of calling up the dead and learning of them about the future destiny of the individual in whose behalf they are engaged, they lie in a trance for two days, when their spirits are said to have gone to the Prince of Darkness, to inquire how long the sick person shall be left among the living. . . .

"Let us now note the different methods adopted to cast out the evil spirits from the demoniacs. Doctors are called to do it. They use needles to puncture the tips of the fingers, the nose, the neck. They also use a certain pill, and apply it in the following manner: the thumbs of the two hands are tied tightly together, and the two big toes are tied together in the same manner. Then one pill is put on the two big toes at the root of the nail, and the other at the root of the thumb nails. At the same instant the two pills are set on fire, and they are kept until the flesh is burned. In the application of the pills, or in the piercing of the needle, the invariable cry is; 'I am going; I am going immediately. I will never dare to come back again. Oh, have mercy on me this once. I'll never return!'

"When the doctors fail, they call on people who practice spiritism. They themselves cannot drive the demon away, but they call another demon to do it. Both the Confucianists and Taoists practice this method. . . . Sometimes the spirits are very ungovernable. Tables are turned, chairs are rattled, and a general noise of smashing is heard, until the very mediums themselves tremble with fear. If the demon is of this dreadful character, they quickly write another charm with the name of the particular spirit whose quiet disposition is known to them. Lutsu is a favourite one of this kind. After the burning of the charm and incense, and when prostrations are made, a little frame is procured, to which a Chinese pencil is attached. Two men on each side hold it on a table spread with sand or millet. Sometimes a prescription is written, the pencil moving of its own accord. They buy the medicine prescribed and give it to the possessed. . . . Should they find that burning incense and offering sacrifices fails to liberate the poor victim, they may call in conjurors, such as the Taoists, who sit on mats and are carried by invisible power from place to place. The ascend to a height of twenty or fifty feet, and are carried to a distance of four or five li (about a half mile). Of this class are those who, in Manchuria call down fire from the sky in those funerals where the corpse is burned. . . .

"These exorcists may belong to any of the three religions in China. The dragon procession, on the fifteenth of the first month, is said by some to commemorate a Buddhist priest's victory over evil spirits. . . . They paste up charms on windows and doors, and on the body of the demoniac, and conjure the demon never to return. The evil spirit answers: 'I'll never return. You need not take the trouble of pasting all these charms upon the doors and windows.'

"Exorcists are specially hated by the evil spirits. Sometimes they feel themselves beaten fearfully; but no hand is seen. Bricks and stones may fall on them from the sky or housetops. On the road they may without warning be plastered over from head to foot with mud or filth; or may be seized when approaching a river, and held under the water and drowned."

In his Social Life among the Chinese (2 vols., 1866), Doolittle states,

"They have invented several ways by which they find out the pleasure of gods and spirits. One of the most common of their utensils is the Ka-pue, a piece of bamboo root, bean- shaped, and divided in the centre, to indicate the positive and the negative. The incense lighted, the Ka-pue properly manipulated before the symbol god, the pieces are tossed from the medium's hand, indicating the will of the spirit by the way they fall."

The following manifestation is mental rather than physical:

"The professional takes in the hand a stick of lighted incense to expel all defiling influences; prayers of some sort are repeated, the fingers interlaced, and the medium's eyes are shut, giving unmistakable evidence of being possessed by some supernatural or spiritual power. The body sways back and forward; the incense falls, and the person begins to step about, assuming the walk and peculiar attitude of the spirit. This is considered as infallible proof that the divinity has entered the body of the medium. Sometimes the god, using the mouth of the medium, gives the supplicant a sound scolding for invoking his aid to obtain unlawful or unworthy ends."

And Sir John Burrowa writes, "Divination with many strange methods of summoning the dead to instruct the living and reveal the future, is of very ancient origin, as is proved by Chinese manuscripts antedating the revelations of the Jewish Scriptures."

An ancient book called Poh-shi-ching-tsung, consisting of six volumes on the source of true divination, contains the following preface:

"The secret of augury consists in the study of the mysteries and in communications with gods and demons. The interpretations of the transformations are deep and mysterious. The theory of the science is most intricate, the practice of it most important. The sacred classic says: 'That which is true gives indications of the future.' To know the condition of the dead, and hold with them intelligent intercourse, as did the ancients, produces a most salutary influence upon the parties. . . . But when from intoxication or feasting, or licentious pleasures, they proceed to invoke the gods, what infatuation to suppose that their prayers will move them. Often when no response is given, or the interpretation is not verified, they lay the blame at the door of the augur, forgetting that their failure is due to their want of sincerity. . . . It is the great fault of augurs, too, that, from a desire of gain, they use the art of divination as a trap to ensnare the people.''

Peebles adds:

''Naturally undemonstrative and secretive, the higher classes of Chinese seek to conceal their full knowledge of spirit intercourse from foreigners, and from the inferior castes of their own countrymen, thinking them not sufficiently intelligent to rightly use it. The lower orders, superstitious and money-grasping, often prostitute their magic gifts to gain and fortune-telling. Their clairvoyant fortune-tellers, surpassing wandering gypsies in 'hitting' the past, infest the temples, streets and roadsides, promising to find lost property, discover precious metals and reveal the hidden future.''

Ghosts

The Chinese were strong in the belief that they were surrounded by the spirits of the dead. Indeed ancestor-worship constituted a powerful feature in the national faith, involving the likelihood and desirability of communion with the dead. Upon the death of a person they used to make a hole in the roof to permit the soul to effect its escape from the house. When a child was at the point of death, its mother would go into the garden and call its name, hoping thereby to bring back its wandering spirit.

''With the Chinese the souls of suicides are specially obnoxious, and they consider that the very worst penalty that can befall a soul is the sight of its former surroundings. Thus, it is supposed that, in the case of the wicked man, 'they only see their homes as if they were near them; they see their last wishes disregarded, everything upside down, their substance squandered, strangers possess the old estate; in their misery the dead man's family curse him, his children become corrupt, land is gone, the wife sees her husband tortured, the husband sees his wife stricken down with mortal disease; even friends forget, but some, perhaps, for the sake of bygone times, may stroke the coffin and let fall a tear, departing with a cold smile.'

''In China, the ghosts which are animated by a sense of duty are frequently seen: at one time they seek to serve virtue in distress, and at another they aim to restore wrongfully held treasure. Indeed, as it has been observed, 'one of the most powerful as well as the most widely diffused of the people's ghost stories is that which treats of the persecuted child whose mother comes out of the grave to succour him.'

''The Chinese have a dread of the wandering spirits of persons who have come to an unfortunate end. At Canton, 1817, the wife of an officer of government had occasioned the death of two female domestic slaves, from some jealous suspicion it was supposed of her husband's conduct towards the girls; and, in order to screen herself from the consequences, she suspended the bodies by the neck, with a view to its being construed into an act of suicide. But the conscience of the woman tormented her to such a degree that she became insane, and at times personated the spirits of the murdered girls possessed her, and utilised her mouth to declare her own guilt. In her ravings she tore her clothes and beat her own person with all the fury of madness; after which she would recover her senses for a time, when it was supposed the demons quitted her, but only to return with greater frenzy, which took place a short time previous to her death. According to Mr. Dennys, the most common form of Chinese ghost story is that wherein the ghost seeks to bring to justice the murderer who shuffled off its mortal coil.''

Poltergeists were not uncommon in China, and several cases of their occurrence were recorded by the Jesuit missionaries of the eighteenth century in Cochin China.

Symbolism

There are numerous mysteries of meaning in the strange symbols, characters, personages, birds, and beasts that adorn all species of Chinese art objects. For example, a rectangular Chinese vase is feminine, representing the creative or ultimate principle. A group of seemingly miscellaneous art objects, depicted perhaps upon a brush tray, are probably the po-ku, or ''hundred antiques'' emblematic of culture and implying a delicate compliment to the recipient of the tray. Birds and animals occur with frequency on Chinese porcelains, and, if one observes closely, it is a somewhat select menagerie, in which certain types are emphasized by repetition. For instance, the dragon is so familiar as to be no longer remarked, and yet his significance is perhaps not fully understood by all. There are, in fact, three kinds of dragons, the lung of the sky, the li of the sea, and the kiau of the marshes. The lung is the favorite kind, however, and may be known when met by his having ''the head of a camel, the horns of a deer, the eyes of a rabbit, ears of a cow, neck of a snake, belly of a frog, scales of a carp, claws of a hawk, and palm of a tiger.'' His special office is to guard and support the mansions of the gods, and he is naturally the peculiar symbol of the emperor.

A less familiar beast is the chi-lin, which resembles in part a rhinoceros, but has a head, feet, and legs like a deer, and a tufted tail. In spite of his unprepossessing appearance, he is of a benevolent disposition, and his image on a vase or other ornament is an emblem of good government and length of days. A strange bird, having the head of a pheasant, a long flexible neck, and a plumed tail, may often be seen flying in the midst of scroll-like clouds, or walking in a grove of treepeonies. This is the fengbuang, the Chinese phoenix, emblem of immortality and appearing to mortals only as a presage of the auspicious reign of a virtuous emperor. The tortoise (kuei), which bears upon its back the seagirt abode of the Eight Immortals, is a third supernatural creature associated with strength, longevity, and (because of the markings on its back) the mystic plan of numerals that is a key to the philosophy of the unseen.

Colors have their significance, blue being the color of the heavens, yellow of the earth and the emperor, red of the sun, and white of Jupiter or the Year Star. Each dynasty had its own particular hue, that of the Chou dynasty being described as ''blue of the sky after rain where it appears between the clouds.''

The apparently haphazard conjunction of objects in the decorative schemes of Chinese art is far from being a matter of chance, but adds to its decorative properties the intellectual charm of symbolic significance.

China in the Modern World

In the great political and economic upheavals of modern times, culminating in the establishment of the People's Republic of China October 1, 1949, many old beliefs, superstitions, and practices have been swept away, but in the emergence of China as a modern nation many skills from the past have also been revived and developed. The references to ''pricking with needles'' quoted earlier can now be seen as an imperfectly understood observation of the practice of acupuncture, an interesting blend of mystical concepts of anatomy and medical healing. Acupuncture and its associated skills of moxibustion and acupressure are now gaining ground in Western countries.

Also familiar in the West is the group of Asian martial arts, combining mental, physical, and spiritual resources for self-defense in weaponless fighting, or the achievement of apparently paranormal feats of strength and control. These involve the concept of ch'i (or ki), a subtle vital energy that can be controlled by willpower. Also taught in Western countries is the Chinese system of physical exercises known as t'ai chi chuan, originally a self-defense system.

Another element of Chinese tradition to attract popular interest is the I Ching, a book embodying a system of philosophy and divination, now widely consulted in various translations in Western countries.

With the opening up of communications and cultural relations with the West, many ancient Chinese mystical teachings and practices are now becoming more widely known. Chinese astrology is over a thousand years old but has not been familiar in the West nearly as long. Like the Western zodiac, it comprises twelve signs. But it operates on a completely different system; it is based on a 12-year rather than 12-month cycle, and each year is symbolized by the sign of an animal—rat, bull, tiger, cat, dragon, snake, horse, goat, monkey, rooster, dog, and pig. The attributes of these animals differ radically from the pejorative associations of the West (for example, rats are intellectual, affable, generous, and fun-loving) and can be found in Chinese astrological manuals.

Buddhism was known in China from the beginning of the Christian era, and the Ch'an or Zen school was established in the sixth century with the arrival of the patriarch Bodhidharma. China developed its own individual forms of yoga, often merging with Taoism. Taoist yoga developed from the Hindu concepts of kundalini and brought together special practices of physical development, diet, and meditation. These were often characterized by the term "K'ai Men," meaning "open door," expressing the idea of Taoist yoga as the doorway to the channels of mind, spirit, and body, and reflecting the harmony and balance of the principles of yin and yang in the universe. These teachings and practices, long a secret tradition, have now gained some attention in the Western countries through such authorities as Lu K'uan Yü (Charles Luk), Mantak Chia, and Maneewan Chia. On a more popular level, the simpler mind-body exercises of t'ai chi chuan, an offshoot of the Taoist tradition, have now been revived widely in China and the rest of the world.

In the pragmatic liberalism of present-day China, religions are now widely tolerated, and in 1968, the Liaoning People's Publishing House released a series of books titled Man and Culture, which included the standard guide to psychical research by Ivor Grattan-Guinness, Psychical Research; A Guide to Its History, Principles, and Practices. This work was issued in celebration of a hundred years of the Society for Psychical Research, London, and its release in China signifies an interest in reputable academic study of parapsychology.

The current Chinese approach to research in claimed paranormal phenomena is in terms of materialistic philosophy, and in place of Western terms like "extrasensory perception," Chinese researchers speak of "EHF" (exceptional human function). A number of Chinese children have claimed to demonstrate such EHF faculties as identifying hidden targets of Chinese written characters, under test conditions (like Western parapsychology tests for ESP with Zener cards or other targets), psychokinesis, and teleportation. A team of five members from the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal, the skeptical debunking organization, visited China during March and April of 1988 and while there tested a number of EHF subjects and investigated claims at the Institute of Scientific and Technical Information of China, Beijing. CSICOP findings were, as expected, largely negative. For an account of the visit, see The Skeptical Inquirer (12, no. 4, summer 1988).

Sources:

Academy of Traditional Chinese Medicine. An Outline of Chinese Acupuncture. China Books, 1975.

Carus, Paul. Chinese Astrology. LaSalle, Ill.: Open Court, 1907.

Cerney, J. V. Acupressure, Acupuncture Without Needles. Virginia Beach, Va.: Cornerstone, 1975.

Chee Soo. Chinese Yoga: The Chinese Art of K'ai Men. London: Gordon & Cremonesi, 1977.

Chia, Mantak. Awaken Healing Energy Through the Tao: The Taoist Secret of Circulating Internal Power. New York: Aurora Press, 1983.

———. Iron Shirt Chi Kung I. Huntington, N.Y.: Healing Tao Books, 1986.

Chia, Mantak, and Maneewan Chia. Healing Love Through the Tao: Cultivating Female Sexual Energy. Huntington, N.Y.: Healing Tao Books, 1986.

Da Lui. T'ai Chu'an and I Ching. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

Huard, Pierre, and Ming Wong. Oriental Methods of Mental & Physical Fitness: The Complete Book of Meditation, Kinesiotherapy & Martial Arts in China, India & Japan. New York: Funk & Wagnall, 1971.

Latourette, K. C. The Chinese: Their History & Culture. 2 vols. New York: Macmillan, 1934.

Legge, James, trans. I Ching; Book of Changes. New York: Causeway, 1973.

Luk, Charles [Lu K'uan Yü]. The Secrets of Chinese Meditation. London: Rider, 1964.

———. Taoist Yoga: Alchemy and Immortality. London: Rider, 1970.

Morgan, Harry T. Chinese Symbols and Superstitions. P. D. and Ione Perkins, 1942. Reprint, Detroit: Gale Research, 1972.

Sivin, Nathan. Chinese Alchemy. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1968.

Wilhelm, Hans. Your Chinese Horoscope. New York: Avon, 1980.

Yang, C. K. Religion in Chinese Society. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1961.

Chinese Astrology

As the ancient Chinese observed the heavens, they mapped it with a completely different grid than that imposed by their contemporaries in the Mediterranean Basin and created a very different astrology. Most Westerners have encountered this very different astrology in the designation of each year with the name of an animal, a frequently used motif in Chinese pop art.

Chinese astrology gives primary consideration to the movement of the moon through its 28-day orbit around the Earth. Each day is considered a different mansion, and the 28 mansions are grouped into four sets corresponding to the four phases of the moon. Detailed charts provide the data on which mansion the moon is in on any given day. Particular meanings are assigned to each of the 28 mansions that are grouped thusly:

The Green Dragon of Spring

1. The Horn
2. The Neck
3. The Base
4. The Room
5. The Heart
6. The Tail
7. The Basket

The Black Tortoise of Winter (new moon)

8. The Ladle
9. The Ox-Boy
10. The Maiden
11. The Void
12. The Rooftop
13. The House
14. The Wall

The White Tiger of Autumn

15. Astride
16. The Mound
17. The Stomach
18. The Pleiades
19. The Net
20. The Beak
21. Orion

The Red Bird of Summer (full moon)

22. The Well
23. Ghosts
24. The Willow
25. The Bird
26. The Bow
27. The Wings
28. The Carriage.

Chinese astrology in general has two goals: the prediction of the future, and the determination of auspicious days upon which to initiate a particular enterprise (especially to marry or to begin a new business endeavor). For example, the Pleiades is an unfortunate day to marry or initiate any family activity, while the next day is a good day. The Mound is a good day for initiating construction projects such as building a new house.

The visible planets (Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn) are associated with the five basic elements as discerned by ancient Chinese thought (water, metal, fire, wood, and earth). They are analogous to the four elements of ancient Greek thought (earth, air, fire, and water). Characteristics assigned to the various planets have some likenesses to Western astrology, but important differences as well. For example, Venus, the feminine planet in the West, is a very masculine planet in China.

The 12 signs that lend their names to each year in the Chinese calendar appear to be an addition to Chinese astrology, possibly from lands to the West. They derive from the observation of the 12-year period that it requires for the planet Jupiter to complete its orbit. Each year is associated with an animal (rat, ox, tiger, rabbit, dragon, snake, horse, sheep, monkey, cock, dog, and pig). In Chinese thought, animals such as the rat, snake, and pig do not have the negative association that dominates in the West.

As with all things Chinese, Chinese astrology received the attention of Westerners beginning with President Nixon's opening of a new positive phase of United States-Chinese relations in the 1970s. Among the first attempts to create an interest in Chinese astrology was made by psychic Daniel Logan in a 1972 book. In the intervening years a selection of books delineating the Chinese system has appeared. However, Chinese astrology has not become established in the West in the manner of other Chinese practices such as acupuncture, tai chi, or macrobiotics. It is primarily practiced in Chinese ethnic communities. Unlike Vedic astrology, the Chinese system is too different for the dominant astrology of the West that has been in a significant growth phase.

Sources:

Logan, Daniel. Your Eastern Star: Oriental Astrology, Reincarnation, and the Future. New York: William Morrow and Co., 1972.

Walters, Derek. Interpreting the Revelations of the Celestial Messengers. Wellingborough, UK: Aquarian Press, 1987.

———. The Chinese Astrology Workbook: How to Calculate and Interpret Chinese Horoscopes. Wellingborough, UK: Aquarian Press, 1988.

Chinmoy, Sri (1931–)

Sri Kumar Ghose Chinmoy is a modern Hindu mystic. He was born August 27, 1931, in Chittagong, East Bengal. He is said to have had profound mystical experiences during childhood, achieving the enlightened condition of nirvikalpa samadhi (superconsciousness beyond subject and object) at the age of twelve. Soon afterward, he entered the Sri Aurobindo Ashram at Pondicherry, where he remained for 20 years, developing and perfecting his realization through prayer and meditation.

Sri Chinmoy immigrated to the United States in 1964 and founded a center in New York. Soon his teachings spread to Puerto Rico, then to other parts of North America, Europe, and the Far East. After establishing his mission in America, he conducted regular weekly meditations for delegates and staff at the United Nations Church Center (dedicated to creating world peace through spiritual development) in New York; later he became the first director of the U.N. Meditation Group. Sri Chinmoy has also lectured at more than 150 universities throughout the world, including Oxford and Cambridge. He had a private audience at the Vatican with Pope Paul, who presented him with a medallion.

Sri Chinmoy's basic teaching is the pathway of love, devotion, and surrender to God. He also emphasizes the value of sports, particularly running, and is himself a dedicated runner. The Sri Chinmoy Center in New York sponsors over 100 public races each year, including marathons and ultramarathons, which are an example of what Chinmoy refers to as the meditation of action. The center also runs the Annam Brahma Restaurant in Jamaica, New York.

Sri Chinmoy has written over 300 books of spiritual aphorisms, lectures, poems, and questions and answers and has composed over 2,000 songs and musical works. He has given concerts at music centers in the United States and Europe. He has also expressed the experience of meditation in color and form in thousands of mystical paintings. There are now Sri Chinmoy centers throughout the world. U.S. address: PO Box 32433, Jamaica, NY 11432.

Sources:

Chinmoy, Sri. Arise! Awake! Thoughts of a Yogi. New York: F. Fell, 1972.

———. Astrology: The Supernatural and the Beyond. Hollis, N.Y.: Vishma Press,1973.

———. Death and Reincarnation: Eternity's Voyage. Jamaica, N.Y.: Agni Press, 1974.

———. Mother India's Light-house. San Francisco: Shi Chinmoy Center, n.d.

———. The Seeker's Mind. Jamaica, N.Y.: Agni Press, 1978.

Chintamani

A mythical wish-fulfilling stone described in ancient Hindu scriptures, clearly related to later legends of the philosophers' stone.

Chips of Gallows

Chips from gallows and places of execution were said to make effective amulets against ague.

Chirognomy

The art of estimating character by inspecting the hand. Other impressive synonyms for palmistry included chirology and chiromancy. The Greek word cheir (hand) was used by the noted palmist Count Louis Hamon (1836–1936) in his pseudonym, Cheiro.

Chirology

Another name for chirognomy or palmistry.

Chiron

A comet discovered in 1977 whose existence has been integrated into contemporary astrology. Chiron, as originally observed by astronomer Charles Kowal, is an estimated 150 miles in diameter, by far the largest comet-like body in the solar system. It was thought to be a planetoid traveling in its orbit between Saturn and Uranus and only in 1990 discovered to be a comet.

Believed to be a new planet, astrologers moved quickly to integrate it into traditional astrology. A volume detailing its movement through the astrological signs was quickly compiled and made available at the 1978 meeting of the Astrologers' Guild of America. Zane B. Stein founded the Association for Studying Chiron and published initial speculations in the association's periodical, The Key. He also authored the first book on the planet, Interpreting Chiron, in 1983. It was immediately followed by several others in the attempt to offer psychological insights into the new factor in the horoscope. The story of the ancient Greek mythological character for whom the planet was named was detailed by Dale O'Brien, who saw him as the first astrologer, trained by Artemis and Apollo.

By the time that Chiron was discovered to be a comet, an estimated 20 percent of practicing astrologers were regularly adding it to their clients' charts (astrologers being quite conservative in making any major alteration to the preparation of charts). The discovery that Chiron was a comet did not lead to any demise in its popularity, though it may slow any further acceptance by the next generation and inclusion in twenty-first century astrological textbooks. In the 1990s, The Key was superseded by Chironicles: A Newsletter Dedicated to the Myth and Astrology of Chiron, and the Practice of Astrology from a Chironic Perspective (available from P.O. Box 41127, Sacramento, CA 95841).

Sources:

Clow, Barabra Hand. Chiron: Rainbow Bridge Between the Inner and Outer Planets. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1989.

O'Brien, Dale. The Myth of Chiron. Temple Hills, Md.: The Author, 1991. Audiotape.

Reinhart, Melanie. Chiron and the Healing Journey: An Astrological and Psychological Perspective. London: Arcana, 1989.

Stein, Zane B. Interpreting Chiron. New York: The Author, 1983.

CHITON See MYANMAR

Chochurah

The Kabalist name for wisdom. (See also Kabala)

Choisnard, Paul (1867–1930)

Paul Choisnard, a pioneer of the modern astrological revival in France, was born February 13, 1867, at Tours. Following his graduation from L'École Polytechnique in Paris, he joined the army and rose to the rank of major in the artillery. While pursuing his military career, he also became interested in astrology and launched statistical research as a means of establishing the reality of planetary influence upon human affairs. In order to have his controversial sideline separate from his career, he wrote and published under the pseudonym Paul Flambert and only after his retirement went public with his astrological identity.

Choisnard's books were never translated and had little influence in the English-speaking astrological community. However, they were read by German astrologer Karl Ernst Krafft and underlie his research, which in turn led to the contemporary well-known work of Michel Gauquelin and Francoise Gauquelin. Choisnard died February 9, 1930.

Sources:

Flambert, Paul [Paul Choisnard]. Etude nouvelle sur l'hérédité. Paris, 1903.

———. Influence astrale. Paris, 1901.

———. Langage astral. Paris, 1903.

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

Chov-hani

The Gypsy name for a witch. (See also Gypsies)

Choynowski, Mieczyslaw (1909–)

Director of the Psychometrical Laboratory, Polish Academy of Sciences. Choynowski was born November 1, 1909, in Poland and studied at Warsaw University (M.A., 1937) and Jagellonian University (Ph.D., 1946). After graduation he became the editor of the Polish journal Life of Science and from 1951 to 1960 was director of the Psychological Laboratory, State Hospital for Mental Illness, Krakow-Kobierzyn.

Choynowski was a visiting Ford Foundation fellow to the United States in 1957–58. He has been a member of the Polish Psychological Association, the Association Internationale de Psychologie Appliquée, the American Statistical Association, and the Association Internationale de Cybernétique; a foreign affiliate of the American Psychological Association; and a graduate member of the British Psychological Society. His acceptance of parapsychology is marked with skepticism, especially regarding experimental studies of telepathy and clairvoyance.

Christian, Paul (1811–1877)

Pseudonym of Jean Baptiste Pitois, who wrote The History and Practice of Magic, first published in France in 1870. He was born May 15, 1811, at Remiremont, France. His family wanted him to become a priest and allowed him to be raised in a monastic community. However, he eventually decided against the priesthood, and as a young man moved to Paris, where he became the associate of Charles Nodier, one of the leading literary lights of the romantic movement, which was then emerging on the Continent. Nodier's interest in the occult transferred to Pitois.

Pitois became a journalist and wrote largely under the pen name Paul Christian. He cowrote Historic Paris: Walks in the Streets of Paris (1837–1840), which was his first book, with Nodier. It was followed by his Studies of the Paris Revolution (1839). That same year he was appointed librarian of the Ministry of Public Education. Working with Nodier through the mass of uncataloged material opened up a new level of interest in the occult, although it was not manifested for years. Meanwhile, he took his turn in the French army (Algiers, 1843–44) and wrote several historical texts. His most important were the History of the Terrors (1853) and the multivolume Heroes of Christianity (1853–57). A hint of what was to come appeared in 1844 with his Stories of the Marvelous from All Times and Lands.

Pitois had read about occultism and developed a strong anticlerical stance. During his life, many Eastern texts had been translated into French, as had the works of Emanuel Swedenborg. In 1859 Pitois turned his attention to writing Historie de la Magie, du monde Surnaturel et de la fatalité a travers les Temps et les Peuples (1870). Carefully written so as not to offend his largely Catholic audience, it immediately became popular public reading. It surveyed the whole of the occult, explaining each element, and provided a history of occult practice in the West from ancient times.

Pitois wrote one additional book, The History of the War with Prussia and of the Two Sieges of Paris, 1870–71 (1872–73). His health declined through the 1870s, and he died at Lyons on July 12, 1877. He left behind a still-unpublished work on astrology that reportedly contains numerous allusions to contemporary events as proof of the value of the horoscope.

Sources:

Christian, Paul [Jean Baptiste Pitois]. Historie de la Magie, du monde Surnaturel et de la fatalité a travers les Temps et les Peuples. 1870. Translated by Ross Nichols as The History and Practice of Magic. New York: Citadel Press, 1969.

Christian Fellowship Organization

Edward Lewis Hodges, a physician in San Diego, California, claimed to be the earthy representative of the Secret Order of the Christian Brotherhood and School of Christian Initiation. Similar to what has been elsewhere termed the Great White Brotherhood, the Secret Order of the Christian Brotherhood was seen as consisting of those evolved beings who in ages past had so spiritualized their bodies and perfected their understanding that they had been given the keys to the Kingdom Universal. Their present task is to guide the Earth. As an initiate, Hodges was given the order's teachings and told to propagate them. He founded the Christian Fellowship Organization as an instrument for the order and in 1938 published their teachings in a book, The Teachings of the Secret Order of the Christian Brotherhood.

The order taught a means of achieving liberation through the restoration and spiritualization of the body. Jesus headed the order during his earthly ministry and taught the means of spiritualization. The great secret of life was God, expressed through Jesus, the mortal man. We must look beyond Jesus to the Christ within. Christ within the human form is the saving potential. The first step on the path of initiation is realizing oneness with the Christ within.

The organization taught a process of liberation from death through spiritualization of the body. Students were asked to place themselves under the "cultural condition of the Christian brotherhood," by invoking its presence. They were also given a set of affirmations (positive prayers) to bring about conditions of health, prosperity, and spiritualization. Eventually, the individual should be able to take his or her body to heavenly worlds and return as he or she sees fit.

The organization functioned into the 1950s, but appears to have become defunct.

Sources:

Hodges, Edward Lewi. Be Healed. . . A Remedy That Never Fails. San Diego: Christian Fellowship Organization, 1949.

———. Teachings of the Secret Order of the Christian Brotherhood. Santa Barbara: J. F. Rowney Press, 1938.

———. Wealth and Riches by Divine Right. San Diego: Christian Fellowship Organization, 1945.

The Christian Parapsychologist

British journal concerned with religious aspects of parapsychology. Published quarterly by the Churches' Fellowship for Psychical and Spiritual Studies, it includes book reviews. Address: General Secretary, CFPSS, The Rural Workshop, South Road, North Somercotes, Nr Louth, Lincolnshire LN11 7PT. Website: http://www.cfpss.freeserve.co.uk/.

Christian Science See Church of Christ, Scientist

Christian Spirit Center

The Christian Spirit Center was an American branch of the Brazilian Spiritualist movement and existed primarily to translate the messages of Brazilian mediums (spoken in Portuguese) into English. Brazilian Spiritualism is derived from the French spiritism of Allan Kardec and gives central importance to reincarnation.

The center affirmed the continuity of life after death (proved by Christ in his resurrection), the law of cause and effect, reincarnation, and the freedom and moral responsibility of people. Last known address: P.O. Box 114, Elon College, NC 27244.

Christian Spiritual Alliance, Church of the (CSA)

In spite of its name, the Church of the Christian Spiritual Alliance (CSA) was a Hindu organization with teachings derived from Swami Paramahansa Yogananda. However, the organization was originally founded in 1962 by H. Edwin O'Neal, formerly a Baptist; his wife, Lois O'Neal, a Religious Scientist; and William Arnold Lynn, all of whom embraced a form of metaphysical Christianity. O'Neal took over Orion, an older metaphysical publication founded by Ural Murphy, and made it a CSA periodical.

In the late 1960s O'Neal was joined by Roy Eugene Davis, a former minister with the Self-Realization Fellowship in Phoenix, Arizona, who left that group to found the independent New Life World-Wide. Davis contributed his periodical, Truth Journal, and his national speaking tours brought many new members to CSA. In 1977 O'Neal resigned as chairman of the board and president of the CSA Press and turned the organization over to Davis. Soon after, all hint of metaphysical Christianity was dropped in favor of the kriya yoga teachings advocated by Davis.

By the early 1990s the church had centers across the United States and Canada and had expanded to Germany, Ghana, and South Africa. The headquarters complex in Lakemont, Georgia, included facilities of the CSA Press, the Center for Spiritual Awareness, an educational arm, and the Shrine of All Faiths and Sacred Initiation Temple. Last known address: P.O. Box 7, Lakemont, GA 30552-0001.

Sources:

Davis, Roy Eugene. An Easy Guide to Meditation. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA Press, 1978.

———. God Has Given Us Every Good Thing. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA Press, 1986.

———. The Teachings of the Masters of Perfection. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA Press, 1979.

———. The Way of the Initiate. St. Petersburg, Fla.: New Life World-Wide, 1968.

The Christian Spiritualist

The name of several now-defunct Spiritualist periodicals. The first was published in New York from 1854 to 1857 by the Society for the Diffusion of Spiritual Knowledge; a second was a British Spiritualist monthly, founded in 1871 by Rev. F. R. Young, that appeared for several years. The last was also a British Spiritualist journal, established in 1926 and published weekly by the Society of Communion, London; it was edited by Rev. J. W. Potter, in Wiltshire.

Christian Spiritualists

Spiritualists of the mid-nineteenth century who saw in the Bible a depiction of Spiritualist truth. They believed Jesus to be a great medium. In contrast, most Spiritualists were not Christians, believing that Spiritualist contact with the dead stood in contradiction to Christian doctrines of the resurrection. In the United States, Moses Hull was the first major champion of the Christian Spiritualist perspective.

Sources:

Hull, Daniel. Moses Hull. Wellesley, MA: Maugus Printing, 1907.

Christopher, Milbourne (1914–1984)

One of America's leading conjuring magicians and chairman of the Occult Investigation Committee of the Society of American Magicians. Christopher entered the public eye in the mid-1970s when he challenged the feats of Uri Geller and other psychics in his book Mediums, Mystics and the Occult (1975). Based upon his observations, Christopher asserted that Geller was a clever conjurer and suggested various techniques by which his apparently paranormal feats were accomplished.

Born in Baltimore, Maryland in 1914, Christopher practiced conjuring from early childhood. During the Depression years, he performed for the Roosevelts at the White House. He performed in more than 60 countries and amassed one of the world's largest private collections of magic memorabilia, including prints, paintings, letters, scrapbooks, playbills, drawings, and photographs relating to the great magicians of history. He wrote several books on the history of magic and his personal hero, Harry Houdini.

Although Christopher was a skeptic as far as occult and psychic phenomena were concerned, his writings on the subject had a precision and scholarly cast. He avoided making broad accusations against individuals; those searching for truth in paranormal research have found Christopher's skeptical writings valuable for their careful research and thoughtful presentation. Additional books on the paranormal by Christopher include ESP, Seers & Psychics (1970) and Search for the Soul (1979), a report on the continuing quest by psychics and scientists for evidence of life after death.

Christopher did much to popularize magic shows on television during the 1950s and demonstrated some amazing acts, including making an elephant vanish and catching a bullet fired from a rifle in his mouth. He also served as president of the American Society of Magicians. He died in New York, June 17, 1984, after complications following surgery.

Sources:

Christopher, Milbourne. ESP, Seers & Psychics. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1970.

———. Houdini: The Untold Story. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1969. Reprint, New York: Pocket Books, 1970.

———. The Illustrated History of Magic. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1973.

———. Mediums, Mystics and the Occult. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1975.

———. Panorama of Magic. New York: Dover Publications, 1962.

Christos Experience

A technique for inducing altered states of consciousness, as first described in the book Windows of the Mind (1974) by Australian novelist G. M. Glaskin. The Greek word Christos (anointed one) was thought by Glaskin to mean "inner self." The technique involves massaging the subject's feet and forehead before a series of visualization exercises, culminating in the experience of traveling by mind (imagination) to other places, identities, and time periods. When successful the technique produces a vivid and stimulating experience that often includes reexperiencing events believed to have happened in former lives.

The Christos experiments originated with a group in isolated Western Australia who published a magazine titled Open Mind. Glaskin first described the experiments in his books Windows of the Mind; Discovering Your Past and Future Lives Through Massage and Mental Exercise (1974) and The Christos Experiment (1974). He subsequently published two additional books on the subject: Worlds Within: Probing the Christos Experience (1976) and A Door to Eternity; Proving the Christos Experience (1979). (See also Arnall Bloxham; double; dreaming true; out-of-the-body travel)

Sources:

Glaskin, G. M. A Door to Eternity: Proving the Christos Experience. London: Wildwood House, 1979.

———. Windows of the Mind; Discovering Your Past and Future Lives Through Massage and Mental Exercise. New York: Delacorte Press, New York, 1974. Reprinted as Windows of the Mind: The Christos Experiment. London: Wildwood House, 1974.

———. Worlds Within: Probing The Christos Experience. London: Wildwood House, 1976. Reprint, Lonson: Arrow, 1978.

Chromotherapy

Chromotherapy, the practice of healing with color, emerged in the nineteenth century as the object of scientific speculation and research, out of which various practitioners created new forms of alternative healing. Modern color healing combined occult thought about color with scientific investigations of the physical properties of light and behavioral psychologists' studies of human reactions to various colors.

Early Beginnings

Augustus James Pleasanton is usually credited with beginning the contemporary enthusiasm for color healing by initiating what became known as the "blue glass craze." Pleasanton claimed that in experiments on grape vines in his laboratory, he had been able to increase the production of grapes by alternating clear sunlight with blue-filtered light. News of his findings led many to purchase blue panes of glass under which they took sunbaths, seemingly oblivious to the denunciations of many of Pleasanton's scientific colleagues. Pleasanton's work led to the first formal studies of chromotherapy in the 1870s, which led to the publication of Blue and Red Light; or, Light and Its Rays as Medicine (1877) by Dr. S. Pancoast.

By far the most important of the early chromotherapists, however, was Edwin Dwight Babbitt. As early as 1876 he had announced his explorations of the means of atoms interacting with "etheric" forces to produce the effects of heat, light, and electricity. He further claimed in his 1878 book, The Principles of Light and Color, that color directly affected humans. He suggested a method by which people could make practical use of his claims—water should be charged by putting it in a colored bottle and then placing the bottle in strong sunlight. Babbitt produced no hard data to back up his claims, and they were soon forgotten by most. Among the few who took them seriously was a young Indian scientist-inventor, Dinshah Pestanji Ghadiali (1873–1966).

Twentieth-Century Chromotherapy

As a young physician in India, Ghadiali tested the chromotherapy ideas on patients with seemingly great success. Shortly before World War I he migrated to the United States and became a citizen. He aligned himself with the emerging community of naturopathic physicians and worked on developing chromotherapy into a usable form of alternative therapy. In 1920 he announced his perfection of "Spectro-Chrome therapy," which he envisioned as an attuned color wave healing science. Meanwhile he worked on a degree in naturopathy and in 1924 he purchased land in Malaga, New Jersey, to open his institute.

Ghadiali worked quietly in Malaga through the 1920s, but in 1931, the government, which had been developing ways to combat what it considered medical quacks, moved against Ghadiali for fraud and tried to have his citizenship revoked (a real possibility under recently passed anti-Asian immigration laws). Ghadiali was at the time completing his magus opus, the three-volume Spectro-Chrome Metry Encyclopedia, which appeared in 1933. After almost a decade in resolving his legal problems, some of which swirled around attempts to market a color healing device, Ghadiali settled into a private practice, which he continued until his death in 1966. His son has continued his work at Malaga, but has emphasized vegetarianism rather than color therapy. Ghadiali's color healing was picked up by fellow Indian-American N. S. Hanoka of Miami, Florida.

While Ghadiali was trying to perfect a scientific perspective on color healing, Theosophist Ivah Bergh Whitten picked up on the occult speculations on color of Annie Besant and Charles W. Leadbeater. Whitten experienced a personal crisis following the death of her husband in 1907. While recovering from a nervous breakdown she was contacted by someone she later spoke of as an Elder Brother, a member of the Great White Brotherhood. He offered her a choice, death or a life as a lightbearer to the world. She chose the latter, soon recovered from her illness, and became an active and avid Theosophist. Eventually she became a lecturer for the Theosophical Society on her chosen topic, the occult meaning of color. As a result of her travels, study groups formed to examine her ideas. In the late 1920s these groups organized AMICA (the Amica Master Institute of Color Awareness).

Whitten began to publish her findings in the 1930s, beginning with a booklet, What Color Means to You (1932), soon followed by The Initial Course in Colour Awareness. She developed the theosophical perspective on color by which the highest white light is broken into the seven colors (rays) of the light spectrum. Each ray symbolizes a set of human characteristics over which a particular ascended master presides. The seven colors also correspond to various other universal structures, such as the seven subtle spiritual centers of the body, the chakras. Ultimately, this set of correspondences became the basis of an occult color healing system. Whitten was quite aware of Ghadiali, and she praised his healing devices. She also developed a form of healing meditation during which a person imagines breathing in a specific color.

During the 1930s, British Theosophist Roland T. Hunt emerged as Whitten's leading student. While he studied Whitten's writings, he was also becoming aware of the new psychological findings about the effects of color on human behavior. These were combined in his 1940 text, The Seven Keys to Colour Healing. Hunt moved to California following World War II and became the head of AMICA. He wrote a number of books before passing the work to Paola Hugh and the Fleur de Lys Foundation in Tacoma, Washington.

Concurrent with but independent of Hunt was the activity of Rosicrucian Corine Heline, the founder of the New Age Bible and Philosophy Center in Santa Monica, California. In 1943 she wrote Healing and Regeneration through Color. Heline, in the astrological tradition of her teacher Max Heindel of the Rosicrucian Fellowship, saw colors related to astrological signs. She also believed that illnesses affecting specific parts of the body had correspondences to astrological signs. Traditionally, for example, diseases of the head were related to Aries. Color treatment should be given in conjunction with astrological analysis. Light, she suggested, also stimulated glands. Glands serve as connecting points between the physical body and the invisible mental and causal bodies (which many occultists believe each individual possesses). Stimulating the glands with light (either visible or imagined) can lead to the glands secreting healing substances.

During the 1970s, color therapy entered the New Age and holistic health movements through the work of health journalist Linda Clark. Her 1975 The Ancient Art of Color Therapy became the first of a series of books to reintroduce the topic to a more mainstream audience after it had been pushed to the edge of the occult community in the 1960s.

Evaluating Color Therapy

Contemporary color therapy is grounded in scientific research on light and psychological findings on the beneficial effects of color. Such research has, for example, been widely utilized in the design of public institutions, possibly the most famous instance being the banishing of black boards in schools in favor of green boards. It is also widely known that sunlight, in moderate doses, stimulates the production of vitamin D by the body, that colored rooms can assist the healing of some psychological disorders, and the rights colors in offices can stimulate employees.

Physicists have explained light as part of a spectrum of electromagnetic energy. Each part of the spectrum manifests as radiation that vibrates at a specific rate. Visible light appears somewhere toward the center of the spectrum. On one side of the spectrum are cosmic rays, gamma rays, x-rays, and ultraviolet, and on the other side are infrared, electricity, radio, and television. Light is thus a form of radiant energy, and human beings can be seen as living systems that absorb and radiate energy. Many psychics and occultists claim that the body radiates energy just outside of the visible light spectrum, which surrounds the body as an aura. Some people claim the ability to see this radiation, or aura, and interpret its meaning.

While many advocate the beneficial effects of sunbaths, chromotherapists go far beyond to a sophisticated analysis of the application and use of very specific colors on specific parts of the body. Such color may be received by sitting in a spotlight shining a colored beam on the body. Alternatively, through meditation, a particular color can be imagined either to shine upon the body or be taken into the body through breaths. Color therapy has also been associated with crystals, which also come in a variety of colors, and some have hypothesized that crystals of varying colors radiate different healing energies. The most common explanation of the healing power of color relates to stimulating the glandular system is some way.

It should be noted that a variety of attempts to verify the healing effects of color as hypothesized by color therapists has proved unsuccessful. Thus, the sale of machines that can radiate specific beams of color for healing purposes is against the law and can lead to an arrest for fraud. To date, most of the effects with color healing can be attributed to other causes.

Sources:

Amber, Reuben. Color Therapy. New York: ASI Publishers, 1980.

Clark, Linda. The Ancient Art of Color Therapy. Old Greenwich, Conn.: Devin-Adair, 1975.

Ghadiali, Dinshah P. Spectro-Chrome Metry Encyclopedia. 3 vols. Malaga, N.J.: Spectro-Chrome Institute, 1933.

Heline, Corine. Healing and Regeneration through Color. Santa Barbara, Calif.: J. F. Rowney Press, 1943.

Hunt, Roland. The Seven Keys to Colour Healing. Ashington, England: C. W. Daniel, 1954.

Whitten, Ivah Bergh. What Color Means to You. Ashington, England: C. W. Daniel, 1932.

Chrysolite (or Chrisoletus)

A yellow-green gemstone used as an amulet by ancient Romans to protect the wearer from melancholy and enchantment. It was set in gold to dispel nightmares. Its virtue was also said to be enhanced if a hole was made in it and the hairs of a donkey passed through.

Chrysoprase

A semiprecious stone used in amulets. Its color is green and gold and it was traditionally used to combat weakness of sight and to render its possessor joyful and liberal.

Chupacabras

Chupacabras are vampire-like creatures that during the 1990s were widely reported to attack domestic animals across Latin America and the Spanish-speaking communities in the United States. The name "chupacabra" literally translates as "goat sucker," a reference to its seeming love of goats and its habit of sucking the blood from its victims. It also refers to a family of nocturnal Puerto Rican birds that steal milk from goats. The chupacabras are quite contemporary creatures, the stories originating suddenly in the mid-1990s in Mexico and Puerto Rico, flowing to adjacent lands through 1995, and peaking in 1996 and 1997 (the centennial of the appearance of Dracula.) As described by those who claimed to have seen it, the creature combines elements of the vampire with that of Big Foot or the Yeti. It has glowing red eyes, fangs, and long hairy arms. From the head to the bottom of the back, it has bright-colored phosphorescent spine-like appendages. Many reported bat-like wings, and suggested that it might be a cross between a kangaroo and a bat. It left two deep puncture wounds on its victims and a sulfur-like stench. The remnants of the chupacabras attacks were very real and included most frequently goats and smaller animals that one might find on a farm—dogs, cats, chickens, ducks. But the creature has also been known to attack larger animals such as cows and horses. As a whole it did not attack humans. Most frequently reported were the penetrating wounds, as if a set of fangs had gone searching for an artery. Similar to tales of cattle mutilations in the United States, theories about the nature of chupacabras have been as widespread as the reports of their attacks. They have ranged from vampires to aliens, and some have seen the creatures as the result of a failed scientific experiment. Like the cattle mutilations, those animals reportedly attacked and then examined by veterinarians showed no unusual characteristics. They appeared to have died of common predator attacks. Their major veins and artery were not targeted and they were not sucked dry. The chupacabras were quickly dismissed as a modern legend and by 1997 the reports were being treated as humorous anecdotes. By the end of the decade, the wave of interest had died out. While reports continue to emerge, interest has faded. However, at its peak in 1996, even English-speaking newspapers were carrying the reports of the more spectacular attacks.

Sources:

Dresser, Norine. "Chupacabras: A Contemporary Vampire Invasion." Unpublished paper in the American Religions Collection at Davidson Library, University of California–Santa Barbara, 1997.

The Churches' Fellowship of Psychical and Spiritual Studies

Founded in 1953 in Britain by Lt. Col. R. M. Lester and agroup of clergy and laypersons interested in psychical research and its relevance to Christianity and mysticism. The fellowship organized lectures, conferences, study groups, and retreats dealing with paranormal healing, psychic phenomena, and mysticism and also issued a quarterly journal, Christian Parapsychologist. Full membership in the fellowship was limited to members of churches that belong to either the World Council of Churches or the British Council of Churches or that adhere to the orthodox theological tradition and held Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior. Last known address: St. Mary Abchurch, Abchurch Ln., London, EC4N 7BA, England.

Sources:

Pearce-Higgins, John D. Life, Death and Psychical Research: Studies on Behalf of the Churches' Fellowship for Psychical and Spiritual Studies. London: Rider, 1973.

Church of Christ, Scientist

Organization founded in 1879 by Mary Morse (Baker) Eddy (1821–1910) as the embodiment of the healing movement popularly known as Christian Science. As a young woman Eddy suffered from chronic health problems. Through the 1850s and 1860s she sought out various remedies and eventually found her way to Phineas Parkhurst Quimby, a mental healer in Maine. She experienced great relief for a time and was grateful for Quimby's efforts. It was not until 1866, however, that she found a new spiritual insight while recovering from an injury received in a fall. She experienced a complete recovery of health, discovering that God is all and that illness and death are unreal. She also came to believe that in the acceptance of the complete reality of God health appears.

Eddy's recovery was followed by a period of further Bible study, working with others in light of her new vision and reexamining Quimby's teachings. The result of this study was a primal booklet, The Science of Man (1870), and then a textbook, Science and Health (1875). She organized the Christian Science Association in 1876 as an organization for her students. Over the next years the healing movement grew and expanded. Several new editions of the textbook were published as Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures. In 1892 the movement went through a complete reorganization and the mother church structure, through which the church is currently organized, was established. The church bylaws were published in 1895 as the Church Manual. Leadership of the church was placed in the hands of the mother church (the First Church of Christ, Scientist), located in Boston, Massachusetts, and its pastor, Mary Baker Eddy, who had been ordained in 1881.

Included in both the textbook and the Church Manual are the tenets of the church. They affirm the Bible as the inspired guide to life; one God; God's Son; the Holy Ghost; and man as a being in God's image. Forgiveness of sin results from new spiritual understanding that casts out evil as having no God-ordained reality. The atonement of Jesus, "the wayshower," is evidence of God's love. Salvation comes through the truth, life, and love, as he demonstrated. Healing, following the principles laid down by Eddy in Science and Health, remains the most significant aspect of the doctrine of the Church of Christ, Scientist. Such healing is distinct from both psychic healing and magnetism (or mesmerism), both of which were condemned by Eddy.

Since Eddy's death, leadership of the church has been in the hands of a five-member board of directors that administers the affairs of the church according to the rules laid down in the Church Manual. Each church is autonomous but its leaders must be members in good standing with the mother church. Church headquarters are at the Christian Science Center, Boston. The Christian Science Publishing Society issues a number of books and periodicals, most notably the Christian Science Journal and a daily newspaper, The Christian Science Monitor. The Herald of Christian Science appears in a dozen languages.

The Christian Science movement has not only built a large organization but has also inspired a variety of religious healing movements in other groups. Throughout the early years of the movement a number of students withdrew from association with Eddy and the church. Some continued as independent Christian Science practitioners, and others gathered around Emma Curtis Hopkins and developed what would come to be known as the New Thought movement. Boston Episcopal minister Elwood Worcester founded the Emmanuel Movement, the organization that introduced spiritual healing into the Episcopal Church and continues today as the Order of St. Luke the Physician.

The Church of Christ, Scientist was born in controversy and has continued as a controversial organization. Members are known for their refusal to seek the services of physicians, preferring their own Christian Science practitioners. Throughout the twentieth century, church leaders have labored long and somewhat successfully to gain a legal status for their church and to have their practitioners recognized by government authorities and even insurance companies. Their success has been challenged periodically when a person who might have been helped by modern medical techniques or medicine dies. In the 1980s a score of court cases were heard, with very mixed results, concerning Christian Science parents whose children died without receiving any medical treatment.

The Church of Christ, Scientist can be contacted at its headquarters: 175 Huntington Ave., Boston, MA 02115-3187. Website: http://www.tfccs.com/.

Sources:

Christian Science: A Sourcebook of Contemporary Materials. Boston: Christian Science Publishing Society, 1990.

The Church of Christ, Scientist. http://www.tfccs.com/. March 8, 2000.

Eddy, Mary Baker. Church Manual of the First Church of Christ, Scientist, in Boston, Mass. Boston: Trustees Under the Will of Mary Baker Eddy, 1908.

———. Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures. Boston: Trustees Under the Will of Mary Baker Eddy, 1906.

Gottshalk, Stephen. The Emergence of Christian Science in American Religious Life. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.

Peel, Robert. Mary Baker Eddy. 3 vols. New York: Holt Rinehart & Winston, 1971.

Swihart, Altman K. Since Mrs. Eddy. New York: Henry Holt, 1931.

Church of Cosmic Science

The Church of Cosmic Science was a fellowship of Spiritualist congregations founded in 1959 at Rialto, California, by Rev. William Dickensen, Reginald Lawrence, and Josephine Dickensen. Though small (only seven congregations in the 1970s), the church made an impact among West Coast Spiritualists through its monthly publication, Cosmic Light, which circulated widely among independent Spiritualist congregations. The church's Cosmic Light Press also published Awareness for Cosmic Truth, a set of lessons in psychic development. The former headquarters in Jamul, California, have been closed, and the present status of the group, if it still exists, is unknown.

Church of Divine Man

The Church of Divine Man grew out of the work of Lewis Bostwick (1918–1995), a psychic and teacher in the San Francisco Bay area who in 1973 founded two organizations, the Berkeley Psychic Institute, a teaching center, and the Church of Divine Man, a spiritual community embodying the beliefs that Bostwick, who served as the church's archbishop during his last years, had come to hold. Bostwick saw the development of psychic abilities and the emergence of a mystic consciousness as primary over any doctrinal statements and had argued for what he termed "psychic freedom." He had little use for ideological or philosophical perspectives that tended to divide people. He stressed the abilities each person had for manifesting psychic talents and noted Jesus' words, "What I can do, you can do and greater than these shall you do."

The Berkeley Psychic Institute offers a wide range of courses in psychic development and awareness for the general public along with serving as the seminary for the training of ministers for the Church of the Divine Man. Ministers become accomplished teachers and practitioners of meditation, psychic healing, and clairvoyance. Ministers take an intensive course in clairvoyance. They also learn to do past-life readings, and reincarnation is generally accepted by those associated with the church.

The church grew through the mid-1970s and in 1976 a branch in Seattle, Washington, opened under the leadership of Bishops Menuard Slusher and Mary Ellen Flora. Additional churches have been founded throughout California. In Anaheim, the Church of the Rose, an affiliated congregation, operates the Southern California Psychic Institute. More recently, the Seattle branch has become independent of the Berkeley branch but continues to operate under the same name with branches in Washington and Oregon. It operates the Washington Psychic Institute.

The Church of Divine Man is headquartered at 2018 Allison Way, Berkeley, CA 94704. It publishes a tabloid newspaper, The Psychic Reader, which in 1986 had superseded its earlier periodical, This Is Your Psychic Life. Deja Vu Publishing is an independent associated publishing concern.

Sources:

Psychic Reader. Berkeley, Calif., n.d.

Church of Illumination

Closely associated with the Fraternitas Rosae Crucis, which is a very elite and exclusive fraternity, the Church of Illumination operates as an outer court that interacts with the general public. The church's program centers upon the establishment of the Manistic Age, during which the equality of male and female will be fully recognized. During this age a new world teacher will arise who will teach the five fundamentals: As ye sow so shall ye reap; talents as gifts and responsibilities; the golden rule; honesty; and the new birth as the awakening of the Christos, or divine spark, within. The church's headquarters are located at Beverly Hall, PO Box 220, Quakertown, PA 18951.

Sources:

The Christic Teachings. Quakertown, Pa.: Church of Illumination, 1955.

Clymer, R. Swinburne. Christisis. Quakertown, Pa.: Philosophical Publishing, 1945.

———. The Interpretation of St. John. Quakertown, Pa.: Philosophical Publishing, 1953.

Manisis: The Interpretation of the Divine Law for the Manistic Dispensation. Quakertown, Pa.: Beverley Hall, 1955.

Church of Light

The Church of Light was one of the most important occult organizations in the United States in the mid-twentieth century. It had a special role in the modern revival of astrology. The church was incorporated in 1932, but it is part of the history of the Brotherhood of Light, which emerged in the nineteenth century. The Brotherhood of Light is a group of exalted beings who guide humankind (known elsewhere as the Great White Brotherhood). The believers in the Brotherhood of Light had representatives in Great Britain in the mid-nineteenth century. One of these, Thomas H. Burgoyne (1855–94), a Scotsman, came to the United States in the 1880s. He resided for a period with a Captain Norman Astley and his wife, Genevieve Stebbins, in Carmel, California. He also met Henry Wagner and his wife, Belle Wagner, who owned the Astro-Philosophical Publishing Company in San Francisco. Through the Wagners, Burgoyne published the first volume of a book he was writing on astrology and occultism, Light of Egypt. Burgoyne and the Wagners also agreed to found an organization, The Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor, to give expression to the Brotherhood of Light on the visible material plane. The Hermetic Brotherhood was headed by a scribe, a seer, and an astrologer. Burgoyne was the original scribe and Minnie Higgins the original astrologer.

For a generation the organization pioneered occult and astrological thought in the United States. Then in 1909 Higgins died. A young student of the brotherhood, Elbert Benjamine, was called as the new astrologer. Benjamine was assigned the additional task of preparing a complete set of lessons covering the whole of occultism. These would become the textbooks of the brotherhood and introduce people to the emerging Aquarian Age. Benjamine set about the task, which would keep him busy until 1934. In the meantime, in 1913, the Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor was formally disbanded. As the surviving leader, Benjamine inherited its mission and responsibilities, and in 1915 he began to hold informal classes, which were opened to the general public after World War I.

As Benjamine neared the completion of his lessons, he founded the Church of Light as the successor of the Hermetic

Brotherhood and the visible expression of the Brotherhood of Light. The church teaches that there are two orders of truth—science and religion. Between these two there can be no true antagonism. Nature's laws provide the substance of true religions. Astrology is an especially useful tool for interpreting nature, though all occult arts contribute. The church now offers 21 courses in occult knowledge based upon the lessons prepared by Benjamine and published as a series of books by the church.

Following Benjamine's death in 1951, Edward Doane was named as president. Members are scattered across the North America and relate to the church via correspondence. The church may be contacted at 2341 Coral St., Los Angeles, CA 90031. It publishes The Church of Light Quarterly.

Sources:

Astrological Research & Reference Encyclopedia. 2 vols. Los Angeles: Church of Light, 1972.

Burgoyne, Thomas H. Light of Egypt. 2 vols. Albuquerque, N. Mex.: Sun Publishing, 1980.

Wagner, Henry O., comp. A Treasure Chest of Wisdom. Denver: H. O. Wagner, 1967.

Church of Metaphysical Christianity

The Church of Metaphysical Christianity is a small Florida-based Spiritualist church founded in 1958 by Rev. Dorothy Graff Flexer and Russell J. Flexer, who were earlier associated with the Spiritualist Episcopal Church. In 1958, amid charges of fake mediumship at Camp Chesterfield, Indiana, the Flexers were among those who led the Spiritualist Episcopal Church to break with the camp. However, in that same year the Flexers also left the Spiritualist Episcopal Church to establish their independent work in Florida.

The Flexers teach what is termed Metaphysical Christianity. Metaphysical Christianity attempts to combine religion, science, and philosophy, and members live out of the spiritual truths revealed in the life and teachings of Jesus. It studies to discern the laws of nature and tries to conform to them. Obedience to natural laws constitutes the highest form of worship. Among the laws that have been discovered are the laws of life, love (the creative force of life), truth (right thinking), compensation, freedom, abundance, and perfection.

As with other Spiritualist churches, the Church of Metaphysical Christianity attempts to demonstrate the continuity of life through mediumship and encourages members to develop their own gifts of the spirit so that such communication becomes a natural part of human life. The church affirms that after death, the human spirit continues and remains conscious and can thus communicate with the visible earth plane. Also from spirit comes the power to heal. The church publishes a monthly magazine, The Metaphysical Messenger, and is headquartered at 2717 Browning St., Sarasota, FL 33577. Issues of Metaphysical Messenger are available from the church's website at http://home1.gte.net/cmcpress/.

Sources:

Church of Metaphysical Christianity. http://home1.gte.net/cmcpress/. March 8, 2000.

Davis, Charles [Dorothy Flexer]. A New Way of Life. Sarasota, Fla.: Church of Metaphysical Christianity, 1989.

———. Spirit Speaks. Sarasota, Fla.: Church of Metaphysical Christianity, 1988.

Wade, Alsa Madison. At the Shrine of the Master. Philadelphia, Pa.: Dorrance, 1953.

Church of Revelation

The Church of Revelation is a New Age Spiritualist church founded in 1976 by Rev. Harrison Ray Hasketh of Honolulu, Hawaii, and Rev. Linda L. Harrison of Seattle, Washington. Hasketh, a popular spiritual/psychic counselor known as Tat, had previously taught at the Mystic Island Center operated by medium Patricia Diegel in Honolulu. In 1975 he opened his own Astral Physics School and was ordained in the Life Science Church, a church that ordained independent ministers by mail. He also began two call-in radio shows.

Tat was born in 1936 in Pennsylvania and raised in a Christian church. He was baptized in the Evangelical United Brethren Church (now a part of the United Methodist Church) in 1946, but the heritage of his mother and grandmother as seers and healers asserted itself during his youth. He was the first male in the family to manifest such gifts. Thus during his teen years he began a spiritual quest that led him to study the world's religious and spiritual traditions beginning with the various Christian denominations and followed by the Eastern religions and esoteric movements. When he was 33, he became a disciple of Swami Muktananda, a teacher of kundalini yoga. His broad studies led to an awakening experience in 1974, which he describes in terms of his self-realization of his I Am Presence. The Master of the Great White Brotherhood gave him a new name, Tattenaiananda, one who bestows the gifts of God and liberated bliss.

In the Astral Physics School, Tat demonstrated and taught various psychic abilities from clairvoyance to seeing auras. The work led naturally to the opening of the church early the next year. The church is an eclectic Spiritualist church centered upon belief in the one God, whom Tat refers to as transcendental consciousness. Basic to the practice of church members is the Rainbow Bridge Meditation, a special meditation technique designed to bridge the gap between the conscious self and the White Light of God.

The church is headed by a board of directors and Tat as church president. Its international headquarters is at HCR 1 Box 57009, Keaau, HI 96749-9407. Its Internet site is at http://www.astralphysicsschool.com/. Affiliated churches are found in the mainland United States, Canada, and Bermuda. In 1985, Tat accepted consecration as a bishop from Archbishop Joseph Vredenburgh of the Federation of St. Thomas Churches, a Gnostic Christian church headquartered in Palo Alto, California.

Sources:

Church of Revelation. http://www.astralphysicsschool.com/. February 15, 2000.

Church of Satan

In the late 1960s many were dismayed to learn that one Anton LaVey (1930–1997) of San Francisco, California, had founded a church dedicated to the worship of the devil. The media had a field day with the various events following the founding of the church on April 30, 1966, from LaVey's holding a funeral for a young sailor who died at the Treasure Island Navy Base to his use of a nude woman as an altar for a "worship" service at his home in San Francisco. The house, which served as headquarters of the church, was painted totally black. Following actress Jayne Mansfield's tragic death in a car accident, it was revealed that she had been associated with the church, and LaVey reaped the full benefit from his brief appearance as the devil in the movie version of Rosemary's Baby.

In 1969 LaVey issued the first of three books, The Satanic Bible, which presented the basic beliefs and practices of the church. It was followed by The Compleat Witch (1971) and The Satanic Rituals (1972). LaVey played on the image of a traditional Satanist and did little to counter the speculations of an exploitative press that rarely got beyond the sheer offense of the church's name or took time to look into the church's teachings or practices. Few understood the appeal of such a church in a secularized society.

Unlike traditional Satanism, which operates in a supernatural world of angels and demons, God and Satan, LaVey's assertion of Satanism was initially a statement of disbelief in supernaturalism altogether. Satan was seen not as the evil opposite of God, but as a Promethean figure who represented modern secular man at his best, living in the present with little regard for the future. Satanic principle asserted that humans were simply animals who lived a time on earth and should enjoy that life. They should value indulgence, vital existence, undefiled wisdom, kindness to the deserving, vengeance, responsibility to the responsible, and the practice of those "sins" that lead to mental and physical gratification.

The church's rituals are designed to lead to members' acceptance of a perspective centered on antiestablishmentarianism, self-assertion, and gratification. The church opposes the breaking of any laws made for the common good and opposes the use of drugs, which it sees as perpetuating an escapist view of reality.

The church celebrates several main holidays. Foremost, in keeping with the self-assertive perspective, is one's own birthday. Next Walpurgisnacht and Halloween, traditional magical dates on the agricultural calendar, are also celebrated. A form of baptism includes a ceremony of glorification of the one baptized. The church uses a form of the Black Mass, traditionally a reversal of the Roman Catholic Mass.

The church has a policy of enrolling new members with a lifetime membership; however, active membership is renewed annually and has never been more than a few thousand. There are concentrations of members in England, Holland, and Denmark, and The Satanic Bible has been translated into Danish, Swedish, and Spanish.

The Church of Satan and its literature has given rise to a variety of Satanic groups that follow its beliefs and practices but are administratively separate. The most important group with roots in the Church of Satan is the Temple of Set, headed by Michael A. Aquino, which has developed a new theology based on the identification of the Christian Satan with the ancient Egyptian god Set.

On the day of Anton LaVey's death, October 29, 1997, the church was placed under the control of high priestess, Blanche Barton. The Church of Satan's mailing address is PO Box 210666, San Francisco, CA 94121. The church's official homepage is http://www.churchofsatan.com/.

Sources:

Barton, Blanche. The Church of Satan: A History of the World's Most Notorious Religion. Los Angeles: Feral House, 1992.

———. The Secret Life of a Satanist: The Authorized Biography of Anton LaVey. New York: Hell's Kitchen Productions, 1990.

Church of Satan. http://www.churchofsatan.com/. March 9, 2000.

Harrington, Walt. "The Devil in Anton LaVey." The Washington Post Magazine, February 23, 1986, 6–17.

Church of Satanic Brotherhood

The Church of Satanic Brotherhood grew out of the period of turmoil experienced by the Church of Satan in the early 1970s, during which time the majority of the church's local centers (termed grottos) revolted against the leadership of church founder Anton LaVey. In the Midwest, prominent grottos were functioning under the leadership of Wayne West in Detroit and John DeHaven in Dayton, Ohio. LaVey moved against the rebellious members in February 1973 by dissolving the Dayton grotto. The following month DeHaven led in the founding of the Church of Satanic Brotherhood.

The new church operated with a collective leadership of bishops. A periodical, the True Grimoire, was launched, and grottos soon appeared in Dayton, Indianapolis, Louisville, New York City, and St. Petersburg. The church lasted only a short time. In 1974 John DeHaven announced his conversion to Christianity and publicly renounced Satanism.

Church of the Eternal Source

While the primary thrust of the modern Neo-Pagan Movement has been the recovery of European traditions, some attempts have been made to recover the magic and spiritual life of ancient Egypt. Standing at the fountainhead is Aleister Crowley (1875–1947), whose use of Egyptian themes date to the first decade of the twentieth century. When in Cairo, he found several magical items of special interest, including the Stele of Revealing. He received a revelation contained in the small booklet The Book of the Law, the reception of which initiated a new era of Horus (an Egyptian deity), the Crowned and Conquering Child. He then later integrated Egyptian themes into all his magical work. A typical magical ritual with an Egyptian theme was published by David Conway in his book, Magic: An Occult Primer (1972).

Although Crowley utilized Egyptian themes extensively, he never attempted to build a modern Egyptian religion. That task was initiated by the Church of the Eternal Source, founded by Donald D. Harrison and Harold Moss. Both Moss and Harrison were pioneers of modern Paganism. Harrison had first been attracted to Greek and Roman religion, and in 1967 founded the Julian Review. The Review served as the periodical for the Delphic Fellowship, an early Pagan group functioning primarily within the California gay community. Meanwhile, Moss organized a proto-Egyptian religious group after being inspired by the movie "The Egyptian." They held their first Egyptian party as early as 1963. In 1970, Moss and Harrison combined their efforts in the Church of the Eternal Source built upon two emphases, authentic Egyptianism and a belief in the plurality of the gods.

Authentic Egyptianism derives from attention to the earlier layers of the Egyptian religion before its corruption by the entrance of many non-Egyptian ideas. Henri Franfurt's book, Ancient Egyptian Religion, is cited as a source for gaining an overview of the church's perspective, and mastery of ancient Egyptian history is an important task for individual church members. In the church's understanding, the gods create reality. In their diversity and their transactions, divine vectors are established. The human task is to achieve balance by relating to the divine vectors.

Worship is both communal and personal. Communal gatherings are held on the full moon in July (at the birthday of the gods) and at the solstices and equinoxes. At the festivals, the myth of a particular deity may be reenacted. Various magical rituals are also used, though no particular rituals have been prescribed. Most worship centers upon personal shrines which members erect in their own dwellings. Members also practice forms of divination.

The Church of the Eternal Source inspired a number of other experiments in Egyptian Paganism through the last generation, most short-lived. It has continued as a small group of fewer than 100 people, most residing on the American West Coast. Their periodical, Kephera, has also had a sporadic life. The church may be contacted at P.O. Box 44146, Tucson, AZ 85733. The church's website may be found at http://members.aol.com/amanitae/ces.

Sources:

Conway, David. Magic: An Occult Primer. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1972.

Frankfurt, Henri. Ancient Egyptian Religion: An Interpretation. New York: Harper & Row, 1961.

Church of the Final Judgment See Process Church of the Final Judgment and Foundation Faith of God

Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye

The Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye is a public center in the greater Miami, Florida, metropolitan area of what is generally a secretive religious community, Santeria. In the years since the Cuban Revolution (1959), a large expatriate community has emerged in southern Florida among whom Santeria is a significant religion. Santeria is often associated with voudou and other African-based religions that were brought with the slaves in the nineteenth century. It is based on the worship of the deities called orishas. It is a magical religion in which the practice of spells for healing, love, and improvement of life are common. Worship is centered upon the acknowledgment of the presence of the deities who are often seen to possess the priest or priestess or members of the group. Santeria took on much of its secretive quality under the pressure of a dominant Christian culture that attempted to suppress it.

In the relatively free atmosphere of Miami, Ernesto Pichardo, his brother Fernando Pichardo, and Paul Rodriguez (now deceased) founded the church at the beginning of the 1970s. Leading the church was Iyolusha Carmen Plá Oni Yemay, who had been ordained to the priesthood in 1970 by Apetebi Orunmla Ramona Ojeda. The church was incorporated in 1974. It operated quietly, though Ernesto Pichardo taught a class on the religion at the Miami-Dade Community College. However, in the mid-1980s, the group decided to purchase a building in suburban Hialeah and begin holding public services. The action focused some attention on the church and on a particular aspect of Santeria that brought the most offense to the larger community, the practice of animal sacrifice.

A short time after the opening of the church, the city of Hialeah passed a series of ordinances that attempted to outlaw animal sacrifice. The city defended its actions on the grounds that it wanted to prevent animal cruelty, the spread of disease, and the traumatization of children (though none of these had been a problem reported within the Santeria community). The church decided to fight the case, which landed on the docket of the Supreme Court in 1993. The Hialeah ordinances were struck down.

The church is located at 3720 SW 108th St., Hialeah, FL 33165. Website: http://home.earthlink.net/~clba/.

Sources:

Resnick, Rosalind. "To One City, It's Cruelty. To Cultists, It's Religion." National Law Journal (September 11, 1989).

Church of the New Jerusalem

The religious organization devoted to the teachings of Swedish mystic Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772). Shortly after Swedenborg's death, Thomas Cookworthy, Rev. John Cowles, and Rev. Thomas Hartley began to translate Swedenborg's writings—all originally written and published in Latin—into English. Then in 1783 Robert Hindmarsh called together people interested in Swedenborg's ideas, and weekly meetings began. Originally called the Theosophical Society, the group was reconstituted as the New Jerusalem Church in 1787. Five years later the church was introduced into the United States.

Followers of Swedenborg believe that the Second Coming of Christ took place in 1757 in the form of the revelation of Swedenborg's esoteric interpretation of the Scriptures. They interpret the revelation as a fulfillment of St. John's vision of the New Jerusalem coming down out of heaven from God, with the declaration, "Behold, I make all things new." Salvation is regarded as deliverance from sin itself, and hell is considered a free choice on the part of those who prefer an evil life. Jesus is worshiped directly as Creator, Redeemer, the Word, and the Revelation.

The beliefs and practices for the New Jerusalem are put forth in the voluminous religious writings of Swedenborg and are summarized in the introductory chapters of The True Christian Religion (1950) and The New Jerusalem and Its Heavenly Doctrine (1938). A manuscript originally written in 1769 covering much of the same material as the first three chapters of The True Christian Religion was finally published in 1914 as The Canons of the New Church.

In England, the church has taken the name, the New Church. It has more than forty houses of worship administered by a general conference. (Address: New Church Enquiry Centre, 20 Bloomsbury Way, London, WC1A 2TH.)

During its first quarter-century in the United States the New Jerusalem founded some 17 societies. These groups met in 1817 and founded the General Convention of the New Jerusalem. A split occurred in 1840 that led to the formation of the General Church of the New Jerusalem. This later body is now the largest of the several American churches (with more than 3,000 members). It has built a large headquarters and cathedral in the small community of Bryn Athyn, Pennsylvania. The General Convention with over 2,000 members is headquartered at 48 Sargent St., Newton, MA 02158.

In the late 1930s a movement began among members of the New Church in the Netherlands maintaining that, like the Bible, the writings of Swedenborg had an internal spiritual meaning. The immediate implication of the notion was twofold. First, not only is the Bible from the Lord, but the doctrine of the New Church is also. Second, the discovery of the internal meaning in Swedenborg's voluminous writings allows for continuous growth and change in understanding his revelation. Out of this movement emerged the Lord's New Church Which Is Nova Hierosolyma. It is the smallest of the Swedenborgian churches with three North American congregations. (Address: 1725 Huntingdon Rd., Box 7, Bryn Athyn, PA 19009.)

Swedenborg's teachings had strong influence on the development of the nineteenth-century Spiritualist and occult movements in both Europe and the United States. In America the church found a significant advocate in Jonathan Chapman, popularly known as "Johnny Appleseed," a Swedenborgian who wandered through nineteenth-century settlements planting apple trees and leaving Swedenborgian literature at log cabins.

Through Spiritualist medium Andrew Jackson Davis (1826–1910), who claimed that Swedenborg was one of three spirits who revealed the secrets of the universe to him in 1844, Swedenborgian ideas flowed into Spiritualism. In fact, a number of Swedenborgian leaders went on to become leaders in Spiritualism, Theosophy, and New Thought. Swedenborg's ideas concerning correspondence between the spiritual and material worlds which led him to write a number of biblical commentaries, also inspired Mary Baker Eddy's Key to the Scriptures, which was appended to her primary Christian Science textbook, Science and Health.

Sources:

Block, Marguerite Beck. The New Church in the New World. New York: Henry Holt, 1932.

General Church of the New Jerusalem. The General Church of the New Jerusalem: A Handbook of General Information. Bryn Athyn, Pa.: General Church Publication Committee, 1965.

———. Liturgy and Hymnal. Bryn Athyn, Pa.: General Church Publication Committee, 1966.

Lord's New Church Which Is Nova Hierosalyma. Handbook of the Lord's New Church Which Is Nova Hierosolyma. Bryn Athyn, Pa.: The Author, 1985.

Sigstedt, C. O. The Swedenborg Epic: The Life and Works of Emanuel Swedenborg. New York: Bookman Associates, 1952. Reprint, London: Swedenborg Society, 1981.

Silver, Ednah C. Sketches of the New Church in America. Boston: Massachusetts New Church Union, 1920.

Woofenden, William Ross. Swedenborg Researcher's Manual. Bryn Athyn, Pa.: Swedenborg Scientific Association, 1988.

Church Universal and Triumphant

A church of the "I AM" tradition, which has emphasized its Christian Gnostic lineage. The church began in 1958 in Washington, D.C., as the Summit Lighthouse under the leadership of Mark L. Prophet. For several years Prophet had been a messenger of the Ascended Masters of the Great White Brotherhood and had associated with the Lighthouse of Freedom, another I AM organization. He began Pearls of Wisdom, a weekly periodical, as a means of disseminating the messages of the masters to the public. In 1961 Prophet was joined by Elizabeth Clare Wulf, whom he eventually married and who, after a period of training, was also named a messenger of the brotherhood.

The church developed through several stages, beginning in 1962 with the establishment of the Keepers of the Flame Fraternity at the suggestion of ascended master Saint Germain. The fraternity was created from among those who received the "pearls of wisdom," who especially dedicated themselves to the freedom and enlightenment of humanity. In 1966 the headquarters of the church was moved to Colorado Springs, Colorado. In 1971 Summit University was founded to provide more intensive and systematic training in the teachings of the masters for those associated with the Summit Lighthouse.

Mark Prophet died in 1973 and Elizabeth Clare Prophet assumed full control of the movement. She aggressively pursued the growth and development of the movement and in 1974 incorporated the Church Universal and Triumphant. Headquarters of the church were moved to California in 1976 and a decade later to Montana, on land north of and adjacent to Yellowstone National Park.

The church developed in the midst of the older I AM Religious Activity and freely admits its debt to Guy W. Ballard, but in its emphasis upon its Christian nature it has developed a number of differences from the I AM. It teaches that the human soul is the living potential of God. Souls are conceived in the mind of God as an initial realization of God's unity. They are then born as separate entities, a realization of the duality of God, a being of both spirit and matter. The individual is thus seen as having two parts—a higher, unchanging self and a lower, changing self. The God-identity of each individual, the I AM Presence, is extended into matter, time, and space, the church teaches.

It is the goal of each individual to evolve through many incarnations to become one with Christ—the higher self—in physical embodiment. The masters have taught a variety of disciplines that use prayers, mantras, and decrees to help purify the soul. These are used in conjunction with the violet flame of transmutation, the sacred spiritual fire of the Holy Spirit, which allows a balancing of errors of the soul in this and previous incarnations. After the process of purification is completed, the soul ascends to the Divine Source, from which it originated.

Through the 1980s the church was the subject of considerable controversy, especially from the anticult movement and from some neighbors in Montana who opposed its moving into the sparsely populated community. Also, the church has a survivalist perspective, and members built and stocked a number of underground facilities should disaster ever strike the country. It was widely (and mistakenly) reported that at one point Prophet had predicted a major disaster and ordered the membership to prepare to go underground. Slowly, as the accusations against the church proved groundless, the tension between the church and its neighbors in Montana decreased.

Currently, the church is an international organization with approximately 240 centers in 35 countries. Address: c/o The Summit Lighthouse. Dept. 793, Box 5000, Corwin Springs, MT 59030-5000. Website: http://www.tsl.org/.

Sources:

Ascended Master Network. http://www.tsl.org/. March 8, 2000.

Lewis, James R., and J. Gordon Melton, eds. Church Universal and Triumphant in Scholarly Perspective. Stanford, Calif.: Center for Academic Publications, 1994.

Prophet, Elizabeth Clare. The Great White Brotherhood in the History, Culture, and Religion of America. Los Angeles: Summit University Press, 1976.

Prophet, Mark L., and Elizabeth Clare Prophet. Climb the Highest Mountain. Colorado Springs, Colo.: Summit Lighthouse, 1972.

———. The Lost Teachings of Jesus. 2 vols. Livingston, Mont.: Summit University Press, 1986.

Churchward, James (1852–1936)

Author of several books about the lost continent of Mu or Lemuria, the Pacific Ocean equivalent of Atlantis, born in England in 1852. He stated that he became friendly with a Hindu priest during a famine in India in the nineteenth century, and the priest led him to a collection of ancient clay tablets hidden in a cave and taught him a language called Naacal, by which the tablets could be deciphered. According to Churchward, these tablets told the story of the lost continent of Mu, a primitive Garden of Eden destroyed by volcanic action.

No one ever saw the Naacal tablets, and it is likely that they never existed. More important in building Churchward's vision of Mu were the writings of Augustus Le Plongeon, an archaeologist who had spent the last decades of the nineteenth century studying the Mayan remnants in the Yucatán. He believed that he had deciphered the hieroglyphics that told the story of an ancient land, Mu. He published his results in a book Queen Moo and the Egyptian Sphinx (1896). Churchward inherited Le Plongeon's papers.

Churchward took Le Plongeon's speculations into the realm of pure fantasy. He picked up on the theosophical myth of Lemuria, which he identified with Le Plongeon's Mu. His first book on the subject, The Lost Continent of Mu, the Motherland of Man, appeared in 1926. It was followed by three additional volumes expanding upon the theme. Churchward's Mu was located in the South Pacific. It extended 500 by 300 miles in area from present-day Hawaii to Fiji and from Easter Island to the Mariana Islands. It was believed to be inhabited by a white race that worshiped the sun, believed in immortality, and built cities. The continent was home to 64 million people when it was destroyed 10,000 years ago; only a few survived. Churchward died in Los Angeles, California on January 4, 1936.

Raymond Buckland, under the pseudonym Tony Earll, wrote a spoof on Churchward's books, Mu Revealed (1969).

Sources:

Churchward, James. Children of Mu. New York: Ives Washburn, 1931.

———. Cosmic Forces of Mu. New York: Ives Washburn, 1935.

———. The Lost Continent of Mu: The Motherland of Man. New York: Ives Washburn, 1926.

———. The Sacred Symbols of Mu. New York: Ives Washburn, 1933.

Earll, Tony [Raymond Buckland]. Mu Revealed. New York: Paperback Library, 1970.

Le Plongeon, Augustus. Queen Moo and the Egyptian Sphinx. New York, 1896.

Churchyard

It is not difficult to understand why the churchyard has come to be regarded as the special haunt of ghosts. The popular imagination may well be excused for supposing that the spirits of the dead continue to hover over the spot where their bodies are laid.

The ancient Greeks thought the souls of the dead were especially powerful near their graves or sepulchres, because of some natural tie binding body and soul, even after death. The more earthly a soul was, the less willing it was to leave the vicinity of its body, and in consequence, specters encountered in a churchyard were more to be feared than those met with elsewhere. The apparitions witnessed at the tombs of saints, however, were to be regarded as good angels rather than as the souls of the saints themselves.

CIEEPP See Comité Illusionniste D'Expertise et D'Experimentation des Phenomenes Paranormaux

Circle Network News

Circle Network News, founded in the early 1980s as a newsletter serving the then relatively small Neo-Pagan community, has grown into one of the most stable and largest circulating periodicals devoted to the concerns of contemporary Wiccans and Pagans. Now a substantial 32-page tabloid, Circle Network News originates from Circle Sanctuary, a Wicca center in rural Wisconsin, and home to Circle, one of the older Wiccan fellowships. Circle was founded in the 1970s by Selena Fox, the driving force behind the founding of Circle Sanctuary as a nature sanctuary retreat and conference center for the use of Pagan worshippers of every tradition.

Each issue of Circle Network News is built around a single theme for which articles, comments, and letters are solicited from the readers. The accumulated articles, which may take up as much as half the content of the issue, cover all aspects of the topic from a global perspective and include reflections on mythology from far corners of the Earth, new rituals that integrate the theme, and speculations on how the theme related to Goddess worship.

Each issue also features a set of columns of interest. The "Lady Liberty League Report," for example, carries news of religious freedom issues that affect Pagans. The Lady Liberty League arose in the 1980s in response to continuing problems faced by Pagans, especially the loss of jobs following their boss's discovery of their religion, and courts' refusal to give Pagan parents custody of their children following a divorce. The "Pagan World News" column keeps readers aware of notable happenings within the community, especially actions manifesting the culture's acceptance of Wiccan practice. The "Pagan Academic Corner" carries news of a growing community of Pagans who have acquired advanced degrees in religious studies, sociology of religion, and related fields, and are focusing their research on topics of primary interest to Pagans. (The Pagan community has been unique among new religious communities that have arisen in the West since World War II for its nurture of an academically trained intelligencia.)

Networking has been a major objective of the periodical. Different columns carry notices of Pagan groups around the country, other Pagan periodicals, and notices of isolated Pagans seeking pen pals. The second largest segment of each issue, the "Magical Market Place," consists of ads of products and services primarily produced by Pagans for Pagans.

Circle Network News is directed totally to the Pagan community and makes no attempt to build a more general reading audience, hence it provides one of the better manifestations of the world of contemporary Wicca and Paganism. Not a newsstand periodical, though distributed through some Pagan-oriented stores, it is available by subscription from Circle Sanctuary, P.O. Box 219, Mt. Horeb, WI 53572. Information about Circle Network News is also available from the Circle Sanctuary's website, http://www.circlesanctuary.org/.

Sources:

Circle Network News. Mt. Horeb, Wis., n.d.

Circle Sanctuary. http://www.circlesanctuary.org/. April 25, 2000.

Circle of Atonement

The Circle of Atonement is one of several groups to emerge from the larger community of students of A Course in Miracles (ACIM). The Circle was founded in 1993 in response to the teaching activity of Robert Perry. Perry had begun teaching at the Miracle Distribution Center in Fullerton, California, a primary structure for communication between the many diverse ACIM study groups around the country. He authored several widely distributed books, An Introduction to A Course in Miracles, The Elder Brother: Jesus in A Course in Miracles (1990), and A Course Glossary (1995). Joining Perry in the formation of the circle was Allen Watson. He and Perry have coauthored several texts, and Watson went on to write a number of volumes, all published by the circle.

The circle was designed around three programmatic thrusts. The Teaching Wing facilitates the study of the Course's idea; the Transformation Wing encourages the practice of the Course's teachings and their application in daily life; and the Healing Wing attempts to extend the healing and forgiveness so central to the Course's approach beyond the members of the circle to the larger community. Only the Teaching Wing was in operation as the new century began.

The Circle of Atonement became the focus of attention above the many other ACIM groups at the end of the 1990s when a lawsuit developed between the circle and the several entities who had an interest in the copyrights of A Course in Miracles, including the Foundation for Inner Peace, the Foundation for A Course in Miracles, and Penguin Books. When A Course in Miracles was first published, the Foundation for Inner Peace held the copyright, but in recent years assigned that copyright to the Foundation for A Course in Miracles headed by Kenneth Wapnick. In the meantime, the publishing rights were sold to Penguin Books, who has brought out a commercial edition of ACIM. In the wake of its agreement with Penguin, the Foundation for A Course in Miracles has moved against several groups that have in the past published portions of ACIM either as separate booklets or as part of a larger work commenting upon ACIM. The foundation specifically denied the use of ACIM material in an as yet unpublished item by Perry and asked that several of the Circle of Atonement's publications be withdrawn from publication.

Unable to resolve this matter, the circle has filed a lawsuit against the two foundations and Penguin, claiming that it is the circle's belief that ACIM is a divine revelation ultimately authored by Jesus and as such it cannot be copyrighted. The lawsuit has also been extended to include additional works, also the product of Helen Schucman's channeling, ascribed to Jesus. This lawsuit, one of several contemporary suits over channeled material, remains in adjudication and attempts to revisit the issue of the status of materials ascribed to divine authorship and channeled material in American law.

The Circle of Atonement is headquartered at P.O. Box 4238, West Sedona, AZ 86340. It publishes a correspondence course and a newsletter, A Better Way. It has a website at http://nen.sedona.net/circleofa/ciofaoffr.html.

Sources:

Circle of Atonement. http://nen.sedona.net/circleofa/ciofaoffr.html. April 24, 2000.

Perry, Robert. A Course Glossary. West Sedona, Ariz.: Circle of Atonement, 1995.

———. The Elder Brother: Jesus in A Course in Miracles. West Sedona, Ariz.: Circle of Atonement, 1990.

Perry, Robert, and Allen Watson. The Answer Is a Miracle. West Sedona, Ariz.: Circle of Atonement, 1998.

———. Bringing the Course to Life: How to Unlock the Meaning of the Course in Miracles for Yourself. West Sedona, Ariz.: Circle of Atonement, 1999.

Circle of Inner Truth

The Circle of Inner Truth was a short-lived channeling group built around the work of trance medium Marshall Lever. Lever, a young Presbyterian seminarian, discovered his mediumistic abilities and made contact with a spirit named Chung Fu, who described himself as a student of the ancient Chinese philosopher Lao Tzu. In 1970 Lever and his wife, Quinta Lever, began the Circle of Truth as an instrument of Chung Fu's work. They gave up any home life and spent all of their time traveling and allowing Chung Fu to lecture and counsel people. In trance, Lever began to give health readings similar to those once offered by Edgar Cayce.

Chung Fu taught that humans have immortal spirits that live through many incarnations. The incarnating process continues until the individual identifies with a God-self during a life on Earth. Such an awareness is developed through the practices of affirmative meditation. Chung Fu also advised a regimen of nutrition and healthy practices.

The circle continued into the 1980s. The Levers issued a magazine, Our News and Views, from San Francisco. However, more recently, the Levers have moved on to other activities.

Sources:

Fu, Chung. Evolution of Man. San Francisco: Circle of Inner Truth, 1973.

Circle of Power Spiritual Foundation

The Circle of Power Spiritual Foundation was established in the mid 1980s by Ray Fletcher, a psychic channel, and his wife Candy. Through the mid-1960s, she had become interested in psychic matters, and had read what she could find on paranormal phenomena. In July 1968 Candy had talked Ray into trying the ouija board with her. A spirit entity named Tawa came through and identified himself as their son's spiritual teacher. He and Mikol had been together on earth in a previous incarnation as Native Americas some 400 years ago. In September, though the ouija board, Tawa asked about using Ray's vocal cords to speak. Permission was granted, and Ray began channeling material from Tawa. The communications from Tawa continued for two years. They were recorded and later transcribed. The last session was on December 29, 1970.

The Fletchers did little with the material through the 1970s. Then in 1979, Ray had a massive heart attack. He also had an accompanying out-of-body experience during which he spoke to Tawa. His heart troubles continued even though he had a bypass operation in 1981. Meanwhile in 1979 he had also begun work on a book that summarized Tawa's teachings. The massive volume, Spirit In His Mind, was nearing completion in 1984 when the Fletchers decided to move to Montana. Before moving they incorporated the Circle of Power Spiritual Foundation to publish the book. Two months after relocating in Montana, Ray went into the hospital for an angiogram. However, the evening before the proceeding, as a result of prayer, he was healed of his heart problems. The angiogram could find none of the artery blockages previously reported.

Tawa's coming was to inaugurate the Second Coming of Christ whom he said was then living in the Middle East. The person did not yet know he was the Christ and the Christ essence had yet to enter him. He would soon awaken to his mission and identify himself and would be much revered. However, before that happened, the Antichrist, living in England, would identify himself, and exercise power for one year. The Fletchers were told that they were part of a chosen circle of followers who are messengers of the Second Coming.

Spirit in His Mind and several other lesser volumes published soon afterward were the means of announcing the Second Coming. However, by the end of the 1990s, the Circle had disappeared and nothing was heard of the Fletchers, Tawa, or the coming messiah through the 1990s. It is assumed that the predictions of his arrival proved incorrect and the Circle has disbanded.

Sources:

Fletcher, C. R. Spirit in His Mind. Bigfork, Mont.: Circle of Power Spiritual Foundation, 1985.

Graham, Richard. The Love Connection. Bigfork, Mont.: Circle of Power Spiritual Foundation, n.d.

Circles

The circle is the most common space created for the working of magic and witchcraft. It stands in sharp contrast to the rectangular space that the average Christian church defines. The circle is easily drawn on the ground and just as easily erased. The circle has been a popular form for worship since ancient times as demonstrated by numerous stone monuments found around the world.

In modern magical and Wiccan practice, the circle is seen as both a protective barrier and a container of energy. It is the visible manifestation of a sphere that completely surrounds the worker of magic. Where the invisible sphere intersects the ground or floor, a circle is defined. While occasionally a more permanent circle is drawn and remains for regular workings, the circle is usually created only at the beginning of a magical ritual and dissolved at its close.

Modern magical rituals begin with the imaginal setting of a sphere of energy around the individual or group performing the ritual. Commonly, there are specific words that are spoken to create the sphere or circle. Most Wiccans believe in the existence of an array of spirit beings, from deities to elemental spirits. Most rituals are designed to invoke one or more of these deities and the intrusion of unwanted entities would disturb the focus of the ritual. In such settings, the circle is seen as a barrier that protects the ritual and keeps entities attracted by the power raised by the ritual from disturbing its fruitful conclusion. The ritual is closed with a banishing act dispersing any attending entities.

Modern rituals are also seen as acts that raise, focus, and direct energy to a specific purpose such as the healing of someone or the gaining of some particular favor. In such thinking, the sphere or circle is seen as a container that holds the energy so raised until the ritual's climax, when it is sent forth to do its work.

In modern Neo-Paganism, where worship predominates over magic, the idea of creating the circles as the creation of sacred space, apart from the mundane world, predominates. Sacred space is, or becomes, space in which the veil dividing the common everyday world from the realm of spirits is thin and communication is possible. While some sacred space is defined by the environment, a particularly beautiful or striking spot, it can be created anywhere. In the pantheistic Pagan world, all space is ultimately seen as sacred. Sacred space is often entered only after participants have cleansed themselves and donned special dress, commonly a ritual robe, or as in the case of some Wiccan groups, in the nude.

Sources:

Adler, Margot. Drawing Down the Moon. Boston: Beacon Press, 1979.

Crowley, Vivianne. Principles of Paganism. London: Thorsons, 1996.

Circles, Spiritualist

A group of persons who meet at intervals to hold séances for spirit communication. It is essential that at least one among them be a medium, and there may be several mediums in one circle. However, all the members of a circle must be chosen with care if the séances are to induce phenomena. The Baron von Guldenstubbé, in his book Practical Experimental Pneumatology, or the Reality of Spirits and the Marvellous Phenomenon of their Direct Writing, originally published early in the history of Spiritualism in French in 1857, gave directions for forming a circle after the American fashion.

"Setting aside the moral conditions, which are equally requisite, it is known that American Circles are based on the distinction of positive and electric or negative magnetic currents.

"The circles consist of twelve persons, representing in equal proportions the positive and negative or sensitive elements. This distinction does not follow the sex of the members, though generally women are negative and sensitive, while men are positive and magnetic. The mental and physical constitution of each individual must be studied before forming the circles, for some delicate women have masculine qualities, while some strong men are, morally speaking, women. A table is placed in a clear and ventilated spot; the medium is seated at one end and entirely isolated; by his calm and contemplative quietude he serves as a conductor for the electricity and it may be noted that a good somnambulist is usually an excellent medium. The six electrical or negative dispositions, which are generally recognized by their emotional qualities and their sensibility, are placed at the right of the medium, the most sensitive of all being next to him. The same rule is followed with the positive personalities, who are at the left of the medium, with the most positive among them next to him. In order to form a chain, the twelve persons each place their right hand on the table, and their left hand on that of the neighbour, thus making a circle round the table. Observe that the medium or mediums, if there be more than one, are entirely isolated from those who form the chain.

Camille Flammarion stated that the sexes are alternated to "reinforce the fluids." It has also been asserted that the séance may be as productive when the circle is composed of only a few investigators, following no rules but their own.

Although the presence of a medium is traditionally regarded as indispensable, a group of experimenters composed of members of the Toronto Society for Psychical Research in Canada obtained interesting phenomena by concentrating on "Philip," an artificial personality deliberately created by the group. (See also psychic force)

Sources:

Post, Eric. Communication with the Beyond: A Practical Handbook of Spiritualism. New York: Atlantic Publishing, 1946.

Circle Sanctuary

Circle Sanctuary, one of the largest contemporary Wiccan/neo-pagan fellowships, began in 1974 as an informal gathering of people interested in magic and mysticism. During meditation, founder Selena Fox received the name, concept, and logo of Circle, and, with her partner Jim Alan, called the first group of people together at their home in Madison, Wisconsin. In the summer of 1975 they established Circle Farm on land near Sun Prairie, Wisconsin. There the first Circle Coven was formed, and other related groups emerged.

Fox and Alan quickly became well known in the growing neo-pagan community for their ecumenical spirit, vibrant music, and extensive networking activity. In 1977 they published their first tape of Wiccan music and an accompanying songbook and organized the Circle Network, an international fellowship of Wiccans. The expanding organization was incorporated as the Church of Circle Wicca in 1978; the following year it issued the first edition of the Circle Resource Guide (which now exists in several volumes). Circle became the largest active fellowship of neo-pagans in North America.

In 1979 Circle moved to a farm near Middleton, Wisconsin, and in 1983 a farm was purchased near Barneveld, Wisconsin. There the Circle Sanctuary was created as an all-weather nature preserve, ritual site, and gathering place for Wiccans and neo-pagans. Circle Sanctuary has the support of neo-pagans far beyond the membership of Circle. Meetings are held at the sanctuary year round. After a lengthy court battle, Circle Sanctuary won zoning status as a church.

Fox has led in the development of an ecumenical and eclectic paganism that draws on elements of indigenous land-based religions, especially the traditions and practices of Native Americans. The ever-evolving system is termed "Wiccan Shamanism" or "Nature Spirituality," a blend of Wiccan spirituality, nature mysticism, shamanistic practices from around the world, ecofeminism, and the insights of modern psychology, especially its humanistic and transpersonal branches. Fox emphasizes the divinity inherent in nature and acknowledgement of the Goddess and Mother Earth.

Through the 1980s, Circle became one of the more visible Wiccan groups, and in 1980 it launched its publishing concern with Circle Network News, one of the more substantive of Wiccan periodicals. That same year the Pagan Spirit Alliance, a neo-pagan fellowship and friendship network, was organized and in 1981 the Circle Sanctuary hosted the first annual International Pagan Spirit Gathering. In the late 1980s, Circle also emerged as a champion of religious freedom and in 1991 established a more permanent organization, the Lady Liberty League, to focus on this continuing concern.

Currently, Circle is headed by Fox and her husband, Dr. Dennis Carpenter, both professionally trained psychotherapists. Fox heads Circle's school for priestesses, its school for women in Goddess-oriented spirituality, and its school for ministers, which trains pagan and Wiccan leadership. Fox was appointed to the Assembly of Religious and Spiritual Leaders in 1999.

Circle publishes several periodicals, including the Sanctuary Circles Newsletter, the Circle Guide to Pagan Groups, and CIRCLE Magazine. It may be contacted at P.O. Box 219, Mt. Horeb, WI 53572. Website: http://www.circlesanctuary.org/. (See also Wicca)

Sources:

Circle Sanctuary. http://www.circlesanctuary.org/. March 8, 2000.

Fox, Selena. Circle Guide to Pagan Groups. Mt. Horeb, WI: Circle, n.d.

The Circles Effect Research Unit (CERES)

Now-defunct British organization, headed by George Terence Meaden, concerned with the phenomenon of crop circles. The Journal of Meteorology used to be published by the group but has since ceased publication.

Circle 77

A séance group in Florence, Italy, at which psychic Roberto Campagni has manifest physical phenomena of materialization of small apports.

The Circular

Quarterly periodical concerned with the phenomenon of crop circles, published in Great Britain by the Centre for Crop Circles Studies 12 Tintagel Close, Exeter EX4 9EH, United Kingdom. A North American edition is also available from CCCS: Shepard Hill Farm, Newton, CT 06470.

Citizens Against UFO Secrecy (CAUS)

An activist organization founded in 1977 to make public government data on UFOs. It has made numerous Freedom of Information requests, filed suits, and investigated UFO reports and published its findings. The organization was originally established by W. Tod Zechel, Brad Sparks, and Peter Gerstein, but since 1998 is headed by Gerstein. Currently the organization is responsible for an online daily e-mail newsletter, Caus & Effect. Address: 8624 E. San Bruno, Scotsdale, AZ 85258. Website: http://caus.org/.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. The UFO Encyclopedia. I, UFOs in the 1980s. Detroit: Apogee Books, 1990.

Fawcett, Lawrence, and Barry J. Greenwood. Clear Intent: The Government Coverup of the UFO Experience. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1984.

Claflin Sisters, Victoria (1838–1927) and Tennessee Celeste (1846–1923)

Early American feminists who gave Spiritualist séances during childhood. (See Victoria Claflin Woodhull)

Clairaudience

The faculty of "clear hearing," the ability to hear sounds inaudible to the normal ear, such as "spirit" voices; a faculty analogous to clairvoyance, but considerably less frequently met with.

One such incident occurred to the apostle Paul on the road to Damascus. He saw a light and heard a voice. As he later told of the events, "They that were with me saw the light and were afraid; but they heard not the voice of him who spoke to me" (Acts 23:9). Perhaps the best-known case is that of Joan of Arc (see Jeanne D'Arc). She was not the only martyr who heard the voices of saints and angels urging them to perform some special task.

In Spiritualist circles the faculty is claimed by mediums, but distinction must be made between the "inner voice," through which mediums are supposed to receive communications from the denizens of "the otherworld," and an externalized voice comparable to an actual physical sound. Frequently some such physical sounds form the basis of an auditory hallucination, just as the points of light in a crystal are said to form points de repère around which the hallucination of the visualizer may shape itself.

Clairaudience is considered a rare mediumistic gift, but the phenomenon has been known from ancient times: "The prophet that is in Israel telleth the king of Israel the words the king of Syria speaks in his bedchamber" (2 Kings 6). The experience of hearing inner voices was described in the age of animal magnetism by one of Dr. G. Billot's somnambulists:

"At first, I feel a little breath like a light zephyr, which refreshes and then chills my ear. From that instant I become deaf, and I begin to be aware of a little humming in the ear, like that of a gnat. By giving close attention I then hear a small voice which says to me that which I afterwards repeat.

"A biographer of the poet William Cowper wrote that the most important events of Cowper's later years were audibly announced to him before they occurred."

The difficulty in where to draw the line between subjective and objective experience is illustrated by the following narrative of Vincent Turvey in The Beginnings of Seership (1911):

"One afternoon a few weeks ago I went to sleep on the sofa; after a time, probably about forty minutes, I became aware that there was an indistinct conversation going on somewhere near me. Knowing that all my people were out and that my house stands detached in its own grounds, I wondered what it meant. Then I realized that I was asleep and was 'hearing' clairaudiently, and that those who were conversing were not 'spirits,' but someone inside me and someone outside me, and yet part of me, because both voices were 'Turvey' in language, etc. I caught no sentence, save here and there a word or two such as 'understand—no condition—not yet,' etc., then I heard the sentence: 'But you had better wake it up now, as there is a man coming to the house in a minute.' I woke and had just enough time to throw off my rug and smooth my hair with my hand, when the front door bell rang."

Clairaudience is either spontaneous or experimentally induced. Seashells are used for the latter purpose; most people can hear what sounds like the murmur of the sea in a shell. But the clairaudient medium soon distinguishes other voices, may hear distant friends speaking, may hear part of a conversation he or she has already heard or will soon hear, and may interpret the communications as messages from the dead or from the living. The medium Arthur Ford was well known as a successful platform clairaudient in the United States, whereas Estelle Roberts had a similar reputation in England. Marjorie Livingston published several books on esoteric matters that she clairaudiently received.

Clairaudience fades imperceptively into the inspiration experienced by many artists. Many poets and novelists have also claimed that they "received" their material rather than consciously constructed it. In like measure, musicians often report initially hearing in their head a new composition, which they then reproduce for their audiences.

Sources:

Hollen, Henry. Clairaudient Transmission. Hollywood, Calif.: Keats Publications, 1931.

Roberts, Estelle. Forty Years a Medium. London: Herbert Jenkins, 1959. Revised as Fifty Years a Medium. London: Corgi Books, 1969.

Sharp, Arthur. F. The Spirit Saith. London: H. H. Greaves, n.d.

Clairvoyance

The faculty of clear-sightedness, the supposed paranormal ability to see persons and events that are distant in time or place. Clairvoyance may be roughly divided into three classes—retrocognition and premonition; perceiving past and future events; and perception of contemporary events happening at a distance, or outside the range of normal vision. Clairvoyance may include psychometry, second sight, and crystal gazing.

Prophecy is a form of clairvoyance extending back into antiquity, and second sight is also an ancient form. It is notable that Spiritualism in Great Britain was directly heralded, about the third decade of the nineteenth century, by an outbreak of clairvoyance. Among clairvoyants of that period was Alexis Didier, whose phenomena suggested that telepathy at least entered into his feats, which included reading letters enclosed in sealed packets, playing écarté with bandaged eyes, and others of a like nature. Clairvoyance remains a prominent feature of the Spiritualistic séance.

Although there exists a quantity of evidence, collected by members of the Society for Psychical Research and other scientific investigators, that would seem to support the theory of supernormal vision, it must be acknowledged that many cases of clairvoyance lend themselves to a more mundane explanation. For instance, it has been shown that it is almost impossible to bandage the eyes of a medium so that the person cannot make some use of his or her normal vision. The possibility of hyperesthesia during trance should also be taken into account, as should telepathy, which may conceivably play a part in clairvoyant performances.

A private detective agency could also be a possible source of some of the knowledge displayed by the professional clairvoyant. The crystal is, as has been indicated, a favorite mode of exercising the clairvoyant faculty, presumably because the hypnotic state is favorable to development of supernormal vision; however, it could also be that the condition thus induced favors the rising into the upper consciousness of knowledge previously stored in the subconscious.

The term clairvoyance is also used to describe the power to see discarnate spirits, and is applied to mediumship generally.

For a discussion of the early history of clairvoyance, see divination.

Types of Clairvoyance

Charles Richet used the term cryptesthesia in a wide sense to cover a whole range of such related phenomena as clairvoyance, premonitions, monitions, psychometry, dowsing, and telepathy. F. W. H. Myers used the term "telesthesia" in a narrower context. As substitutes for "clairvoyance" Henry Holt suggested the word "telopsis" and Dr. Heysinger the word "telecognosis" but these terms would not include deathbed visions and other apparitions.

The clairvoyant experience may be spontaneous or induced by suggestion (as in hypnotism) or autosuggestion (as in crystal gazing and other methods of divination). There are four important subdivisions: X-ray clairvoyance, medical clairvoyance, traveling clairvoyance, and platform clairvoyance. The first is the faculty to see into closed space, such as boxes, envelopes, rooms, and books; the second is the ability to see the inner mechanism of the human body and diagnose disease; the third involves a change of the center of perception—a mental journey to a distant scene and giving a description thereof; and the fourth is seeing spirits.

The so-called X-ray clairvoyance is a frequently observed manifestation of the power. There are many cases on record in which sealed letters were read when the contents were totally unknown to the experimenter or were couched in a language of which the seer was ignorant. The clairvoyant often has to handle the envelope but not necessarily. In pellet reading the pellets may or may not be touched at all; they may even be burnt and the contents revealed thereafter. Conscious effort and anxiety at demonstration, however, have most often resulted mostly results in failure. Moreover, pellet reading has been notorious as a fraudulent phenomenon.

Examples of Clairvoyance

The following statement appeared in the Report of the Experiments on Animal Magnetism, made by the Committee of the Medical Section of the French Royal Academy of Sciences, 1831:

"We have seen two somnambulists who distinguished, with their eyes closed, the objects which were placed before them; they mentioned the color and the value of cards, without touching them; they read words traced with the hand, as also some lines of books opened at random. This phenomenon took place even when the eyelids were kept exactly closed with the fingers.

In 1837 the French Academy offered a prize of 3,000 francs for a demonstration of true clairvoyance. One of the claimants of the prize was the 12-year-old daughter of one Dr. Pigaire, a physician, whose clairvoyant faculty was admitted by the scientist Arago. At the decisive séance the jury rescued itself from the awarding the prize by stating that, according to the doctors, normal vision could not be excluded even if the girl's eyes were plastered up and covered with cotton wool and a silk mask.

In a remarkable case of clairvoyance, Thomas A. Edison, experimenting with the clairvoyant Bert Reese, wrote in a distant room on a piece of paper, "Is there anything better than hydroxide of nickel for an alkaline electric battery?" When he rejoined Reese, the latter at once said, "No, there is nothing better than hydroxide of nickel for an alkaline battery." In another case involving Reese, Baron Schrenck-Notzing wrote on five pieces of paper the questions, What is my mother's name? When will you go to Germany? Will my book be a success? What is the name of my eldest son? and an intimate question. He mixed the papers and presented them without knowing which contained which question. Reese, barely touching them, answered all the questions.

Experimenting with Stephan Ossowiecki in Warsaw, Charles Richet wrote this phrase: "The sea never appears so great as when it is calm. Its fury lessens it." He folded the paper and put it in an envelope. Ossowiecki kneaded it feverishly and said after 10 minutes, "I see much water, much water. You want to attach some idea to the sea. The sea is so great that beside its motion. . . . I can see no more." Gustav Geley wrote on a visiting card, under the table, "Nothing is more moving than the call to prayer by the muezzins." Ossowiecki, feeling the envelope, said, "There is a feeling of prayer, a call, from men who are being killed or wounded. . . . No, it is not that. . . . Nothing gives rise to more emotion than the call to prayer, it is like a call to prayer, to whom? A certain caste of men, Mazzi, madz. . . . A card. I can see no more."

Sleepwalkers furnish evidence of a clairvoyant faculty of vision. The existence of such a faculty may explain strange experiences in dreams, such as the oft-quoted story of Rev. Henry Bushnell (Sunday at Home, vol. 1875) about Capt. Youatt, a wealthy man who in a dream saw a company of emigrants perishing in the mountain snow. He distinguished the faces of the sufferers and gave special attention to the scenery; a perpendicular white rock cliff struck him particularly. He fell asleep again and the dream was repeated. He described the scenery to a comrade, who recognized its features as belonging to the Carson Valley Pass, 150 miles away. A company was collected with blankets, provisions, and mules. On arriving they found the company exactly as portrayed in the dream.

That clairvoyant vision may be independent of normal eyesight and exercised by the mind without the assistance of the senses is shown by a note by Stainton Moses, dated March 1, 1874:

"In the midst of the séance, when perfectly clear of influence, I saw Theophilus and the Prophet. They were as clear and palpable to the eye as human beings would be in a strong light. Placing my hand over my eyes made no difference, but turning away I could see them no longer. This experiment I repeated several times."

Darkness presents no obstruction. Elizabeth d'Esperance could sketch in the dark, the paper before her appearing just as well illuminated as the spirit face that she sketched.

The nature of clarivoyant perception is difficult to define. It is not seeing, it is being truly impressed. "In the clairvoyant state," wrote Alfred Vout Peters (Light, October 11, 1913), "all bodily sensations seem to be merged into one big sense, so that one is able to see, hear, taste, smell, and above all, know. Yet the images stand out clear and strong." In Horace Leaf's experience sometimes the images are considerably smaller than lifesize, in some cases a few inches in height, although normally proportioned. He occasionally saw abnormally large forms, sometimes the face alone covering the entire field of vision. A clairvoyant may give a perfect character delineation of a man seen for the first time in his life. Heinrich Zschokke possessed this gift:

"It has happened to me sometimes on my first meeting with strangers, as I listened silently to their discourse, that their former life with many trifling circumstances therewith connected, or frequently some particular scene in that life, has passed quite involuntarily, and as it were dream-like, yet perfectly distinct, before me."

Medical Clairvoyance

An early allusion to medical clairvoyance, the ability to see inside the body and diagnose disease, is found in Hippocrates: "The affections suffered by the body the soul sees with shut eyes." In the age of animal magnetism, medical clairvoyance was widely demonstrated. The investigation committee of the French Academy of Medicine admitted the phenomena of medical clairvoyance in 1831.

With the coming of Spiritualism the magnetizer disappeared and both medical and ordinary clairvoyance found an outlet in spontaneous trance, or was exercised in the waking state. In the astounding psychic development of Andrew Jackson Davis, medical clairvoyance represented the initial stage.

Both in the United States and in England, the first well-attested records of medical clairvoyance involve servant girls. Mary Jane, the servant of Dr. Larkin, of Wrentham, Massachusetts, diagnosed her own state and the diseases of the doctor's patients with remarkable precision in 1844 in a trance. Emma, the maid of Dr. Joseph Haddock showed similar powers. She distinguished between arterial and venous blood in the heart, calling one the "light side" and the other the "dark side." Dr. Haddock's experiences were corroborated by Dr. William Gregory in Letters on Animal Magnetism (1851), in the accounts of Sir Walter Trevelyan and Dr. Elliotson, and in Dr. Herbert Mayo's Letters on the Truths contained in Popular Superstitions (1849, 1851).

With the unfolding of Spiritualism, it was thought less and less preposterous to employ mediums professionally for medical purposes. Bessie Williams was a doctor's assistant for some years, and psychic diagnosis was further developed by Walter Kilners's discovery of the human aura and its color changes according to the state of health. The psychic healer Edgar Cayce diagnosed thousands of cases and is credited with many cures.

Traveling Clairvoyance

There is abundant evidence of traveling clairvoyance, the ability to mentally journey to a distant scene and observe events, in old and present-day records. Such ability was freely exercised by the shamans and medicine men of primitive peoples. Sir William Barrett's conclusion in Psychical Research (1911) that the reputed evidence on behalf of traveling clairvoyance is more widespread and ancient than that for telepathy may be justified.

A well-authenticated and frequently quoted instance of traveling clairvoyance is Emanuel Swedenborg's vision in 1756 at Gothenburg of a devastating fire in Stockholm. Kant wrote it down in 1758, having obtained the details from the witnesses themselves. This is a case of spontaneous traveling clairvoyance, not purposive, representing rather a psychic invasion by the medium. It resembles the experience of Apollonius of Tyana, who, during a lecture at Ephesus, suddenly broke off, saying that the tyrant Domitian had been killed at Rome.

The first known instance of something resembling real traveling in magnetic sleep was recorded in a letter written from Nantes to the Marquis de Puysegur in March 1785. A young girl followed the movements of her magnetizer when he went into town and described everything that was taking place around him.

In Germany some early records are to be found in Dr. Van Ghert's Archiv für den tierischen Magnetismus. The first carefully investigated traveling clairvoyants were the French Alexis and Adolph Didier and Adèle Maginot. President Seguier, without giving his name, called upon Alexis Didier for a sitting. Didier made an imaginary journey to Seguier's room and saw a tiny bell on a table. Seguier denied this. On returning home, Sequier found that in his absence a bell had been placed on the table.

The Didier brothers were widely experimented with in England. An account of 14 séances held at Brighton with Alexis Didier is to be found in Dr. Edwin Lee's Animal Magnetism (1866). Adolphe Didier was investigated mainly by H. G. Atkinson. Adèle Maginot's striking adventures in traveling clairvoyance were recorded by Louis-Alphonse Cahagnet. She not only found for his sitters distant relatives who had vanished years ago, but also claimed to have actually conversed with them.

In one instance, Maginot, "traveling" by clairvoyance to a tropical country, asked to be awakened because she was afraid of wild beasts. It is within the bounds of possibility that an encounter with a wild beast on the scene would severely affect a clairvoyant's nervous system.

In another instance, actual harm was suffered by the medium. A M. Lucas de Rembouillet was very anxious about the fate of his brother-in-law. With the mother of the vanished man he visited Adèle Maginot.

"That which astonished this good woman, not a little, as well as Mr. Lucas, and the other persons present at the séance, was to see Adèle putting her hands before the left side of her face to shelter her from the burning rays of sunshine of that climate, seeming at the same time to be overcome with heat; but what was more marvelous still was the fact that she had a violent sunstroke, which made all the side of her face, from her brow to her shoulder, a bluish red, whilst the other side remained white. This deep color only began to disappear twenty-four hours later. The heat was so violent at this time that you could not keep your hand on her.

Five thousand miles from Melbourne at sea William Howitt had a vision in which he clearly saw his brother's house, premises, and the landscape around. When he landed, he was so sure of his bearings that he went cross-country. All was as the vision portrayed.

Another case from an early record has some curious features. Dr. F. magnetized Jane and warned William Eglinton that he would send Jane to see what he was doing between eight and ten that evening. Jane said, "I see a very fat man with a wooden leg, he has no brain. He is called Eglinton. He is sitting before a table where there is brandy, but he is not drinking." The fact was Eglinton had made a fat dummy and dressed it in his own clothes.

In Thirty Years of Psychic Research (1923), Charles Richet describes a dramatic instance of traveling clairvoyance concerning himself. Pierre Janet sent Leonie B., in trance, after Richet, who had left for Paris. The clairvoyant suddenly declared that Richet's laboratory was burning. It was later determined that the laboratory was indeed burning at the time of the vision.

To exercise the faculty of traveling clairvoyance, sometimes an object belonging to a distant friend or locality is necessary, but often an index, say, the name of a friend or a place, is sufficient. The process of locating the desired person or object escapes explanation. As F. W. H. Myers writes in Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death, 1903:

"The clairvoyant will frequently miss her way, and describe houses and scenes adjacent to those desired. Then if she almost literally gets on the scent—if she finds some place which the man whom she is sent to seek has some time traversed—she follows up his track with greater ease, apparently recognizing past events in his life as well as present circumstances. The process often reminds one of the dog who, if let loose far from home will find his way homewards vaguely at first, and using we do not quite know what instinct; then if he once gets on the scent will hold it easily across much of confusion and obstacle."

E. W. Cox in What Am I? (1874) observes,

"The description is rarely or never that which should be given of an object then clearly present to the sight. It is more or less wanting in definite outline, like objects seen in a fog, suggesting that the perspective faculty, whatever it may be, is exercised through more or less obstacle. The objects do not preserve their relative proportion of size or colour in the impression they make upon the mind of the patient. Whatever the perspective faculty may be it is certainly not so powerful, nor so clear as the sense of sight. Small and unimportant things are often perceived when more prominent objects are unnoticed. Moreover, the faculty seems to be subject to continuous variation during the few minutes of its exercise, as if interrupted frequently by passing clouds."

Cox also asks whether traveling clairvoyance might not be a survival of the mysterious power of orientation so well developed in animals but nearly extinguished in men.

Vincent Turvey writes in The Beginnings of Seership?,

"In the mental body-travelling the 'I' (the spirit) appears to leave the 'me' (the body) and to fly through space at a velocity that renders the view of the country passed over very indistinct and blurred. The 'I' appears to be about two miles above the earth, and can only barely distinguish water from land, or forest from city; and only then, if the tracts perceived be fairly large in area. Small rivers or villages would not be distinguishable."

Traveling clairvoyance may take the seer into the future. Robert James Lees' claimed visions of the crimes that Jack the Ripper was going to commit the following day, with an exact description of the locality.

Perhaps traveling clairvoyance could also be exploited for historical research in guiding the medium into the past. Many sensitives claim to be able to go back into past ages in trance, some as far back as the mythical Atlantis or the still older Lemuria. Accomplishments of this sort, however, are more psychometric than clairvoyant and defy verification.

Many trance communications are classed under traveling clairvoyance if the control is considered the subconscious self of the medium. A strange mixture of traveling clairvoyance, clairaudience or control by the subconscious of the living is described in the following letter from Rosina Thompson to J. G. Piddington of the Society for Psychical Research, May 24, 1900:

"On Monday, March 7, 1900, about 7:30 in the evening, I happened to be sitting quite alone in the dining-room and thinking of the possibility of my subliminal communicating with that of another person—no one in particular. I was not for one moment unconscious. All at once I felt someone was standing near and quietly opened my eyes, and was very surprised to see—clairvoyantly, of course—Mr. J. G. Piddington. I was very keen to try the experiment, so at once spoke to him aloud. He looked so material and lifelike I did not feel in the least alarmed. I commenced: 'Please tell me of something I may afterwards verify to prove that I am really speaking to you.' "

J. G. P. replied, "I have had a beastly row with [name witheld]."

Then Thompson asked, "What about?" but there was no answer.

J. G. P. answered, "He says he did not intend to annoy me, but I said he had been very successful in doing so whether he intended or not." And after these words he disappeared.

According to Piddington, all the details were correct. The quarrel was in correspondence. The final remark was addressed to Mrs. Piddington at breakfast. It is not possible that Thompson heard of the remark.

A curious form of clairvoyance is what Turvey (The Beginnings of Seership) describes as phone-voyance, a sort of psychic television in which the telephone wire apparently plays some part but which is nevertheless replete with elements of mystery not encountered in psychic television.

Psychical research has offered no convincing explanation for the phenomena of clairvoyance. In Letters on the Truths contained in Popular Superstitions, published in 1849, Herbert Mayo, professor of physiology in King's College and the Royal College of Surgeons, London, suggested an exo-neural action of the mind:

"I hold that the mind of a living person in its most normal state is always, to a certain extent, acting exo-neurally or beyond the limits of the bodily person, and in the lucid state this exo-neural apprehension seems to extend to every object and person around." This hypothesis differs only in degree from another, much bolder speculation put forward by which Sir William Barrett: "It may be that the intelligence operating at a séance is a thought-projection of ourselves—that each one of us has his simulacrum in the unseen. That with the growth of our life and character here, a ghostly image of ourselves is growing up in the invisible world; nor is this inconceivable."

There are opinions in essential agreement with part of the spiritist view, according to which the sense organs of the etheric body come into play or the information is impressed on the seer's mind by the spirits. It is also suggested that in traveling clairvoyance the double travels to the scene. The objection to this suggestion is that the double is temporarily separated the body is usually left behind unconscious and the memory of the journey is seldom brought back, whereas in traveling clairvoyance the subject describes with living voice what transpires at a distant place. The Theosophists have speculated on an "astral tube" that the clairvoyants construct for themselves from astral matter to see through.

Vincent Turvey appeared to see through some such agency. He writes:

"In plain, long distance clairvoyance, I appear to see through a tunnel which is cut through all intervening physical objects, such as towns, forests and mountains. This tunnel seems to terminate just inside Mr. Brown's study, for instance, but I can only see what is actually there, and am not able to walk about the house, nor to use any other faculty but that of sight. In fact, it is almost like extended physical sight on a flat earth void of obstacles. (This tunnel also applies to time as well as to space.) In mental body-travelling the 'I' (the spirit) is actually on the spot and sees and hears and smells and uses all the sense of the 'me' (the body) which remains at home; although, if physical force be needed this is as a rule borrowed from a third party."

Theosophists have also suggested that the clairvoyant may see thought-pictures. Mediums themselves are at variance as to how they do it. Bessie Williams (Mrs. Russel-Davies) claimed that clairvoyance is vision by one's spirit. W. H. Bach, in Mediumship and its Development, contends that both clairvoyance and clairaudience are impressional. The gift is often noticed in children, and it may disappear later. D'Esperance, when a child, continually saw "shadow people" in the house where she lived; Bessie Williams played with spirit children in the garden; and most other gifted mediums had similar experiences. Alfred Vout Peters experienced a feeling of irritability or excitement before becoming clairvoyant.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle suggested that the special atmosphere of clairvoyants might be the result of ectoplasm emanating from the sensitive's body and enabling the spirit to impress it. The cold chill and subsequent fainting in seeing ghosts may be due not only to terror but also to the drain on the body. In The Coming of the Fairies (1922) Doyle proposed a vibrational theory:

"If we could conceive a race of beings which were constructed in material which threw out shorter or longer vibrations (than ours), they would be invisible unless we could tune ourselves up or tone them down. It is exactly that power of tuning up and adapting itself to other vibrations which constitutes a clairvoyant and there is nothing scientifically impossible, so far as I can see, in some people seeing that which is invisible to others. If the objects are indeed there, and if the inventive power of the human brain is turned upon the problem, it is likely that some sort of psychic spectacles, inconceivable to us at the moment, will be invested and that we shall all be able to adapt ourselves to the new conditions. If high-tension electricity can be converted by a mechanical contrivance into a lower tension, keyed to other uses, then it is hard to see why something analogous might not occur with the vibrations of ether or other waves of light."

Dr. Daniel Frost Comstock, who was a professor at the Massachusetts Technical Institute, claimed to have known a clairvoyant woman with whom he made the discovery that her range of vision extended far past the point in the violet end of the spectrum where most of us cease to get any further retina stimuli. She therefore had an actual ultraviolet vision to a degree greatly beyond anything Comstock had ever heard of.

In the experiments of Dutch researchers G. Heymans, Henry Brugmans, and Weinberg with the clairvoyant D. Vandam, it was found that when certain substances, including alcohol and bromide, were ingested, clairvoyance became more intense. The reason, according to Brugmans, was that alcohol lessened the power of inhibition, of reasoning, and of attention, thereby increasing the power of the subconscious.

Charles W. Donville-Fife describes in his book Among Wild Tribes of the Amazons (1924) how clairvoyance could be induced by a drug named yage or peyotl (peyote). He was convinced by actual experiments of the strange workings of the drug. Since then, Louis Levin's Phantastica (1931) and Aldous Huxley's The Doors of Perception (1954) have familiarized a whole generation with psychedelic drugs.

Dr. Norman Jeans, in experiments with himself under various anesthetics, found that under the influence of laughing gas (nitrous oxide) he became clairvoyant and was able to see events happening at various distant places.

A more complicated form of clairvoyance is shown in the case of the medium Knudsen, who, blindfolded, steered a steamlaunch around the harbor of Copenhagen. For him to do it, however, somebody in the boat had to place his hand on his head. A similar feat was demonstrated by Gaston Overien in August 1928. With his face and eyes completely covered by a thick mask, he rode twice round the dirt track at White City, London, on a motorcycle and avoided numerous obstacles that had been placed in the way after he had been blindfolded.

Many clairvoyants (e.g., Gerard Croiset) have been consulted by the police of several countries to help trace criminals. Although startling claims of success have been made, there is some ambiguity in many instances.

Because much claimed clairvoyant faculty is of a spontaneous nature, it presents difficulties for parapsychological experimentation and testing. The personal associations and emotional stimuli of mediumship are difficult to embody in the atmosphere of laboratory testing. However, a more rigorous approach to spontaneous phenomena, involving fuller documentation (e.g., prompt recording, independent firsthand corroboration, background information on medium and sitter), can assist in tentative evaluation. Laboratory experiments have involved card guessing, target guessing, and Ganzfeld setting, but decades of experimentation have not yet established any consistent rationale for clairvoyant faculty, although there is some presumptive evidence for its occurrence under control conditions. Further experimentation with talented subjects is needed to determine the relationship between clairvoyance and other forms of ESP, such as telepathy and psychometry. (See also Eyeless sight)

Sources:

Butler, W. E. How to Develop Clairvoyance. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1971.

Dykshoorn, M. B., and Russell H. Felton. My Passport Says Clairvoyant. New York: Hawthorn, 1974.

Edmonds, Simeon. ESP: Extrasensory Perception. London: Aquarian Press, 1965. Reprint, North Hollywood, Calif.: Wilshire Book, 1972.

Fukurai, T. Clairvoyance & Thoughtography. London, 1931. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Geley, Gustav. Clairvoyance & Materialisation. London: T. F. Unwin Ltd., 1927.

Gurney, Edmund, F. W. H. Myers, and Frank Podmore. Phantasms of the Living. 2 vols. London: Trubner, 1886. Reprint, Gainesville, Fla.: Scholars' Facsimiles & Reprints, 1970.

Hodson, Godfrey. The Science of Seership. London, 1920.

Leshan, Lawrance. Clairvoyant Reality: Toward a General Theory of the Paranormal. Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, England: Turnstone Press, 1980.

Montague, Nell St. John. Revelations of a Society Clairvoyante. London, 1926.

Myers, F. W. H. Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death. 2 vols. London: Longmans, Green, 1903. Abridged edition. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961.

Osty, Eugene. Supernormal Faculties in Man: An Experimental Study. London: Methuen, 1923.

Pollack, J. H. Croiset the Clairvoyant. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1964.

Rhine, J. B. The Reach of the Mind. New York: W. Sloane Associates, 1947.

Rhine, Louise E. Hidden Channels of the Mind. London, 1962. Reprint, New York: Apollo, 1966.

Tenhaeff, W. H. C. Telepathy & Clairvoyance. Springfield, Ill.: Charles C. Thomas, 1972.

Tischner, R. Telepathy & Clairvoyance. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1925.

Van Over, Raymond. ESP & the Clairvoyants. New York: Award Books, Happauge, 1970.

Clancarty, Earl of (1911–)

A writer on UFO and ancient astronaut themes better known under his given name (William) Brinsley Le Poer Trench, under which he wrote.

Clan Morna

In Irish romance one of the divisions of the Fianna, whose treasure bag containing magic weapons and precious jewels of the Danaan age was kept by Fia of that clan. (See also Danaans)

Claregate College

British organization offering courses and workshops on esoteric and occult subjects, directed by Dr. Douglas M. Baker. Subjects covered include esoteric healing, astrology, psychology, and meditation. For students unable to attend in person, Claregate offers correspondence courses with cassette tapes, textbooks, and other materials. Address: Claregate College, Little Elephant, High Road, Essendon, Hertfordshire AL9 6HR, England.

Clarie, Thomas Cashin (1943–)

Author of valuable bibliographical works on the occult and paranormal. Clarie was born December 21, 1943, in Providence, Rhode Island. He was educated at the College of the Holy Cross (B.S., 1965), Southern Connecticut State College (M.S.L.S., 1972), and the University of Connecticut (M.A., 1973). He has produced several publications, but is best known for his bibliographical book on occultism, which strives to preserve knowledge on the subject.

Sources:

Clarie, Thomas C. Occult Bibliography: An Annotated List of Books Published in English, 1971 through 1975. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1978.

———. Occult/Paranormal Bibliography: An Annotated List of Books Published in English, 1976 through 1981. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1984.

Clark, Walter Houston (1902–1994)

Professor of psychology of religion, who took a special interest in parapsychology, psychedelic drugs, and religious experience. He was born July 15, 1902, in Westfield, New Jersey, and was educated at Williams College (A.B., 1925) and Harvard University (A.M., 1926; Ed.M., 1935; Ph.D., 1944). While pursuing his graduate work, he joined the staff of Lenox School in Massachusetts as an instructor in English and the Bible. He stayed at Lenox for 19 years, eventually becoming the senior master and acting headmaster. In 1945 he joined the faculty at Bowdoin College and successively taught at Middlebury College, Middlebury, Vermont (1947–51); Hartford Seminary Foundation, School of Religious Education, Hartford, Connecticut (1951–62); and Andover Newton Theological School, from 1962 until his retirement in 1967.

As a psychologist with a religious background, and the author of a standard textbook on the psychology of religion, Clark became interested in religious experience. He was among the first intellectuals affected by the psychedelic revolution and came to feel that properly administered mind-altering drugs were an instant source of intense religious experiences. His own analysis was published in 1969 as Chemical Ecstasy; Psychedelic Drugs and Religion and informed his later book, Religious Experience; Its Nature and Functioning in the Human Psyche (1973). His interest in parapsychology was manifest in his accepting the presidency of the Academy of Religion and Psychical Research at its founding in 1973. Clark died in December 1994 at Cape Elizabeth, Maine.

Sources:

Clark, Walter Houston. The Oxford Group; Its History and Significance. New York: Bookman Associates, 1951.

———. The Psychology of Religion; An Introduction to Religious Experience and Behavior. New York: Macmillan, 1958.

———. Religious Experience; Its Nature and Functioning in the Human Psyche. Springfield, Ill.: Charles Thomas, 1973.

Clark, Walter Houston, and M. H. Malony, J. Daane, and A. R. Tippett. Chemical Ecstasy; Psychedelic Drugs and Religion. New York: Sheed and Ward, 1969.

Clarke, Arthur C. (1917–)

Famous British science fiction author and technologist credited with originating the concept of communication satellites. Clarke has also presented two television series on paranormal phenomena. He was born December 16, 1917, in Minehead, Somersetshire, England, and was educated at King's College, University of London (B.Sc., 1948). He had previously been an auditor in the British Civil Service (1936–44) and a radar instructor in the Royal Air Force (1941–46), retiring as a flight lieutenant. After graduation he served as an assistant editor of Science Abstracts (1949–50). He began freelance writing in 1951 and has since turned out numerous nonfiction and science fiction books such as, Childhood's End, and Rendezvous with Rama. He was selected to chair the Second International Astronautics Congress in London, 1951.

Clarke has received many important awards for his science fiction writing and his scientific contributions, including the Stuart Ballantine Gold Medal from the Franklin Institute in 1963 for his concept of communications satellites, the Robert Ball Award from the Aviation-Space Writers Association in 1965 for best aerospace reporting of the year, and the Westinghouse Science Writing Award from the American Association for the Advancement of Science in 1969.

Clarke became internationally famous for his screenplay (with Stanley Kubrick) for the film 2001: A Space Odyssey, which received the Second International Film Festival special award in 1969 and an Academy Award nomination from the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences (1969).

With such a background of scientific fact and fiction, Clarke's investigation of claimed paranormal phenomena was of special interest. He was coauthor with Simon Welfare and John Fairley of two important television series: Arthur C. Clarke's Mysterious World (1980) and Arthur C. Clarke's World of Strange Powers (1984), both presented on British television and later aired on programs in the United States and other countries. The series was supported by books containing additional material not in the television programs. In both books and television programs, Clarke and his collaborators express a considerable skepticism, although granting a limited probability to certain claimed paranormal phenomena such as apparitions, maledictions, poltergeists, telepathy, stigmata, and fire walking. However, the great value of books and programs lay in the scrutiny of recent phenomena instead of simply a rehash of old material, and in the television programs rare early movie records of phenomena were shown together with recently filmed events. Both books and television programs therefore constitute a useful record of research, and even their skepticism is a healthy corrective to overcredulous writing and filming on the paranormal.

Sources:

Clarke, Arthur C. Ascent to Orbit: A Scientific Autobiography. New York: John Wiley, 1984.

———. Childhood's End. New York: Ballantine, 1953.

———. The Ghost from the Grand Banks. London: V. Gollancz, 1990.

———. Profiles of the Future: An Inquiry Into the Limits of the Possible. New York: Holt Rinehart, and Winston, 1984.

———. Rama Revealed. London, Gollancz and New York: Bantam, 1993.

———. Rendezvous with Rama. London, Gollancz and New York: Harcourt Brace, 1973.

Fairley, John. Arthur Clarks' World of Strange Powers. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1984.

Clavel, F. T. B. (ca. 1845)

Author of a frequently quoted history of Freemasonry: Histoire pittoresque de la Franc-Maçonnerie et des sociétés anciennes et modernes (1843). He hinted in it that when Freemasonry in Austria was suppressed by Charles VI, the Order of Mopses was established in its place. (See also Collegia artificum)

Claymont Society for Continuous Education

American organization stemming from the International Academy for Continuous Education founded by British mathematician-philosopher John G. Bennett propagating the Fourth Way methods of G. I. Gurdjieff. The society, founded in 1974, may be contacted at Rte. 1, Box 266P, Charles Town, West Virginia 25414-9734. Website: http://www.claymont.org/.

Sources:

Claymont Society for Continuous Education. http://www.claymont.org/. March 8, 2000.

Clear Light (Magazine)

Quarterly publication of the Pansophic Institute concerned with Tibetan Buddhist teachings and ideals of enlightenment and world brotherhood. Last known address: P.O. Box 42324, Portland, OR 97242.

Cledonism (or Cledonismantia)

Ancient system of divination based on the good or evil presage of certain words uttered without premeditation when persons come together in any way. The system also regulated the words to be used on particular occasions. Cicero stated that the Pythagoreans were very attentive to these presages, and according to Pausanius, it was a favorite method of divination at Smyrna, where the oracles of Apollo were thus interpreted.

Cleidomancy

System of divination using a suspended door key. It was to be performed when the sun or moon was in Virgo. The name of the individual being investigated was written upon a key tied to a Bible, and both were hung upon the nail of the ring finger of a virgin, who softly repeated certain words three times.

Depending on whether the key and Bible turned or were stationary, the person in question was considered to be innocent or guilty. Some ancient diviners added the seven psalms with litanies and sacred prayers, and then more fearful effects were produced upon the guilty, for not only were the key and the Bible supposed to turn, but the impression of the key was to be made the person or he lost an eye.

Another method was to place the key on the Fiftieth Psalm, close the Bible, and fasten it tightly with a woman's garter. It was then suspended to a nail that was said to turn when the name of a suspected thief was mentioned. In a third method, two persons suspended the Bible between them, holding the ring of the key by their two forefingers. (See also bibliomancy)

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

Clemens, Samuel Langhorne ("Mark Twain") (1835–1910)

Samuel Clemens (b. November 30, 1835) was better known as March Twain and by his classic fictions such as, The Adventures of Tom Sawyer, and The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, rather than his work as a reporter-writer. In this capacity, Mark Twain manifested a great interest in a wide variety of contemporary events and movements. Reference to paranormal events and metaphysical movements are scattered throughout his writings. He is well known for his book on Christian Science (1970), upon which he poured out his scorn. He also had a great interest in thought-transference, or "mental telegraphy" as he called it, and wrote an essay on the subject originally intended as a chapter in A Tramp Abroad but later published separately in 1882. This was followed by another essay, "Mental Telegraphy Again," in 1889, in which he related personal experiences in telepathy and seeing an apparition. These essays were included in Literary Essays in the author's edition of The Writings of Mark Twain.

The famous author died on April 21, 1910 in Redding, Connecticut.

Sources:

Clemens, Samuel Langhorne. The Writings of Mark Twain. New York: Harpers, 1907.

Cleromancy

System of divination practiced by throwing black and white beans, little bones or dice, or stones—anything, in short, suitable for lots. A method of practicing cleromancy in the streets of Egypt is cited in the entry on sortilege, and similar divination was common in ancient Rome.

The Thriaejan lots meant much the same thing as cleromancy, being little more than the tossing of dice in which the objects used bore particular marks or characters and were consecrated to Mercury, who was regarded as the patron of this method of divination. For this reason an olive leaf, called "the lot of Mercury," was generally put in the urn in order to gain his favor.

Clive-Ross, Francis Fabian (1921–)

Active figure in British occult publishing. A justice of the peace, Clive-Ross was for many years proprietor of the Aquarian Book Service, established at Pates Manor, an ancient house in Middlesex. He relinquished his interest in Aquarian Press around 1966.

Soon after the London Spiritualist Alliance was reorganized as the College of Psychic Science in 1955, Clive-Ross became editor of the long-established Spiritualist journal Light. Under his editorship, the journal expanded its scope to include articles on occultism, comparative religion, and parapsychology, some of them highly critical and skeptical. Readers demanded that the journal revert to its former role as a Spiritualist publication. Clive-Ross pointed out that he had accepted editorship on the condition that Light be an independent journal. Subsequently, he resigned and Dr. V. F. Underwood took over as editor in a voluntary capacity, the journal resuming its stance of propagating the case for Spiritualism and psychical research.

Clive-Ross formed Perennial Books to specialize in metaphysics, philosophy, and religion. He has retained a critical faculty in dealing with occult subjects, believing that there is a good deal of fraud or self-deception in Spiritualism and psychical research.

Closed Deck

Term used by parapsychologists in card-guessing tests, where each symbol in the deck occurs a set number of times, as in a normal pack of playing cards. The deck is randomized for each run in the test. This is in distinction to an open deck.

Close Encounters of the Third Kind

Title of a 1977 movie about UFOs or flying saucers, produced by Columbia Pictures and directed by Steven Spielberg. The film—a story about a group of people mysteriously drawn to a site in the Western United States where government personnel hoped to communicate with a extraterrestrial craft expected to land—was fiction but drew heavily upon UFO research and theory. Astronomer and ufologist J. Allen Hynek served as technical consultant on the film and made a brief cameo appearance. Several of the movie's subplots were based on firsthand accounts of claimed sightings of UFOs.

The title derives from a grading of types of UFO sighting reports developed by Hynek; the first kind denotes sightings without contact, the second kind involves UFO reports that include some accompanying physical evidence, and the third kind designates claimed contacts with extraterrestrial entities.

Close Encounters of the Third Kind is particularly notable for its special effects, the creation of Douglas Trumbull, who also created the noteworthy special effects in Stanley Kubrick's film 2001: A Space Odyssey.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. UFOs in the 1980s: The UFO Encyclopedia. Vol. 1. Detroit: Apogee Books, 1990.

Cloud Busting

Popular term for controlling weather by dissipating of clouds through mental concentration or other telekinetic means. In his article "People and Weather," Les Shepard made an early comparative discussion of weather changers and techniques while reviewing the claims of Wilhelm Reich; Oscar Drummond of Reading, England; Judith L. Gee of London; and Dr. Rolf Alexander, author of the book The Power of the Mind: The System of Creative Realism (1955). Alexander, a New Zealander by birth, gave demonstrations of his claimed ability to dissipate clouds on a British television program in 1956. Alexander would stare at a chosen target of cumulus cloud and mentally concentrate on its dissipation.

Oscar Drummond was reported in the Reading Standard of October 1, 1948, as "attacking" the sky and stopping rain through mental action. He was quoted as saying, "Einstein's ideas of time, space, and relativity coincide somewhat with my own facts; that man is sealed down in a domeshaped sky, and he, being 90 percent water, is one with the wet sky, physically. . . . If such were not the case, I could not destroy the clouds metaphysically."

Judith L. Gee wrote, "My method is simplicity itself. It is the non-acceptance of clouds and rain. . . . So when I want sunshine, I just see the sun shining . . . the clouds parting and dispersing and blue skies triumphant."

Wilhelm Reich, an early pupil of Freud's famous for the concept of orgone energy, invented what he called a "cloud-buster"—an apparatus composed of hollow tubes connected with running water and pointed at the sky by the operator in a certain manner.

A more skeptical view of cloud busting was made by Denys Parsons in a 1956 article in the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research, London. He suggested that fair weather cumulus clouds normally dissipate within about fifteen minutes and account for the apparent effectiveness of paranormal cloud-busting activity.

Sources:

Alexander, Rolf. The Power of the Mind: The System of Creative Realism. London, 1955.

Parsons, Denys. "Cloud Busting: A Claim Investigated." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research, 38, 690 (December 1956).

Shepard, Les. "People and Weather." Orgonomic Functionalism 2, no. 4 (July 1955).

Cloven Foot

There is an old belief, buttressed by countless tales of apparitions, that the devil always appears with a cloven foot as a sort of distinguishing mark. It has been suggested that the Evil One, having fallen lower than any man, is not permitted to take the perfect human form but must have some sort of deformity (i.e., the cloven foot). It is also hypothesized that medieval Christian imagery of the Devil merged with that of the pagan goat-footed god Pan. The goat, of course, has a variety of occult associations, including its inclusion in astrology in the sign of Capricorn and the manifestation of incubi and succubi in the form of a goat.

Sources:

Cavendish, Richard. The Black Arts. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1967.

Russell, Jeffrey Burton. Witchcraft in the Middle Ages. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1972.

Cloverleaf Connections

Cloverleaf Connections is a Canadian-based channeling organization claiming to be in contact with a host of spiritual entities, especially those extraterrestrial beings who constitute the intergalactic association commonly known as the Ashtar Command. Cloverleaf Connections traces its history to the Harmonic Convergence event of 1987 during which a young woman, Ariana Sheran, learned to channel and began to receive messages, especially from Ashtar. Over a period of time, Sheran received numerous messages and reproduced them for general circulation. Cloverleaf Connections emerged as a point of dissemination for these messages.

Throughout the 1990s to the present, Cloverleaf Connections has generally seen itself within the emerging ascension movement and Sheran has been comfortable with channeling material from both members of the theosophical spiritual hierarchy (Sananda, Kuthumi, St. Germain) and the Galactic Federation, as well as various angelic beings such as Lord Michael. The primary messages, however, are from Ashtar.

Ashtar is thought of as an etheric being who has passed through many incarnations. Through these various lives he has concentrated upon seeding planets. He reportedly brought life to Earth, including what became human life. He has had a special concern for human beings. In the present, he believes that Earth has become unbalanced, just as it is about to enter the fifth dimension (ascension). He works under Sananda (known to most people as Jesus). This present generation is a time of cleansing (the same times discussed in the biblical Book of Revelation).

Cloverleaf Connections is headquartered at 118 Fisher Crescent, Saskatoon, SK Canada S7L 5C4. It has published a number of the channeled materials received through Sheran in both booklets and cassette tapes. It may be contacted through its website at http://www.webster.sk.ca/cloverleaf/.

Sources:

Cloverleaf Connections. http://www.webster.sk.ca/cloverleaf/. February 28, 2000.

Clow, Barbara Hand (1943–)

Barbara Hand Clow, astrologer, channeler, and New Age entrepreneur, was born in Saginaw, Michigan, on February 14, 1943, the daughter of Eugene A. and Catherine Wallace Hand. She attended the University of Michigan and received her M.A. from the Institute for Culture and Creation in Chicago. In 1974 she married publisher Gerald Cudahy Clow. She also studied astrology and became aligned with the New Age Movement. Her interest excelled in the 1980s when she became the executive vice president of Bear & Company, a prominent New Age publishing house, and began to write out of her own perspectives on various occult topics. Her first astrology book, Eye of the Centaur, appeared in 1986.

During the 1980s, the field of astrology expanded greatly, among the most popular subjects being the study of asteroids and comets. Initial attention to the comet Chiron emerged in the 1970s, and Clow first rose out of obscurity with her study of the comet, published in 1987 as Chiron: Rainbow Between the Inner and Outer Planets. Her volume called attention to the Chiron orbit between the planets known in the ancient world (inner) and those only discovered in the modern age (outer). She followed this effort with her study of astrology and sexuality, Liquid Light of Sex: Mid-Life Crisis and the Planets (1991).

While becoming known as an astrologer, Clow also emerged as a channel, and in 1989 she issued one of the first books containing channeled material reputedly from inhabitants from the Pleiades star cluster, Heart of the Christos: Starseeding from the Pleiades. This volume, along with Barbara Marciniak's Bringers of the Dawn (1992), would create the emphasis on Pleiadian wisdom that became so prominent in the post-New Age ascension movement of the 1990s. She followed it with The Pleiadian Agenda: A New Cosmology for the Age of Light (1995). She has come to think of herself as a Pleiadian Emissary of Light who is assisting Earth with its transcendence of the dominant restrictive patterns that limit human creativity and awareness. As vice president of Bear & Company, she has been in charge of publishing many of the Pleiadian texts.

Sources:

Clow, Barbara Hand. Chiron: Rainbow Between the Inner and Outer Planets. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1987.

———. Heart of the Christos: Starseeding from the Pleiades. Santa Fe, N. Mex.: Bear & Co., 1989.

———. The Pleiadian Agenda: A New Cosmology for the Age of Light. Santa Fe, N. Mex.: Bear & Co., 1995.

Clymer, R(euben) Swinburne (1878–1966)

For many years head of the Rosicrucian Fellowship (Fraternitas Rosae Crucis), the oldest of the contemporary Rosicrucian organizations, founded in the nineteenth century by Pascal Beverley Randolph. Clymer was born November 25, 1878, in Quakertown, Pennsylvania. He was educated at the College of Medicine and Surgery, Chicago, Illinois (M.D., 1902). Clymer made a special study of osteopathy and naturopathy, and in 1910 he was registered as an osteopath in New York. He soon emerged as an early champion of natural forms of medical treatment, writing several books on the subject.

Clymer had become associated with the Rosicrucian Fellowship as a young man. He enrolled as a neophyte in 1897. In 1905 he became grand master of the Rosicrucian Fellowship and later succeeded James R. Phelps as exalted grand master and Edward Brown as supreme grand master, a position he held until his death in 1966. In his work for the fellowship he created a number of associated organizations, including the Philosophical Publishing Company (1900), Royal Fraternal Association (1909), Beverly Hall Corporation (1921), Confederation of Initiates (1929), and the Beverly Hall Foundation (1941). Clymer was also a prolific author and wrote many of the books still circulated by the fellowship.

After Clymer's death in June 1966 his son Emerson M. Clymer succeeded him as head of the fellowship.

Sources:

Clymer, R. Swinburne. The Book of Rosicrucie. 3 Vol. Quakertown, Pa.: Philosophical Publishing, 1946–49.

———. A Compendium of Occult Law. Quakertown, Pa.: Philosophical Publishing, 1938.

———. Diet: A Key to Health. Quakertown, Pa.: Humanitarian Society, 1930.

———. The Fraternitas Rosae Crucis. Quakertown, Pa.: Philosophical Publishing, 1929.

———. The Rosicrucian Fraternity in America. 2 vols. Quakertown, Pa.: Rosicrucian Foundation, 1935.

———. The Way to Happiness. Quakertown, Pa.: Humanitarian Society, 1920.

Coates, James (ca. 1927)

British writer on Spiritualism and spirit photography. He contributed articles to Light and Two Worlds and was the author of several books and pamphlets, including The Practical Hypnotist (1905), Seeing the Invisible (1906), and Photographing the Invisible (1911).

Cochrane, David (1949–)

David Cochrane, a leader in the development of computerized astrological programs, was born on May 1, 1949, in East Meadow, New York. He received a B.A. degree in psychology in 1972, and was offered a scholarship to continue his graduate studies in the field. However, he chose to become a professional astrologer and for the next decade devoted his time to a private practice. He also did some speculation over harmonics (the research initiated by John Addey) and midpoints (integral to Uranian astrology), the subject of several articles.

In the early 1980s he turned his attention to the computer and the new astrological computer programs that were emerging as tools for the professional astrologer. He developed the Kepler program that made its initial appearance in 1986. Over the next 15 years he developed Kepler into a comprehensive astrological tool that works for all astrologers, from the beginner who wishes to learn astrology, to the professional who needs assistance in constructing charts, to the advanced researcher who needs to make a variety of calculations beyond the average horoscope. The ephemeris contains the positions of the planets from 1000 B.C.E. to 2300 C.E. and for the asteroids from 1000 C.E. to 2300 C.E. It has a world atlas for locating birthplaces and complete information on daylight savings time and its variations since instituted.

Recently, Cochrane has created Avalon College, a nonresidential course of study attached to Kepler that offers complete beginning and intermediate training in astrology in 27 lessons. The step-by-step program is designed so that upon completion one will have a thorough grasp of astrological principles and be prepared to pass the tests that are offered as a requirement for certification by various astrological associations.

Cochrane heads Cosmic Patterns, the company that produces and distributes Kepler. It may be reached through its website at http://www.patterns.com/.

Sources:

Cosmic Patterns. http://www.patterns.com/. May 20, 2000.

Cock

The cock has been connected with magic practice in various parts of the world throughout the ages. It is the herald of the dawn, and examples abound of assemblies of demons and sorcerers where its shrill cry, announcing daybreak, has put the infernal Sabbat to rout. It is said that to avert such a contingency, sorcerers used to smear the head and breast of the cock with olive oil or place around his neck a collar of vine-branches.

In many cases the future was divined through this bird. It was also believed that in its stomach was found a stone, called lappilus alectorius, from the Greek name of the bird, that gave strength and courage and is said to have inspired the gigantic might of Milo of Crotona in the sixth century B.C.E.

Originally a native of India, the cock arrived in Europe in early times via Persia, where it is alluded to in the Zoroastrian books as the beadle (messenger) of the sun and terror of demons. Among the Arabs, it was said that it crowed when it became aware of the presence of jinns. The Jews received their concept of the cock as a scarer of evil spirits from the Persians, as did the Armenians, who said that it greets the guardian angels with its clarion call, who descend to earth with the day, and that it gives the keynote to the angelic choirs of heaven to commence their daily round of song.

In India, too, and among the pagan Slavs, it was supposed to scare away demons from dwelling places and was the first living creature introduced into a newly built house. The Jews, however, believed that it was possible for the cock to become the victim of demons and that it should be killed if it upsets a dish.

The cock was used directly in magic practice. In Scotland, it was buried under the patient's bed in cases of epilepsy. The Germans believed that if a sorcerer threw a black cock into the air, thunder and lightning would follow, and among the Chams of Cambodia, a woman who wished to become a sorceress sacrificed a live cock on a termite's nest, cutting the bird in two from the head to the tail and placing it on an altar, in front of which she danced and sang in the nude until the two halves of the bird came together again and it came to life and crowed. The name of the cock was pronounced by the ancient Greeks as a cure for the diseases of animals, and it was said by the Romans that locked doors could be opened with its tail feathers. The bird was pictured on amulets in early times and also figured as the symbol of Abraxas, the principal deity of a Gnostic sect.

The cock was regarded as the guide of souls to the underworld, and in this respect was associated by the Greeks with Persephone and Hermes. The Slavs of pagan times sacrificed cocks to the dead and to the household serpents, in which they believed their ancestors to be reincarnated. Conversely, the cock was pictured as having an infernal connection, especially if its color was black. Indeed, it was employed in black magic, perhaps the earliest instance of this being in the Atharva Veda, an ancient Hindu scripture. A black cock was offered up to propitiate the Devil in Hungary, and a black hen was used for the same purpose in Germany. The Greek sirens, the Shedim of the Talmud, and the Izpuzteque, whom the dead Aztec encounters on the road to Mictlán, the Place of the Dead, all have cock's feet. Cocks are also sacrificed in the Voudou and Santeria ceremonies of the West Indian islands.

There is a widespread folk belief that once in seven years the cock lays a little egg. In Germany it is necessary to throw this over the roof, or tempests will wreck the homestead; but should the egg be hatched, it will produce a cockatrice or basilisk. In Lithuania the cock's egg should be put in a pot and placed in the oven. From this egg is hatched a kauks, a bird with a tail like that of a golden pheasant, which, if properly tended, will bring its owner great good luck. A chronicle of Basel in Switzerland mentions that in the month of August 1474 a cock in that town was accused and convicted of laying an egg and was condemned to death. He was publicly burned along with his egg, at a place called Kablenberg, in sight of a great multitude of people.

In Oldenburg, Germany, a black cock was used to divine witches. The heart, lungs, and liver were pierced with needles and placed in a sealed vessel over a fire, while everyone present kept strict silence. When the heart boiled or became ashes, the witch would be evident, since she would feel a burning pain in her body and beg to be released.

The cock was also regarded as having a connection with light and with the sun, probably because of the redness of his comb and the fiery sheen of his plumage, or perhaps because he heralds the day. It is the cock who daily wakens the heroes in the Scandinavian Asgard. (See alectromancy)

Cockatrice

Another name for the fabulous and deadly reptilian monster known as the basilisk.

Cock Lane Ghost

Widely discussed disturbances of a poltergeist in 1762 at a house on Cock Lane, Smithfield, in London, England. They were attributed to the restless spirit of a Mrs. Kent, a former resident of the house, and communications were received through raps that she was murdered by her husband. The accused party retorted that an attempt was being made to blackmail him.

Dr. Samuel Johnson, assisted by the Reverend Douglas, later bishop of Salisbury, investigated the case. It was discovered that the phenomena of raps and furniture movements centered around 12-year-old Elizabeth Parsons, the daughter of the occupant of the house, and that the noises followed her wherever she went. But nothing occurred in the presence of the committee. By threats the child was frightened into trickery. She did it with so little art that she was immediately exposed. The story is recorded in The Mystery Revealed (1762), a pamphlet said to have been written by Oliver Goldsmith, and in Andrew Lang's Cock Lane and Common Sense (1894). Johnson's account was first published in The Gentleman's Magazine for 1763.

Sources:

Grant, Douglas. The Cock Lane Ghost. New York: Macmillan; St. Martin's Press, 1965.

Mackay, Charles. Memoirs of Extraordinary Popular Delusions. London: Richard Bentley, 1841. Reprinted as Extraordinary Popular Delusions and the Madness of Crowds. Wells, Vt.: Fraser Publishing, 1963.

Wilson, Colin. Poltergeist: A Study in Destructive Haunting. New York: Putnam, 1981.

Coffin Nails

In Devonshire, England, superstition had it that a ring made from three nails or screws that have been used to fasten a coffin that was dug up in a churchyard would act as a charm against convulsions and fits of every kind.

CoG See Covenant of the Goddess

Cogni, Giulio (1908–)

Author, poet, and teacher of aesthetics and the psychology of music. Cogni was born January 10, 1908, in Siena, Italy. As a member of the Italian Society for Parapsychology, he contributed articles to Tomorrow magazine, as well as published papers in the proceedings of the congresses and the annals of the Italian Society for Parapsychology on such topics as telepathy, clairvoyance, mediumship, and theories of survival after death. (See also Italy)

Coincidence

Simultaneous occurrences that connect together in a meaningful way. Such events may be the result the same prior cause or the result of sheer chance. Meaningfulness, a somewhat subjective notion, may vary from person to person. One person may see coinciding events as highly significant and another view the same events as merely of mild academic interest. Some unique coincidence may become highly important, even life-changing events, for the person who perceives them.

Unusual coincidences may be determined and assessed by calculating probabilities. When calculation shows that coincidences at a level higher than chance are occurring, and there is apparently no normal agency (error, fraud) to which the occurrence could be attributed, occult explanations (magic, spirit intervention, clairvoyance, telepathy) are given, and psychical research may shed light on the problem.

How complex calculating probabilities may be is well illustrated by a curious experience of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle told in his book Through the Magic Door (1907). He was staying in Switzerland and had visited the Gemmi Pass, where a high cliff separates a French from a German canton. On the summit of the cliff was a small inn that was isolated in winter for three months as it became inaccessible during heavy snowfalls. His imagination was stirred and he began to build up a short story of strong antagonistic characters being penned up in the inn, loathing each other, yet utterly unable to get away from each other's society, each day bringing them nearer to a tragedy. As he was returning home through France a volume of Guy Maupassant's Tales came into his hands. The first story he looked at was called "L'Auberge." The scene was laid in the very inn he had visited and the plot was the same as he had imagined, except that Maupassant brought in a savage hound.

Doyle experienced a most unusual coincidence. Maupassant visited the inn and wrote his story. Doyle visited the same place and evolved the same train of thought. He planned a story, then bought a book in France and saved himself from an eventual accusation of plagiarism. Was this also coincidence? He believed it to be more, an intervention by spiritual powers. But there are other explanations. For example, some might suggest that Maupassant's intense feeling about the inn amy have lingered in the psychic atmosphere and led Doyle "magnetically" to the book.

The calculation of probabilities offers little assistance in individual cases. For example, the London newspapers reported on April 1, 1930, that during the evening of the previous day two men, both named Butler, both butchers, were found shot (one in Nottinghamshire, one near London) by their cars. One was named Frederick Henry Butler, and the other David Henry Butler. They were entire strangers, unrelated, and both shot themselves with pistols by the side of their cars. In a case like this there is no chance expectation on which a calculation could be based. The probability is infinitesimal. Even if one in a billion suicides were by two strangers of the same occupation, of the same name, and under the same circumstances, there is still nothing to tell the date at which the occurrence is likely to take place. It may as well happen today as a thousand years hence. The improbability of the coincidence is therefore no barrier against its turning up in one single case.

Many similar cases of bizarre coincidences were collected by Charles Fort and his latter-day disciples. Carl G. Jung discussed the idea of personally significant coincidences under the term synchronicity.

Parapsychology has attempted to study repeatable coincidences and to measure their probability. A similar effort has been attempted in astrological studies. The truth of various astrological statements (e.g., people born under a prominent Mars tend to be warriors) have been tested by checking the occurrence of various planets in the birth charts of a large number of prominent people.

Sources:

Franz, Marie-Louise von. On Divination and Synchronicity: The Psychology of Meaningful Chance. Toronto: Inner City Books, 1980.

Jung, Carl G. Sychronicity: An Acausal Connecting Principle. London: Ark Paperbacks, 1985.

Koestler, Arthur. The Roots of Coincidence. London: Hutchinson, 1972.

Colby, George P. (1848–1933)

George P. Colby, the founder of the Spiritualist camp at Cassadaga, Florida, was born to Baptist parents in Pike, New York, on January 6, 1848. Eight years later, the family moved to Minnesota. At the age of 12, young George was baptized, an event that became life changing, but in a most unexpected manner. It seemed to catalyze his psychic abilities. One of the first events was his reception of a message that he would one day found a Spiritualist camp in the southern United States. In the meantime, he became known locally for his healing and clairvoyant abilities. In 1867 he formally left the church and became an itinerant medium visiting various Spiritualist centers. He made his living through the pubic demonstration of his mediumistic skills. Like many mediums, he had acquired a set of spirit guides; among them was a Native American who called himself Seneca.

In 1875 Seneca directed Colby to go to Wisconsin where he would meet T. D. Giddings, another medium. Together they would travel by rail to Jacksonville, Florida, then the end of the railroad line, and search out a location that Seneca had described. Traveling inland, they finally found the spot, notable for its seven small hills. Colby settled in the area, but continued to travel the country as a medium. Finally, in 1880 he filed for a homestead grant and in 1884 was awarded 145 acres. However, the fulfillment of the original message would wait until after the formation of the National Spiritualist Association (now the National Spiritualist Association of Churches) in 1893. Colby attended the initial meeting and the following year, assisted by people from Lily Dale, the Spiritualist camp in New York, organized the Southern Cassadaga Spiritualist Camp Meeting Association. Colby donated 35 of his acres (later adding 20), and the initial meeting of the association was held in his home.

Colby subsequently became one of the resident mediums and lecturers, but still continued to travel during the off-season. He also enjoyed some prosperous years, and having never married, he adopted several orphan boys and saw to their education. However, in his later years, as his health failed, he lost all of the little he had accumulated and at the time of his death, July 27, 1933, he was bankrupt. He had no family, and the association had to give money to see to his remains.

Sources:

Henderson, Janie. The Story of Cassadaga. Cassadaga, Fla.: Pisces Publishing, 1996.

Karcher, Janet, and John Hutchinson. This Way to Cassadaga, Deltona, Fla.: John Hutchinson Productions, 1980.

Colby, Luther (1814–1894)

American Spiritualist, originally a materialist, who founded and edited the journal Banner of Light in Boston beginning in 1857. Colby was born in Amesbury, Massachusetts, on October 12, 1814. He began his journalistic career at the Boston Daily Post where he met William Berry, whom he attended séances with. Over the course of their friendship, Colby developed a strong interest and belief in Spiritualism, and the two men founded Banner of Light. It became the longest running publication of its kind in the nineteenth century. Colby remained its editor until his death on October 7, 1894.

Sources:

Garraty, John A., and Mark C. Carnes, ed. American National Biography. 24 vols. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Coleman, Loren (1947–)

Loren Coleman, a cryptozoologist and investigator of the unexplained, was born on July 12, 1947, in Norfolk, Virginia, and when three months old moved with his family to Decatur, Illinois, where he grew up. His interest in mysterious creatures originated in his youth and as a teenager he began to correspond with Ivan T. Sanderson and Bernard Heuvelmans, pioneer investigators of Bigfoot, the Yeti, and the Loch Ness Monster. He had his first hands-on experience in 1962, when he found a set of ape-like footprints in south-central Illinois. He attended Southern Illinois University (1965–1969), but dropped out following his marriage. Over the next years he worked at various jobs (including two years of alternative service as a conscientious objector), attended classes at several schools, and eventually completed his degree in 1976. He moved on to complete a master's in social work at Simmons College, and during the next decade was employed in social work and social service administration. In 1989 he became an adjunct associate professor in social work at the University of Southern Maine (where he continues to teach) while also teaching at several other nearby colleges. His continuing interest in unknown animals led to an acquaintance with Jerome Clark, and together they authored two books, The Unidentified (1975) and Creatures of the Outer Edge (1978). He went on to write several books during the 1980s, among the more notable being Tom Slick and the Search for the Yeti (1989), a chronicle of the eccentric Texas oil millionaire's quest to obtain undeniable evidence for the existence of the abominable snowman. Slick died in a 1962 plane crash and much of his research had been lost. Through the 1990s, Coleman wrote numerous articles on cryptozoology, appeared on many radio and television shows, and consulted on a variety of projects connected with the search for hidden animals. Strange Magazine carried his column, "The Cryptozoo News," and he currently authors the "Mysterious World" column for Fate and "On the Trail" column for Fortean Times. His research over the years has culminated in two books at the end of the decade, The Field Guide to Bigfoot, Yeti and Other Mystery Primates Worldwide, with Patrick Hughe (1999), and Cryptozoology A to Z: The Encyclopedia of Loch Monsters, Sasquatch, Chupacabras, and Other Authentic Mysteries of Nature (1999). In the latter volume he returned to his fruitful collaboration with Jerome Clark. As the new century begins, Colemen continues active research on unknown animals across North America. He has built a large library on cryptozoology as well as a large collection of artifacts. In 1997 he was inducted into the Roger Patterson Memorial Hall of Fame (Patterson being known for his film of Bigfoot) housed at the Bigfoot Museum in Portland, Oregon.

Sources:

Coleman, Loren. Tom Slick and the Search for the Yeti. London: Faber and Faber, 1989.

———, and Jerome Clark. Creatures of the Outer Edge. New York: Warner Books, 1978.

———. Cryptozoology A to Z: The Encyclopedia of Loch Monsters, Sasquatch, Chupacabras, and Other Authentic Mysteries of Nature. New York: Fireside, 1999.

———. The Unidentified. New York: Warner Books, 1975.

———, and Patrick Hughe. The Field Guide to Bigfoot, Yeti and Other Mystery Primates Worldwide. New York: Avon, 1999.

Coleridge, Samuel Taylor (1772–1834)

English author and mystic. Coleridge was born October 21, 1772, in Ottery St. Mary, Devonshire. He was the son of John Coleridge, a clergyman and schoolmaster who enjoyed considerable reputation as a theological scholar and was author of a Latin grammar. Samuel's childhood was spent mostly at the native village. During his youth he showed a marked aversion to games and even avoided the company of other children instead giving his time chiefly to varied reading.

"At six years of age," he writes in one of his letters to his friend, Thomas Poole, "I remember to have read Belisarius, Robinson Crusoe, and Philip Quarll, and then I found the Arabian Nights Entertainments." In this same letter he told how the boys around him despised him for his eccentricity, the result being that he soon became a confirmed dreamer, finding in his mind a haven of refuge from the scorn leveled at him.

By the time he was nine years old, Coleridge showed a predilection for mysticism. Consequently, his father decided to make him a clergyman, and in 1782 the boy left home to go to Christ's Hospital, London. There he found among his fellow pupils at least one who shared his literary tastes—Charles Lamb—and a warm friendship quickly sprang up between the two, while a little later Coleridge developed affection for a young girl called Mary Evans. The progress of the love affair was soon arrested, the poet leaving London in 1790 to go to Cambridge.

Beginning his university career as a sizar (undergraduate receiving an allowance from the college) at Jesus College, he soon became known as a brilliant conversationalist. He made enemies by his extreme views on politics and religion, however, and in 1793, finding himself in various difficulties, he went back to London where he enlisted in the fifteenth Dragoons. Bought out soon afterward by his relations, he returned to Cambridge, and in 1794 he published his drama The Fall of Robespierre. At Cambridge he met his lifelong friend Robert Southey, through whom he became acquainted with Sara Fricker, his future wife. Through her he made the necessary contacts to issue Poems (1796).

He began to preach occasionally in Unitarian chapels, and in 1797 he met William Wordsworth, with whom he speedily became a close friend. He joined Wordsworth in publishing Lyrical Ballads, which contains some of Coleridge's finest poems, notably "The Ryme of the Ancient Mariner." Scarcely before it was finished, he composed two other poems of comparable worth, "Christabel" and "Kubla Khan."

In 1798 he was appointed Unitarian minister at Shrewsbury; after holding this post for a little while, he went to travel in Germany, the requisite funds having been given him by Josiah and Thomas Wedgwood, both keen admirers of Coleridge's philosophical powers. They believed that study on the Continent would be of material service to him.

Among Coleridge's first acts on returning from Germany was to publish his translation of Schiller's "Wallenstein." At the same time he used a cottage at Keswick, intending to live there quietly for many years. But peace and quiet are benefits usually sought in vain by poets, and Coleridge was no exception. Early in life he had begun to take occasional doses of laudanum (opium), and now this practice developed into a habit that ruled his whole life.

In 1804, he sought relief by going to Malta, and afterward he visited Rome. On returning to England, he was happy to find that a small annuity had been left him by the Wedgwoods. He was quite incapable of shaking off the deadly drug habit, though it had not yet begun to weaken his gifts. After staying for awhile with Wordsworth at Grasmere, he delivered a series of lectures on poetry at Bristol and in London. His genius was quickly recognized in London, and he was made a pensioner of the Society of Literature, enabling him to take a small house at Highgate, where he spent most of his declining years. His remains were interred in Highgate Cemetery after his death in 1834.

Coleridge is representative of the romantic movement of the early nineteenth century, whose literary exponents wished to penetrate the mysteries of the inner self, and in pursuit of their goal often became mystics. That search was many times aided by the use of mind-altering drugs such as the laudanum to which Coleridge became addicted. Everything written by Coleridge is permeated with the romantic flavor. Apart from his metaphysical works, of which the most notable are Aids to Reflection and Confessions of an Enquiring Spirit, his Biographia Literaria and other fine contributions to critical literature are all of a mystical temper. Coleridge (more, perhaps, than any other critic, not even excepting Goethe and Walter Pater) was never content with handling the surface of things, but always reflected a striving to understand the mysterious point where artistic creation begins. For him, literature was a form of life—one of the most mysterious forms of life—and while he is supremely quick at noticing purely aesthetic merit and equally quick at marking defect, it is really the philosophical element in his criticism that gives it its transcendent value and interest.

Coleridge's metaphysical tendencies are equally marked in both his prose and his verse. In a singularly beautiful poem, "To the Evening Star," he tells that he gazes thereon, "Till I, myself, all spirit seem to grow." And in most of his poems, indeed, he is "all spirit," while often he spellbounds the reader into feeling something of his own spirituality. Waiving Coleridge's metaphysical poems altogether, it might be justly said that he introduced the occult into verse with a mastery rarely equaled in English literature.

The romantic had its dark side as well. Not only was the spiritual world explained, but often, in opening the unconscious, the world of nightmare and evil was also opened to the poets and novelists. Coleridge was no exception. Along with his mystical bent, Coleridge wrote the first vampire poem in the English language. "Christabel" tells the story of the invasion of a castle by the vampire figure Geraldine, who not only attacks the title character, but as the unfinished poem ends, has attached herself to her father.

Coleridge died on July 25, 1834 in Highgate, England.

Sources:

Coleridge, Samuel Taylor. Selected Poems. London: Oxford University Press, 1965.

Doughty, Oswald. Perturbed Spirit: The Life and Personality of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1981.

Nethercot, Arthur H. The Road to Trye: A Study of the History, Background, and Purposes of Coleridge's "Christabel." Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1939. Reprint, New York: Russell & Russell, 1962.

Colinon, Maurice (1922–)

Author, journalist, and lecturer in France who studied various aspects of occultism and parapsychology. Colinon was born February 16, 1922, at Chateau-Thierry (Aisne). He studied at the University of Paris, and his qualifications included licencié en lettres (1943), diplòme d'études supérieures (lettres, 1943), and licencié en droit (1945). He subsequently became a journalist, lecturer, and broadcaster on French radio and television.

Colinon worked as a clairvoyant and healer. He took part in a parapsychological study group on unorthodox healing in 1954 at St. Paul de Vence. He also studied the new religious movements that were arising as a result of the occult revival of the nineteenth century and the changes wrought by the twentieth century.

Sources:

Colinon, Maurice. Faux prophètes et sectes d'aujourd'hui. N.p., 1953.

———. Les Guérisseurs. N.p., 1957.

———. Guide de la France religieuse et mystique. Paris: Tchou, 1969.

———. Le Phénomène des sectes au 20ème siècle. N.p., 1959.

Collaboration (Magazine)

Quarterly journal concerned with the teachings of Sri Aurobindo and his successor, The Mother (Mira Richard, 1878–1973). It carries news of Auroville, the New Age city near Pondicherry, and the various Aurobindo centers in the United States. It may be contacted through the Sri Aurobindo Association, Box 163237, Sacramento, CA 95816-9237.

College of Buddhist Studies

An educational facility associated with the International Buddhist Meditation Center in Los Angeles. It was founded as the College of Oriental Studies by the Venerable Thich Thien-An (1926–1980) and offers a curriculum in advanced Buddhist studies leading to ordination to the Buddhist priesthood. It is currently headed by Thich Thien-An's successor, the Venerable Karuna Dharma. Also associated with the center is the Thien-An Institute of Buddhist Studies. Address: 933 S. New Hampshire Ave., Los Angeles, CA 90006.

College of Psychic Studies

A British organization continuing the work of the London Spiritualist Alliance, originally established in 1884. The organization was renamed the College of Psychic Science in 1955 and assumed its present name in 1970. It should not be confused with the British College of Psychic Science, which flourished from 1920 to 1947.

The College of Psychic Studies, an educational charity situated in London, offers facilities to both experienced investigators and the general public for research and intelligent discussion in the field of psychical phenomena, with particular emphasis on the evidence for survival after death and for communication from the dead. The college is also concerned with the relationship of psychic studies to philosophical and scientific opinion.

The college maintains a library of some 6,000 volumes on all aspects of psychical science, Spiritualism, and related topics and organizes lectures and psychological counseling. The college currently publishes a triannual magazine, LIGHT, which was founded in 1881. Address: 16 Queensberry Pl., South Kensington, London, SW7 2EB England. Website: http://www.psychic-studies.org.uk/.

Sources:

College of Psychic Studies. http://www.psychic-studies.org.uk/. March 8, 2000.

College of Thelema/Temple of Thelema

The College and Temple of Thelema are two intimately intertwined organizations that have grown out of the teachings of magician Aleister Crowley (1875–1947) dating to the 1970s. The Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO), the major organization headed by Crowley, fell on hard times following his death. His successor as Outer Head of the Order, Karl Johannes Germer (1885–1962), did little to build the work, and by the 1960s it had become largely moribund, especially in the United States. Several attempts to revive the work were launched in the years following Germer's death.

Phyliss Seckler (Soror Meral) had been an early member of the OTO in America. In 1973 she opened the College of Thelema as a education program in Western esotericism, with a special emphasis upon the system of thelemic magic as developed by Crowley. As it developed, the college's program included four consecutive courses in psychology, the philosophy of thelema, qabalah, astrology, and magic. The entire course takes approximately two years to complete. In 1976, Seckler also began issuing In The Continuum, one of the more substantive thelemic journals. It continued for 20 years, its last issue coming out in 1996.

The Temple of Thelema, an initiatory magical order, was established upon the teaching delivered through the college. The temple offers a more systematic course of training for students who wish to begin the practice of magic and learn the disciplines and mystical realities that are integral to thelemic magic. Seckler adapted to the older grading system of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn to conform to thelemic principles. Also, contemporary findings from psychology, especially transpersonal psychology, has been integrated into the curriculum, and an attempt to remove the sexist bias, a basic assumption of most Western magical teachings, has been made. The student follows a program of intellectual accomplishment, meditation, and magical ritual. Students are also involved in the healing work of the temple and participate in various initiation ceremonies as they progress.

The exact content of the program of the college and temple are held confidential for participants only, though it is in line with the teachings of Crowley that are available in his many writings. Crowley claimed that in 1904 he received, through a process similar to what is now called channeling, The Book of the Law, from a praeternatural intelligence named Aiwass. The book announced a new era for humankind, the Aeon of Horus, the Crowned and Conquering Child (of Isis and Osiris). The revelation called upon people to follow their True Will (Thelema), and to allow their passions to be conformed to their Will. Magic is the instrument for finding one's true Will and the magical life; living in conformation to that True Will (destiny) follows.

The temple and college may be contacted at P.O. Box 415, Oroville, CA 95965. In 1998 there were seven centers in the United States and one in Vancouver, British Columbia. In 1997, a periodical, the Black Pearl, has succeeded In the Continuum. It has a website at http://www.thelema.org/.

Sources:

Crowley, Aleister. Magick: Book Four, Parts I–IV. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1994. [Includes The Book of the Law, a brief text that has been reprinted numerous times.]

———. Magick in Theory and Practice. New York: Dover Publications, 1976.

In the Continuum (bi-annual) (1976–1996).

College of Universal Wisdom

An educational facility sponsored by the ministry of Universal Wisdom, a flying saucer organization founded by George W. Van Tassell (1910–1978), a contactee and author of a number of books, beginning with I Rode in a Flying Saucer (1952). Through the school, Van Tassell published a journal, the Proceedings of the College of Universal Wisdom. The school was closed soon after Van Tassell's death.

Collegia artificum

Ancient Roman craftsmen's society. According to F. T. B. Clavel, historian of Freemasonry, the college of architects was from Attica, and its members established the mysteries of Bacchus at Rome.

Colley, Thomas (d. 1912)

The archdeacon of Natal and rector of Stockton, a Church of England parish, and an ardent English psychical investigator. For a period of 40 years preceding his death in 1912, Colley had many extraordinary psychical experiences. Although he participated in the exposure of the fraudulent medium William Eglinton in 1876, he was the firmest believer in the similar phenomena of F. W. Monck. He issued a challenge to the stage magician J. Maskelyne to produce phenomena like Monck's. When the magician claimed to have won and sued for the amount of their wager, Archdeacon Colley was awarded £75 and costs in the verdict. He lectured on Monck's materializations before the church congress at Weymouth in October 1903 and gave memorable defenses of physical phenomena in the annals of Spiritualism.

Archdeacon Colley first brought the mediumship of William Hope, the spirit photographer, to public attention, and later founded the famous Crewe Circle.

Collins, Doris (ca. 1918–)

Medium and psychic noted for her reported powers of clairvoyance, prediction, and psychic healing. She was born February 10, 1918 and grew up in Essex, England, the youngest of a family of nine children. Like many psychics, she said her first psychic experiences occurred during childhood. Her psychic talent seemed to have emerged at the age of five or six, when she stayed for a time with an aunt in Manor Park, East London. Collins played in the garden with a pretty little girl named Connie, but was later told by her aunt that Connie (her daughter) had been dead for several years. Collins had also seen her own dead sister, Emmie.

At age 12, when her parents were out for the evening, Collins was in bed when she heard a voice warning her to get her sister Lily out of the downstairs room, where she was playing the piano. Collins called out to Lily, and as Lily left the room, part of the ceiling collapsed and a large slab landed on the piano stool.

Collins was reassured about the experiences by a medium who was the mother of one of her girlfriends at school. The medium explained to Collins that she had a psychic gift, and this was also confirmed when Collins attended a service at the local Spiritualist church. There a medium gave her a message for her father from Emmie. The message so impressed Collins's parents that they visited the Spiritualist church themselves. In later visits to the church, Collins went into trance.

After her first marriage and the birth of a son, she developed a talent for spiritual healing and also for clairvoyance. In 1958 she became president of Woodford National Spiritualist Church, Essex; she later became vice-president of the Union of Spiritual Mediums (now renamed the Institute of Spiritualist Mediums). Among her visitors was a government official from Trinidad and Tobago, where her fame had already spread. Collins's healing talents resulted in several visits to the West Indies to heal prominent politicians. Eventually, she became a resident psychic at the Spiritualist Association of Great Britain, headquarters of British Spiritualism.

As her psychic abilities became well known, she was invited to travel and made trips to the United States, the Philippines, Australia, New Zealand, Switzerland, and Finland. In London she demonstrated her psychic gifts at the prestigious Royal Albert Hall. She made many friends among stars of the entertainment world, including Peter Sellers and Michael Bentine. Together with the equally famous Doris Stokes, she was regarded as one of England's leading psychics through the 1980s.

Sources:

Collins, Doris. A Woman of Spirit. London: Panther Books, 1983.

Collins, Mabel (Mrs. Keningale Cook) (1851–ca. 1922)

An important but shadowy figure in the Theosophical Society during the latter part of the nineteenth century. Although her influential book Light on the Path (first published anonymously in 1885) is a classic work in the theosophical movement, Collins has received only scant biographical notice.

A daughter of Mortimer Collins, she became a prolific author of novels and other works, including: Princess Clarice: A Story of 1871 (2 vols., 1872), Blacksmith and Scholar (3 vols., 1875), An Innocent Sinner (3 vols., 1877), In the World (2 vols., 1878), Our Bohemia (3 vols., 1879), Too Red a Dawn (3 vols., 1881), Cobwebs (3 vols., 1882), The Story of Helen Modjeska (1883), In the Flower of Her Youth (3 vols., 1883), Violet Fanshawe (2 vols., 1884), The Prettiest Woman in Warsaw (3 vols., 1885), and Lord Vanecourt's Daughter (3 vols., 1885).

Her later books, The Idyll of the White Lotus (1885), Through the Gates of Gold (1887), and The Blossom and the Fruit: The True Story of a Black Magician (1888), strongly manifested her growing interest in metaphysics and the occult. The Blossom and the Fruit was included by occultist Aleister Crowley as recommended reading for neophytes in working with magic, and it seems possible that the author had some inside knowledge of secret occult organizations.

Collins's husband, Dr. Keningale Cook, was also a writer, author of The Fathers of Jesus: A Study of the Lineage of the Christian Doctrine and Traditions (2 vols., 1886).

Collins became an active worker in the movement for women's suffrage in Britain and collaborated with suffragette Charlotte Despard on a novel, Outlawed (1908) dealing with the subject of women's rights.

She was an early member of the London Lodge of the Theosophical Society, which she joined in 1884. In the same year, she wrote The Idyll of the White Lotus, followed by Light on the Path, subtitled "A Treatise written for the personal use of those who are ignorant of the Eastern Wisdom, and who desire to enter within its influence. Written down by M.C., Fellow of The Theosophical Society." In 1887, after publication of Through the Gates of Gold, Collins became coeditor with Helena Petrovna Blavatsky of the society's journal Lucifer, but ceased editing it two years later as a result of a controversy in the movement connected with the authorship of her books. The ambiguous ascription on the title page of Light on the Path suggested to some that the work was inspired by an adept, and for some time it was implied that the source was Mahatma Koot Hoomi, one of Madame Blavatsky's mysterious "Masters." After fierce controversy over the source of the book's inspiration, Collins was expelled from the society. Later she was permitted to rejoin. Whatever the true source of the book, it seems that Collins sustained a claim to have traveled on the astral plane and encountered inspired teachers.

Another strange episode in her life revolves around allegations that in 1888 she was closely associated with the notorious murderer Jack the Ripper. According to Aleister Crowley in his Confessions, Collins had a lover who was a doctor and later evidence strongly suggested he was the infamous Ripper.

Sources:

Collins, Mabel. The Awakening. London: Theosophical Publishing Society, 1906.

———. The Blossom and the Fruit: The True Story of a Black Magician. New York: Theosophical Publishing Society, 1888.

———. A Cry from Afar. London: Theosophical Publishing Society, 1905.

———. The Idyll of the White Lotus. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1885.

———. Light on the Path. Boston: Occult Publishing, 1884.

———. Through the Gates of Gold. London: J. M. Watkins, 1887.

Crowley, Aleister. The Confessions of Aleister Crowley. Edited by John Symnonds and Kenneth Grant. New York: Hill and Wang, 1969.

Fuller, Jean Overton. The Magical Dilemma of Victor Neuburg. London: W. H. Allen, 1965.

Colloquy of the Ancients

A collection of Ossianic legends of ancient Ireland made into one work about the thirteenth or fourteenth century. It relates how the Fian heroes Keelta and Oisin, each with eight warriors, meet to talk over the glorious past for the last time. Then Oisin returns to the Fairy Mound of his mother, and Keelta meets with St. Patrick and his monks at Drumdreg. Keelta tells the saint many tales, interspersed with lyrics, with which he is delighted. The paint eventually baptizes Keelta and his warriors and grants them absolution.

Cölman, Arthur (ca. 1880)

Described by Florence Marryat as "the most wonderful materialization medium I ever met in England." As many as five fully materialized spirits were seen by Marryat at the same time in a séance. The control of the medium was a female spirit, "Aimee."

Cölman, a well-known figure in British Spiritualism in the 1880s, did not long remain before the public. Because of the drain on his strength and the adverse effect on his health, he gave up public sittings and retired. "Aimee" appears to have been inherited by the medium F. G. F. Craddock, who was exposed in fraudulent materialization phenomena in 1879.

Sources:

Marryat, Florence. There Is No Death. New York: John W. Lovell, 1891. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Colombo, John Robert (1936–)

Canadian author, anthologist, editor, journalist, and consultant who has written extensively on paranormal topics, especially as they relate to Canada. Colombo was born March 24, 1936, in Kitchener, Ontario. He has edited more than 120 books for various Canadian publishing houses since 1960, and is especially known for his anthologies of poetry. He has hosted several programs on CBC-TV and had his own columns in the Toronto Star and Toronto's Midtown Voice. He has received numerous awards, including Ontario Library Association's Certificate of Merit; the Periodical Distributors of Canada's Best Paperback of the Year (1976); the Centennial Medal, Esteemed Knight of Mark Twain; and the 1985 Philips Information Systems Literary Prize. He also served as an adviser to the Canada Council and the Ontario Arts Council.

Sources:

Colombo, John Robert. Abracadabra. Toronto: McClelland and Stewart, 1967.

———. Colombo's Book of Marvels. N.p., 1979.

———. Extraordinary Experiences: Personal Accounts of the Paranormal in Canada. Willowdale, Ontario, Canada: Hounslow Press, 1989.

———. Mostly Monsters. Toronto: Hounslow Press, 1977.

———. Mysterious Canada. N.p., 1988.

Colombo, John Robert, ed. Windigo: An Anthology. N.p., 1982.

Colton, Ann Ree (1898–1984)

Ann Ree Colton, spiritual teacher and founder of the Ann Ree Colton Foundation of Niscience, was born in Atlanta, Georgia, on August 17, 1898. She had extraordinary psychic experiences during her childhood and in her 20s established contact with a set of supernormal entities she termed the masters or great immortals, similar to the masters contacted by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky of the Theosophical Society. She began her public ministry in 1932 and four years later opened a church in Florida. The church continued through World War II (1939–45), and following its closing in 1945 she entered a period of transition.

In 1952 she met Jonathan Murro (1927–91), who she eventually married. Together, the following year they founded the Foundation of Niscience in Glendale, California, and Colton began the mature era of her ministry. Colton projected the picture of the spiritual hierarchy, at the highest level of which were the archetypes of God—the blueprints of creation, and the highest beings—Jesus, his disciples, and the archangels. At a slightly lower level were the masters who worked on Earth through a set of cosmos disciples and telepathic disciples who resided in earthly bodies. Colton taught that individuals can become open to the highest levels of the universe and believed that she had been united with the Niscience archetype. She was told that the "hum" of the archetype would bring a spiritual renewal uniting people with the Jesus ethic.

Colton expanded on her teachings in more than 20 books written in the 1960s and 1970s. She taught at the center in Glendale, and her students founded groups across the United States and in several foreign countries. She initiated the Niscience Guild through which students may become ministers. Murro assisted her and dedicated himself to preserving and distributing her writings. Following her death on June 28, 1984, he succeeded her as head of the foundation.

Sources:

Colton, Ann Ree. Men in White Apparel. Glendale, Calif.: ARC Publishing, 1961.

———. The Soul and the Ethic. Glendale, Calif..: ARC Publishing, 1963.

———. Vision for the Future. Glendale, Calif.: ARC Publishing, 1960.

———, and Jonathan Murro. Prophet for the Archangels. Glendale, Calif.: ARC Publishing, 1964.

Colville, Wilbur Juvenal (ca. 1859–1917)

British inspirational speaker and author of little education but considerable natural abilities. Little is known of Colville's early life. He is thought to be born on September 5, 1859. His mother died when he was an infant and his father when he was eight. He was then raised by a guardian. As a child he saw spirit beings, including a beautiful lady who claimed to be his mother. The beginnings of his own mediumship date from May 24, 1874, when as a 14-year-old youth he attended an inspirational address of Cora L. V. Richmond at Brighton. He became conscious of spirit presence, and at home he passed into trance and delivered his first poetic improvisation. He described his sensations afterward:

"I suddenly felt myself lifted in the air. I seemed to have an enormous head and a very small body. My lips seemed to be moving mechanically under the pressure of some influence over which I could not exert, and could not will to exert, no power whatever. I heard someone commenting upon a poem, then I sat down and finished my supper and wondered if I had not been to sleep. That was my first experience as a medium for speaking, though from my earliest childhood I had had spiritual experiences and constantly felt, saw and heard beings around me, who were not in material form."

Colville took regular engagements from 1877. While delivering his addresses, which showed remarkable knowledge, and while answering questions on a variety of subjects, he was often unconscious. At other times he heard everything he said as if it proceeded from strange lips. He was only 18 when he traveled to the United States, and he spent most of the 1880s moving between the United States and England. Some of his more important books appeared at the end of the decade, Inspirational Discourses (1886), The Spiritual Health and Healing (1887), and Studies in Theosophy (1889). In the early 1890s, he went to Australia for two years and then settled permanently in the United States, were he developed his early interest in alternative medicine (including chromotherapy) and mastered a broad range of subjects in the occult field. He continued to lecture and conduct trance sessions while writing numerous books, including Spiritual Therapeutics; or, Divine Science (1894), Our Place in the Universal Zodiac (1895), and Light and Color (1914).

Sources:

Coville, W. J. Light and Color. New York: McCoy Publishing and Masonic Supplies, 1914.

———. Spiritual Science of Health and Healing. Chicago: Garden City Publishing, 1888.

———. Spiritual Therapeutics; or, Divine Science. Chicago: Educator Publishing, 1914.

———. Studies in Theosophy. Boston: Colby & Rich, 1890.

———. Universal Spiritualism. New York: R. F. Fenno, 1906.

Comets

Throughout human history comets have been regarded as auguries of disasters such as famine, plague, or war. The most recent outbreak of widespread concern that a comet might portend disaster occurred in 1973 when the comet Kohoutek was announced. For the first time in more than a generation, there arose the possibility that a bright comet, plainly visible with the naked eye, would be seen by the majority of people. A variety of speculations on the spiritual and prophetic implications of the comet were made, but the comet did not prove to be as spectacular as hoped, and none of the predicted changes signaled by its appearance occurred. No such speculation seems to have occurred at the time of the return of Halley's Comet in 1986.

In the past century comets have also figured in speculations about the history of the earth. In Ragnarok: the Age of Fire and Gravel (1883), Ignatius Donnelly assembled legends and religious beliefs tending to show that the earth was affected by a collision with a comet that created the Pleistocene Ice Age. In the 1950s, Immanuel Velikovsky connected the theme of a comet disaster with biblical prophecy in his book Worlds in Collision.

Sources:

Donnelly, Ignatius. Ragnarok: The Age of Fire and Gravel. New York: Harper's, 1883. Reprinted as The Destruction of Atlantis: Ragnarok. Blauvelt, N.Y.: Rudolf Steiner Publications, 1971.

Melton, J. Gordon. "Comet Kouhotek: Fizzle of the Century." Fate 27, no. 5 (May 1974): 58–64.

Velikovsky, Immanuel. Worlds in Collision. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1950.

Comité Illusionniste D'Expertise et D'Experimentation des Phenomenes Paranormaux (CIEEPP)

CIEEPP, founded in 1976, organized conferences and demonstrations featuring experts in the field of paranormal phenomena. Publications were issued in various languages, including English. Last known address: 29 rue P.V. Couturier, F-94380 Bonneuril-sur-Marne, France.

Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal (CSICOP)

Founded April 30, 1976, at an annual meeting of the American Humanist Association devoted to "The New Irrationalism: Antiscience and Pseudoscience" and sponsored by some twenty-five scientists, authors, philosophers, and scholars. The moving spirit in this organization was Paul Kurtz, professor of philosophy at the State University of New York at Buffalo, and the formation of CSICOP was an outgrowth of a 1975 manifesto, signed by 186 prominent scientists, denouncing astrology. The following objectives were stated by the committee:

"To establish a network of people interested in examining claims of the paranormal; to prepare bibliographies of published materials that carefully examine such claims; to encourage and commission research by objective and impartial inquirers in areas where it is needed; to convene conferences and meetings; to publish articles, monographs, and books that examine claims of the paranormal; to not reject on a priori grounds, antecedent to inquiry, any or all such claims, but rather to examine them openly, completely, objectively, and carefully."

An initial step toward implementing these aims was the sponsorship of a journal, the Zetetic, originally founded by Marcello Truzzi, a sociologist at Eastern Michigan University, Ypsilanti. The name of the journal derived from an ancient Greek school of skeptical inquiry, although, interestingly enough, in nineteenth-century England it became synonymous with belief in a flat earth, and it is still used in that connection by the Flat Earth Research Society International.

Formation of CSICOP was an outcome of genuine concern of some intellectuals and scientists, most with a prior commitment to humanistic and rationalistic worldviews, about what they viewed as the uncritical public acceptance of so-called paranormal phenomena, often without any valid evidence for their genuineness. In the wake of the publicity and seeming sanctioning of paranormal phenomena by parapsychologists and other scientists, as well as the intellectual pluralism in the post-World War II West, they viewed with alarm widespread belief in highly speculative pseudoscience. They saw this belief reflected in best-selling books, television and radio programs, and even university courses that elevated such controversial subjects as ancient astronauts, astrology, UFOs, and so on to the status of factual science. Seeing interest in the paranormal as a reaction against science and reason, some members of the committee viewed such beliefs as threatening to civilization.

CSICOP initially included a number of outstanding individuals, such as George Abell (professor of astronomy, University of California at Los Angeles), Isaac Asimov (chemist, author of science-fiction stories), Richard Berendzen (dean, College of Arts Sciences at American University), Brand Blandshard (professor of philosophy, Yale University), Bart Bok (emeritus professor of astronomy, University of Arizona), Daniel Cohen (author, former editor of Science Digest), L. Sprague de Camp (engineer, author of science-fiction stories), Eric J. Dingwall (anthropologist, parapsychologist), Charles Fair (author), Antony Flew (professor of philosophy, Reading University, England), Martin Gardner (author, member of editorial staff of Scientific American), Sidney Hook (professor of philosophy, State University of New York at Buffalo), Lawrence Jerome (science writer), Philip J. Klass (engineer, science writer), Marvin Kohl (professor of philosophy, State University College at Fredonia, New York), Ernest Nagel (professor emeritus of philosophy, Columbia University), Lee Nisbet (special projects editor of The Humanist), James Prescott (neuro psychologist), W. V. Quine (professor of philosophy, Harvard University), James Randi (magician, escapologist, author), B. F. Skinner (professor of psychology, Harvard University), Martin Zelen (professor of statistical science, State University of New York at Buffalo), and Martin Zimmerman (philosopher, State University of New York at Buffalo).

The inclusion of such well-known opponents of claims for psychic phenomena as Martin Gardner and James Randi—as well as of humanists who actively discouraged belief in religion as unscientific—led to accusations that CSICOP was strongly slanted to debunking the paranormal rather than impartial investigation. Critics charged that chairman Kurtz was "exploiting the prestige lent by the names of the scientists who joined the Committee to further the aims of his American Humanist Society—which, ironically, is registered as a religion ('Atheist') for tax purposes."

However, Kurtz insisted that CSICOP was not a "witch hunt" nor "biased or locked in by established scientific views," and claimed that it was "willing to consider and investigate areas however strange or anomalous they seem to the existing state of knowledge." He also stressed the social consequences of increasing acceptance of reports of paranormal phenomena, which might contain "inherent dangers" to society. "There is always the danger that once irrationality grows, it will spill over into other areas of society," Kurtz said.

The initial attack on astrology had garnered much news attention (and inadvertently brought a significant amount of free publicity and new business to astrologers). CSICOP proceeded to create issues that would keep its concern before the media. For example, during November 1977 the committee filed a formal complaint with the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) charging NBC Television with knowingly presenting questionable material that could result in physical harm to the public in a 50-minute program titled "Exploring the Unknown," featuring psychic surgery, communication with the dead, and other claimed paranormal events. CSICOP's complaint alleged that the favorable presentation of such topics as psychic surgery and psychic healing could lead viewers to seek such methods of treatment to the exclusion of needed medical care. The FCC ruled that the complaint was unfounded.

Although it was true that individual members of the committee were receptive to scientific investigation of claims of the paranormal, the stance of Kurtz and others in control was amply demonstrated by their first attempt at new research. Soon after the formation of the committee, they began a project to check the claims of French researchers Michel and Françoise Gauquelin The Gauquelins said they had found significant correlation between the position of planets at the time of birth of a number of individuals who had been outstanding examples of success in their profession. Several members of the committee studied a sample of American athletes to see if, as the Gauquelin's had found with their sample, the planet Mars had a similarly prominent position when they were born. Kurtz's group declared that their research disproved the Gauquelins' claims, and they published their report in the committee's journal, now renamed The Skeptical Inquirer.

However, trouble was brewing within CSICOP. In 1979 Dennis Rawlins was excluded from the group's council, upon which he had served. Two years later, in a lengthy article published in Fate magazine (October 1981), Rawlins revealed that the research had in fact substantiated the Gauquelins' research, but that findings had been altered so that negative results could be reported. Rawlins accused the committee of willingness to cover up evidence of any reality of the paranormal in an effort to totally destroy public belief in it. Rawlins's revelations about the activity of some of the committee's leading members put a mark on the committee that has hampered its efforts ever since.

The "Starbaby incident," as the astrology scandal was termed, however, merely highlighted issues that had divided members of CSICOP from the beginning. Marcello Truzzi, original founder of the journal The Zetetic (formerly titled Explorations), had already resigned from the committee in 1978, relinquishing editorship of the journal, which thereafter changed its name to The Skeptical Inquirer. His letter of resignation told of differences between his original goals and those of the committee and the American Humanist Association, leaving him no alternative but to resign. For many years thereafter Truzzi edited the Zetetic Scholar, an independent scientific review of claims of anomalies and the paranormal.

Truzzi's resignation underlined a basic contradiction in the purpose of CSICOP: How could it combine an attitude of impartial inquiry with a stance of scientific authority when there was an initial assumption that all claims of the paranormal were erroneous or fraudulent? One searches the pages of The Skeptical Inquirer in vain for an instance of any paranormal phenomenon or parapsychological finding being validated or even tentatively accepted, and opposing voices or protests are quoted only in order to be relentlessly discredited without extended discussion. The tone of many articles is sarcastic and hostile, rather than impartial, and the frequent appeals to "scientific evidence" as a remedy for "false beliefs and delusions" often sound authoritarian.

Because of the skepticism of its members, however, CSICOP has made many contributions, especially through its journal. Its scope of inquiry has been a wide one. Drawing on resources far beyond the committee's membership, CSICOP has effectively refuted many dubious or fraudulent claims. Foremost among these contributions was the uncovering of several fake faith healers who were using classic Spiritualist tricks to impress their audiences.

Address: Box 703, Buffalo, NY 14226-0703.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome, and J. Gordon Melton. "The Crusade Against the Paranormal." Parts 1 and 2. Fate 32, 9 (September 1979): 70–76; 32, 10 (October 1979): 87–94.

Kurtz, Paul. The Transcendental Temptation: A Critique of Religion and the Paranormal. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1986.

Kurtz, Paul, ed. A Skeptic's Handbook of Parapsychology. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1985.

Melton, J. Gordon, Jerome Clark, and Aidan Kelly. New Age Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1990.

Rockwell, Theodore, Robert Rockwell, and W. Teed Rockwell. "Irrational Rationalists: A Critique of the Humanists' Crusade Against Parapsychology." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 72 (January 1971): 23–34.

Common Ground

Quarterly journal of the Association for the Scientific Study of Anomalous Phenomena, published during the early 1980s and concerned with a wide range of paranormal and Fortean phenomena. At the end of 1984, following issue number 10, Common Ground's editor Kevin McClure joined the editorial panel of the quarterly journal Magonia, and Common Ground merged with it.

Common Ground (San Francisco)

Common Ground (San Francisco) is the original New Age networking magazine founded in 1976 to provide contact between the groups and leaders in the then-emerging New Age community and the growing community of people who identified with the New Age vision of transformation of self and society. Common Ground pioneered a format that was soon adapted by many other New Age periodicals.

Each issue of Common Ground is dominated by numerous display advertisements that have been grouped into more than a dozen categories. Each ad follows a similar outline, with the name of the group or individual, a logo or picture, a description of services, and contact information. The common outline allows for alphabetizing and the creation of what amounts to a yellow pages of services available in the community. The reader can easily locate spiritual groups, psychological therapists, vegetarian cafes, yoga and exercise classes, or psychic development workshops. As a further aid in locating a particular group or practitioner, an alphabetical index of all the advertisers is also included.

While the greatest amount of space is given to the resource directory, each issue of Common Ground also includes several feature articles, generally grouped around a common theme. There are also regular columns including book reviews, music reviews, and letters to the editor. A column called "On the Path" features biographical sketches of various group leaders and practitioners.

From its modest beginning, Common Ground had grown into a 144-page large-format quarterly. Over the years periodicals serving other urban areas in North America adopted not only Common Ground's format but even its name. It is distributed free throughout the San Francisco Bay area from headquarters at 305 San Anselmo Ave., Ste. 313, San Anselmo, CA 94960. It has an Internet site at http://www.commongroundmag.com/.

Sources:

Common Ground. San Anselmo, Calif. n.d.

Common Ground. http://www.commongroundmag.com/. March 15, 2000

Common Ground (Vancouver)

Common Ground (Vancouver) is one of several New Age networking magazines inspired by, taking the name of, and following the general format of Common Ground (San Francisco), the original such magazine. Common Ground (Vancouver) initially appeared in the early 1990s with a self-conscious Canadian focus. Like its model, it is an oversized periodical, approximately 30 pages per issue, largely supported by its many advertisers in the local New Age community.

Common Ground is built around its "Resource Directory," a listing of organizations and events updated monthly. Directory listings are presented categorically under such headings as books and music; spiritual practices; health, healing and body work; time-out, travel, and recreation; and intuitive arts. Shorter notices of events are included in the monthly "Datebook." These listings, all paid advertisements, are supplemented by a number of display ads that collectively highlight the events, publications, and programs of the broad spectrum of the esoteric and holistic healing community in Western Canada. These notices of the activities and resources available to readers provide the main appeal of Common Ground, which appears monthly and is distributed free thorough the metaphysical bookstores and health food stores in British Columbia. Each issue of Common Ground also includes one or two feature articles, shorter articles on news of interest, brief book reviews, and several columns. The content of the articles and columns has shown a particular interest in holistic healing and the natural environment.

Common Ground (Vancouver) is published at 201-3091 W. Broadway, Vancouver, BC V6K 2G9, Canada, just down the street from the Banyen Tree, Western Canada's largest New Age bookstore.

Sources:

Common Ground (Vancouver). Vancouver, Canada, n.d.

Commonwealth of Independent States See RUSSIA

Communication (Between Living and Dead)

The possibility of communication between the living and the world of the dead (spirits and nonhuman intelligences) was the dominant issue raised by Spiritualism in the mid-nineteenth century, and the verification of Spiritualist claims dominated psychical research through the first half of the twentieth century. Spiritualist claims that certain individuals could regularly demonstrate communication with the dead and psychical research's quest for scientific proof of this alleged phenomenon emerged in response to the Enlightenment's critique of supernaturalism and demands for scientific verification of any such assertions.

Claims of communication with the dead have been an integral part of human experience since the beginning of history. Accounts of spontaneous contact date to ancient times, as do reports of specialists who claimed an extraordinary ability at regular contact with the dead. Such specialists were known by a variety of names, but in Spiritualism they have been referred to as mediums. Most Spiritualists have been satisfied that the human organism of a talented medium is the best mechanism for communication with spirits. The clarity and reliability of communication are usually considered dependent upon whether unseen operators can make use of the medium's sensitivity when his or her will and consciousness are passive. This function has been termed sensory automatism by psychical researchers.

Sometimes communication is assisted by a mechanical indicator such as a planchette or Ouija board. Throughout the twentieth century mechanical devices to effect communication without using the human organism, such as the Ashkir-Jobson Trianion, have been invented. Such devices, of course, involve the presence of human observers, who, it might be supposed, could exert a mediumistic element, if only subconsciously. It was long hoped that a suitable instrument could be invented that would elevate communication with the dead to the domain of pure physics, but, with some notable exceptions, few scientists have been willing to risk ridicule by devoting their energies to such a project. One exception was inventor Thomas A. Edison, who hoped to construct an instrument for communicating with departed spirits. A review of mechanical devices used in spirit communication follows.

Mechanical Communication

In his book Startling Facts in Modern Spiritualism (1874), N. B. Wolfe records a spirit prediction that a "thought indicator" instrument for spirit communication would be invented about 60 years later. In fact, during the 1930s a group of British psychical researchers formed the Ashkir-Jobson Trianion and devised several apparatuses, among them the communigraph and the reflectograph, to facilitate spirit communication by mechanical means.

From time to time other experimenters have also attempted to develop mechanical methods of spirit communication. In 1948 N. Zwaan, a Dutch delegate to the International Spiritualist Federation Congress in London, demonstrated an electrical device he claimed produced a field of energy capable of stimulating the psychic senses into activity. In 1949 Mark Dyne called a meeting of Spiritualists in Manchester, England, where Dennis Russell demonstrated a Zwaan ray apparatus, and the Spirit Electronic Communication Society was founded. In 1952 the Teledyne Research Unit was formed with Don Emerson as medium, and with spirit guidance the Teledyne instrument was constructed employing Zwaan ray principles.

Other devices included the dynamistograph and the Vandermeulen spirit indicator.

In the 1970s there was widespread interest expressed in the electronic voice phenomenon or Raudive voices, developed by Friedrich Jürgenson in Sweden and Konstantin Raudive in Germany. Jürgenson and Raudive claimed that voices of dead people could be recorded on a tape recorder, that these voices could answer questions and/or offer verifiable evidence of survival. The simplest technique involved merely making a recording in a quiet room with an open microphone, with a preliminary announcement, then to playing the tape back at maximum volume. A second method involved connecting the tape recorder to a simple diode circuit. A third method consisted of coupling an ordinary broadcast receiver to the tape recorder, which was tuned to a frequency that appeared devoid of normal signals.

Paranormal voices distinct from either radio signals, extraneous sounds, or the "white noise" backgrounds were said to have been recorded. In some cases the voices occurred at a different speed from the recording. They were sometimes noted to have broken through or interrupted radio sounds.

Because of the ambiguity of so many of the claimed paranormal voices and the susceptibility of a listener to hallucinate sounds from faint signals, there was initially a good deal of skepticism about the electronic voice phenomenon, but there was also much responsible scientific support. Interest in the phenomenon declined since it failed to produce results over a period of time.

Motor Automatism

Motor automatism refers to the action of the body, independently of the conscious will, in the production of extraordinary phenomena. Such motor automatism is seen in the movement, under the hand, of the séance table, Ouija board, planchette, coin, tumbler, or pendulum inside an alphabetical circle; in the striking of the pendulum against a glass; in raps when a nervous explosion appears to explain the phenomenon; in automatic writing, and in trance speaking. A stranger manifestation of motor automatism has been reported in some rare cases of stigmata, in which messages appear in raised letters on the surface of the medium's skin.

On occasion, the motor effects of the divining rod employed as a means of communication. According to Professor E. Garnett of the Transvaal University College is quoted in Stanley de Brath's book The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism (1947), "During the past few months my son has discovered that in reply to definite question, the rod [divining rod] behaves as planchette. The method he adopts is as follows: The rod is held at forehead level, almost vertical. Questions are asked in usual tone and pitch of voice. For 'Yes' the rod moves forward and downward. For 'No' the rod moves backward and downward."

The tilting of the table in table turning séances or the gentle tapping by a table leg indicating a letter of the alphabet was a crude and laborious, but popular form of communication during the nineteenth century. The Ouija board and other alphabetical arrangements represent a simplification of the process. Raps are more effective, and they eliminate the medium's subconscious to a greater degree, but they are rarer. The planchette approaches automatic writing, and trance speaking is motor automatism at its most effective.

Sensory Automatism

Sensory automatism may involve some degree of mediumistic consciousness and is witnessed in the delivery of messages by clairvoyance, clairaudience, and telepathy, or in the perception of symbolic visions. The clairvoyant messages may be presented pictorially to the medium's mind, externalized in a crystal ball or other shining surface, or heard in seashells or by inner audition.

Many instances of message-bearing symbolic visions are recorded by Ernest Bozzano in the Annals of Psychical Science (volume 6, 1907). In one instance, a mother saw a little bird flying in a deserted plain a little bird whose wings suddenly fell off. Soon after the vision her son died.

Independent Physical Signals

In a third and further-developed stage of communication, Spiritualists have claimed that both motor and sensory automatism are dispensed with and messages occur in apparent independence through the operation of a mysterious psychic force. Observers have seen tables move without being touched and heard percussive sounds that could not be traced to the medium's organism.

Sir William Crookes recorded the following observations with the famous medium D. D. Home: "One of the most amazing things I have seen was the levitation of a glass water-bottle and tumbler. The two objects remained suspended above the table, and by tapping against each other answered 'yes' to questions. They remained suspended about six to eight inches above the table for about five minutes, moving in front of each person and answering questions."

At another time Crookes observed: "During a séance with Mr. Home a small lath moved across the table to me in the light and delivered a message to me by tapping my hand; I repeating the alphabet and the lath tapping me at the right letters. The other end of the lath was resting on the table, some distance from Mr. Home's hands.

"The taps were so sharp and clear and the lath was evidently so well under control of the invisible power which was governing its movements, that I said 'Can the intelligence governing the motion of this lath change the character of the movements, and give me a telegraphic message through the Morse alphabet by taps on my hand.' Immediately I said this the character of the taps changed and the message was continued in the way I had requested. The letters were given too rapidly for me to do more than catch a word here and there and consequently I lost the message; but I heard sufficient to convince me that there was a good Morse operator at the other end of the line, wherever it might be."

Deceiving Spirits and the Play of the Subconscious

To anyone seriously pursuing the possibility of spirit communication, the questions that present themselves are numerous. Are the communications to be accepted at their face value as emanating from spirits? Can they be explained by the subconscious powers of the medium, of the sitters, or of others?

As early as 1853 G. H. Lewes observed (and exploited for purposes of derision) that suggestion may play an important part in the shaping of the contents of mediumistic verbiage. He described a sitting for raps with Maria B. Hayden when, by carefully emphasized hesitation at the appropriate letters he had a conversation with one of the Eumenides. At the same sitting he induced the table to confess, in reply to his mental question, that Hayden was an impostor and that the ghost of Hamlet's father had 17 noses!

In The Book of Mediums, French medium Allan Kardec writes of an instance in which the medium evoked Tartuffe, who he showed himself in all his classical peculiarities. When the medium asked, "How is it that you are here, seeing that you never had any real existence?" Tartuffe answered "I am the spirit of an actor who used to play the part of Tartuffe."

But no such fencing was possible in the following case, also recorded by Kardec: "A gentleman had in his garden a nest of little birds. This nest having disappeared one day, he became uneasy as to the fate of his little pets. As he was a medium he went into his library and invoked the mother of the birds to get some news of them. 'Be quite easy,' she replied to him, 'my young ones are safe and sound. The house-cat knocked down the nest in jumping upon the garden wall; you will find them in the grass at the foot of the wall.' The gentleman hurried to the garden and found the little nestlings, full of life, at the spot indicated."

Highly improbable communications came sometimes even through mediums of established reputation. In a sitting with Lenora Piper in 1899, the biblical Moses reportedly communicated prophecies as well as a variety of meaningless utterances.

There have been numerous communications attributed to "deceiving" spirits. Theodor Flournoy, in his 1911 classic text Spiritism and Psychology, records instances in which mediumistic conversations were carried on for days with the spirits of friends who announced their sudden death. It was found afterward that they were in flourishing health and had no idea of the distress they had caused.

It was known from early times that communications allegedly coming from the spirits cannot always be trusted. Emanuel Swedenborg wrote in his spiritual diary: "When spirits begin to speak with man he must beware lest he believe them in any thing; for they say almost anything. Things are fabricated by them and they lie. If man then listens and believes, they press on and deceive and seduce in divers ways."

To some extent the character of an established control may be responsible for untrustworthy communications. Hester Dowden observed that the controls seem to have a private circle of acquaintances to draw from. These acquaintances always choose to come through the same control and are generally as trustworthy as the keeper of the unseen barrier. When the control was seeking a communicator Dowden often noticed that quite foolish and irrelevant little messages were spelled out as if spirits of the poltergeist type had been playing with the Ouija board.

Communications that seem to originate in an extraneous mind are sometimes followed by others in which the subconscious element is overwhelming. Dowden cited a case in which description of a haunted castle was given. She wanted to stop the communication as one of no interest when her guest interrupted and said that he was very much interested, since the story that came through was the plot of his new play.

Generally the communications are earnest and their tone is moral and religious. In discussing the various angles presented by the contents of mediumistic communications, F. W. H. Myers concluded:

"The high moral quality of these automatic communications is a phenomenon worth consideration. I must indeed confess myself unable to explain why it is that beneath frequent incoherence, frequent commonplaces, frequent pomposity of these messages, there should always be a substratum of better sense, of truer Catholicity than is usually to be heard, except from the leading minds of the generation. The almost universally high tone of genuinely automatic utterances—whether claimed as spirit communications or proceeding obviously from the automatist himself—has not, I think, been sufficiently noticed or adequately explained."

The Personal Character—Difficulties and Complications of Communications

The great question in all communications that originates in the subconscious is why they should take on the form of personal character. William James offered an explanation, that "all consciousness tends to personal form." He believed that genuine communications are extremely rare and that the information occasionally imparted by supernormal means is immediately seized upon by the subconscious mind and presented in a dramatized and elaborated form. His supposition is borne out by the observations of Frederik van Eeden with the medium Rosina Thompson. The sum total of his findings was that after the genuine information has ceased, the role of any spirit is easily and imperceptibly taken up by the medium.

What is the mechanism of communication? In the trance mediumship of Leonora Piper the controls took pains to give an explanation, later summarized by Richard Hodgson:

"We all have bodies composed of luminiferous ether enclosed in our flesh and blood bodies. The relation of Mrs. Piper's ethereal body to the ethereal world, in which communicators claim to dwell is such that a special store of energy is accumulated in connection with her organism, and this appears to them as 'light.' Mrs. Piper's ethereal body is removed by them and her ordinary body appears as a shell filled with this 'light.' Several communicators may be in contact with this light at the same time. There are two chief masses of it in her case, one connected with the head, the other in connection with the right arm and hand. Latterly, that in connection with the hand has been brighter than that in connection with the head. If the communicator gets into contact with the light and thinks his thoughts, they tend to be reproduced by movements in Mrs. Piper's organism. Very few can produce vocal effects, even when in contact with the light of the head, but practically all can produce writing movements when in contact with the light of the hand. Upon the amount and brightness of this light, caeteris paribus, the communications depend. When Mrs. Piper is in ill health the light is feebler and the communications tend to be less coherent. It also gets used up during a sitting and when it gets dim there is a tendency to incoherence even in otherwise clear communicators. In all cases coming into contact with this light tends to produce bewilderment, and if the contact is continued too long or the light becomes very dim the consciousness of the communicator tends to lapse completely."

Multiple Communications

To obtain communications from two different intelligences at the same time, one writing and the other speaking, was nothing unusual in Piper's mediumship. Attempts were even made at gaining the use of the left hand by a third intelligence for simultaneous communication. Hodgson reported that at a sitting where a lady was engaged in a profoundly personal conversation with Piper's control "Phinuit" concerning her relations, "the hand was seized very quietly and, as it were, surreptitiously, and wrote a very personal communication to myself purporting to come from a deceased friend of mine and having no relation whatsoever to the sitter; precisely as if a caller should enter a room where two strangers to him were conversing, but a friend of his is also present and whispers a special message into the ear of the friend without disturbing the conversation."

The attempt to write with the left hand was successfully made on March 18, 1895, in a sitting with a Miss Edmunds. Her deceased sister wrote with one hand and "G. P." with the other, while "Phinuit" was talking—all simultaneously on different subjects. Very little, however, was written with the left hand. The difficulty appeared to lie chiefly in the deficiencies of the left hand in writing.

Piper's case was not unique. Dr. David Underhill (later the husband of Leah Fox), in his story of the mediumship of Abby Warner (related in E. Hardinge Britten's Modern American Spiritualism), quotes affidavits and writes from his own experience that Warner often gave three separate communications at once—one with her right hand, another with her left, and a third through rapping.

Robert Dale Owen testified to the same versatility in Kate Fox. William Crookes confirmed Owen's observations: "I have been with Miss Fox when she has been writing a message automatically to one person present, whilst a message to another person on another subject was being given alphabetically by means of raps and the whole time she was conversing freely with a third person on a subject totally different from either."

Confusion and Incoherence

The incoherency of some of the messages received through mediums and the difficulties in communicating with the dead presented a very complex problem. Richard Hodgson, on the basis of his experiences with Piper, arrived at the following conclusions:

"If, indeed, each one of us is a spirit that survives the death of the fleshly organism, there are certain suppositions that I think we may not unreasonably make concerning the ability of the discarnate spirit to communicate with those yet incarnate. Even under the best conditions for communication which I am supposing for the nonce to be possible, it may well be that the aptitude for communicating clearly may be as rare as the gifts that make a great artist, or a great mathematician, or a great philosopher. Again, it may well be that, owing to the change connected with death itself, the spirit may at first be much confused, and such confusion may last for a long time; and even after the spirit has become accustomed to its new environment, it is not an unreasonable supposition that if it came into some such relation to another living human organism as it once maintained with its own former organism it would find itself confused by that relation. The state might be like that of awaking from a prolonged period of unconsciousness into strange surroundings. If my own ordinary body could be preserved in its present state, and I could absent myself from it for some days or months or years, and continue my existence under another set of conditions altogether, and if I could then return to my own body, it might well be that I should be very confused and incoherent at first in my manifestation by means of a human body. I might be troubled with various forms of aphasia and agraphia, might be particularly liable to failures of inhibition, might find the conditions oppressive and exhausting, and my state of mind would probably be of an automatic and dream-like character. Now the communications through Mrs. Piper's trance exhibit precisely the kind of confusion and incoherence which it seems to me we have some reason a priori to expect if they are actually what they claim to be."

Myers pointed out the resemblance of such communications to the fugitive and unstable discourse between different strata of personality of which embodied minds offer an example. He suggested that multiple personality may occur in the disembodied as well.

The explanations of Piper's control "George Pelham" presented a Spiritualist explanation of the communication process:

"In trance the ethereal body of the psychic parts from the physical body just as it does in dreams and then we take possession of it for the purpose of communication. Your conversation reaches us as if by telephone from a distant station. Our forces fail us in the heavy atmosphere of the world, especially at the end of the séance. . . . If I often blunder it is because I am making use of an organism which does not fit me well. . . . When clear communications are wanted you must not stun them with questions. In order to reveal themselves to you the spirits put themselves in an environment that discommodes them a good deal. They are like persons who have received a blow on the head and are in a state of semi-delirium. They must be calmed, encouraged, assured that their idea will immediately be of great importance. To put ourselves into communication with you we must penetrate into your sphere and we sometimes become careless and forgetful as you are. That is the reason why we make mistakes and are incoherent. I am as intelligent as I ever was, but the difficulties of communicating with you are great. In order to speak with you it is necessary for me to reenter the body and there dream. Hence you must pardon my errors and the lacunae in my speech and memory."

A message claimed to be from the deceased W. T. Stead, recorded in Julia's Bureau on June 2, 1912, is similar: "When I see now for myself the extraordinary difficulties in getting messages through from this side, I marvel not that we got so little in all our searchings when I was with you but that we got as much as we did. For it is you, your conditions which make the barrier."

Piper's controls could not hold on long in the body of the medium and often got confused through the eagerness of the interrogator. The spirit of Robert Hyslop said to his son, "You interrupt me, I ought to go now for my power is failing me and I don't know what I am doing." Another time he said "James, I am getting weaker, wait for me, I am coming back." This experience was common with all the communicators. Free, easy chatter, safe from concentration on tests is conducive to better communications. James H. Hyslop, in his sixteenth sitting with Piper, when he adopted the methods of the Spiritualists, obtained more identity proofs than in all the previous 15 sittings.

The first attempts in getting through are usually fraught with greater difficulties. By a curious process of inversion, the recently dead individual reproduces the symptoms of his last bodily illness in the body of the medium without conscious effort and causes her great discomfort. At the same time the communicator lapses into the mental state he was in as he was dying. Hyslop wrote on this point:

"The mental confusion relevant to the death of my father was apparent in his first attempt to communicate through Mrs. Piper, and when I recalled this period of his dying experience, this confusion was repeated in a remarkable manner, with several evidential features in the messages. Twice an uncle lost the sense of personal identity to communicate. His communications were in fact so confused that it was two years before he became at all clear in his efforts. He had died as a result of a sudden accident. Once my father, after mentioning the illness of my living sister and her name, lost his personal identity long enough to confuse incidents relating to himself and his earthly life with those that applied to my sister and not to himself." Hyslop further observed:

"We may well suppose it possible that this coming back produces an effect similar to the amnesia which so often accompanies a shock or sudden interference with the normal stream of consciousness. The effect seems to be the same as that of certain kinds of dissociation which are now being studied by the student of abnormal psychology, and this is the disturbance of memory which makes it difficult or impossible to recall in one mental state the events which have been experienced in another."

The extent to which the medium is affected by the psychic state of the communicator at the moment of death is well illustrated by Emma Hardinge Britten's description of her famous prediction of the loss of the steamer Pacific:

"That evening, just as my mother and myself were about to retire for the night, a sudden and unusual chill crept over me, and an irresistible impression possessed my mind that a spirit had come into our presence. A sensation as if water was streaming over me accompanied the icy chilliness I experienced and a feeling of indescribable terror possessed my whole being. I begged my mother to light up every lamp we had at hand; then to open the door that the proximity of people in the house outside our room might aid to dissipate the horror that seemed to pervade the very air. At last, at my mother's suggestion, I consented to sit at the table, with the alphabet we had provided turned from me and towards her, so that she could follow the involuntary movements of my finger, which some power seemed to guide in pointing out the letters. In this way was rapidly spelt out: 'Philip Smith: Ship Pacific.' To my horror I distinctly felt an icy cold hand lay hold of my arm; then distinctly and visibly to my mother's eyes, something pulled my hair, which was hanging in long curls; all the while the coldness of the air increasing so painfully that the apartment seemed pervaded by Arctic breezes. After a while my own convulsed hand was moved tremblingly but very rapidly to spell out: 'My dear Emma, I have come to tell you I am dead. The ship Pacific is lost and all on board have perished; she and her crew will never be heard from any more.' "

Just as the medium may prove hypersensitive to the thoughts of the sitters when in trance, so it appears that thought impressions of the spirits congregating around the "light" may have a garbling influence on the message of the control. This possibility was strongly borne out by the attitude of Piper's control "George Pelham," who many times asked the waiting sitters to withdraw until he was through with his first messages. The assumption was that at the same time the spirits on the other side also left and saved him much confusion. Hyslop noted several instances in which the communication came through unintentionally.

The communication of names that have no special meaning is usually difficult for the controls when the messages are sent by telepathic or pictorial impressions. There is often confusion of the letters.

Hyslop also believed that the nature of the communicator's mind can present another difficulty in clear communication. If, for instance, the communicator was a good visualizer and the medium is a poor one, the pictorial messages impressed on the medium may come through imperfectly.

Hyslop made statistical calculations regarding the more important communications through Piper in 15 sittings. There were 205 in all; of these 152 were found to be true, 16 false, and 37 indecisive. In regard to 927 matters of detail alluded to in these communications, 717 were true, 43 false, and 167 undecided.

According to Hodgson, three kinds of confusion could be distinguished in the Piper communications: (1) confusion of the spirit as to whether it was communicating or not, primarily because of mental or bodily conditions when living; (2) confusion in the spirit produced by the conditions into which it came when in the act of communicating; and (3) confusion about the result because of lack of complete control over the writing (or other) mechanism of the medium.

Hodgson found that the best communicators were recently deceased children and adults who had died in the prime of a healthy life, like George Pelham, who only complained that the dreams of the medium got in his way.

In his first report on Piper, Sir Oliver Lodge stated that when "Dr. Phinuit" vacated his place for another communicator the speeches were "more commonplace, and so to say 'cheaper' than what one would suppose likely from the person himself." Phinuit said that after "entering the medium" he only remembered the messages entrusted to him for a few minutes and then became confused. Apparently he was not able to depart at once and kept on repeating incoherent statements.

Considering that in messages from the living the agents do not appear to exercise control over the contents any more than thoughts in dreams are controlled, it is a legitimate supposition that, in some cases, the dead may not be more conscious of sending a message than the living. Again, the communicator may be perfectly conscious of the message, yet uncertain of its receipt. The deceased Myers, purporting to communicate to Alice Kipling Fleming (Mrs. Holland), said, "Does any of this reach you, reach anyone, or am I only wailing as the wind wails—wordless and unheeded?" (Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, vol. 21, p. 233).

Other Forms of Communication

Communication from the dead may come in dreams. One of the oldest instances is given by Cicero in De Divinatione: Two friends go to Megare, one lodges at an inn, the other at a private house. The latter, in his dream, hears his comrade call him for assistance against an assassin. He awakens, then sleeps again. The friend appears and tells him he has been killed and thrown into a wagon by the innkeeper and that manure had been thrown over his body. In the morning the friend finds the story true in every detail.

Communicating with the spirits through raps is commonly dated from the time of the so-called Rochester rappings at Hydesville, New York, in 1848. Four months after the Hydesville outbreak Isaac Post, a Quaker, revived David Fox's idea of asking the spirits to rap at the corresponding letter of the alphabet. The Hydesville discovery was not without precedent, however, as early as 858 C.E. it was described in a chronicle, Rudolf of Fulda. Also, before 1848 a spiritualistic interpretation was accepted by many for the phenomena of magnetic trance. The Shakers experienced a special influx of spirit manifestation between 1837 and 1844.

The Rochester rappings and the physical phenomena followed only appeared to confirm the existence of another world. At first it seemed to be inhabited by nonhuman spirits, angels, and other exalted beings. The manifestation of "John King" in the log house of Jonathan Koons marked a transition between nonhuman and human communicators. At first King said he was semidivine, one of "the most ancient angels," and claimed kingly attributes. Later he confessed to have been Morgan, the pirate king. From his early identity as the ruler of a primeval Adamic race, King evolved into a more humble entity who, in manifesting through mediums succeeding Jonathan Koons, laid no more claim to royalty.

Sources:

Bander, Peter. Carry on Talking: How Dead are the Voices? U.K.: Colin Smythe, 1972.

Beard, Paul. Survival of Death: For and Against. London, 1966.

Broad, C. D. Personal Identity and Survival. London: Society for Psychical Research, 1968.

Cummins, Geraldine. Swan on a Black Sea: A Study in Automatic Writing: The Cummins-Willett Scripts. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1965. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

Ducasse, C. J. A Critical Examination of the Belief in a Life after Death. Springfield, Ill.: Charles Thomas, 1961.

Ellis, D. J. The Mediumship of the Tape Recorder. Harlow, England: David J. Ellis, 1978.

Hart, Hornell. The Enigma of Survival: The Case for and against an After Life. Springfield, Ill.: Charles Thomas, 1959.

Hill, J. Arthur. Spiritualism: Its History, Phenomena and Doctrine. New York: George H. Doran, 1919.

Holms, A. Campbell. The Facts of Psychic Science and Philosophy Collated and Discussed. London, 1925. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1969.

Hyslop, James H. Contact With the Other World: The Latest Evidence as to Communication with the Dead. New York: Century, 1919. Reprint, Finch Press, 1972.

Kautz, William H., and Melanie Branon. Channeling: The Intuitive Connection. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987.

Leonard, Gladys Osborn. My Life in Two Worlds. London: Cassell, 1931.

Myers, Frederic W. H. Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death. 2 vols. London: Longmans Green, 1903, 1954.

Piper, Alta L. The Life and Work of Mrs. Piper. London: Kegan Paul, 1929.

Richmond, Kenneth. Evidence of Identity. London: G. Bell, 1939.

Salter, W. H. Trance Mediumship: An Introductory Study of Mrs. Piper and Mrs. Leonard. London: Society for Psychical Research, 1962.

Sargent, Epes. Planchette: or the Despair of Science. Boston, 1869.

Communigraph

An instrument for mechanical communication with spirits of the dead. Known as the Ashkir-Jobson Communigraph, it consists of a small table with a free pendulum underneath. The pendulum may make contact with a number of small metal plates representing the alphabet. The contact closes a circuit and makes the corresponding letter appear illuminated upon the face of the table. According to the inventors' claim, no medium is necessary for the instrument to work. If a circle sits around the table, the pendulum will begin swinging by what seems to be its own volition. The communigraph was developed by the Ashkir-Jobson Trianion—A. J. Ashdown, B. K. Kirby, and George Jobson.

After the death of Sir Vincent Caillard (1856–1930), a prominent British diplomat, industrialist, and writer, his widow, Lady Zoe Caillard, transcribed a book on the communigraph said to be dictated by the spirit of her husband and entitled A New Conception of Love (1934). She had previously written a book of her own, Sir Vincent Caillard Speaks from the Spirit World (1932).

Sources:

Ashdown, A. J. "The Communigraph and Other Early Psychic Aids for Communications." The Psychic Researcher supplements 2 and 3 (1975).

Gaillard, Lady Zoe. A New Conception of Love. London, 1934.

———. Sir Vincent Caillard Speaks from the Spirit World. London, 1932.

Communion

Title of a bestselling book by Whitley Strieber, author of such fantasy/horror stories as The Wolfen (1978) and The Hunger (1981). In Communion (1987) Strieber describes what are claimed to be his real personal experiences of abduction and painful examination by strange creatures. These experiences date from age 12 when Strieber claims that one evening, near his backyard, he was attacked by a huge insect resembling a praying mantis, which hit his head with a silver nail.

Strieber also recalls being abducted momentarily from a train during a journey with his family from San Antonio to Wisconsin. Soon afterward, "visiting spacemen" gave him instructions for constructing an antigravity machine. When he connected it to the electrical supply there were showers of sparks and a pulsation of lights in the house. The machine exploded, burning out house lights, and the following night the roof of the house was destroyed by fire. Other nightmare experiences concerned giant insect figures and a headless figure touching him with a silver-tipped wand.

The substance of the book, however, concerns events in 1985 in an upstate New York cabin, where he claims that a number of creatures came and transported him to an alien spacecraft. There, he says, a needle was put into his brain and a triangular object inserted into his rectum. The triangular theme recurs in a later experience; while reading in bed, he had an unexplained time-lapse of four hours, and later discovered two triangles incised on his left forearm.

In 1986 Strieber met and compared notes with Budd Hopkins, who has specialized in the subject of claimed UFO abductions. Hopkins it the author of Missing Time (1981) and Intruders: The Incredible Visitations at Copley Woods (1987). These books discuss other claimed "missing time" abductions.

Following publication of his book, Strieber received more than 500 letters in six weeks, many of them claiming similar mysterious visitations or abductions. He followed the book with a sequel, Transformation: The Breakthrough (1988), and eventually Communion was made into a movie. In 1989 he created the Communion Foundation to focus further debate on his experiences and research on abduction claims. By this time Strieber had developed a more positive view of the abduction experience, a perspective that soon led to his break with the ufological community. The foundation lasted only a few years; it was discontinued as Strieber withdrew from intense debates on the abduction phenomenon.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. Encyclopedia of Strange and Unexplained Phenomena. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Conroy, Ed. Report on "Communion": An Independent Investigation of and Commentary on Whitley Strieber's "Communion." New York: William Morrow, 1989.

Taves, Ernest H. "Communion with the Imagination." The Skeptical Inquirer 12, 1 (Fall 1987).

Community of Sensation

A sharing of sensations between hypnotizer and subject was discovered by early experimenters in mesmerism. It meant that the subject became insensible in his or her own body but reacted to physical sensations experienced by the mesmerizer. Taste and smell were most commonly transferred in this way, but the transfer of sight and hearing was often reported.

Curious occurrences of the same phenomenon were claimed by Dr. Paul Joire in an account of his experiments in exteriorization of sensitivity. Community of sensation was established between a glass of water or a ball of putty, vaguely resembling human shape. If the putty was pricked, the subject experienced the pain in a corresponding part of his body. This experiment is similar to the black magic practice of making a small image of an enemy and pricking it with pins.

Still stranger cases have been cited involving materialization phenomena in séances. Ectoplasm, from which the materialized shapes are reported by formed, is claimed to be exuded by the medium, and the physical sensations of the phantom figures are thus keenly felt by the medium. Stories of the bad effects of "spirit grabbing" (attempts to touch the materialized figures) are often recounted and tell of serious injury to the medium as a result. Vivid descriptions can be found in Elizabeth d'Esperance's autobiography. Insistence by skeptics claimed that materializations were only the medium or an accomplice in disguise led to the necessity of such stories.

Apart from the materialization sessions, however, there are a number of accounts of a community of sensation. Possibly, the most gruesome instance was experienced in the course of a hypnotic experiment by the celebrated Belgian painter Antoine Wiertz (1806–1865) who wanted to know if thought persisted in the brain of a decapitated man. According to Larelig's biography, Wiertz, with the aid of a prison doctor friend, hid himself under the guillotine during an execution and instructed his hypnotist, who was a party to the experiment, to command him to identify himself with the criminal. Reportedly, while the condemned man was led to the scaffold, Wiertz manifested extreme distress and begged to be released.

"'It was too late, however—the knife fell.' 'What do you feel? What do you see?' asked the doctor. Wiertz writhed convulsively and replied, 'Lightning! A thunderbolt falls! It thinks! It sees!' 'Who thinks and sees?' 'The head. It suffers horribly. It thinks and feels but does not understand what has happened. It seeks its body and feels that the body must join it. It still waits for the supreme blow for death, but death does not come.'&43"

As Wiertz spoke, the witnesses saw the head, which had fallen into the basket and lay looking at them horribly, its arteries oozing blood. It was only after some moments of suffering that the guillotined head at last seemed aware that it was separated from its body. Wiertz became calm and seemed exhausted, while the doctor resumed his questions.

The painter answered:

"I fly through space like a top spinning through fire. But am I dead? Is all over? If only they would let me join my body again! Have pity, give it back to me and I can live again. I remember all. There are the judges in red robes. I hear the sentence. Oh! my wretched wife and children. I am abandoned. If only you would put my body to me, I should be with you once more. You refuse? All the same, I love you my poor babies. Miserable wretch that I am I have covered you with blood. When will this finish—or is not a murderer condemned to eternal punishment?"

As Wiertz spoke these words, the witnesses thought they saw the eyes of the decapitated head open wide with a look of unmistakable suffering and of beseeching.

The painter continued his lamentations: "No, such suffering cannot endure for ever; God is merciful. All that belongs to earth is fading away. I see in the distance a little light glittering like a diamond. I feel a calm stealing over me. What a good sleep I shall have. What joy!" These were the last words the painter spoke. He was still entranced but no longer replied to the questions asked by the doctor. They then approached the head and the doctor touched the forehead, the temples, and the teeth and found they were cold. The head was dead.

Wiertz painted three pictures of a guillotined head. According to an account of his gruesome experience in Catalogue Raisonné du Musée Wiertz, précédé d'une biographie du paintre par le Dr. L. Watteau (1865), Wiertz had been closely following a murder trial that ended in two men being sent to the scaffold. It is very likely that one of them was the subject of his experiment.

Community of sensation is witnessed when the medium through whom a recently freed spirit communicates takes on the conditions of his last illness and suffers his agonies. In experiments connected with psychometry this occurs frequently. It may also occur in prevision. British psychic Vincent Turvey said that when he foresaw a future event in which the subject suffered pain, he experienced the victim's sensations at the moment of premission. (See also Wirdig's Magnetic Sympathy)

Sources:

Wiertz, Antoine Joseph. Antoine Wiertz, 1806–1865. Paris: J. Damase, 1974.

Community of the Beloved Disciple

The Community of the Beloved Disciple is an initiatic mystery school founded by visionary musician James F. Twyman. As a young spiritual seeker in the early 1990s, Twyman had been associated with Endeavor Academy and the related New Christian Church of Full Endeavor, through which he was introduced to A Course in Miracles, a volume reportedly channeled from Jesus Christ through psychiatrist Helen Schucman. He later spent time with the Emissaries of Divine Light, an New Age community with numerous centers worldwide. By the mid-1990s he had developed a primary concern for world peace.

In the summer of 1995, as he was about to embark on a concert tour in Europe, Twyman was given a copy of a set of prayers for peace from 12 world religions. He subsequently wrote music to go with these prayers, which have become an important aspect of his performances. During his journey in Europe, he found his way to the war-torn countries of Bosnia and Croatia, and while there claimed to have met a group of 13 spiritual masters. They gave him a simple message that it was now possible for humanity to create a world based on the laws of love that will replace the present one built on fear. Since that time, carrying this message to the world has determined Twyman's career. He also subsequently developed a variety of psychic gifts.

Twyman wrote a book describing his meeting with the masters that was published in 1997. He also held concerts in Iraq, Northern Ireland, and at the United Nations in New York City, each aimed at helping the cause of world peace. He also organized what he called the Great Experiment, calling for people around the world to join in ten minutes of prayer for world peace on April 23, 1998. He tied the event to the visit to the United Nations of Thomas Banyacya and the Hopi elders several years previously with their message of peace. The Great Experiment II was held on April 23, 2000.

Out of his experience with the masters, whom he termed the Emissaries of Light, Twyman organized the Community of the Beloved Disciple, to initiate people into their teachings. People drawn to his community are considered those who have chosen to reincarnate at this time in order to become stewards of the new world ruled by love that is coming into existence. Those who affiliate with the community begin with two courses of study of four and six months respectively that prepare them for initiation. Further study leads to ordination as a minister in the community.

The Community of the Beloved Disciple may be contacted at P.O. Box 1054, Joshua Tree, CA 92252. It has an Internet page at http://www.emissaryoflight.com/.

Sources:

Emmissary of Light. http://www.emissaryoflight.com/. June 11, 2000.

Twyman, James F. Emissary of Light: Vision of Peace. Boston: Little Brown and Co., 1997.

———. The Secret of the Beloved Disciple. Tallahassee, Fla.: Findhorn Press, 2000.

Comparative Psychophysiological Study of Living Adepts Project (COMPSLA)

COMPSLA was initiated in 1989 to provide comprehensive, comparative, systematic, and focused study of the psychophysiological abilities of adepts worldwide (including Hindu yogis, Moslem fakirs, Tibetan Buddhist lamas, Taoist and Zen masters, shamans, and others) by an interdisciplinary team of anthropologists, medical researchers, and religious studies specialists. Such claimed abilities included thrusting unsterilized knives and spears through the flesh without experiencing pain, bleeding, or infection; drinking or immersing parts of the body in boiling water without pain or tissue damage; drinking poison or receiving bites from poisonous creatures such as snakes and scorpions without the expected morbid effects; chewing and swallowing glass without the expected pain and tissue damage; handling fire without being burned; radically modulating body or skin temperature; all methods of controlling pain, immune function, and metabolism; and unusual longevity.

The group undertook the first-ever study of Ethiopian Christian Orthodox ascetics, who possessed the last remaining substantial tradition of Christian hermetic asceticism. The tradition was retained by many Ethiopians living in mountain caves, deserts, and forests who practice rigorous seclusion, fasting, celibacy, vigils, mortification, continual prayer and meditation, and yogalike practices involving breath control. This tradition appeared to have changed very little since the movement of the desert Christian fathers from Egypt and Syria into Ethiopia in the third through the fifth centuries C.E.

The study concluded that many of the practices involve either sensory deprivation or sensory overload, attention to physical sensation, self-induced pain, and automotor manipulations such as closed eyes and eye-rolling. Appetitive drives were altered through fasting, dietary restrictions, sexual continence, and sleep deprivation. Researchers observed the ascetics using breath and posture control, dancing (similar to that of whirling dervishes), and other kinds of ritualized movements, as well as various vocalizations—chanting, singing, and reciting poetry or mantras. The ascetics also practiced visualization and various forms of meditation and prayer. Musical instruments and drugs were employed to bring about altered states of consciousness, influencing both mind and body.

COMPSLA's last known address was through the Department of Anthropology, Columbia University, New York, NY 10027.

Compass Brothers

Between the years 1400 and 1790, a guild of this name met twice a year at Lübeck. Their badge was a compass and sector suspended from a crowned letter "C," over which was a radiated triangular plate. In 1485 they adopted chains composed of these emblems united by eagles' tails. They appear to have been a magical or Kabalistic society.

COMPSLA See Comparative Psychophysiological Study of Living Adepts Project

Compton, Elizabeth J. (1829– ?)

A washerwoman of Havanah, New York, and mother of nine children who in 1875, at age 45, was discovered to be a powerful medium. Henry S. Olcott, one of the founders of the Theosophical Society, in his People from the Other World (1875) describes remarkable séances with Compton that produced surprising discoveries.

Olcott removed the medium's earrings, passed sewing thread through the perforation in her ears, and sealed the ends to the back of her chair. He impressed his private signet on the seals, fastened her chair to the floor with thread and wax, and left the cabinet, firmly convinced that the slightest movement of the medium would be sufficient to snap the threads.

A young girl who called herself "Katie Brink" soon stepped out of the cabinet. Her weight varied between 52 and 77 pounds (the medium weighed 121); she sat on Olcott's knee, caressed him, and gave him permission to go into the cabinet while she was outside. Her only condition was that he should not touch the chair in which the medium was sitting. Olcott went in, found the chair, but both the medium and the fastenings had disappeared.

After the appearance and departure of another phantom, an Indian warrior, Olcott went in again. He wrote in his book:

"I went inside with a lamp and found the medium just as I left her at the beginning of the séance, with every thread unbroken and every seal undisturbed. She sat there with her head leaning against the wall, her flesh as pale as marble, her eyeballs turned up beneath the lids, her forehead covered with a deathlike dampness, no breath coming from the lungs, and no pulse at her wrist. When every person had examined the threads and seals, I cut the flimsy bonds with a pair of scissors and, lifting the chair by its back and seat, carried the cataleptic woman out into the open air of the chamber. She lay thus inanimate for eighteen minutes, life gradually coming back to her body, until respiration and pulse and the temperature of her skin became normal."

Given the present perspective on such materialization occurrences and Olcott's own incompetence as an investigator, in spite of the presence of 11 other people at the séance, there was every reason to believe that he had simply been unable to detect the fraud. A skeptical view would be that Compton relied on confederates, both to impersonate spirit forms and to move her and the chair in and out of the cabinet without breaking the seals, using a duplicate empty chair to suggest that the medium had been transformed.

Observers were somewhat confounded by events during the séances. It seemed as impossible to duplicate what they saw in a mundane manner as it was for a spirit to accomplish the task. The body of the spirit seemed to be Compton's. However, a transfiguration involved complete change of stature and bulk. She was variously elongated, compressed, became thin and then corpulent, and her impersonation of the departed was so perfect that the presence of the spirit was accepted, especially since she had intimate knowledge of personal circumstances in every such case.

Now and again, in an attempt at exposure, she was seized. In such cases she seemed to resolve into her original form, and became Elizabeth Compton again in a second of time. Such seizures, however, were always followed by her collapse.

Later, Dr. John Ballou Newbrough, a Spiritualist medium himself, reported on a séance. He used shoemaker's wax-end in fastening Compton to the chair and nailed the ends to the wall and her dress to the floor. The medium, dress, and nails disappeared during the materialization of a phantom outside. When she was discovered in her chair again, careful measurements revealed that the nails were in new places, the knots had been changed or untied, and the had been seals removed and returned to their places.

Sources:

Olcott, Henry S. People from the Other World. Hartford, Conn.: American Publishing, 1875.

Computer UFO Newsletter

European publication that discusses computer application to UFO research and databases. At present the newsletter is published approximately six times per year. Address: CUFON, via Matteotti 85, 22072 Carmenate (Como), Italy.

Le Comte de Gabalis

Title of a strange work published by the Abbé de Montfaucon de Villars (1635–1673). It reads like an occult novel, with mystical commentaries, and has been interpreted by some as a satire of the writings of La Calprenede (a popular French writer of the era), but with an added blend of history, philosophy, and mysticism.

The book became a major source of information for later discussion on elementary spirits. The author remarks of his principal character,

"Paracelsus says of the practice of Philosophy, 'this Art is taught by Gabalis (the spiritual perception of Man).' These words inspired the title Comte de Gabalis which veils the identity of a great Teacher. . . . The Comte's true identity will be widely recognized."

The poet Alexander Pope, in his dedication to The Rape of the Lock, first drafted in 1711, states,

"The Rosicrucians are a people I must bring you acquainted with. The best account I know of them is in a French book call'd Le Comte de Gabalis, which both in its title and size is so like a Novel, that many of the Fair Sex have read it for one by mistake. According to these Gentlemen, the four Elements are inhabited by Spirits, which they call Sylphs, Gnomes, Nymphs, and Salamanders . . . they say, any mortals may enjoy the most intimate familiarities with these gentle Spirits, upon a condition very easy to all true Adepts, an inviolate preservation of Chastity."

The book is also cited by Bulwer Lytton (1803–1873) in his occult novel Zanoni.

Sources:

de Villars, Abbé. Comte de Gabalis. 1821. Reprint, London: Methuen, 1941. Reprint, Quakertown, Pa.: Philosphical Publishing Co., 1983.

Lytton, Edward Bulwar. Zanoni. London: Saunders & Otley, 1842. Reprinted as Zanoni: A Rosicrucian Tale. Blauvelt, N.Y.: Rudolf Steiner Publications, 1971.

Pope, Alexander. The Rape of the Lock. N.p., 1821. Reprint, London: Methuen, 1941.

Conan Mac Morna

A figure in the Ossianic cycle of Irish legend, described as scoffing and deriding all that was high and noble. One day while hunting, he and other Fians entered a magnificent palace that they found empty, and began to feast. It soon became apparent, however, that the palace was enchanted, and the walls shrank to the size of a fox's hole. Conan seemed to be unaware of the danger and continued to eat, but two of the Fians pulled him off his chair, to which some of his skin stuck. A black sheepskin was placed on his back to soothe the pain. The sheepskin adhered to his back and he wore it until he died.

Conant, Mrs. J. H. (1831–1875)

American medium who, through the generosity of Luther Colby, editor of The Banner of Light, gave, for the last 17 years of her life, free public séances in Boston. Her trance messages, characterized by the impersonation of the departed, were published weekly in the Banner.

Conant was known in Spiritualist circles as both an inspirational speaker and a platform healer. For her medical diagnosis the medium relied on the spirit of Dr. John Dix Fisher, an old Boston physician.

While in trance she believed herself to be outside her body and wandering about, and on occasion her double was believed to manifest through other mediums. She also wrote automatically in trance, and reportedly spoke in many languages unknown to her especially in various Indian dialects, an ability known as xenoglossia.

Sources:

Putnam, Allen, comp. Flashes of Light from the Spirit-Land. Boston: William White, 1872.

———. Biography of Mrs. J. H. Conant. Boston: W. White and Co., 1873.

Conary Mor

A legendary high king of Ireland. It is said that his great-grandfather destroyed the Fairy Mound of Bri-Leith, and thus brought ill fate upon Conary Mor. As a child, he left his three foster brothers on the Plains of Liffey and followed a flock of beautiful birds down to the shore. The birds were transformed into armed men, who told him they belonged to his father and were his kin. His geise (taboo) was made known to him, and later he was proclaimed king of Erin.

His reign was prosperous, until the Danaans lured him to break his geise. It is told how Conary, dying of thirst after battle, sent his warrior Mac Cecht to bring him water. Mac Cecht had much difficulty in obtaining the water, and on his return, he found Conary had been beheaded. The water, however, was raised to the mouth of the bodiless head, which, it is said, thanked Mac Cecht for his deed.

Condon, Edward U(hler) (1902–1974)

Professor of physics at the University of Colorado, and director of the study on UFOs (unidentified flying objects) commissioned by the U.S. Air Force and conducted by the University of Colorado in the late 1960s. The Condon Report, officially titled the Scientific Study of Unidentified Flying Objects, was released by the U.S. government in 1969.

Edward Condon was born on March 2, 1902 in Almogordo, New Mexico. An outspoken and controversial figure, he spent two years doing research in Germany after obtaining a Ph.D. in physics from the University of California in 1926. He was assistant professor of physics at Princeton University (1928–29), professor of theoretical physics at the University of Minnesota, and associate professor at Princeton (1930–37). During World War II he was associate director of the Westinghouse Research Laboratories and participated in the development of radar and the atom bomb. After the war he became director of the National Bureau of Standards, U.S. Department of Consumers (1945–51), and subsequently headed the research and development division of Corning Glass Works (1951–54).

In the late 1940s Condon was attacked by the House Un-American Activities Committee for allegedly "consorting with communists." At the time he was a special adviser to the Special Senate Committee on Atomic Energy of the Congress. Following the "witch-hunts" of the period, and after clashing with Richard Nixon, his security clearance was revoked in 1953 and 1954. He resigned from Corning Glass Works and returned to an academic career. From 1956 to 1963, he was Wayman Crow Professor of Physics at Washington University, and he joined the University of Colorado faculty in 1963 as a professor in the Department of Physics and Astrophysics and fellow in the Joint Institute for Laboratory Astrophysics.

Condon's main conclusion was that further studies of UFO phenomena would not be of scientific benefit. He rejected the hypothesis of extraterrestrial origins of UFOs. Not surprisingly, he was condemned by many UFO enthusiasts as a debunker of the subject. He did not personally conduct field investigations while preparing this report. Condon retired after the report appeared and was named emeritus professor in 1970. He died on March 26, 1974 in Boulder, Colorado.

Sources:

Condon, Edward U. "UFOs I Have Loved and Lost." Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists (December 1969).

Condon Report

Popular name for the Scientific Study of Unidentified Flying Objects, written by Edward U. Condon, edited by Daniel S. Gillmor, and released by the U.S. government in 1969. The project grew out of a critical review of Project Blue Book, the U.S. Air Force structure for reviewing UFO reports, by the Air Force's Scientific Advisory Board in March 1966. The next month, a hearing on UFOs was conducted by the U.S. House of Representatives Armed Services Committee.

Subsequently commissioned by the U.S. Air Force, the Condon study occupied 15 months investigation of reports of unidentified flying objects. The report was skeptical and ascribed most UFO sightings to weather balloons, stars, birds, insects, optical illusions, or atmospheric phenomena. The tone and conclusions of the report flatly repudiated earlier rumors that the U.S. government accepted the reality of flying saucers, stating, "Our general conclusion is that nothing has come from the study of UFOs in the past 21 years that has added to scientific knowledge." As a result, the U.S. Air Force canceled Project Blue Book in December 1969, and, as a whole, ufology entered a period of decline.

During the writing of the report a controversy arose as charges were made that the study was a sham and that Condon had already reached his conclusions before the project began. Several UFO groups withdrew their support. Ufologists who read the report noted that many of the cases cited had no assigned explanation. Slowly a reaction built. In 1972 J. Allen Hynek wrote The UFO Experience, in which he critiques the report and charges the Air Force with incompetence in handling UFO reports. The following year he founded the Center for UFO Studies (now the J. Allen Hynek Center for UFO Studies).

Sources:

Condon, Edward U. Scientific Study of Unidentified Flying Objects. Springfield, VA: National Technical Information Service, 1968. Reprint, New York: E. P. Dutton, 1970.

Hynek, J. Allen. The UFO Experience: A Scientific Enquiry. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1972.

Saunders, David R., and R. Roger Hawkins. UFOs? Yes! Where the Condon Committee Went Wrong. New York: World, 1968. Reprint, New York: New American Library, 1968.

Conger, Arthur Latham, Jr. (1872–1951)

Arthur L. Conger, Jr., the leader of the American branch of the Theosophical Society in the years immediately after World War II (1939–45), was born on January 30, 1872, in Akron, Ohio. His father was a Civil War veteran and prominent leader in the Republican Party. While at Harvard (1890–1894), Conger became attracted to Theosophy and joined the local lodge in 1892. He met his future wife, Margaret Loring Guild, at the lodge. Following his graduation, at his parents' request, he left for England to study for the Episcopal priesthood, but while he did well at the seminary at Cambridge, he settled upon Theosophy as his belief. Before his second year was out, he left the seminary and moved to New York to work for the society, just as the controversy heated up between the national leader of the society and the international organization. That controversy would lead to the American society separating from the international movement. He met Katherine Tingley, and in 1896 when she became the new leader of the American branch, she asked Conger to become her secretary.

Conger worked at the headquarters (without pay) for the next two years, but his family cut him off financially and he had to seek paid employment. He joined the army and participated in the Spanish American War (1898), where he was awarded the Silver Star. Over the next years he rose in the ranks and during World War I (1914–18) was chosen to join the staff of General Pershing in France. He was awarded the Distinguished Service Medal and (from the French government) the Legion of Honor and the Croix de Guerre. He eventually rose to the rank of colonel and retired from the service in 1938.

In the years following the war, Conger again became active in the society, speaking occasionally at national gatherings. He served a brief term as the American section president (1932–33), and was reelected in 1939. Among the projects he fostered was a new digest-sized periodical, Theosophical Nuggets, a pocket-sized magazine that was published during the World War II years (1939–45).

Conger was president of the American section at the time the community at Point Loma was abandoned and the headquarters were moved to Covina, California (a Los Angeles suburb). Gottfried de Purucker, the head of the society, died in 1942. A collective leadership emerged for the rest of the war years, but in 1945 Conger was named the new leader of the society. By this time he was suffering from Parkinson's disease. The years of Conger's leadership showed two very different trends. First, he developed a forward-looking program to rebuild the society, which had suffered greatly from inattention during the war years. He also became the center of much controversy as a number of prominent older members did not accept his leadership and were asked to leave the headquarters staff. The splintering that occurred divided American Theosophists for a generation.

Among his last actions as head of the society was initiating the move of the headquarters to Pasadena, California, in 1950. Conger passed away in Pasadena on February 22, 1951. He did not write any books, but during his years as head of the society, he edited its journal, The Theosophical Forum.

Sources:

Donant, Alan E. "Colonel Arthur L. Conger." Theosophical History 7, no.1 (January 1998): 35–56.

Congregational Witchcraft Association (CWA)

The Congregational Witchcraft Association (CWA) is a fellowship of Wiccans that operates in Canada. It was chartered in 1992 as a Canadian nonprofit association, but had actually been founded four years previously as an association of autonomous self-governing Wiccan covens, the original members residing in Nova Scotia, Ontario, and British Columbia. Through the 1990s, additional covens (the small groups that form the basic organizational unit in Wicca) were added from other Canadian provinces.

Member groups of the association adhere to a common statement of Wiccan belief and ethical standards, but are in control locally of worship and coven administration. Besides providing a sense of belonging and identity, the association is designed to perform those functions that a single coven would have difficulty accomplishing alone. Most importantly, it represents the member covens to the government. It also, in a general fashion works to promote Wicca and to set up larger festivals and gatherings.

The association believes in a multifaceted immanent divine reality that manifests as the many gods and goddesses of traditional polytheism. The divine also manifests on various levels, and thus it is proper to speak of the greater or higher deities and the lesser deities, among whom would be guardian spirits. The immanent divine is also ever present and active in the world. Humans embody the divine, and every act of love or pleasure is an expression of the divine in human life. Association members also condone and celebrate all sexual expression that is noncoercive.

Association members practice magic. Through ritual and other magical acts, they believe that the world may be changed according to their will (destiny). Magic and ritual are not to include any animal sacrifice or physically coercive aspects. Covens and/or members of the priesthood are not allowed to charge fees for either the teaching of witchcraft or for initiation into the craft. Priests and priestesses are seen to operate as other religious pastoral leaders and are expected to keep the confidences of those whom they counsel.

The CWA is a democratic organization. Its national council is elected by vote of the member covens. It has a vision of creating a non-degree-granting college for the training of people for the Wiccan priesthood. In the mid-1990s, there were 12 covens in either full or associate membership. The association may be reached at P.O. Box 2205, Clearbrook, BC, Canada V2T 3X8. It publishes a periodical, Duck Tales, and several of the covens also publish newsletters. Website: http://www.cwa.ca/.

Sources:

Congregational Witchcraft Association. http://www.cwa.ca/. February 28, 2000.

Congress of Astrological Organizations

Founded in 1973 to promote the general welfare and interest of members and to stimulate and increase their cooperation in all matters affecting their interest in astrology; to establish, improve, and promote standards in the field of astrology; to eliminate abuses of and unfair practices in the practice of astrology; to promote and cultivate a spirit of harmony among all astrologers; and to settle disputes arising among members.

The Congress of Astrological Organizations conducts research programs, provides technical assistance, maintains a collection of scientific research materials relating to astrology, and conducts a speakers bureau. It publishes the CAO Times. Current membership of some 50 organizations represents some 6,000 individuals. Address: P.O. Box 75, Old Chelsea Sta., New York, NY 10113.

Conjuretors

Magicians who claimed to have the power to evoke demons and tempests.

Conjuring

To conjure originally meant to call up spirits or practice magic arts, but in the course of time a secondary meaning of sleight of hand displaced the earlier meaning, and the term now indicates trickery or deception (usually for entertainment). In the United States, the term magic is usually used for conjuring, although this too originally had an occult meaning. The blurring of the occult and stage magic occurred in the late nineteenth century when so many mediums passed off stage illusions as genuine Spiritualist phenomena.

Sources:

Evans, Henry Ridgeley. The Old and New Magic. Chicago: Open Court Publishing, 1909.

Conklin, J. B. (ca. 1862)

Nineteenth-century American "test medium" who gave answers from departed relatives to mental questions of the sitters and also did pellet reading.

Conklin's chief claim to fame was the patronage of President Abraham Lincoln. After Lincoln's election, Conklin stated in The Cleveland Plaindealer that the President-elect was a Spiritualist. Lincoln did not deny the statement, and it is recorded that for four successive Sundays, prior to the issue of the antislavery proclamation, Conklin was a guest at the presidential mansion. The spirit messages delivered by Conklin were reported to have greatly strengthened the president's determination to make the historic step.

Sources:

Britten, Emma Hardinge. Nineteenth Century Miracles. New York: William Britten, 1884.

Cooper, Robert. Spiritual Experiences. London: Heywood & Co., 1867.

Shelton, Harriet M. Abraham Lincoln Returns. New York: Evans Publishing, 1957.

Connections (Journal)

Connections is one of a small number of newsstand magazines serving the Neo-Pagan community. Founded in 1993 as an expression of Paganism in the Denver, Colorado, area, by the end of the decade it had gained national circulation and at the beginning of the new millennium it was adopted as the organ of the Covenant of Unitarian Universalist Pagans (CUUPS). CUUPS traces its history to the emergence of Pagans within the very diverse interfaith fellowship of contemporary Unitarian Universalism (which also includes Buddhist, Humanist, and Christian contingents). A Pagan network was formed in 1986 and CUUPS formally accepted as an affiliate by the Unitarian Universalist Association. A quarterly newsletter was launched to keep CUUPS members informed. The legitimacy provided Pagans by its association with the Unitarian Universalists made CUUPS attractive to many, and it grew rapidly.

Robin Woodsong had an evangelical Christian background and in his late teens he attended a Bible college with the idea of becoming a pastor. However, he became disillusioned with Christianity and as a young adult turned to Paganism. Settling in Colorado, he became a leader in the relatively large Denver area community that through the 1980s supported a Wicca-Pagan-oriented bookstore. In 1989 he met his future wife, Summer, at a Pagan festival. Together they began Connections in 1993.

Connections is issued quarterly and each issue is built around a set of feature articles on topics of interest to Witches and Pagans. These range from interviews with leaders in the community to articles on magick, Witchcraft, Pagan ethics, and sexuality. There are few regular columns though space is given to an advice column and letters to the editors.

Connections was adopted by CUUPS at the end of the 1990s and the initial issue reflecting the new sponsorship of the magazine appeared in the spring of 2000. This change also occurred as CUUPS headquarters moved from Boston, Massachusetts, to Cincinnati, Ohio. Connections is now published at 8190A Beechmont Ave., Cincinnati, OH 45255-3154. It has an Internet site at http://www.connectionsjournal.com/.

Sources:

Connections. Cincinnati, Ohio, n.d.

Connections. http://www.connectionsjournal.com/. March 14, 2000.

Consciousness Research Laboratory (CRL)

The Consciousness Research Laboratory (CRL), a private research facility in Palo Alto, California, was originally founded at the University of Nevada-Las Vegas in 1993. It dropped its university affiliation in 1998 at which time it moved to its present location.

Heading CRL since its opening is Dean Radin. As a young man Radin was a musician who played both bluegrass and classical violin. He gave up his musical career to become a scientist, taking a degree in electrical engineering at the University of Massachusetts (magna cum laude), and an M.S. and Ph.D in psychology from the University of Illinois. Through the 1980s, Radin was a researcher in advanced telecommunications at the AT&T Bell Laboratories and GTE Laboratories.

In 1985 he became involved with the Stanford Research Institute and conducted parapsychological research as part of the program being sponsored by the U.S. government. Over the next 15 years he continued such research at Princeton University, Edinburgh University, and then in the early 1990s, the University of Nevada. He is the author of more than 150 papers and three books on parapsychology.

The particular emphasis of CRL, as its name implies, is the role of consciousness in the physical world, especially as it is expressed in psychic phenomena. Its research program is focused on controlled laboratory experiments, especially mind-matter interactions (psychokinesis), distant healing, and precognition. It has conducted investigations of haunted sites and psi-related factors at the casinos. It does not offer a training program.

CRL is located in Palo Alto, California. It may be contacted through its web page at http://www.psiresearch.org/.

Sources:

Consciousness Research Laboratory. http://www.psiresearch.org/. April 19, 2000.

Conselheiro, Antonio (1835–1897)

Brazilian millennialist and religious leader who prophesied that the world would end in the year 1900. Born Antonio Vicente Medes Macial, son of poverty-stricken landowners in Ceará, Brazil, he left home to become a wandering preacher and acquired the name "Conselheiro" (the Counsellor) from the peasants, who respected his judgment.

His influence spread rapidly, and after the establishment of the Republic of Brazil in 1889, his preaching led to skirmishes with the authorities. After proclaiming the imminent end of the world, he formed a community of the faithful in the remote northern village of Canudos. Several military campaigns were undertaken by the government against his community, but the troops were repelled.

In 1897 Conselheiro became ill (possibly through dysentery) and died. Soon afterward his millenialists were defeated.

Sources:

Cunninghame, Graham R. B. A Brazilian Mystic: Being the Life and Miracles of Antonio Conselheiro. London: Heineman, 1920. Reprint, Freeport, N.Y.: Books for Libraries Press, 1971.

Levine, Robert M. Vale of Tears: Revisiting the Canudos Massacre in Northeastern Brazil. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1992.

Macedo, Nertan. Antonio Conselheiro. N.p.: Graf Record, 1969.

Contactees

Contactee is the name that has been given to people, especially since the 1950s, who claim contact with extraterrestrials, beings from other planets. In the wake of the citing of flying saucers by pilot Kenneth Arnold in 1947, speculation was rampant that they were possibly spaceships from a distant planet. Beginning in 1952, with George Adamski, a number of people emerged who claimed that they had met and communicated with the humanoids who drove the flying saucers. Two years later, contactee George van Tassel began to host an annual convention of contactees and those who believed their message at a place called Giant Rock, in the desert of Southern California, near Lucerne Valley. A contactee movement was born that has persisted to the present.

While a number of contactees have claimed direct physical meetings with the space beings—most notably a few of the more famous of the 1950s contactees, with a few even trying to produce hard evidence of their contact—overwhelming, the contact was by way of telepathy (or in some cases by out-of-body travel). Contactees have received messages from the space beings much as mediums in earlier generations received messages from spirits of the dead or ascended masters. A new term, channeling, a metaphor referring to the then-new phenomenon of television, was coined to describe their reception of the extraterrestrial communications. When ufology almost disappeared after the very negative Condon report in 1969, channeling from extraterrestrials continued and found a new home as a major subtheme within the New Age Movement.

Pre-Adamski Contacts

Although a new era of extraterrestrial contact was launched by George Adamski, it was soon evident that he was by no means the first to claim contact, and that in fact claims of contacts had periodically appeared over the previous two centuries. In the middle of the eighteenth century, Swedish seer Emanuel Swedenborg, who had made a career of absorbing and publishing communications from angels, claimed to have taken an out-of-body trip through the solar system. He left a record of his discoveries in a small book, Earths in the Solar System (1758). As he moved from planet to planet, he discovered each to be inhabited by races not unlike humans and he described each in turn, usually in very positive terms. It is also the case that he limited his visits to the then-known planets. He did not discover the asteroids between Mars and Jupiter or note the existence of any planets beyond Saturn.

Occasional contacts would be reported over the next century, especially after the emergence of Spiritualism, but a clustering of such claims would appear toward the end of the nineteenth century after astronomer Percival Lowell reported to have seen canals on the surface of Mars. Such unnatural structures crisscrossing the face of a nearby planet offered hope (or provoked fears) that a nearby neighbor was inhabited with rational beings. One of the Martian contactees of the 1890s, Catherine Elise Muller, was studied in depth by Swiss psychologist Theodore Flounoy in a now-classic work of parapsychology, From India to the Planet Mars, originally released in 1899. Operating as a medium in Geneva, Helène Smith (as Muller was called by Flounoy in his book) allowed the psychologist to sit in and observe her as she took her followers on various flights of fantasy. She actually visited Mars in out-of-body-like experiences and described in some depth the Martian civilization, especially the fabled canals. In the end she even produced a Martian language, which, when analyzed, showed a remarkable dependency on French.

As with later contact claims, the material reported by both Swedenborg and Smith/Muller raise the central issue that must be faced in analyzing contactees. Contact is made by psychic means, it most often occurs in a religious/spiritual context, and the information derived from the contact is a mixture of reputed observation about the science and culture of the alien's planet with an emphasis on their philosophical/theological and moral/ethical teachings. The literature draws upon the current state of popular knowledge of science (with little understanding of or appreciation for the scientific endeavor). While appearing to report observations in a somewhat objective fashion, in the end, the conclusions drawn are metaphysical. When contactees initiated their activity outside of a religious setting, following any measurable response, they have tended to form a religious organization as a vehicle for communicating the message of the extraterrestrials. [Many contactees avoid any mention of religion, preferring to distinguish their work from traditional church organizations by using the alternate term "spiritual." However, the great majority of contactee organizations provide their adherents with all of the functions that churches and other religious groups commonly offer their members. These services would include fellowship with like-minded believers, wedding and funeral services, some contact with a transcendent realm, information on the nature of ultimate reality, a means of coming into contact with the transcendent, moral guidelines, and some advice for the adherent's personal life.]

Through the twentieth century, the number of claims of extraterrestrial contact increased and at times in the 1930s and 1940s blended imperceptibly into science fiction literature. Most contacts were made in the context of one of the metaphysical religions, either Spiritualism or Theosophy. Helena Petrovna Blavatsky (1831–1891), cofounder of the Theosophical Society, for example, proposed the existence of a group of evolved masters she termed the "Lords of the flame," who resided on Venus. Blavatsky, who had formerly operated as a Spiritualist medium, claimed to have regular contact with a large group of evolved beings believed to guide the evolution of human life. Contact was normally through the materialization of messages reputedly from these ascended masters, though clairvoyant/telepathic contact also occurred. Blavatsky was plagued the last years of her life with significant charges of fraud, and during the twentieth century, those who established contact with the Masters did so as more traditional mediums/channels, though they tended to use self-descriptive terms that served to separate them from Spiritualist mediums. Most notable of the Theosophical channels were Alice A. Bailey and Helena Roerich. Both established with one of the masters originally named by Blavatsky as members of the spiritual hierarchy, the Great White Brotherhood, and later published a series of books containing the communications from that master.

In the 1930s, a new contact with the masters was made by Guy W. Ballard. Unlike Bailey and Roerich, who confined their contacts primarily to a single master, Ballard claimed to be in touch with the whole range of ascended masters, including a group of masters from Venus, though the majority of messages came from either the master saint Germain or the master Jesus. Ballard, who described himself as a messenger of the masters, also held public meetings during which he allowed one or more of the masters to speak through him. These sessions appeared much like the spirit discourses that had been delivered by Spiritualist mediums in previous decades. Although Ballard described himself, his wife Edna Ballard, and his son Donald as the only authorized messengers of the Masters, soon after the formation of the "I AM" Religious Activity, others came forward to claim contact with the same masters, to offer supplemental revelations and eventually to create competing organizations. Ballard and the "I AM" would become important to the contactee movement as it finally emerged in the 1950s because it offered an alternative model to Spiritualism in which individuals could structure their encounters with extraterrestrials. In fact, in the same way that theosophists spoke of the masters as being organized into a spiritual hierarchy, so contactees would speak of their contacts as being members of a space or interstellar hierarchy. That hierarchy would, strangely enough, often be inhabited by beings who had the same names as the ascended masters originally mentioned by Blavatsky or Ballard.

The New Era

A new era of contact with extraterrestrials began in 1952 with the announcement of George Adamski (1891–1965), an amateur astronomer from Southern California, that he had established communication with the beings who inhabited the spaceships that were being popularly referred to as flying saucers. Actually, Adamski claimed to have first seen a space ship in 1946; in 1950 he had produced two pictures which he claimed to have taken of flying saucers. These were published in Fate, the original periodical featuring news of UFOs. However, on November 20, 1952, he and six companions drove to a location in the desert in southeastern California where Adamski, now separated from the others, claimed to have seen a saucer land. A handsome blond humanoid figure disembarked from the saucer. Through a mixture of telepathy, sign language, and gestures, the extraterrestrial communicated that he was from Venus and that he had come to Earth out of concern over the destructive potential of atomic weapons.

Adamski's contact story was published in a book, Flying Saucers Have Landed (which also included a text on historical UFOs by Desmond Leslie). He would go on to write two further accounts of his interaction with visitors from Mars and Saturn and his own travels in outer space, capped by a view of the thriving life on the backside of the moon. Adamski's success quickly called forth additional stories from Truman Betherum, Orfeo Angelucci, Howard Menger, and Daniel Fry, all of whom claimed to have also met benevolent humanoids from space. Their reports were met with enthusiastic acceptance from one group while receiving across-the-board rejection from serious students attempting to understand the flying saucer phenomena. Ufologists had little sympathy for the religious feeling that the contactees aroused, and believing the stories detracted from their scientific endeavor, tended to dismiss contactees as frauds and kooks.

The contactees went about the business of organizing followers into proto-religious groupings. Thus, while leading critics and supporters of Adamski conducted a public debate on the truth of his contact claims and the accuracy of his information about the planets, Adamski quietly invited his supporters into study groups and gave them copies of lessons he had authored on such topics as cosmic philosophy and telepathy. Eventually people would become aware of Adamski's career prior to his becoming a contactee as an occult teacher and founder of the Royal Order of Tibet.

The great majority of the contactees organized spiritual/religious groups. Some, such as the New Age Foundation established by Wayne Aho or the Sanctuary of Thought launched by Truman Betherum, had little success and folded soon after the death of their leader. More successful were Unarius, founded by former Spiritualist mediums Ruth and Ernest Norman, the Aetherius Society, founded by British contactee George King, and the I AM Nation, founded by a group of contactees in Florida. Each of these organizations produced a large body of occult literature and have survived to the present under a second generation of leadership.

Among the most interesting of the contactee myths was that of Ashtar, the spaceship commander originally contacted and introduced to the world by George Van Tassel (1910–1970). Van Tasel enjoyed some success as the organizer of the annual convention of contactees, the Giant Rock Interplanetary Spacecraft Convention, but less success with his College of Universal Wisdom and his attempt to build the Integratron, a large building that would contain a rejuvenation machine. Today, the Integratron building stands unfinished at Giant Rock. However, as Van Tassel faded from the contactee scene, other contactees began to claim contact with Ashtar and in the 1980s, speaking through Tuella (public name of Thelma B. Turrell), the founder of Guardian Action, Ashtar would enjoy success never experienced even at the height of Van Tassel's career in the 1960s. Today, the Ashtar Command exists as a set of contactee groups, each continuing the themes initiated four decades previously.

The progress of the contactee community was not affected by the ups and downs of the Condon Report that almost destroyed ufology, and the contactee groups continued their spiritual relationship to the space brothers and could wait for the rest of the world to finally discover their truths. While the structures of the older contactees would persist through the remaining decades of the twentieth century, the contactee phenomena would experience a significant growth in the 1970s and 1980s from two unexpected sources.

Contactees and Abductees

As early as 1965, ufologists were entertained with accounts of people who claimed to have been abducted by the entities from extraterrestrial craft. The first of importance was the story of Brazilian Antonio Villas-Boas, who in 1958 claimed that he had been taken aboard a landed flying saucer, had blood drawn from him, and was forced to engage in sex with an alien female. The account of the case did not circulate until 1965, when John G. Fuller was researching the similar story of Barney and Betty Hill. His book, The Interrupted Journey (1966), told how the Hills, driving home through the mountains of New Hampshire, saw a UFO, made note of their sighting, but then arrived home two hours later than they should have. In the weeks following the sighting, their life filled with stress that finally led them to a psychiatrist. He hypnotized the pair, and they told the story of encountering a group of entities, with gray skin and large heads with large eyes, diminutive noses, and almost no ears. They were taken into the saucer and underwent a medical examination (including the insertion of a needle in Betty's stomach). An abridgement of Fuller's book appeared in the October 1966 Look Magazine, but the relative dearth of other similar cases meant that the Hill case was placed on the shelf for a decade.

In the 1970s, a series of abduction stories began with the abduction of Charles Hickson and Calvin Parker in 1973 in Pascagoula, Mississippi. It was unusual in that it occurred during a wave of UFO sightings (commonly referred to as a flap). Other less publicized cases also occurred at the same time. A Utah woman, Betty Roach, would be the first of many who had no conscious memory of what had happened to her, but like the Hills would later recount the story of an abduction and medical examination under hypnosis. In 1975, six woodcutters saw a fellow worker, Travis Walton, taken aboard a UFO. Walton disappeared for five days and told a story later turned into a Hollywood movie.

During the late 1970s a number of cases of abduction were reported and a few, such as Betty Andreasson's, were taken seriously by ufological investigators. During the 1980s, the study of abductions emerged as the wave of the future in UFO studies, a discipline that survived only with the hope that it might lead to the discovery of an extraterrestrial causation behind the varied phenomena. Amateur researcher Budd Hopkins took center stage with the first published study of the abduction accounts, Missing Time (1981). The legitimacy of these stories was given a significant boost by the 1987 book Communion by horror fiction author Whitley Strieber, who told of his multiple abductions, medical examinations and memories recovered by hypnosis. His account hit the bestseller lists and brought the discussion of abductions into the popular culture. UFO debunker Philip Klass finally felt the abduction phenomenon deserving of a comprehensive refutation. He dismissed them as a combination of fantasy and hypnotic confabulation.

However, Klass wrote just as the abduction dam was about to break. Folklorist Thomas Bullard released his massive study of 300 abduction cases which established the overall patterns of the cases. Historian-turned-believer David Jacobs published the study of cases he had personally investigated in 1992, the same year a number of ufologists and others interested in abductions met in Cambridge, Massachusetts, called together by psychiatrist John E. Mack, an adjunct professor at Harvard University. For several years Mack had been counseling abductees and gave some credence to their stories. The conference proceedings were published along with a shorter journalistic summary of the papers and discussion, both leading to Mack's important 1994 book, Abduction, which joined Budd Hopkins' writings as the prime statements of the abduction case.

Abductions continue to be investigated by ufologists, though the enthusiasm for the accounts definitely peaked in the mid-1990s. Although abduction stories continue to provide a rich mine of material for social scientists, they have not produced the hoped-for breakthrough in unraveling the UFO mystery. The physical evidence—items recovered from the abductees—cited in the early 1990s failed to produce any meaningful data.

An additional important factor deflating interest in abductees among ufologists was the growing association of the abduction stories with contactee stories. In 1980, counseling psychologist and hypnotherapist R. Leo Sprinkle of the University of Wyoming began holding annual gatherings of contactees, those people who believed themselves in contact, telepathic and otherwise, with benevolent space beings. The gatherings were conducted in a positive, accepting environment. However, through the decade, as word of the gathering circulated, abductees began to make their way to the gathering and the boundaries between those who initially had positive contacts with extraterrestrials and those who had negative contacts began to fade. There was a marked tendency for abduction stories to transform into contactee accounts.

The popularity of Whitley Strieber's account of his abduction became a two edged sword for the UFO community. Strieber began to see his interaction with the space people in a more positive light, and in spite of the trauma he had initially experienced, he began to interpret his multiple contacts as part of an effort to educate humanity. By the end of the 1980s, he and the ufologists had parted company, and he established an organization, the Communion Foundation, to work toward a productive relationship with the alien visitors. Subsequent books, Transformation (1988) and The Secret School: Preparation for Contact (1996), document his own transformation into a contactee.

As the life histories of abductees became known, and the stories such as Strieber's of a lifetime of contact that began in childhood surfaced, investigators searched for larger meanings. Those with psychological training saw the transformative and initiatory nature of the experiences and the manner in which they forced people into a more cosmopolitan view of their place in the universe. By the time John Mack's long-awaited book appeared in 1994, it went on the shelves of the New Age bookstores next to the shelf of contactee books. Through the 1990s a variety of people began to look at the metaphysical and philosophical implications of the abduction phenomena and seriously began suggesting paranormal explanations for the phenomena surrounding the stories. Such approaches did away with extraterrestrials and had no need of physical space craft. They quickly returned to the warnings of the 1950s contactees about the apocalyptic conditions facing humanity, now rushing to destruction at breakneck speed. Alien contact was an urgent message for humankind to reverse its course.

The New Age Movement

At the same time that ufologists were discovering and reorienting their work around the abduction phenomenon, the New Age community emerged as the nurturing community for a new generation of channelers. New Age channelers brought forth a mountain of material, from a variety of transcendent entities from ascended masters to the spirits of the recently deceased, to vague entities masquerading as the channeler's own higher self. However, it became evident to those who began to survey the channeling literature that the largest recognizable block of channeled literature derived from entities who described themselves as extraterrestrials. Much of this literature continued contact with the space commanders who had made their original appearances in the 1950s, and the members of the redefined theosophical hierarchy now seen as administrators of an immense intergalactic government.

Within a few years after Ashtar and members of his command had been introduced to the world through George Van Tassel, he began to speak through other channelers. The messages received by Trevor James Constable and published in his 1958 volume They Live in the Sky were among the first. Through the 1970s a variety of channels from around the English-speaking world heard from Ashtar, and in the 1980s his most prominent voice, Thelma B. Turrell, had no problem assembling representative messages from him in her compilation, Ashtar: A Tribute. Turrell went on to head Guardian Action, the most prominent post in the Ashtar Command, though in the wake of Turrell's death, a number of competing outposts have arisen.

Forming a link between the ufological community and the New Age was Swiss contactee Eduard Albert Meier, a contactee whose career has paralleled that of George Adamski. In 1979, Meier's coffee-table book, UFO. . . Contact from the Pleiades, was released in an English-language edition. While ufologists were offended by what they quickly came to see as an elaborate hoax, a number of amateur UFO buffs were attracted to the evidence of the impressive pictures. Meier's basic claim was that on the afternoon of January 28, 1975, he had seen a flying saucer land. From it a beautiful woman named Semjase came forth and engaged him in conversation for an hour and a half. She told him that she was from a people that had originated on a planet in the constellation Lyra, but that a war had driven her people to Pleiades. Along the way, the Pleiadians had discovered Earth and periodically visited it. In fact, some had settled here and intermarried with humans, then in a rather primitive state. In subsequent visits with Semjase, Meier would take many photographs and even rides in the space ships. Inventor/consultant Fred Bell would also claim meeting with Semjase from which he derived plans for the flying saucers and other bits of advanced technology.

From the very beginning, Semjase's message had distinct religious overtones. She denounced the established religions and called Meier's attention to the Laws of Creation, an interplanetary alternative to the Ten Commandments. Meier went about building a classic contactee spiritual community, the Freie Interessengemeinschaft für Grenz und geistes Wissenschaften and Ufologie Studien (Free Community of Interests in the Border and Spiritual Sciences and UFO Studies), the American branch of which was known more simply as the Semjase Silver Star Center. Amid the many books designed simply to present his claims for contact, a lesser-known set of books, designed primarily to circulate among his followers, outlined his moral/religious message. Basic to that message, known as the Ten Bids (analogous to the Ten Commandments) are the ten things Creation bids us to do.

The attacks upon Meier's credibility were somewhat lost amid the flood of material supportive of his claims, including more than a dozen books, most beautifully illustrated with photos. Meier also released several amateurish videos. Through the 1980s these materials circulated among UFO buffs, but found an even larger audience within the New Age community. They associated the Pleiades as the home for the visitors from outer space, and thus it is not surprising that by the end of the 1980s, a series of books otherwise unconnected to Meier and his supporters began to appear containing messages channeled from entities from the Pleiades. Among the first was from astrologer channel Barbara Hand Clow, Heart of the Christos: Starseeding from the Pleiades (1989), though by far the most popular item was Barbara Marciniack's Bringers of the Dawn: Teachings from the Pleiadians, which appeared in 1992. Other channelers who claim to be in touch with the Pleiadians include Susan Drew, Amorah Quan Yin, Nina Jenice, and Australian channel Jani King.

Quite apart from channels united by their contact with the Pleiadians, a popular community of channelers has been brought together by Sedona Magazine, a channeling-oriented monthly with issues built around short excerpts, arranged by topic, from a host of channelers. Here messages from the space brothers mix harmoniously with messages from ascended masters and other entities who have taken the lead in the post-New Age era of spiritual emergence. Frequently, flying saucer entities will speak through the same channeler who at other times might channel ascended masters from the Great White Brotherhood. Prominent among the extraterrestrial entities in the current generation are Zoosh and Jopah (channeled by Robert Shapiro), and Zwoosh (Bob Fickles). Also, collective voices speak from groups such as the Assembly of Light, the Council of Twelve, and the Planetary Council. Lyssa Royal, who channels a variety of different entities, has emerged out of the group as possibly the most successful of the Sedona cadre.

As the New Age Movement faded in the early 1990s, a new wave of contactees have come to the fore amid a new generation of prophets offering guidance for the twenty-first century and claiming revelation from a range of paranormal sources. In spite of challenges to the entire channeling enterprise from the skeptical community, they are enjoying a popularity never dreamed of by the first wave of contactees. They have built a community of support upon the broadly held belief that extraterrestrial life exists somewhere and the still significant community of people who believe that UFOs may be extraterrestrial craft. Contactees channel beings who originate on planets far beyond the reach of contemporary science and speak messages of religious and moral guidance. They have almost nothing to say about the science behind their extraterrestrial travel and even use a most nontechnical language when discussing the process of channeling itself. Like the words of the angels who visited past generations, the spiritual admonitions of the extraterrestrials must be accepted upon faith (there being no evidence to back up the claims of the channeled entities). Most importantly, their accounts of life on their home planet is not susceptible to possible falsification, a major flaw of the early contactees whose descriptions of Venus, Mars, and the Moon were disconfirmed even in their lifetime.

Sources:

Flounoy, Theodore. From India to the Planet Mars: A Study of a Case of Somnambulism with Glossalalia. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Klimo, Jon. Channeling Investigations on Receiving Information from Paranormal Sources. Berkeley: North Atlantic Books, 1998.

Lewis, James R., ed. The Gods Have Landed: New Religions from Other Worlds. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Meier, Eduard "Billy." Decalogue, or the Ten Bids. Alamogordo, N. Mex.: American Office: FIGU/Semjase Star Center, 1975.

Melton, J. Gordon. "Religious Reflections on UFO Stories: Contactee to Abductee." In Andrea Pritchard et al., eds. Alien Discussions: Proceedings of the Abduction Study Conference. Cambridge, Mass.: North Cambridge Press, 1994.

Steiger, Brad. Gods of Aquarius: UFOs and the Transformation of Man. New York: Harcourt Brace Javanovich, 1976.

Contact International

Former international UFO organization founded in Britain in 1967 by Brinsley Le Poer Trench (earl of Clancarty), the British peer who introduced the first debate on UFOs in the British House of Lords, the upper chamber of the British Parliament, on January 18, 1979. During the 1980s the organization had members in more than thirty countries. It published a quarterly journal, Awareness, containing UFO world reports and personal experiences, as well as a biannual UFO Register, which sought to present accurate information on UFO phenomena.

"Le Conte del Graal"

One of the "Quest" versions of the legend of the Holy Grail (Graal). It was the last of a series of works of medieval romance written by Chrétien de Troyes, a twelfth-century French writer. Chrétien favored the Arthurian legends and he wrote one volume on Lancelot and King Arthur's court that formed the background of several other books. Le Conte del Graal told how Perceval was reared to the life of a forester by his mother, but forsaking her became a member of the court of King Arthur. Perceval went forth as a knight-errant, and his numerous adventures are recited.

In the middle of the story, the adventures of Gauvain, another of the knights, are fully detailed. However, in the end Chrétien returns to Perceval, who ventures forth again and wanders about for five years in a godless state of mind. One Good Friday he meets with a band of pilgrims who remonstrate him for riding armed on a holy day, and he turns aside to confess to a hermit who turns out to be his uncle. From him he learns that only the sinless can find the Grail, and that he sinned in abandoning his mother and thus causing her death. He had also taken a lady, Balncheflor, but he never returned to her from his wanderings.

Le Conte del Graal was not completed, but copies were circulated, read, and deeply influenced later writers of the Arthurian tales, who developed the story of Perceval and filled in many details of the Graal legend. Chrétien never identifies the Graal, but its juxtaposition with Good Friday caused later authors to identify it with the cup of Christ's Last Supper.

Sources:

Chrétien de Troyes. Le Conte del Graal (Perceval). Edited by Félix Lecoy. Paris: Champion, 1973.

Lacy, Norris J., ed. The Arthurian Encyclopedia. New York: Garland Publishing, 1986.

Control

A term designating the spirit entity that works with a medium from "the other side" and who takes charge of the séance proceedings while the medium is in a trance. This operator might also be called a guide. Generally, the term implies enduring attendance by a distinct and continuous personality who uses the entranced medium's body. Some controls, such as Arthur Ford's "Fletcher," became almost as famous as the medium. In some ways, the control resembles the regular entities that speak through channels and deliver a body of teachings. In fact, controls often deliver a brief message at the beginning of séances, but their primary function is to direct the orderly contact of various spirit entities with the people present. The apparent motive of controls is to do good, to be of service, and to work out their salvation.

Spiritualists, who view the medium as a bridge to a lively world of spirit entities, believe the control performs a variety of functions during the séance: delivering direct or relayed messages to sitters, keeping order among those who rushed to the "light" (emanating from the "other side"), keeping away undeveloped or evil spirits, and occasionally getting out of the way to allow the entity to communicate directly to others.

Spiritualists claim that the body of the medium is an instrument that requires considerable practice in efficient handling. The control is a communication expert that watches over the fluency of the proceedings and often steps in to explain or repeat unintelligible expressions. The conversational aspect of the séances is largely due to the control's presence.

The nature of the control entity and the manner in which the control functions remains unclear. There are, of course, a variety of opinions on exactly what a control is. Today, many non-Spiritualists, especially psychological scientists, consider the control a part of the medium's personality. Others—even more skeptical in light of the significant amount of fraud found among mediums in the early twentieth century—tend to write off controls as mundane creations of mediums. Spiritualists suggest that the controls' long-term attendance of mediums is considered on the other side as a kind of missionary work, or as an occasional opportunity for experimental research.

Some of the most critical pieces of evidence to be considered in assessing the nature of spirit controls suggest that some entities at séances may be artificial personalities created from the unconscious attitudes and thoughts of the sitters. In September 1972, a group of experimenters at the Toronto Society for Psychical Research in Canada created an artificial entity named "Philip" by meditating on his history, characteristics, and appearance as decided on by the group. After negative results for nearly a year, the group adopted the conventional Spiritualist séance method and soon received messages from Philip through table rapping. Some spirit guides and controls are obviously synthetic and illusory, as in the deliberate creation of Philip; however, it may be that the momentary acceptance of them as real personalities can favorably influence paranormal phenomena.

The Human Qualities of Controls

There is a human element in the process of establishing a control's presence. Among the spirit entities, there may be a struggle for the post, and an established control may be replaced by another, as witnessed in the case of Leonora Piper. The struggle for control is often conveyed to the medium by broken communications and spasmodic movements of the hand or of the traveler on the ouija board.

The character and limitation of the controls also bear the human stamp. They may have a large experience in life in the beyond, yet, in answer to questions, they often confess ignorance and reply that they will inquire from another who knows. They tend to be patient, and during the days of physical phenomena were ready to produce such phenomena to the sitters' satisfaction. But they seem adverse to taking orders; they expect courteous treatment, appreciation for what they do, and have their own caprices. Often they bring a religious atmosphere but few of them seem of saintly disposition. "Walter," the control of Mina Crandon (Margery) cursed freely if something displeased him and sent cantankerous objectors to the devil. In his righteous indignation against Houdini he accused him of cheating, swore terribly, called down curses on his head, and used the most fearful language.

"Eyen," the Egyptian control of Mrs. Travers Smith (Hester Dowden), who claimed to have been a priest of Isis in the reign of Ramses II, also cursed and swore in verse against a member of the circle who drove him out by hypnotic suggestion given to the medium. "Peter," another control of Smith, was similar to "Walter," in that he attached himself to the circle to satisfy his own curiosity and conduct psychical experiments from the other side. He was excellent in devising tests, but otherwise his character left little to be desired.

The power of constant controls is usually greater than that of incidental communicators, and often appears to be specific. "I have only power for voices," said Cristo d'Angelo, when he was requested to be the control at the Rossi sittings. This is a curious parallel with similar limitations on the part of mediums and supports the theory that the control, in relation to other spirits, is just as psychic as the medium in relation to the sitters. For instance, in Cristo d'Angelo's case some spirits, if too weak to reach the sitter on their own voice vibrations, came through that of the control, which resulted in a blending of accent and occasional predomination of the timbre of the control.

During the period when mediums were under widespread scrutiny, the controls became central to physical effects (an understanding of which has to be integrated with the belief that the majority of the physical mediums were discovered in some form of fraud). Consequently, the controls often had helpers (some would term them "confederates"), other spirits who prepared difficult physical phenomena while a message was being delivered. These helpers sometimes assisted in the control as well, increasing the coherence of the messages.

Many instances of blunders by controls were recorded in the scripts of Stainton Moses. Once, heavy volumes of phosphoric smoke were produced, scaring the medium as he was enveloped in fire. It was explained afterward that an accident happened during the production of the psychic lights (see luminous phenomena). Another time, a perfume-producing experiment miscarried and the sitters were driven out of the room by an unbearable stench.

Sometimes harm reportedly occurred to the medium because of the control's negligence or careless overdraft of power. Occasionally controls failed in their capacity as doorkeepers and undesirable, malignant elements invaded the séance room. In such cases they immediately ordered the closing of the sitting. When the medium awakened from trance, the control disappeared. The control could not communicate anymore but might be watchful and desirous of sending a message. Mrs. Piper occasionally received such messages through her own entranced daughters.

The presence of the control was made known by various means. The voice in direct speaking, the character of the handwriting or the sensation experienced in automatic writing, the peculiar style of rapping or tilting of the table, or mannerisms disclosed the control's identity. Physiological observations may have also furnished proof. Sir Arthur Conan Doyle found that the pulse of medium John Tichnor beat 100 when controlled by "Colonel Lee," 118 when under the control of "Black Hawk," and 82 when normal.

A curious case of two controls conversing audibly, each using his own medium, was witnessed in the Mina Crandon séances when another medium, Miss Scott, also fell into trance. The control, "Walter," who was in charge of the séance from the other side, instructed the spirit of Mrs. Scott, mother of the medium, how to proceed, when to start and when to stop talking.

The Picturesque Element

The claims by controls of prior existence in human embodiment present another problem in assessing them. Most controls have claimed a distant and inconspicuous life that defies any verification. The control of D. D. Home always spoke in plural and never gave his name. Stainton Moses was attended by an organized band of controls that included biblical characters, philosophers, sages, and historic personalities. The biblical characters called themselves "Imperator" (Malachias), "Preceptor" (Elijah), "The Prophet" (Haggai), "Vates" (Daniel), "Ezekiel," "Theophilus" (St. John the Baptist), "Theosophus" (St. John the Apostle), and "Theologus" (St. John the Divine).

The philosophers and sages included a prestigious selection of the famous and a few unknowns: Solon, Plato, Aristotle, Seneca, Athenodorus (Doctor), Hippolytus (Rector), Plotinus (Prudens), Alexander Achillini (Philosophus), Algazzali or Ghazali (Mentor), Kabbila, Chom, Said, Roophal, and Magus. Moses was torn by doubts for a long time as to their identity and finally concluded that, "judging as I should wish to be judged myself they were what they pretended to be."

Imperator was one of the most ancient spirit controls, but he was preceded by nearly a thousand years by "Lady Nona" (the guide of "Rosemary"), who claimed to have lived in Egypt in the time of the pharaohs. "Black Hawk," the control of Evan Powell, insisted that a book had been published about him in America. In 1932 the book was found; it was printed in 1834 in Boston.

There are several instances in which the same control has manifested through different mediums. They have particular favors for one medium at a time, however, and on that medium's death the loss of power is passed on to another. "John King," who also claimed to have been Sir Henry Owen Morgan, the buccaneer king, first appeared in the Davenport séances and manifested at séances of other mediums for a long time, while "Katie King," his daughter, appeared to have passed on to a higher sphere after her farewell from Florence Cook. Katie, however, made an unexpected return to the circle of Dr. Glen Hamilton in 1932. Roy Stemman reported that Katie King materialized in Rome in July 1974 with the medium Fulvio Rendhell.

Native American Controls

Native Americans attained a special status within Spiritualist circles, so frequently did they act as controls. Spiritualism, in fact, presents one of the earliest attempts to build a positive image of Native Americans among the European-American public. These controls bore romantic or plain Indian names; for instance, "North Star" (Gladys Osborne Leonard), "Red Cloud" (Estelle Roberts), "White Feather" (John Sloan), "Greyfeather" (J. B. Johnson), "Grey Wolf" (Hazel Ridley), "Bright Eyes" (May Pepper), "Red Crow" (F. F. Craddock), "Black Hawk" (Evan Powell), "Black Foot" (John Myers), "Red Jacket" (Dr. C. T. Buffum) and Emily French, "Old John" and "Big Bear" (Dr. Charles B. Kenney), "Hawk Chief" and "Kokum" (George Valiantine), "Moonstone" (Alfred Vout Peters), "Tecumseh" (W. H. Powell), and "Segaske" (T. d'Aute Hopper). Few Native American guides surpassed the fame of "White Eagle" and "Silver Birch," the controls of two famous British mediums, Grace Cooke and Maurice Barbanell, respectively.

Other nationalities, primarily those identified as cultures that taught the ancient wisdom, were also frequently encountered, such as "Tien-Sen-Tie" (the Chinese guide of J. J. Morse), "Eyen" (an Egyptian guide of Hester Dowden), and "Feda" (the Asian Indian guide of Gladys Leonard. In addition, Hooper was attended by a fakir, Annie Brittain by a Senegalese child, and Eileen Garrett by an Arab control. Nevertheless, Native American controls were in the majority.

In spirit photographs Native American controls followed popular images and appeared in scalp locks and tribal robes. Their chief organizer was said to have been John King, but before the appearance of the romantic buccaneer the first Indian controls manifested in the Shaker communities in America. They came collectively as a tribe. A knock was heard at the door and when the spirits were invited they possessed everyone. Indian shouts echoed in the house; the obsessed spoke Native languages among themselves and danced Native American dances.

The Native American spirits did not deliver any teaching. On the contrary, the Shakers came to the conclusion that they had to teach and convert the spirits. The Shakers' work was the beginning of what later became known in Spiritualist groups as a rescue circle. The visits continued from 1837 to 1844. When the spirits left, they informed their teachers that they would return soon and invade the world, entering palaces and cottages. But generally the Native American controls restricted their activity to physical manifestations.

E. W. Wallis, coauthor with M. H. Wallis of Guide to Mediumship, writes:

"Many Indian spirits become true and faithful friends. They act as protectors—"doorkeepers" so to speak—to their mediums. They do the hard work of development in the circle and prevent the intrusion of undesirable spirits. Sometimes they are boisterous and exuberant in their operations and manifestations and while we do not share the prejudices which are expressed against them we think it is wise to exercise a restraining influence over their demonstrations. They generally possess strong healing power and frequently put their mediums through a course of calisthenic exercises—which, although beneficial to the health of the medium and, in the presence of a few friends, may pass without adverse comment, would probably cause criticism if performed in a public assembly."

Apart from Native Americans, and in light of contemporary discussion of the child as an element in the individual's subconscious self, children furnished the most interesting group of controls. The best known include "Feda" (Gladys Osborne Leonard), "Nelly" (Rosina Thompson), "Dewdrop" (Bessie Williams), "Sunshine" (Anne Meurig Morris), "Little Stasia" (Stanislawa Tomczyk), "Nina" and "Yolande" (Elizabeth d'Esperance), "Belle" (Annie Brittain), "Bell" (Florence Perriman), "Harmony" (Sussannah Harris), "Snow Drop" (Maud Lord Drake), and "Pocka" Miss C. E. Wood).

Before Emanuel Swedenborg, the human element was largely lacking in spirit contact. Paracelsus, for example, communed with elemental creatures; the spirits seen in the "shew stone"of John Dee were not identified with men; and sleepwalkers believed themselves to be possessed by the devil or by the Lord. The first controls as guiding spirits appeared in the experiments of G. P. Billot in France about 1820. The spirits possessing his mediums claimed to be their guardian angels. Some controls claim to be pure spirits (never incarnated), such as "Little Stasia" of Stanislawa Tomczyk and "Nona" of Lujza Linczegh Ignath.

Control by the Living

In several recorded cases the messages delivered by the medium were proved to have emanated from living individuals. This introduces the important question of whether the living can act as controls. It was found that messages from the living often came without their knowledge, in most cases when they were asleep. This would suggest that occasionally the spirit entity communicating might also be unconscious of doing so—it might be dreaming through the medium. The repeated statements of Mrs. Piper's controls that they have to enter a dream state to communicate have a curious bearing on this idea.

The Frenchman Allan Kardec and American John Edmonds were the first to state that spirit communications may emanate from the living. In his Spiritual Tracts (October 24, 1857), Edmonds writes:

"One day while I was at West Roxbury there came to me through Laura [his daughter] as a medium, the spirit of one with whom I had once been well acquainted, but from whom I had been separated some fifteen years. His was a very peculiar character—one unlike that of any other man whom I ever knew, and so strongly marked that it was not easy to mistake his identity. I had not seen him for several years; he was not at all in my mind at the time, and he was unknown to the medium. Yet he identified himself unmistakably, not only by his peculiar characteristics, but by referring to matters known only to him and me. I took it for granted he was dead, and was surprised afterwards to learn that he was not. He is yet living. . . . I have known since then many similar manifestations so that I can no longer doubt the fact that at times our communications are from the spirits of the living as well as the dead."

Other interesting cases may be found in E. K. Bates's Seen and Unseen (1907), M. Monteith's The Fringe of Immortality (1920), A. N. Aksakov's Animismus und Spiritismus (1890), and Florence Marryat's There Is No Death (1892).

In one instance the spirit of Florence Marryat was summoned while she was asleep. In the experience of the author, the spirits of the living invariably beg to be sent back or permitted to go, as if they were chained by the will of the medium. Among her own mediumistic gifts Marryat claimed the power to summon the spirits of the living.

Some early clairvoyants suggested that the only perceptible difference between the spirits of the living and those of the dead was that a delicate line of light appears to proceed from the latter, apparently uniting it with the distant physical body. Some modern clairvoyants claimed to have discovered another distinction. The spirit incarnate appears lifeless, dead, statuelike, whereas the discarnate one is intensely alive.

Catherine Berry writes in Experiences in Spiritualism (1876):

"The table presently began rolling in a most extraordinary manner, so that we could scarcely keep it down. We asked what was the matter and it spelled out 'We have buoyed the cable and shall be home in three days.' We did not know what this meant. Someone suggested that we should ask the name which it gave. A gentleman then present at once said 'Are you Alfred?' Answer: 'Yes.' 'Then you are on board the Great Eastern?' 'Yes.' 'Then you are all safe?' 'Yes.' At this time, I should say, the vessel had not been heard of for ten days or a fortnight; and exactly at the end of three days the vessel arrived. This spirit "Alfred" was in the flesh at the time and is now; and though he has been questioned he has no knowledge of the circumstance or of having desired to send us such a communication."

The story of a communication by raps from a living man is told in the Revue Spirite, January 1911 by a Mrs. Bardelia. This medium reported the occurrence took place under the observation of Gustave Le Bon. It happened in 1908 in St. Petersburg. The manager of the hotel where the medium was staying asked for the favor of a séance. He was eager to get a message from his father, who had recently died. The manager was dissatisfied when, with the aid of the alphabet, the first raps spelled out a name quite different from the one he expected. The family name shortly followed, and he exclaimed, "Why, that is the name of my best friend; but he is certainly not dead, for I just lately heard from him from a hotel in Moscow, where he is employed." Both the manager and the medium were surprised, and Bardelia sought further information. The spirit confided, "I am not dead, but in a state of coma; I shall die tonight." The manager asked, "Are you at your hotel?" "No, at the hospital," was the reply. The raps ceased.

The manager, still skeptical, announced his intention of immediately telephoning to Moscow to verifying the message. About an hour later he returned, very pale and greatly excited. A hotel spokesman said that, delirious and dying, his friend had been moved to the hospital that morning and was not expected to live through the night.

Mrs. J. H. Conant, an American medium, could manifest through other mediums while her body was in trance and under spirit control.

Wsevolod Solowiof, a well-known Russian writer, and automatist who usually produced mirror scripts, on one occasion wrote the name "Vera." On inquiry it was elicited that a relative of his was communicating. "Yes; I sleep, but I am here, and I have come to tell you that we shall meet tomorrow in the summer gardens." This came to pass. Moreover, the young girl told her family that she dreamed of visiting her cousin and of having told him of their meeting.

Hereward Carrington, in his introduction to Sylvan J. Muldoon's The Projection of the Astral Body (1929), narrates his personal attempt at projection—to appear to a certain young lady, an accomplished pianist, with a phenomenal musical memory:

"One day, I asked her if she had ever heard of an old song, 'Sparrows Build,' made famous years ago by Jenny Lind, and a favourite of my childhood days. She stated that she never had. I said that I would get and send her a copy 'some time' as I thought she would like it. That was all that was said about it at the time and no particular importance was attached to it. A couple of nights later I attempted to appear to her, and as usual awoke in the morning without knowing whether my experiment had 'succeeded' or not. A little later I received a telephone call and the young lady in question informed me that I had appeared to her the night before—rather more vividly than usual—and that she had thereupon been seized with the impulse to write automatically—the result being a verse of poetry. That afternoon I called, was told of the experience, was shown the poetry and confess that I received quite a momentary thrill. The poetry consisted of the opening lines of the song 'When Sparrows Build,' absolutely accurate with the exception of one word."

The Gordon Davis case recorded by S. G. Soal in the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 35) is one of the more famous cases in all of psychical research. In a series of séances with Blanche Cooper in 1922, a voice came through which Soal recognized as that of Gordon Davis, an acquaintance who he believed had died in the war. Details about home and family were given in a very convincing manner. Three years later Soal met Davis, still quite alive. He knew nothing of the communications that were said to have come from him. Several similar cases are recorded by W. Leslie Curnow in a 1927 article in Psychic Science.

Shamar, the Hindu control of Hester Dowden, specialized in bringing communicators who were living. In one instance, the name of an intimate friend came through:

"He stated that he was not sound asleep and therefore the message would come in jerks, which it did. He said he was sitting before the fire in his drawing-room; no one else was in the room. I asked him to give my sister a message from me; he said, 'Sorry, I can't; I shall forget all this when I wake.' He then said goodbye and that he could not speak any more as he was getting more wakeful."

Sir Lawrence J. Jones, in his presidential address to the Society for Psychical Research in 1928, dwelt on the mediumship of Kate Wingfield, saying,

"On four different occasions my youngest girl, aged nine, purported to control during her sleep, speaking with great animation and very characteristically. In the first instance she was at Ripley, some fifteen miles from Wimbledon, where K. [Wingfield] was staying. Later at Valescure she was asleep either in the same house or in a neighbouring villa. On the first occasion the child was asked, after some conversation, "What about the sailor frock?" The answer came: "We went to a shop. Mummie just said, 'You get those things out. That is her tallness.' And they got them; nothing else to be done, no altering—they just sent them home. That's what I like."

This was a correct version of what had happened that afternoon. The child had been taken by her mother to London but none of us had been at Wimbledon that day, so K. and the other members of the circle only knew that there was a plan to buy a sailor frock. Here is Herbert's (the guide) comment,

"In many cases a spirit on our side is quite unable to tell if a person is dead, or unconscious, or merely sleeping, if the spirit is outside; for after death for some little time the cord hangs loosely before it is absorbed into the soulbody and often in sleep the slackness of the cord presents the same appearance."

This instance may be compared with the "Beard" case in Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 23), where Mr. Beard was described as having quite recently passed over at a sitting held some eight hours before his actual decease.

Mercy Phillimore (in Light, May 9, 1931) told of her experience in 1917 in a sitting with Naomi Bacon when a man was described whom she recognized as a living friend:

"The moment my mind realized his presence a certain ease seemed to invade the sitting and he took direct control of the medium. The control lasted between five and ten minutes, but before it ended the communicator requested me never to refer to the experience to him in his normal state. The facts communicated were found to be correct. In another sitting a year later the living friend again purported to be present. His communications were evidential."

In a direct voice séance given by William Cartheuser for the American Society for Psychical Research on October 26, 1926, Mrs. X, a lady acquaintance of Malcolm Bird received what she considered communication from her former father-in-law. He said that he died of a lung condition and had tried hard to impress Mrs. X the night before. He gave a correct description of what she was doing at that particular time. After the séance, Mrs. X found out that the communicator was alive and in great mental distress on the date of the séance (Psychic Research, 1927).

Alfred Vout Peters, the well-known London clairvoyant, had several similar experiences. On four separate occasions, Laura Finch ("Phygia") controlled Peters while she was in Paris in the body and he in London. She promised to do so if she could. "All who know her have been unanimous in declaring it was Phygia's own self speaking; her mannerism was there; things were said of which only she had cognisance, and when tests were agreed upon beforehand in the shape of certain phrases to be uttered they were invariably used" (Light September 2, 1899). On another occasion it was found that a control who manifested through Peters was alive in Africa.

Admiral J. G. Armstrong related (Light, April 25, 1931) that on one occasion while he was in London, his mother, who lived in Devonshire, spoke to him through a medium. She was asleep at the time and had the impression, on waking, of having made a long journey. During a naval conference in London a naval officer whom he had known many years prior similarly came through and advised him to protest against the reduction of the navy. He gave facts about his recent service. On inquiry Armstrong found out that the man was alive and served in the East. Allowing for the difference in time, it was likely he was sleeping at the hour of the communication.

There are some cases on record in which a materialized apparition was discovered to be living. Alfred Vout Peters saw, in a séance with Cecil Husk, the phantom of a friend who must have been at home asleep at the time. Others had similar experiences with the same medium. Stanley de Brath saw, on four occasions, the materialized face of a lady (then in India) of whom he had lost track. Afterward he received a letter from her. A Church of England clergyman saw the materialized face of his brother who was then living in South Africa (Light, 1903).

In the controversy that ensued, a correspondent wrote to Light of the materialization in the United States of General Sherman, who not only announced his identity, but also stated that he had just died. The general, however, who was at the time on his death bed, did not die until a day or two later.

Some mediums are claimed to have materialized animal phantoms. From a Spiritualist perspective, the question might arise, Is it not possible for animal spirits to control men in trance? The confession of Charles Albert Beare, a self-styled, bogus medium of Peckham, London (Daily Express, September 18, 1931), contains this curious passage:

"One night at Bermondsey . . . I saw a woman supposed to be controlled by an ape. She jumped on chairs, on the table and darted all over the room just like an ape—in fact, she had all the mannerism and characteristics of the ape. It was a horrifying performance, and when the woman came out of the control she had to be revived with water and by people beating her hands."

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Curnow, W. Leslie. "Spirits in the Flesh." Psychic Science (January 1927).

Marryat, Florence. There Is No Death. New York: John Lovell, 1891. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Moore, J. D. "A Medium Appearing in a Materialized Form." Facts 6 (March 1887).

Owen, Iris M., and Margaret Sparrow. Conjuring Up Philip. New York: Harper & Row, 1976.

Stemmen, Roy. Spirits and Spirit Worlds. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1975.

Convulsionaries of St. Médard

An extraordinary outbreak of convulsions and religious ecstasy occurred during the first half of the eighteenth century in the cemetery of St. Médard, Paris. It was initiated by the Jansenists, a religious group suffering much persecution at the hands of the government and the Church.

The outbreak began with a few isolated cases of miraculous healing. One was the case of a Mlle. Morsaron, a paralytic, who had for her confessor an enthusiastic Jansenist. He recommended that she seek the tomb of St. Francis de Paris in the cemetery of St. Médard. After she had gone there a few times, she recovered her health. The news spread abroad, and other cures followed.

Violent convulsions became a feature of the crisis that preceded these cures. At length, the healing of an unusually obstinate case at the tomb of St. Francis preceded by a crisis of more than ordinary severity, was the signal for a violent outburst of epidemic frenzy. People of both sexes and all ages began to visit.

People from the provinces helped to swell the ranks, until there was not a vacant foot of ground in the neighborhood of St. Médard. On January 27, 1732, the cemetery was closed by order of the king. On its closed gate a wit inscribed the lines.

De par le roi défense à Dieu
De faire miracle en ce lieu.

However, the king's ordinance did not put an end to the epidemic, which spread from Paris to many other towns. In 1741—ten years after its commencement—convulsionary healing seemed to have died away. In 1759, however, it reappeared in Paris with vigor. It disappeared once more the following year, although isolated examples persisted as late as 1787.

Sources:

Dingwall, E. J. Some Human Oddities. London: Home & Van Thal, 1947.

Conyers, Georgia

Through the 1990s, the small community of Conyers, Georgia, has been the scene of continuing apparitions of the Virgin Mary to a housewife, Nancy Fowler. The story began in February of 1987 when Fowler, then living in Atlanta, claimed to have seen Jesus Christ for the first time. Over the following months she received locutions, interior words, that spoke to various issues. Then in October of that year, she made a trip to Medjugorje, the small community in Bosnia where apparitions had been occurring to a group of youths since the beginning of the decade. While there, she heard Jesus call her to be his prophet. On November 30, He appeared again, in the form of "Divine Mercy," as He had appeared earlier in the century to Maria Faustina Kowalska, and engulfed in light. At this time she inquired, "What do You ask?" He answered, "To bear witness that I am the Living Son of God."

From that day, Jesus began to appear daily to Fowler. Then in January of 1988, she had an experience of being carried away to heaven. This experience would be repeated on several occasions. A few weeks later she for the first time saw the Virgin Mary, who also began to communicate regularly with her. These messages came to include messages on the 13th of each month, in remembrance of events at Fatima, Portugal, in 1917, concerning the situation in America, and confidential messages similar to the secrets of Fatima.

Around 1990 Fowler, who had confided the account of her experiences to very few people, moved to rural Conyers into a house with a large backyard. Once relocated, she was able to let the world know what had occurred, and crowds of people began to seek her out. The apparitions of Mary on the 13th have become the main times when thousands arrive. Two volumes of the most important early messages that were received were published in 1991 and 1992.

In 1992, the archbishop of Atlanta issued a cautious statement concerning the apparitions. Without making any judgments, he did not support the unofficial nature of the events at Conyers, requesting that no priest publicly identify with or serve the Eucharist at the site, and that no official pilgrimages be organized. He saw no reason at the time to launch an official investigation. A year later, a scientific team led by Dr. Ricardo Castanon, a professor of neuropsychophysiology at the Catholic University of Bolivia, subjected Fowler to a series of tests not unlike tests given to other recent claimants of extraordinary contact with the Virgin Mary and quite similar to those given to JZ Knight, who for 20 years has been channeling Ramtha, believed to be an enlightened master teacher. These tests suggested that Fowler was in fact entering various altered states of consciousness and was not suffering from any form of psychopathology.

The apparitions continued through the 1990s into the new century, and crowds are especially welcomed on the 13th of each month. Over the years, Fowler also claims to have seen several of the saints, Catherine Laborné and Theresa of Lisieaux, known to Roman Catholics as the Little Flower, as well as the famous stigmatist Padre Pio.

The Archdiocese of Atlanta has yet to pronounce an opinion on the apparitions.

Sources:

"To Bear Witness that I AM the Living Son of God." 2 vols. Newington, Va.: Our Loving Mother's Children, 1991, 1992.

Cook, Florence Eliza (1856–1904)

The famous British materialization medium whom physicist and chemist Sir William Crookes investigated. The popular story of her mediumship opens in 1871. She claimed to have seen spirits and heard voices in her childhood, but this was attributed to vivid imagination. When she was fifteen years of age and at a tea party with friends, table-turning was proposed. She at first refused to participate, but later, with her mother's permission, consented to the experiment. Extraordinary things were reported, including the table being unmanageable and Cook being levitated.

Next, while she and her mother sat at home, Florence's hand began to write, and a message came through in mirror (reversed) image. It said she should go to a certain bookseller and there inquire about the Dalston Association. A meeting would take place in a few days and there she would make the acquaintance of the editor of the newspaper The Spiritualist.

For some time afterward she gave séances for the Dalston Association. She attended a few materialization sittings of the mediums Frank Herne and Charles Williams and sat with Herne in her father's house. She soon gave up the Dalston séances because the manifestations became too strong and embarrassing for a public assembly. She was said to have been carried over the heads of the sitters, and invisible hands were said to have stripped her of her clothing. Mrs. Cook decided to allow her daughter to sit only at home.

Florence often became entranced and changed personalities, calling herself "Katie King," the daughter of John King (alias Henry Owen Morgan), the buccaneer. She promised to remain for three years and reveal many strange things. The promise was generously kept. The Hackney circle—composed of Florence, her parents, her two sisters who were also mediums, and Mary, the maid—soon became famous. The young and beautiful "Florrie" gave some private sittings to Charles Blackburn, a wealthy citizen of Manchester, and he guaranteed her an annual retaining fee so she should be free to give her services when required.

She was the first English medium who exhibited full materializations in good light. The first attempt by Katie King was made in April 1872. A face like a death mask was seen between the curtains of the cabinet. It is curious to note from Florence's letter to Mr. Harrison that Katie "told us that we must give her a bottle of phosphorescent oil because she could not get the phosphorus that was necessary from my body because my mediumship was not sufficiently developed." The bottle of oil was employed in the place of psychic light, and lit up Katie's face. At this stage of development the medium was still conscious. Later she passed into trance.

As time went on, increased facility and practice enabled Katie King to show herself more clearly. Her resemblance to the medium in the materialization attempts was soon noticed. To prove that she was distinct from Florence, Katie changed the color of her face to chocolate and then to jet black. Moreover, Katie King was different in stature, manner and personality. As further proof, the medium was tied by the sitters or sometimes by the spirits, in the cabinet.

Katie's Separate Existence

Sir William Crookes offered what was at the time considered decisive proof of Katie's separate existence. The report of his long series of experiments, conducted in the Cook home and in his own laboratory, was published in 1874. It aroused a storm of ridicule, sarcasm, and protests.

Prior to this, Crookes felt prompted to come before the public in defense of Florence Cook in a curious incident. On December 9, 1873, the earl and countess of Caithness and Count de Medina Pomar had been the guests of Mr. Cook. W. Volckman, one of the other guests present, became suspicious of Katie King during a séance, rushed forward, and seized her hand and then her waist. A struggle ensued in which two of the medium's friends went to Katie's aid. In the testimony of Henry Dumphy, a barrister, Katie appeared to lose her feet and legs and made a movement similar to that of a seal in water. She then glided out of Volckman's grip, leaving no trace of physical existence. According to Volckman, she was forcibly freed.

The incontestable fact, however, was that five minutes later when the excitement subsided and the cabinet was opened, Florence was found in black dress and boots with the tape tightly around her waist as at the beginning of the séance, the knot still sealed with the signet ring of the earl of Caithness. She was searched, but no trace of white drapery was found.

As a result of the ordeal the medium became ill, and Crookes came forward in three letters in the Spiritualist press citing his own experiences with her. In his first letter he states that when Katie stood before him in the house of a Mr. Luxmoore, he distinctly heard from behind the curtain Florence Cook's sobbing and moaning from the pangs of trance. The second and third letters contained accounts of séances held in Crookes's own house and at Hackney.

Describing how Katie took his arm when walking, he also noted:

". . . the temptation to repeat a recent celebrated experiment became almost irresistible. Feeling, however, that if I had not a spirit I had at all events a lady close to me, I asked her permission to clasp her in my arms so as to be able to verify the interesting observations which a bold experimentalist had recently somewhat verbosely recorded. Permission was graciously given and I accordingly did—well as any gentleman would do under the circumstances. Mr. Volckman will be pleased to know that I can corroborate his statement that the "ghost" (not "struggling" however) was as material as Miss Cook herself."

On March 12, 1874, Katie came to the opening of the curtain and summoned Crookes to the assistance of the medium. Katie was in white. Crookes went into the cabinet and found Cook, clad in her ordinary black velvet dress, lying across the sofa. Katie vanished.

Later, in May, Crookes actually saw the two forms together during the photographic experiments. To protect herself from the injuries of the flashlight, Cook, lying on the floor, muffled her face with a shawl. Crookes's account stated,

"I frequently drew the curtain on one side when Katie was standing near and it was a common thing for seven or eight of us in the laboratory to see Miss Cook and Katie at the same time under the full blaze of the electric light. We did not on these occasions actually see the face of the medium, because of the shawl, but we saw her hands and feet; we saw her move uneasily under the influence of the intense light and we heard her moan occasionally. I have one photograph of the two together, but Katie is seated in front of Miss Cook's head."

An account of a séance on March 29 furnishes further evidence for the simultaneous appearance of the two figures. Katie allowed Crookes to go into the cabinet. He described his experience:

"I went cautiously into the room, it being dark, and felt about for Miss Cook. I found her crouching on the floor. Kneeling down, I let air enter the phosphorus lamp, and by its light I saw the young lady dressed in black velvet as she had been in the early part of the evening, and to all appearances perfectly senseless; she did not move when I took her hand and held the light quite close to her face, but continued quietly breathing. Raising the lamp I looked around and saw Katie standing close behind Miss Cook. She was robed in flowing white drapery as we had seen her previously during the séance. Holding one of Miss Cook's hands in mine, and still kneeling, I passed the lamp up and down so as to illuminate Katie's whole figure, and satisfy myself thoroughly that I was really looking at the veritable Katie whom I had clasped in my arms a few minutes before and not at the phantasm of a disordered brain. She did not speak but moved her head and smiled in recognition. Three separate times did I carefully examine Miss Cook, crouching before me to be sure that the hand I held was that of a living woman, and three separate times did I turn the lamp to Katie and examine her with steadfast scrutiny until I had no doubt whatever of her objective realty."

He also noticed that a blister on Cook's neck was not to be found on Katie's neck, and that Katie's ears were not pierced for earrings, whereas Cook's were.

Of the many precautionary measures taken by Crookes to prevent fraud, the electrical test devised by Cromwell Varley was perhaps the most interesting. The medium was placed in an electric circuit connected with a resistance coil and a galvanometer. The movements of the galvanometer were shown in the outer room to the sitters on a large graduated scale. Had the medium removed the wires, the galvanometer would have shown violent fluctuations. Nothing suspicious occurred, yet Katie appeared, waved her arms, shook hands with her friends, and wrote in their presence.

As an additional test Crookes asked Katie to plunge her hands into a chemical solution. No deflection of the galvanometer was noticed. Had the wires been attached to Katie the solution would have modified the current.

On May 21, 1874, Crookes witnessed the farewell meeting between Cook and Katie behind the curtain. Katie woke Cook from her trance. The farewell was very moving. They were talking affectionately and the medium shed many tears. She never saw Katie again.

After Katie departed, another spirit form, "Marie," took her place. Marie, who danced and sang in a professional style, led to Cook's exposure. During a séance on January 9, 1880, Sir George Sitwell grabbed Marie, and she did not dissolve. She was found to be the medium, wearing only her underwear, corsets, and a flannel petticoat. The discarded pieces of garment were brought out of the cabinet by another sitter.

According to Marryat, following this exposure Cook declined to sit unless someone remained in the cabinet with her. On one occasion the duty fell to Marryat. She reported being tied to Cook with a stout rope and remaining thus fastened to her the whole evening. Marie appeared and sang and danced the same as before she was seized.

Because of the many trials she had to undergo, Cook, who from 1874 was known by her married name, Mrs. Elgie Corner, for some time gave up public mediumship. During 1899, on the invitation of the Sphinx Society, she sat under test conditions in Berlin.

Following Cook's death in 1904, her husband married her sister, Kate Cook, also a materialization medium.

Assessing Cook's Career: The Question of Fraud

The question of whether Florence Cook was a fraud has been hotly debated and is still a matter of some interest in parapsychological circles. The Sitwell exposure was the primary condemnatory evidence. However, much additional material for discussion has also been uncovered. For example, French researcher Camille Flammarion wrote in a satiric vein that the medium D. D. Home "gave it to me as his personal opinion that Miss Cook was only a skillful trickster and has shamefully deceived the eminent scientist, and as for mediums, why there was only one absolutely trustworthy and that was himself, Daniel Dunglas Home."

Crookes certainly never found the least sign of deception, and when he was notified of the death of Mrs. Corner, in a letter dated April 24, 1904, he expressed his deepest sympathy and declared again that the belief in an afterlife owed so much of its certainty to her mediumship.

Cook's phenomena, like those of Home (also investigated by Crookes), remain a baffling enigma. If one accepts Crookes's careful investigations at face value, the evidence that the materialization of Katie King was real seems conclusive: yet the possibility of a fully materialized phantom form with all the characteristics of a flesh-and-blood human being is difficult to accept, and suggests impersonation by one of Cook's sisters or another accomplice.

Over the years, increasing attention has been given to the hypothesis that Crookes was either highly incompetent or, more likely, infatuated with Florence Cook to a point that weakened his judgment or integrity. This position was supported by a new report published in 1964 by the Society for Psychical Research in London. In it is an account of a man who claimed to have known the medium, and said she admitted fraud to him. He further hinted that the medium had an affair with Crookes. Trevor Hall, in his book The Spiritualists (1962), hypothesized that Florence Cook was Crookes's mistress and that the great scientist tried to cover up the affair. Cook's supporters responded that such an accusation was highly speculative, and lacked firm evidence.

Crookes made no secret of his wonder at the beauty of the phantom Katie King, which appeared to have all the attributes of a living being. He admitted having embraced the phantom to verify his perception of the spirit form as flesh and blood. Obviously, these were things it would have been prudent to conceal if there was really an illicit affair in progress. Some have suggested that a more plausible case could be made for claiming that Crookes at first believed in the reality of Katie King but later had doubts.

By then he was embroiled in an embarrassing situation from which he could only extricate himself by insisting that his experiments Katie King was a genuine materialized spirit form. After the final séance with Katie King on May 21, 1874, Crookes avoided further psychical experimentation. He became reticent about the famous materializations and devoted himself to physics, his research culminating in his development of the radiometer and the Crookes tube.

Hall's book also raises valid doubts as to the genuineness of the Cook phenomena, notably in her association with the medium Mary Showers, a possible accomplice in fraud. Showers also claimed to elicit materialization of spirit forms, in particular the phantom "Florence Maple," which appeared to have the same substantiality as Cook's Katie King. Showers and Cook gave a joint demonstration at the Crookes home in March 1874, when the spirit forms Florence Maple and Katie King walked around the room linked arm in arm, laughing and talking like real human beings. The possibility of two materialization mediums demonstrating the phenomenon jointly at the same séance severely strains credulity.

Also present at this remarkable séance was Sergeant E. W. Cox, who expressed his grave reservations in a letter to The Spiritualist (May 15, 1874):

"I have seen the forms of Katie [King] and Florence [Maple] together in the full light, coming out from the room in which Miss Cook and Miss Showers were placed, walking about, talking, playing girlish tricks, patting us and pushing us. They were solid flesh and blood and bone. They breathed, and perspired, and ate, and wore a white head-dress and a white robe from neck to foot, made of cotton and woven by a loom. Not merely did they resemble their respective mediums, they were facsimiles of them—alike in face, hair, complexion, teeth, eyes, hands, and movements of the body. Unless he had been otherwise so informed, no person would have doubted for a moment that the two girls who had been placed behind the curtain were now standing in propiâ personâ before the curtain playing very prettily the character of ghost.

". . .But I have one piece of evidence that goes far to throw a doubt over the whole. At a sitting with Miss Showers a few days ago, the curtain, behind which the form of Florence [Maple] was exhibiting her face, was opened by a spectator ignorant of the conditions, and a peep behind the scenes was afforded to those present. I am bound, in the interests of truth and science, to say that I, as well as all the others, beheld revealed to us, not a form in front and a lady in the chair, but the chair was empty, and the lady herself at the curtain wearing the ghost head-dress, and dressed in her own black gown! Nor was she lying on the floor as some have surmised. When the head was thrust out between the curtain the eyes were turned up with the fixed stare which has been observed in the supposed Florence [Maple], but the eyes rapidly assumed their natural position when the exposure was made, and the hands were forthwith actively employed in trying to close the curtain, and in the struggle with the inspecting lady the spirit head-dress fell off. I was witness to it all, and the extraordinary scene that followed—the voice crying out 'You have killed my medium!'—an alarm which, by the bye, was quite needless, for she was neither killed or injured beyond the vexation of the discovery. She said in excuse that she was unconscious of what she had done, being [in] a state of trance."

Another letter by Cox to D. D. Home, on March 8, 1876 (cited in the entry on Mary Showers), strongly suggests that both Cook and her friend Showers were frauds. The evidence suggests but does not prove conclusively that Crookes was an accomplice.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

D'albe, E. E. Fournier. The Life of Sir William Crookes. London: T. F. Unwin Ltd., 1923.

Dingwall, E. J. The Critics' Dilemma. Dewsbury, England: The Author, 1966.

Hall, Trevor H. Florence Cook & William Crookes: A Footnote to an Enquiry. London: Tomorrow Publications, 1963.

———. The Spiritualists: The Story of Florence Cook and William Crookes. London, 1962. Reprint, New York: Helix Press, 1963. Reprinted as The Medium and the Scientist. 1984.

Marryat, Florence. There Is No Death. New York: John W. Lovell, 1891. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Medhurst, R. G. Crookes and the Spirit World: A Collection of Writing by or Concerning the Work of Sir William Crookes, O.M., F.R.S., in the Field of Psychical Research. London: Taplinger, 1972.

Medhurst, R. G., and K. M. Goldney. "William Crookes and the Physical Phenomena of Mediumship." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 54 (1964): 25.

Thouless, R. H. "Crookes and Cook." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 42 (1963).

Cook, Kate Selina (1859–1923)

One of the more famous British materialization mediums and sister of Florence Cook, Kate Cook was comparatively less known, as she sat more privately and did not undergo the same scrutiny as her sister.

Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace writes about a series of sittings he attended in My Life (1902):

". . . They took place in the rooms of Signor Randi, a miniature painter, living in Montague Place, W., in a large reception room, across one corner of which a curtain was hung and a chair placed inside for the medium. There were generally six or seven persons present. Miss Cook and her mother came from North London. Miss Cook always dressed in black, with a lace collar, she wore laced boots and had earrings in her ears.

"In a few minutes after she had entered the cabinet the curtains would be drawn apart and a white-robed female figure would appear and sometimes come out and stand close in front of the curtain. One after another she would beckon to us to come up. We then talked together, the form in whispers; I could look closely into her face, examine the features and hair, touch her hands and might even touch and examine her ears closely, which were not pierced for earrings. The figure had bare feet, was somewhat taller than Miss Cook, and though there was a general resemblance, was quite distinct in features, figure and hair.

"After half an hour or more this figure would retire, close the curtains and sometimes within a few seconds would say 'Come and look.' We then opened the curtains, turned up the lamp, and Miss Cook was found in trance in the chair, her black dress, laced boots, etc., in the most perfect order as when she arrived, while the full-grown, white-robed figure had totally disappeared."

Writing of a séance with Mrs. Ross in New York, Wallace adds:

"But what specially interested me was that two of the figures beckoned to me to come up to the cabinet. One was a beautifully-draped female figure, who took my hand, looked at me smilingly and on my appearing doubtful, said in a whisper that she had often met me at Miss Kate Cook's séances in London. She then let me feel her ears, as I had done before, to prove that she was not the medium. I then saw that she closely resembled the figure with whom I had often talked and joked at Signor Randi's, a fact known to no one in America."

Stainton Moses sat with Kate in 1878, and F. W. Myers sat with her a number of times between 1878 and 1882. Both were impressed with her performance.

In 1907, three years after her sister Florences's death, Kate married her widower. In 1923 she inherited what was left of the fortune wealthy Manchester citizen Charles Blackburn originally put at Florence's and then at Kate's disposal.

Sources:

Marryat, Florence. There Is No Death. New York: John W. Lovell, 1891. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Medhurst, R. G., and K. M. Goldney. "William Crookes and the Physical Phenomena of Mediumship." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 54 (1964): 25.

Wallace, Alfred Russel My Life: A Record of Events and Opinions. London: Chapman & Hall, 1902.

Cooke, Grace (d. 1979)

Modern British Spiritualist medium who founded the Church of the White Eagle Lodge in 1936 under the inspiration of her Indian spirit guide, White Eagle. Cooke, known to the members of the lodge as minesta, began her career as a Spiritualist medium in 1913 and became progressively convinced that the spiritual and philosophical aspects of Spiritualism were more important than mere evidence of survival.

She formed a small church in Middlesex, but later separated from its activities after church leaders became more interested in proofs of survival. During the 1930s, she leased Burstow Manor in Surrey and started a White Eagle Brotherhood, later moving to Pembroke Hall. Unfortunately, the headquarters was destroyed during bombing in World War II. In 1941 new premises were acquired in London and in Edinburgh, Scotland. In 1945 Mr. and Mrs. Cooke acquired the present premises at New Lands in Liss, Hampshire, administered by a trust since 1953.

Early in her career, Grace Cooke used her psychic gifts to offer evidence of survival, and Ramsay MacDonald, British prime minister, vouched for the accuracy of her spirit communications. But, in later years, her emphasis shifted to spiritual healing and to channeling teachings from White Eagle and a few other spirit entities, including that of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. Mrs. Cooke died September 5, 1979, at age 87. A special service was held at the temple at Liss, Hampshire, headquarters of the White Eagle Lodge, which she founded.

Sources:

Cooke, Grace. The Illumined Ones. Liss, Hampshire, England: White Eagle Publishing Trust, 1966.

———. The New Mediumship. Liss, Hampshire, England: White Eagle Publishing Trust, 1965.

———. Sun-Men of the Americas. Liss, Hampshire, England: White Eagle Publishing Trust, 1975.

Lind, Ingrid. The White Eagle Inheritance. Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, England: Turnstone Press, 1984.

The Wisdom of White Eagle. Liss, Hampshire, England: White Eagle Publishing Trust, 1967.

Coombe-Tennant, Winifred Margaret Serocold ("Mrs. Willett") (1874–1956)

Winifred Coombe-Tennant was better known by the pseudonym "Mrs. Willett," under which her scripts produced by au- tomatic writing were published. She was born November 1, 1874, and married Charles Coombe-Tennant in 1895. In addition to her mediumship, she was chairman of the arts and crafts section of the National Eisteddfod (a Welsh cultural conference held annually), a justice of the peace, and a delegate to the Assembly of the League of Nations (1922). She was also an associate of the Society for Psychical Research, London.

After the death of her daughter in 1908, Coombe-Tennant corresponded with Margaret Verrall, also known for her automatic writing, and later produced scripts herself. She first went into trance in 1910.

She took part in a cross-correspondence communications study by the Society for Psychical Research in which a group of automatists (Verrall, Helen Salter, Mrs. Holland [Alice Kipling Fleming] and "Mrs. Willett") produced interlocking scripts that indicated the possibility of a disembodied intelligence.

Coombe-Tennant's mediumship is discussed in an article by G. W. Balfour in the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research. After her death in 1956 she supposedly communicated to Geraldine Cummins the scripts later published in the book Swan on a Black Sea (1965).

Sources:

Balfour, G. W. "A Study of the Psychological Aspects of Mrs. Willett's Mediumship." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 43 (1935): 43.

Coons, Peter (1875–1955)

American pioneer of the study of hatha yoga under the name Pierre Arnold Bernard. His nephew Theos Bernard was responsible for an authoritative treatise on hatha yoga.

Cooper, Blanche (ca. 1927)

British direct voice medium at the center of the famous Gordon Davis case. In 1921–22, S. G. Soal, then a teacher at the University of London carried out a series of experiments and observations surrounding Cooper's mediumship. He was concerned with the remarkable communications he obtained from a deceased brother, from presumably fictitious entities, and from a friend, Gordon Davis. Davis was believed to have died in the war but was later discovered alive in 1925 and was ignorant of the communications that came through in his "voice." (See Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, vol. 35, 1926.)

In his report, Soal says Cooper:

" . . . does not go into trance and in the intervals when the voice is not speaking she is apparently normal and able to converse with the sitters and sometimes even able to repeat words which the voice has just said. There is, however, right through the sittings a certain degree of absentmindedness and the medium is sometimes slow to respond to questions addressed to her by the sitter. While the voice is not speaking she keeps up a continuous humming noise with her lips, and this humming noise ceases when the voice comes into play. Throughout the period of my own experiments the medium seemed unable to sustain the voice for more than a minute or two at a time and the information was given for the most part in rapid snatches punctuated by periods of silence lasting from a minute up to a quarter of an hour. Moreover, it appeared that the voice could only be produced while the musical box was playing, and only on one or two occasions were words spoken a second or two after the music had ceased. Objective lights were seen at every sitting but these appeared in the silent intervals and were never simultaneous with the voices. These lights varied in appearance from dim amorphous patches to bright bluish discs about the size of a half a crown."

Soal noticed the peculiar feature that "questions asked by the sitter are seldom answered immediately in the case when the sitter is holding the correct answer in his conscious mind." In such cases it was usually found that the idea had to pass back into the unconscious mind of the sitter before it could emerge from the automatism of the medium. The communicator, when asked for an answer, would usually reply, "I cannot give it now, but will try to give it later." Then at a later period of the sitting, when the sitter had forgotten the question, the correct answer would be given. In cases when the correct answer was not known to the sitter, a direct question would often result in immediate success.

In the case of Gordon Davis, his voice, accent and manner of speech were reproduced fairly accurately. He described incidents of his boyhood known to Soal, and described his last meeting with Soal and the substance of their conversation. He expressed a desire to send messages of comfort to his wife and child, and though he did not give the circumstances of his death, spoke as if he were deceased. He gave an accurate description of the environment and interior arrangements of a house which he did not occupy until a year later.

In the debate over Soal's paper before the Society for Psychical Research, Dr. Wolley suggested that when the house was described in Davis's spirit voice (Soal) the sitter was unconsciously forseeing an event in his own life, i.e., his visit to the house in April 1925.

This theory, however, would allow almost any piece of information given by a medium and afterward verified by the sitter to be considered the sitter's forseeing the future and subconsciously passing it along to the medium.

Cooper, Irving Steiger (1882–1935)

Irving Steiger Cooper, the first regionary bishop of the Liberal Catholic Church in the United States and a leading writer of Christian esoteric literature, was born March 16, 1882, in Santa Barbara, California. He grew up in the state and graduated from the University of California. As a young adult he was introduced to Theosophy and within a few years had become a popular lecturer for the Theosophical Society. In 1911 he traveled to India for the international meeting of the society and stayed there to become the secretary of Charles W. Leadbeater, an Anglican priest who had become a close associate of the society's president, Annie Besant.

Cooper was in India in 1915 when several priests who also were Theosophists were forced out of the Old Catholic Church in England and established the Liberal Catholic Church. The church elected James Ingall Wedgewood as their first presiding bishop. He was consecrated in February 1916. Wedgewood then went to Sydney, Australia, where Leadbeater had relocated, and consecrated him as a regionary bishop for the church in Australia. While these events were taking place, Cooper remained in India, where he was writing his first books: Methods of Psychic Development (1912), Theosophy Simplified (1915), and Reincarnation (1917). In 1917 Cooper moved to Australia and through Leadbeater was quickly involved in the new church. He was ordained a priest in 1918. He assisted Wedgwood and Leadbeater in the preparation of The Liturgy of the Mass (1917), published as The Liturgy of the Holy Eucharist (1918).

Meanwhile, the Liberal Catholic Church had been established in the United States, and Wedgwood chose Cooper to lead it. Cooper was consecrated as reginary bishop for the United States on July 13, 1919, at St. Alban's Liberal Catholic Church in Sydney by Wedgwood and Leadbeater, and he moved to the United States in 1920. Headquarters for the church were established in Hollywood in a cathedral built adjacent to the Theosophical Society's community called Krotona.

Cooper remained active in the Theosophical Society, which became the natural recruitment pool from which members of the church were initially found. He was a firm believer in the messianic role Besant assigned to the young Jiddu Krishnamurti, and in the late 1920s he traveled the United States with Besant promoting Krishnamurti as the vehicle for the coming world savior.

Cooper led the Liberal Catholic Church until his death on January 17, 1935, though his activity was severely curtailed the last five years due to ill health. He worked for many years perfecting the liturgy and in 1934 saw it published as Ceremonies of the Liberal Catholic Church, his major literary production. It remains the standard liturgy of the church.

Sources:

Cooper, Irving Steiger. Ceremonies of the Liberal Catholic Church. Los Angeles: St. Alban Press, 1924.

———. Methods of Psychic Development. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1912.

———. The Secret of Happiness. Chicago: Theosophical Publishing House, 1925.

———. Theosophy Simplified. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1928.

Ward, Gary L. Independent Bishops: An International Directory. Detroit: Apogee Books, 1990.

Cooper, Margaretta S. (ca. 1850)

Early nineteenth century American medium and daughter of La Roy Sunderland. In July 1850 Sunderland, a former Methodist minister turned magnetist-lecturer, launched from Boston one of the first periodicals devoted to reports on Spiritualism, the Spiritual Philosopher. In the first issue he expressed some doubts about the validity of spiritual rappings, but a few weeks later his daughter Margaretta became a medium. In October 1850 Sunderland wrote:

"The manifestations of the spirit world have been continued in our own family in Charlestown, and our office in Boston, with increasing and wonderful interest. . . . The mysterious sounds have been made in nearly all the rooms in our house, and have been heard at different times by different people."

Sources:

Cupron, E. W. Modern Spiritualism: Its Facts and Fanaticisms. Boston: B. Marsh; New York: Partridge and Brittan, 1855.

Cooperator, The (Magazine)

Former journal of the International Cooperation Council, a coordinating body composed of educational, scientific, cultural, and religious organizations that fostered the "emergence of a new universal person and a civilization based on unity in diversity among all peoples." Many of these organizations are concerned with religion, mysticism, and occult teachings.

When the International Cooperation Council was reorganized as the Unity-and-Diversity Council, The Cooperator was superseded by Spectrum, which continued the work of linking metaphysical and New Age groups. Address: Unity-and-Diversity World Council, 5521 Grosvenor Blvd., Ste. 22, Los Angeles, CA 90066-6915.

Cooper-Oakley, Isabel (1854–1914)

Theosophical writer. She was born in Amritsas, Punjab, India, her father being an official in the colonial government. Her father, Henry Cooper, was a believer in female schooling, and young Isabel received a good education for the time. Due to an injury received in 1877, she did not walk for two years, causing her to intensify her studies. During this time she read Isis Unveiled, the first major writing of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, cofounder of the Theosophical Society. Her study of psychic subjects ended, however, when she recovered. She turned to women's issues and set as her goal attending Girton College, Cambridge.

While at Cambridge in 1882 she met her future husband, A. J. Oakley, and Archibald Knightley and his wife. Together they developed a new interest in Theosophy and joined the Theosophical Society in the spring of 1884. In the fall they accompanied Blavatsky to India. Cooper-Oakley became a dedicated Theosophist and a close associate of Blavatsky's. She remained loyal through the scandals arising from the charges of fraud by the Society for Psychical Research, and after Blavatsky's death in 1891 she became an international lecturer for the society.

Cooper-Oakley's first book, Traces of a Hidden Tradition in Masonry and Medieval Mysticism (1900), is an exploration of the Grail and Templar traditions from a theosophical perspective. In 1907 Blavatsky's successor, Annie Besant, appointed Cooper-Oakley to the presidency of the International Committee for Research into Mystical Traditions. While serving in that capacity she published further research on themes developed earlier as Mystical Traditions (1909). The esoteric and mystical history of the West had captured her attention for many years, and in 1912 she gathered some of her early articles into a single volume, The Compte St. Germain, possibly her most-remembered book, in which she assembled all of the known material about one of the more colorful and intriguing occult characters of all time.

After a full life, Cooper-Oakley died March 3, 1914, at Budapest, Hungary.

Sources:

Cooper-Oakley, Isabel. The Compte St. Germain. Milan, Italy: Liberia Editrice del Dr. G. Sulli-Rao, 1912.

———. Mystical Traditions. Milan, Italy: Liberia Editrice del Dr. G. Sulli-Rao, 1909.

———. Traces of a Hidden Tradition in Masonry and Medieval Mysticism. London: Theosophical Publishing Society, 1900.

Coover, John Edgar (1872–1938)

Psychologist and director of the Psychical Research Laboratory at Stanford University whose brief flirtation with psychical research had a significant negative effect upon the whole field. Cooper was born March 16, 1872, at Remington, Indiana, and was educated at Stanford University (A.B., A.M., Ph.D.).

Shortly after Harvard University received a large grant to carry out psychical research in 1912, Thomas W. Stanford gave a significant endowment for the same purpose to the university his brother had founded. Coover had just assumed a position at Stanford and was the first to receive funding from the grant, making him the first faculty member of a large American university to conduct parapsychological experiments.

He conducted a set of methodologically sound experiments in telepathy and clairvoyance with one person "sending" from a deck of playing cards to a second person in another room. Over a five-year period he carried out 10,000 trials and in 1917 presented an impressive 600 page report, Experiments in Psychical Research at Stanford University. The detailed report, filled with an impressive set of statistics, claimed the attention of American scientists. Its skeptical conclusions resulted in negative reactions to further efforts to develop university-based psychical studies.

After these experiments, Coover had little to do with parapsychology. He wrote an occasional article for the periodicals of the Society for Psychical Research and the American Society for Psychical Research and contributed a chapter in a book edited by Carl A. Murchison, The Case for and Against Psychical Belief (1927). Coover reached a somewhat agnostic position on the question, an attitude not conducive to pursuing research in a highly controversial field. He died February 19, 1938, at Palo Alto, California.

Toward the end of Coover's life a mild controversy emerged concerning his 1917 report. In 1935 Robert Thouless carried out a new examination of Coover's data and suggested that it contained statistically significant results. J. B. Rhine later suggested that because of the stress Thouless felt from his colleagues, he refused to report his favorable evidence. This conclusion is bolstered by a letter Thouless wrote to the president of the university, saying his research was "offensive in the nostrils of" his fellow psychologists.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Coover, J. E. Experiments in Psychical Research at Stanford University. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 1917.

Rhine, J. B. "History of Experimental Studies." In Handbook of Parapsychology, edited by B. Wolman. New York: Van Nostrand Rhinhold, 1977.

Thouless, Robert H. "Dr. Rhine's Recent Experiments in Telepathy and Clairvoyance and a Reconsideration of J. E. Coover's Conclusions on Telepathy." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 43 (1935): 24.

Copernicus, Nicolaus (1473–1543)

Nicolaus Copernicus, whose astrological calculations are generally credited with breaking the hold of the geocentric perspective of the universe on Western thought, was born on February 19, 1473, in Torun (or Thorn), Poland. His father, a wealthy merchant, provided Nicolaus an education at the University of Krakow, where he received a broad education in the sciences, and the University of Bologna, where he studied for five years (1496–1501), in the liberal arts. It was still an era in which one could largely master the whole body of scientific knowledge.

Copernicus' father also arranged for his son's appointment as a church canon, and upon his return from Italy, he settled in at the Cathedral at Frombork (Frauenberg), where he lived quietly for the rest of his life. Though attending to a wide range of duties, and despite having no telescope (as yet to be invented), over a period of years Copernicus observed the heavens and kept careful records of his observations. He gave thought to a problem that had long haunted astronomy. As the planets moved across the heavens, at times they appeared to move backward (or retrograde). This backward motion was a major offense to any understanding of the divine perfection of the heavens. To solve this problem, Copernicus proposed the idea that the Sun was the center of the solar system, and the Earth, like the other planets, circled it. While not a totally new idea, he backed his idea with his data. His idea had appeal in that it preserved, for the time being, the movement of the heavenly bodies in their perfection. It met opposition in its moving the Earth from the center of creation.

Although Copernicus published his theories as early as 1514, in a manuscript privately circulated to a few friends, his final work, De revolutionibus orbium coelestium (On the Revolution of the Heavenly Spheres), was not released until the end of his life (he did not live to see published copies). He had turned the manuscript of his book over to his astrologer friend, Joachim Rheticus, to publish. The real impact of Copernicus' work would come decades later as Johann Kepler, Galileo, and Isaac Newton built on it and made plain some of the implications of humanity's not living at the center of the universe.

As Copernicus' heliocentric view became widely known, it became a major challenge to astrology, an art based on Ptolomy's geocentric views. Attempts to create a heliocentric astrology emerged as Europe gave up an Earth-centered view of the world over the next two centuries, but most astrologers remained hostile to such a change. They argued that since astrology concerned the life of earthlings, the relation of the heavenly bodies to Earth remained the key item in their art. After all, even Copernicus did not give up astrology and like most people with some astronomical expertise, cast horoscopes. The move to a heliocentric astronomy did not require a change to a heliocentric astrology. Some new heliocentric astrologies have been proposed in the last generation, partly as an anticipation of future human life on other planets, but they have yet to be seriously considered by most astrologers.

Sources:

Khun, Thomas S. The Copernican Revolution: Planetary Astrology in the Development of Western Thought. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1957.

Kitson, Annabella, ed. History and Astrology: Clio and Urania Confer. London: Mandala, 1989.

Rosen, Edward. Copernicus and His Successors. Hambleton Press, 1995.

Copyright (of Psychic Scripts)

Under the decision of Mr. Justice Eve (London, July 1926, Bligh Bond v. Miss Cummins), a medium who is the amanuensis for the transmission or production of any written communication made in the presence of a sitter or sitters was adjudged to be the sole author of the script produced, and therefore the sole owner of all copyright values inherent in it (subject to the absence of any special agreement to the contrary), whether the script was addressed to a sitter as recipient or otherwise, or whether it contained matter personal to the sitter.

As a result of the above ruling, in Britain the element of telepathic transmission from sitter to medium resulting in the production of writing, or of any associative influence of a like nature involving any other person, living or dead, is excluded from the purview of the law.

Coral

An organic substance formed from the hard skeletons of marine organisms, consisting mainly of calcium carbonate and magnesium carbonate. In addition to its value as a source of lime, coral has been used for jewelry and personal ornamentation, but from ancient times it has also been used in medicine and magic.

It was believed to stop bleeding, preserve houses from thunder, and protect children from goblins, evil spirits, and sorcery. It was supposed to strengthen digestion and, if taken in powder form, to protect young children from epilepsy. Coral was worn by children from Roman times.

It has also been used for rosaries as well as for bead necklaces and bracelets.

Corbenic

A magic castle in the legends of King Arthur, in which it is said the Holy Grail was kept. It was guarded by two lions. Lancelot tried to enter it by his own strength, but instead of leaning on God for guidance, he was struck dumb by a fiery wind. In this state he remained for fourteen days without food or drink.

Cordonnier, Gerard Anatole F. (1907–)

An engineer with the French Naval Construction Service who had an interest in parapsychology. He was born April 19, 1907, at Bailleul (Nord), France, and studied at the Ecole Polytechnique, Paris, the University of Lyons, and the Ecole Nationale Supèvieve du Génie Maritime. Honors for his work began in 1931 when he won the Arts, Sciences and Letters Silver Medal. He was presented the Chevalier, Légion d'Honneur at the end of World War I (1945). His distinguished scientific career included assignment to the National Center for Scientific Research in 1952. He began his service in the Documentation Center of the center in 1958. He has written on clairvoyance and mathematics, and on levitation in relation to gravity. His parapsychological interests included telepathy, clairvoyance, levitation, and psychokinesis.

Cordovero, Moses

A famous Kabalist of the sixteenth century who was influential in the Safed school of mystical interpretations of the Torah. His writings include Shi'ur Lomah and Padres Rimmonim.

Cornell, A(nthony) D(onald) (1923–)

British business technical representative with a long-standing interest in parapsychology. Cornell was educated at Cambridge University, where he studied economics. He was active in the Cambridge University Society for Research in Parapsychology, and became successively its research officer (1956–58), senior research officer (1958–60), and president. In 1962 he became a member of the council of the Society for Psychical Research, London. He conducted an early study measuring public sightings of apparitions and studied hauntings, apparitions, and poltergeists, the primary literary result being the book Poltergeists (1979), which he cowrote with Alan Gauld.

Sources:

Cornell, A. D. "An Experiment in Apparitional Observation and Findings." Journal of the Society for Pyschical Research 40 (1959): 120.

Gauld, Alan, and A. D. Cornell. Poltergeists. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1979.

Corpse Candles

Mysterious phosphorescent lights often seen over marshes or in churchyards. They are also known as "fetchlights," "jack o'lanterns" and "dead men's candles," and are termed ignis fatuus. They are believed by some to presage death. The size is said to indicate the age of the victim, a small light representing an infant death, especially if it is a pale blue color.

These lights are erratic, sometimes disappearing and reappearing. They may be seen on or near the earth, in the air, or over lakes, or on the sea. They may be red, white, or blue and are thought to be caused by unusual atmospheric conditions, gaseous emanations, or by luminous insects.

Corralès, Ophelia

Mysterious phosphorescent lights often seen over marshes or in churchyards. They are also known as "fetchlights," "jack o'lanterns" and "dead men's candles," and are termed ignis fatuus. They are believed by some to presage death. The size is said to indicate the age of the victim, a small light representing an infant death, especially if it is a pale blue color.

These lights are erratic, sometimes disappearing and reappearing. They may be seen on or near the earth, in the air, or over lakes, or on the sea. They may be red, white, or blue and are thought to be caused by unusual atmospheric conditions, gaseous emanations, or by luminous insects.

Corralès, Ophelia (ca. 1908)

Materialization medium of San José, Costa Rica, of whose powers the most astounding claims were made in three publications: the Annals of Psychic Science (1910); El Siglo Espirita, (March 28, 1908), the organ of the Mexican Spiritist Federation; and La Voz de la Verdad of Barcelona.

The séances were presided over by Dr. Alberto Brenes, professor at the law academy and a skeptic. Roberto Brenes Mesên, under secretary to the minister of public instruction, and Ramiro Aguilar, principal of the high school of San José, were attending.

Corralès was 18 years old at the time when she retained complete consciousness while an entity, giving the name "Miguel Ruiz," materialized. He could be touched, his heart could be tested, he could become tall or reduce his size, and if a match was struck, he immediately vanished. He became the guide of the séances and often came in the company of other phantoms, among whom "Mary Brown" was the most remarkable.

It was claimed that as many as five phantoms were sometimes witnessed at the same time, each talking in its mother tongue. The medium could project her double into the séance room while she remained outside. The double wore a different costume but exactly reproduced the voice and appearance of Corralès. When the medium, who was heard talking outside simultaneously with the double, was asked to transmit to the double a comb that was in her hair and a handkerchief, the two articles came immediately through the wall. On request, the medium herself was similarly transported.

While the medium was possessed by a spirit, her double could be seen in the room, and on command, spoke in her voice. Once, when the medium was not possessed, the double was heard accompanying Mary in song. The voice emanated far from where the body was placed by Mary.

Many other marvels, unparalleled in Spiritualist records, were said to have been performed by these spirit visitors. Mary Brown began to write, then she placed her hand on the shoulder of a sitter, who continued the writing in the same character. Similarly, if she or Miguel touched a sitter, the sitter could speak in a language of which he or she was ignorant.

In the light of a small lamp Mary often rose and floated in the air. She could also multiply herself into four personalities or psychic forms, three of which took one of the bystanders by the arms and talked about different things at the same time, acting as though they were independent of one another, while the fourth, some distance away, sang.

Mary explained the feat as a division of the astral body, the parts of which could materialize separately and consciously. Several flashlight photographs were taken; Mary is remarkably lifelike in some.

However, according to a letter from the medium's father to W. T. Stead, published by the Voz de la Verdad, "the photographs taken of Mary have not all the interest which at first attached to them. It is proved that she introduced a young unknown girl into the room, and she appears on the plate (phenomenon of transport and possession)."

Mary gave this explanation: "I sought amongst living persons for one who could faithfully reproduce the expression of my countenance: I found her and brought her here. My intention was a healthy one, and I am ready to repeat the phenomenon in order that you could submit it to a more severe control."

Upon visiting San José, Prof. Willy Reichel found attempts at fraud during the materialization séances, yet he affirmed that Corralès was a medium for independent voices and automatic writing.

Corralès discontinued her séances in 1914. In the absence of any reliable evidence for her phenomena, and the questionable records of other people who have attempted similar feats, the claims made for Corralès remain doubtful. (See also Teleportation)

Correspondences, Doctrine of Central idea in the work of Swedish seer Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772). Swedenborg, in contrast to the new opinion of his intellectual colleagues that reality was basically found in the visible material world, argued that everything visible is but the shadow of a corresponding spiritual reality. Ultimately, he believed the nature of the connection with the spiritual world is most easily realized through a knowledge of the correspondences found in the Bible. Swedenborg devoted a considerable part of his life to writing a 12-volume commentary on the books of Genesis and Exodus (Arcana Coelestia) (1905–10) and several volumes on the Book of Revelation (Apocalypse Revealed) (1970).

In his last book, The True Christian Religion, originally published in 1770–71, he detailed his method of interpreting the Bible spiritually. While on cursory examination it appears similar to allegory, it differs considerably. Swedenborg said he learned from the angels that Scripture had a literal meaning and that one could not derive the higher spiritual meaning from it by allegory. He claims that the angels told him the true meaning of the Bible.

Robert A. Vaughan, author of Hours with the Mystics (1905), notes in regard to Swedenborg:

"According to Swedenborg, all the mythology and the symbolisms of ancient times were so many refracted or fragmentary correspondences—relics of that better day when every outward object suggested to man's mind its appropriate divine truth. Such desultory and uncertain links between the seen and the unseen are so many imperfect attempts toward that harmony of the two worlds which he believed himself commissioned to reveal. The happy thoughts of the artist, the imaginative analogies of the poet, are exchanged with Swedenborg for an elaborate system. All the terms and objects in the natural and spiritual worlds are catalogued in pairs."

For those who do not accept Swedenborg's system, his continued attempt to draw out the correspondences make the reading of his commentaries quite difficult. However, his intense affirmation of a spiritual world drew a welcome response from those satisfied with neither traditional Christianity nor the new, truncated scientific worldview.

Sources:

Woofenden, William Ross. Swedenborg Researcher's Manual. Bryn Athyn, Pa.: Swedenborg Scientific Association, 1988.

Worcester, William L. Lessons in Correspondence. 1892. Reprinted as The Language of Parable: A Key to the Bible. New York: Swedenborg Foundation, 1984.

Coscinomancy

A form of divination practiced with a sieve and a pair of tongs or shears, which are supported on the thumbnails (or the nails of the middle fingers) of two persons facing each other.

In his book Archaeologia Graeca; or the Antiquities of Greece (1697–99), Bishop John Potter writes:

"It was generally used to discover thieves, or others suspected of any crime, in this manner: they tied a thread to the sieve by which it was upheld, or else placed a pair of shears, which they held up by two fingers, then prayed to the gods to direct and assist them; after that they repeated the names of the persons under suspicion, and he, at whose name the sieve whirled round or moved, was thought guilty."

In the Athenian Oracle it is called "the trick of the sieve and scissors, the coscinomancy of the ancients, as old as Theocritus," the writer having mentioned in his third idyll a woman who was very skillful in it. Richard Saunders, in his Physiognomie and Chiromancy (1653), and Agrippa gives certain mystic words to be pronounced before the sieve will turn.

Coscinomancy was also used to discover love secrets as well as to identify unknown persons.

Cosmerism

Cosmerism was the name of a short-lived channeling group that originated in September 1972 when a couple (given the names Luke and Mark) channeled the messages of a group of seven angels. These messages were later published as the Book of Cosmer. Following instructions from the angels, Luke and Mark gathered a group of 13, each of whom was given a Cosmerite name: Matthias, Matthew, Judas Secarius, Josephus, Ananda, Peter, James the Elder, Thomas, Paul, Thaddeus, and John the Beloved. Luke and Mark completed the circle. In the summer of 1974 this circle went public with the first study of the Book of Cosmer and The Moon Monk, a periodical.

Cosmerism advocated the Way of Cosmer, which begins with a realization of the creative force innate in all things as the source of creation. Humanity is on a course toward a oneness of people and angels within the larger unity of the creative force.

The Cosmerites were headquartered in Winter Park, Florida. They proposed the building of Ichikama, a wilderness ashram, but it was never constructed, and the group seems to have disbanded within a few years of its formation.

Cosmic Awareness Communications

Cosmic Awareness Communications is a channeling group that originated in 1962 when a voice describing itself as "From Cosmic Awareness" began to speak through William Ralph Duby. Duby, a former Army officer, had emerged as a medium and a small group had gathered around him. When the group asked who or what "Cosmic Awareness" was, it replied that it was "total mind that is not any one mind, but is from the Universal Mind that does not represent any unity other than that of universality." The group collected the words spoken by "Cosmic Awareness." In 1963 the voice gave instructions for the formation of an Organization of Awareness. The heart of the organization was seen as the 144 entities on the inner plane known as Essence, while the outer structure facilitated the dissemination of the words of "Cosmic Awareness" to the public.

The teachings of "Cosmic Awareness" were summarized in a set of laws and precepts. The universal law is the awareness that each living thing has the power to gather all things necessary for its life. The law of love places the welfare of others above one's own. It refuses to recognize the existence of evil. The law of mercy allows one to forgive all errors. The law of gratitude recognizes the sense of satisfaction from receiving a reward for energy expended.

Following Duby's death in 1967 there was a period of turmoil, and the organization splintered. Of the resulting groups, the largest and most stable is Cosmic Awareness Communications. It recognized a new channel, Paul Shockley, through whom "Cosmic Awareness" continues to speak. Through Shockley, "Cosmic Awareness" suggested that the Organization of Awareness had already accomplished a vast shift of consciousness, a return to the Godhead, which had been willed thousands of years previously by Essence. The return to the Godhead is equated with the return of Lucifer, the fallen angel of light.

Cosmic Awareness Communications may be contacted at Box 115, Olympia, WA 98707. It issues a periodical, Revelation of Awareness, and has a number of transcripts of channeling sessions available.

Sources:

Cosmic Awareness Speaks. Vol. 1. Olympia, Wash.: Servants of Awareness, n.d. Vols. 2–3. Olympia, Wash.: Cosmic Awareness Communications, 1977, 1983.

Cosmic Consciousness

A form of mystical experience characterized by consciousness of the whole cosmos, of the life and order of the universe. It was originally defined by Dr. Richard M. Bucke (1837–1902) in his book of the same name. Bucke considered cosmic consciousness a higher peak in human evolution that the race will universally attain in the distant future.

According to Bucke, it seemed to appear primarily in men between the ages of thirty and forty, who were highly developed, of good intellect, high moral quality, superior physique, and earnest religious belief. He considered the 13 greatest cases to be Gautama Buddha, Jesus Christ, the apostle Paul, Plotinus, Mohammed, Dante, Las Casas, John Ypes, Francis Bacon, Jacob Behmen, William Blake, Balzac, and Bucke's friend Walt Whitman.

As described by Bucke the experience comes suddenly, with a sensation of being immersed in a flame or rose-colored cloud. It is accompanied by a feeling of ecstasy and moral and intellectual illumination in which the mind has a clear concept of the meaning of the universe.

The man or woman who goes through the experience sees and knows that the cosmos is a living presence, that life is eternal, the soul of man immortal, the founding principle of the world is love, and the happiness of every individual in the long run is absolutely certain. All fear of death, all sense of sin is lost, and the personality gains added charm and becomes transformed. In a few moments of the experience the individual will learn more than in months or years of study, and will learn much that no study can teach.

Whitman spoke of cosmic consciousness as "ineffable light, light rare, untellable, lighting the very light beyond all signs, descriptions, languages." His insights correlated with the insights of a large body of mystical and religious literature, and had additional appeal because of his scientific credentials and his mystical approach to God, a perspective somewhat compatible with Eastern thought.

As described by Bucke, cosmic consciousness is equated with the early steps of mysticism.

Sources:

Bucke, Richard Maurice. Cosmic Consciousness: A Study of the Evolution of the Human Mind. 1910. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961. Reprint, New York: Citadel Press, 1970.

———. Richard Maurice Bucke, Medical Mystic: Letters of Dr. Bucke to Walt Whitman and His Friends. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1977.

Nomad, Ali. Cosmic Consciousness. Chicago, 1913.

Row, M. C. Nanjunda Row. Cosmic Consciousness, or the Vedantic Idea of Realization or Mukti in the Light of Modern Psychology. Madras, India, 1910.

Cosmic Picture Gallery

Also known as the akashic records—the scenic representation of every thought, feeling, and action since the beginning of the world. Light travels at the rate of 186,000 miles a second, yet the astronomic distances are so vast that it takes hundreds of thousands of years for light to reach Earth from distant stars. Suppose a person could see, through such enormity of space, what was happening on Earth. At present they could witness only the primeval past. From a great distance the creation of the whole world could be seen as a present reality. Swami Panchadasi, an early twentieth-century writer on astral projection, suggested:

"By travelling to a point in time, on the fourth dimension, you may begin at that point and see a moving picture of history of any part of the earth from that time to the present, or you may reverse the sequence by travelling backwards. You may also travel in the astral, in ordinary space dimensions, and thus see what happened simultaneously all over the earth at any special time, if you wish. As a matter of strict truth, however, I must inform you that the real records of the past exist on a much higher plane than the astral, and that which you have witnessed is but a reflection (practically perfect, however) of the original records. It requires a high degree of occult development in order to perceive even this reflection in the astral light. An ordinary clairvoyant, however, is often able to catch occasional glimpses of these astral pictures, and may thus describe fairly well happenings of the past."

The concept of akashic records derives from Hinduism as transmitted through the Theosophical Society and the teachings of Madame Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, who claimed that such records were accessible to a gifted percipient.

Sources:

Panchadasi, Swami. The Astral World: Its Scenes, Dwellers, and Phenomena. Chicago: Advanced Thought Publishing, 1915.

Cosmic Voice (Newsletter)

Monthly newsletter of the Aetherius Society, promulgating the teachings of psychic George King, and providing up-to-date information on the society's activities. The newsletter was formerly named Aetherius Speaks to Earth and then the Aetherius Society Newsletter. Address: 6202 Afton Pl., Hollywood, CA 90028. Website: http://www.aetherius.org/.

Cosmobiology

Cosmobiology is the name given to an innovative astrological system developed by German astrologer Reinhold Ebertin (1901–1988) in the 1920s. Ebertin had been a student of Alfred Witte, but rejected elements of his teacher's Uranian Astrology system, and he established himself independently. Suppressed by the Nazis, he began to operate again after World War II (1939–1945), at which time he adopted the name cosmobiology (a term previously used by other astrologers) to describe his system. It found a popular response across Europe and spread to the English-speaking world in the 1970s following the translation of Ebertin's several books.

Uranian Astrology was distinguished by its addition of a set of hypothetical planets (planets believed to exist but as yet unverified by standard scientific observation). Witte alleged the existence of no less than eight such planets. Witte also proposed the existence of midpoints, points halfway between the position of any two planets in the individual's horoscope. These midpoints were seen as the point at which their combined energies manifests. Ebertin came to reject the idea of hypothetical planets and also the idea of house as used in traditional astrology. In place of the houses, he emphasized the role of planetary influences. He eventually created a whole new set of terms for use by cosmobiologists.

Cosmobiology begins with the construction of a traditional horoscope with the placement of the Sun, Moon, and planets in each of the traditional positions regarding the sign. Two important points in the traditional horoscope, the ascendant (or horizon) and midheaven (the point directly above at the moment of birth) are treated as additional planets. These planet alignments then undergo a second level of mathematical manipulation to create the cosmogram, cosmobiology's horoscope. In place of the houses, the series of midpoints are also marked, allowing another level of analysis of the planets' influences.

Cosmobiology is also one of the astrological systems that emphasizes the effect of transits, the present location of planets relative to their placement in the birth chart. When a planet today is in the same location relative to itself or another planet in the birth chart, it is said to be transiting it.

The creation of the finished cosmogram is more complicated and requires additional mathematical skill above that needed for the traditional horoscope. However, the production of the cosmogram can now be left to computer programs, allowing the individual astrologer to concentrate on the interpretative aspect of his/her work.

Sources:

Ebertin, Reinhold. Applied Cosmobiology. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1972.

Rauchhaus, Irmgard. "Cosmobiology." In James R. Lewis, ed. The Astrology Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1994.

Savalan, Karen Ober. Midpoint Interpretation Simplified. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1983.

Cosmology Newslink

Quarterly British publication concerned with claimed extraterrestrial contacts and UFO sightings. Address: 37 The Close Dunmow, Essex CM6 IEW, England.

Cosmos (Newspaper)

Australian monthly periodical concerned with New Age topics, ranging from occultism and higher consciousness to dietary theories. Last known address: P.O. Box 322, Lane Cove, New South Wales 2066, Australia.

Cotlar, Mischa (1913–)

Mathematician and physicist with a special interest in parapsychology. Cotlar was born August 1, 1913, in Kiev, Ukraine. He moved to Argentina and became a research professor in the Department of Mathematics at La Plata University (1946–47) and then became a research professor in mathematics at the University of Buenos Aires (1948–50). He moved to the United States in 1951 as a Guggenheim fellow and completed his Ph.D. in mathematics at the University of Chicago in 1953. He returned to Argentina as chairman of the Institute of Mathematics at the University of Cuyo, Mendoza, Argentina (1953–56). In 1957 he became a professor of mathematics at the University of Buenos Aires.

Cotlar was a founding member of the Institute of Parapsychology created in 1972. His research is in the fields of psychokinesis, telepathy and mediumship, yoga, and Hindu philosophy.

Cottin, Angelique (ca. 1846)

A French peasant girl from a small village near Montagne, in Normandy, who as a teen exhibited remarkable phenomena of an apparently electric nature for a period of about ten weeks. Her first manifestation took place on the evening of January 15, 1846, while she was engaged in weaving gloves with three other girls. The frame at which they were working began to jump about. The parish priest was the first to investigate, since witchcraft was suspected. Realizing the money-making possibilities in such a mysterious power, Angelique's parents soon took her to Paris.

A Dr. Tanchou accidentally heard of her curious phenomena, investigated, and found them to be of an electrical nature. Balls of pith or feathers hung on a silken thread were alternately attracted or repelled by a force emanating from her body. She could distinguish between the poles of a magnet by touch. A compass was violently agitated in her presence. Chairs and tables leapt away from her touch in bright daylight and against strong counterpressure. A bed rocked and shook beneath her.

Tanchou sometimes noticed a cold wind during the phenomena. He reported to the scientist François Arago, who tested the girl in his laboratory. Their report revealed sudden and violent movements of the chair on which the girl was sitting. They were not satisfied, however, that these movements were not due to muscular force. But Tanchou and many others remained convinced that the phenomena was proof of the existence of a new force. According to Lafontaine, "When she brought her left wrist near a lighted candle the flame bent over horizontally, as if continually blown upon." The power was especially strong in the evening, from seven to nine o'clock. It radiated only from the front part of Cottin's body, especially at her wrist and elbow, but only on the left side. Her left arm was of higher temperature than the other. If she was seated on a chair without her feet touching the floor, made to sit down on her hands, or stood on a wax floor, a piece of oiled silk, or a plate of glass, no phenomena took place.

At every manifestation of the mysterious force Cottin was seized with terror and sought refuge in flight. During the phenomena she was extremely hyperesthetic; her muscles convulsed and her heartrate increased to 120 beats a minute. The force was so excessive that a 60-pound table would rise into the air if her apron merely touched it.

The telekinetic phenomena of Eusapia Palladino seem to have been similarly produced. Frank Podmore in his examination of the facts found this a suspicious circumstance. He also observed that when chairs were thrown about there was a double movement on the part of the girl, first in the direction of the object thrown and then away from it, the first movement being so rapid that it generally escaped attention.

Sources:

Rochas, Eugene A. A. L'Exteriorisation de la Motricité. 1896. Reprint, N.p., 1899.

Cottingley Fairies

In 1917 Annie Griffiths and her daughter Frances moved from South Africa to the small village of Cottingley, a suburb of Bradford in Yorkshire, England. They would live with Annie's sister, Polly Wright; her brother-in-law, Arthur; and her niece, Elsie, while her husband was in France fighting in the war. At the time Frances was nine and Elsie was 17. Despite their age difference, Elsie and Frances soon became best friends and played together in the stream at the bottom of the garden behind the Wright home. On one occasion, Frances's mother became irritated when the girls returned with wet shoes and socks. Frances responded to her mother's scolding by telling her they had gone to the stream to see fairies. To prove that they had actually seen fairies, Elsie borrowed her father's Midg camera and in July 1917 took a picture of Frances with the fairies. When they returned from the stream, Elsie's father developed the photograph they had taken, which showed Frances sitting by the stream surrounded by four dancing fairies. In September of the same year Frances took a photograph of Elsie with a gnome kneeling near her lap.

Despite the remarkable nature of these photographs, the family chose not to publicize them immediately; instead they remained silent until 1919 when Elsie's mother attended a meeting of the Theosophical Society in Bradford. Held at a time when interest in psychic phenomena was greatly increased, in the aftermath of World War I, the meeting was attended by several hundred persons. During the meeting the lecturer, a Mrs. Powell, apparently mentioned the existence of fairies, which prompted Polly to ask if it was possible that the fairy photographs taken by her daughter and niece could be valid representations of fairy life. Eventually the two photographs taken by Frances and Elsie were given to Mrs. Powell, who forwarded them to Edward J. Gardner. Gardner discussed them with Sir Arthur Conan Doyle who not only believed in the existence of fairies but was also coincidentally collecting material on fairies for an article he had promised to write for the Strand.

Doyle obtained prints of the photographs in June 1920, while he was making preparations for a trip to Australia with his family to preach the cause of Spiritualism. Because of the importance of the subject matter, Doyle made arrangements to meet Gardner at the Grosvenor Hotel in London to discuss the photographs. During those discussions, Doyle asked Gardner to travel to Yorkshire to meet with the family and to investigate the photographs. After completing his investigation, Gardner was convinced that the girls' story was true and that the photographs were valid representations of fairies. Before leaving for Australia, Doyle spoke with Gardner and submitted an article to the Strand; it appeared in December 1920. In the article Doyle used pseudonyms for Elsie (who became Iris) and Frances (who became Alice) and discussed the background of the two photographs and Gardner's visit with the family. Doyle left for Australia before the article was published, but he admitted in the published account of that trip that he took with him "the famous fairy photos—which will appear in England in the Christmas number of the Strand. I feel as if it were a delay-action of mine which I had left behind me. I can imagine the cry of "Fake!" which will arise. But they will stand investigation. It has, of course, nothing to do with Spiritualism proper, but everything which can shake the mind out of narrow material grooves and make it realize that endless worlds surround us, separated only by difference of vibration, must work in the general direction of truth."

When Doyle returned from Australia in the spring of 1921, he submitted another article to the Strand, which appeared in the March 1921 issue. Although two additional photographs were reproduced for the first time in this article—photographs that Elsie and Frances had been urged to take by Gardner in August 1920—the article itself had been written by Doyle before he knew anything about any of the Cottingley fairy photographs. A preface to the article states: "This article was written by Sir A. Conan Doyle before actual photographs of fairies were known to exist. His departure for Australia prevented him from revising the article in the new light which has so strikingly strengthened his case. We are glad to be able to sit before our readers two new fairy photographs, taken by the same girls, but of more recent date than those which created so much discussion when they were published in our Christmas number, and of even greater interest and importance."

Following the publication of Doyle's articles, he wrote several letters to the British press to explain his belief in the fairy photographs. On June 18, 1921, he wrote to Light, a spiritualist magazine, and defended the photographs against charges that they were "clumsy fakes" by assuring its readers that "the photos have been enlarged and also examined in the negatives by some of the most competent professional photographers in England, who could find no flaw."

In October of the same year he wrote to the Yorkshire Weekly Post and repeated that the fairy photographs had been "inspected by several of the first authorities in England, who have found no flaw in them," but also added: "When one considers that these are the first photographs which these children ever took in their lives it is impossible to conceive that they are capable of technical manipulation which would deceive experts."

Despite these explanations, others advanced more skeptical theories. On December 20, 1921, an article appeared in the British newspaper Star, in which a representative of Price and Sons, who were candlemakers, suggested that the Cottingley fairies were almost identical to drawings the company had used to advertise their nightlights.

Despite these criticisms, Doyle utilized both Strand articles as chapters in the first edition of The Coming of the Fairies (1922), which consisted of 1,000 copies published on September 1, 1922. A second impression was made on November 23, 1922, in which an additional 500 copies were published. The first American edition of The Coming of the Fairies, which consisted of 1,500 copies, was published later that same year. These publications included the four previously published fairy photographs and a fifth photograph, which was also taken in 1920. Following the publication of the first edition of The Coming of the Fairies, the South African newspaper Cape Argus published an article that disclosed that Elsie Wright wrote a letter concerning her fairy photographs before making them public. Believing that this disclosure was significant, Doyle submitted a third article to the Strand, for their February 1923 issue, in which he writes that there is new evidence that vindicates Elsie and Frances: "There are a good many apologies due to the children for criticism which could only mean that they were dishonest little wretches. That line of comment must now be definitely abandoned by every fair-minded critic, but what other one is open?"

Following the publication of this article, Doyle relied on others to argue the case. Geoffrey Hodson, a medium who visited Elsie and Frances in Cottingley in August 1921 and whose account was included in Doyle's book, published his own book on the subject. In Fairies at Work and Play (1925) Hodson cites the Cottingley fairy photos as evidence that fairies exist. His book also describes other sightings of brownies, elves, gnomes, manikins, undins, sea spirits, sylphs, devas, and nature spirits. That same year Doyle wrote a letter to The Northern Whig and Belfast Post in which he blasted an "allusion to the 'Fairy Photographs' as if they had been in some way explained or discredited." He declared "This is not so," and reviewed the evidence that supported their veracity, including the letter that appeared in the Cape Argus, and the unquestioned honesty of the girls.

Although Doyle considered writing a fourth article for the Strand after the discovery of additional fairy photographs from other sources, he decided, instead, to publish a second edition of The Coming of the Fairies in 1928. This second edition, published by Doyle's own Psychic Press, added material that was not in the first edition, including a new preface in which he recommends Hodson's book, and an article by Florizel von Reuter which discusses photographs of nature sprites.

Following the publication of the second edition of The Coming of the Fairies, Doyle wrote nothing further on the subject until 1929. In Our African Winter—the account of his missionary adventures in Africa—he recognizes that:

". . . there are thousands of people who still believe the wild assertion made years ago that the fairy photographs were taken from a well-known advertisement. I took the line in my lecture that I was prepared to consider any explanation of these results, save only one which attacked the character of the children. I am sure that when I had explained the facts there were few in the Hall who were not prepared to accept the photographs. . . . There have been many objections made to the Cottingley photographs, most of them palpably absurd. The one which merits most attention is that they are cleverly cut-out figures which have been held up by invisible threads. Such an explanation is conceivable, but the balance of probability seems to me to be greatly against it."

In the same book Doyle also explains why he continued to reject the skeptical explanations advanced concerning the Cottingley fairy photographs:

"1. Frances, the younger girl, wrote at the time (1917) that Cottingley was a nice place on account of the butterflies and fairies. This card was sent to her friend in South Africa (who came from South Africa) and was unearthed in 1923, or thereabouts, and published in the Cape Argus. For what possible reason would she, a child of ten, write thus, if she knew it was a deception?

"2. If the figures were cut out, then similar figures must be in existence in other copies of the book or paper. These have not been found.

"3. There is a great difference in solidity between the 1920 figures and those of 1917, which could be accounted for by waning mediumship, but which is inconsistent with faking.

"4. Experts have reported signs of movement in the figures.

"5. Mr. Gardner formed a high opinion of the character of both of the children and of their father. The latter would certainly have known if there were deception."

Until his death in 1930, Doyle continued to believe that the photos were genuine and that Elsie and Frances were telling the truth. Edward J. Gardner, who first interviewed the girls, also wrote a book on the subject in 1945, in which he includes all five fairy photographs and describes the events that led to their publication.

Although Doyle, Gardner, and Hodson all died believing that the photographs were genuine, the controversy survived them, and more than 60 years after the initial photographs were taken, Frances and Elsie finally admitted that "for the most part, the Cottingley fairy episode was a fraud."

Following Gardner's death in 1970, at age 100, the British press revived the Cottingley fairy story. Beginning in 1971, television programs were produced in which Elsie appeared and described her first conversations with the fairies. Of course, most of these programs were tongue in cheek attempts by the British press to report the historical facts of the episode while, at the same time, leaving no doubt that it was all in good fun. In 1973 the president of the Folklore Society in Yorkshire delivered his annual address, in which he assured his audience that he did not believe the photographs actually depicted real fairies. He concluded this after watching Elsie's 1971 interview.

In 1976, another interview with both Frances and Elsie was televised in Yorkshire. During this program both women confirmed the events recorded by Doyle, Hodson, and Gardner.

Shortly thereafter, Fred Gettings discovered a picture in a book entitled Princess Mary's Gift Book (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1914), which, unlike the Price & Sons advertisement, depicted dancing fairies very similar to those in the first of the photographs. Ironically, Princess Mary's Gift Book also contained an article by Doyle. In 1982 James Randi, the famous magician, published blowups of the photographs to demonstrate that the fairy figurines in the Cottingley photos were cutouts and that the last photograph was a double exposure.

The same year Randi's book appeared, a series of articles by Geoffrey Crawley, entitled "The Astonishing Affair of the Cottingley Fairies," began running as a series in The British Journal of Photography. These articles examine the history of the episode, give an analysis of each of the photographs, and detailed discussions of the Midg camera used by Frances and Elsie and of the source material the girls could have used in constructing the photographs. It also describes Elsie's artistic abilities. The articles become truly "astonishing" in Part 9, which contains a letter from Elsie in which she admits, apparently for the first time, that the fairy photograph episode was a "practical joke that fell flat on its face." She also writes that:

"My dad said really you must tell right now how you got these photos, so I took Frances aside for a serious talk, as the joke had been my own invention. But she begged me not to tell as the Strand Magazine had brought her so much teasing at school, and I was also feeling sad for Conan Doyle, we had read in the newspapers of his getting some jarring comments, first about his interest in Spiritualism and now laughter about his belief in our fairies, there was also a critical cartoon of him in a newspaper chained to a chair with his head in a cloud and Sherlock Holmes stood beside him, he had recently lost his son in the war and the poor man was probably trying to comfort himself with unworldly things."

In the same issue, Frances also admits that the first four photographs were staged but, unlike Elsie, she maintains that the pictures were taken "to help establish that fairies did exist" and that as a child "she did indeed see real fairies very close." In addition, she says she believed that the final photograph was "a genuine one of real fairies."

Apparently, Frances had made a similar confession to Joe Cooper, who published an article on the subject in the British magazine The Unexplained—before its appearance in The British Journal of Photography. Geoffrey Crawley later admitted that he was aware of the confession when he wrote his articles but that he believed that the subsequent confessions made by Frances and Elsie, published in The British Journal of Photography, established for the first time in written form, the reason for the charade. Crawley also sets forth in the articles the first detailed analysis of each of the five photographs and concludes that only one of the photographs, the first one, contained material similar to the illustration found in Princess Mary's Gift Book. The fairy figurines in the next three photographs were drawings made by Elsie from other sources, he says. The first four photographs were taken while the fairy figurines were planted in the earth with hat pins. Crawley, unlike James Randi, offers no solution for the last photograph.

Ironically, Geoffrey Hodson died in January 1983, at age 97 shortly after the beginning of The British Journal of Photography's investigation.

The final chapter in the Cottingley fairy episode was written by Joe Cooper in 1990 when he published his recollections of Frances's first confession. According to Cooper, Frances first confessed in September 1981 during a discussion with him in Canterbury. During this conversation she claimed that the final photo was of real fairies. She also admitted, however, that she brought a copy of Princess Mary's Gift Book with her from South Africa in 1917, and that Elsie in fact copied the figures for the first photograph from that book. Apparently, the first confession made by Elsie was her letter to The British Journal of Photography, which appeared in the April 1, 1983, issue.

Although Frances and Elsie steadfastly maintained that the photographs were valid for most of their lives, they both eventually admitted they were faked. However, Frances only admitted that four of the five were fake. She maintained that the last photograph, which she took, was not faked and, to her dying day, believed in the existence of fairies. Elsie, on the other hand, stated in her last interview that she did not believe in fairies.

In Doyle's December 1920 Strand article he alludes to his Sherlock Holmes character when he writes, "I will now make a few comments upon the two pictures which I have studied long and earnestly with a high powered lens." Cooper, in his 1990 book, also mentions Holmes in his discussion of the fairy photos in a four-page pastiche in which Holmes solves the Cottingley fairy mystery. One telling incident occurs after Holmes solves the mystery and Doyle recalls that he wrote an article in Princess Mary's Gift Book. In hindsight, he laments that he should have realized that the figures in that book could have been copied by the girls for their fairy pictures.

Sources:

Cooper, Joe. The Case of the Cottingley Fairies. London: Robert Hale, 1990.

Crawley, Geoffrey. "The Astonishing Affair of the Cottingley Fairies." British Journal of Photography 24 (December 1982–April 1983; 24 May 1985; 25 July 1986).

Doyle, Arthur Conan. "The Cottingley Fairies: An Epilogue." Strand Magazine 65 (February 1923).

———. "The Evidence for Fairies; with More Fairy Photographs." Strand Magazine 61 (March 1921): 199–206.

———. "Fairies Photographed: An Epic-Making Event." Strand Magazine 60 (December 1920): 463–68.

Gardner, Edward L. Fairies: The Cottingley Photographs and Their Sequel. London: The Theosophical Publishing House, 1945.

Hodson, Geoffrey. Fairies at Work and Play. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1925.

Coué, Emile (1857–1926)

Founder of a popular system of autosuggestion that reportedly had great success in healing many illnesses and diseases. The essence of autosuggestion was that Coué himself was not a healer, but taught techniques by which his patients could heal themselves. His system is quite similar to New Thought and directly influenced modern ideas about the power of the mind.

Coué was born February 26, 1857, in Troyes, in the Aube district of France. He attended the town school until age 15 before studying in the high school, where he showed great aptitude for science. At the age of 19, he was apprenticed in a drugstore in Troyes, later studying chemistry at the École de Pharmacie in Paris. In 1882 he returned to Troyes and became proprietor of a drugstore. He married in 1884.

Soon afterward he was persuaded to listen to a lecture by a Dr. Liebault at the Nancy School of Hypnotism. Coué developed a great interest in hypnotism, but he thought Liebault's procedures lacked systematic method. He took an American correspondence course in hypnotism and practiced on patients who came to his drugstore. He observed that many subjects were not completely hypnotized although they were beneficially affected by simple drugs in a degree far beyond the actual medical potency of the drugs. From observation of his patients, Coué developed a theory of suggestion. He abandoned traditional hypnosis, requiring his patients to make their own suggestion for healing.

In 1910 he retired from business and moved to Nancy, where he concentrated on his practice of autosuggestion, sometimes treating as many as 15,000 people a year. He became well known after the celebrated psychologist Charles Baudoin described his methods in the book Suggestion and Autosuggestion (1920), which he dedicated to Coué. In 1921 the British physician Dr. Monier-Williams traveled to Nancy and studied Coué's methods. Upon returning to London, he opened a clinic for the practice of conscious autosuggestion, The Coué Institute for the Practice of Conscious Autosuggestion, in London treated thousands of patients annually. In 1923 a similar institute was established in Paris.

Coué toured America, where he popularized the phrase "Every day in every way, I get better and better" as part of his therapeutic method. This was a conscious suggestion that the subject was required to repeat in early morning and before going to sleep at night. Coué died at Nancy July 2, 1926. Conscious suggestion has since become an integral element in many popular systems of healing and self-improvement.

Sources:

Brooks, C. Harry. The Practice of Autosuggestion by the Method of Emile Coué. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1922.

Coué, Emile. My Method, Including American Impressions. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Page, 1923.

———. Self Mastery through Conscious Autosuggestion. New York: American Library Service, 1922.

Kirk, Ella Boyce. My Pilgrimage to Coué. New York: American Library Service, 1922.

MacNaghten, Hugh. Emile Coué: the Man and his Work. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1922.

Council on Spiritual Practices

The Council on Spiritual Practices (CSP) is an organization bringing together religious scholars, scientists, and spiritual guides who share a mutual interest in the importance of the direct experience of the sacred dimension (for which each religion has its own descriptive terminology). It is their belief that such experiences, which are facilitated by various spiritual practices and the entering of different altered states of consciousness, have salutary effects upon the individual experiencing them and secondarily upon their acquaintances and the world. To that end, CSP has developed two programmatic thrusts. First, it attempts to discover approaches to primary religious experiences that are safe and effective. Second, it assists both individuals and spiritual communities by introducing them to spiritual experiences.

It is CSP's assumption that direct religious experience is not confined to any one religious community but occurs in all of them. Thus, it works in a multireligious context.

The council emerged in the 1990s in the wake of a series of court cases that supported the laws prohibiting the use of consciousness altering drugs even in a religious context. A significant aspect of CSP's program and raison d'être is its Entheogen Project. Entheogens are substances taken to facilitate spiritual or mystical experiences, the most well-known examples being LSD and peyote. The project, building upon a generation of research, attempts further research on the use of entheogens and explores creative ways that public policy might be altered to accommodate their use. Safety remains an issue in the use of entheogens and many advocate that newcomers make use of an experienced guide. CSP advocates a code of ethics for such guides, who should be properly motivated, competent, and tolerant of a wide variety of religious beliefs.

The council may be contacted at Box 460820, San Francisco, CA 94146-0820 or through its Internet site at http://www.csp.org/.

Sources:

Council on Spiritual Practices. http://www.csp.org/. May 16, 2000.

Count Dracula Fan Club

Founded in 1965 by Jeanne K. Youngson, with a membership of individuals interested in the literary and historical aspects of Bram Stoker's book Dracula, and related topics of vampire and horror lore. Youngson became interested in the historical Dracula in college and, while touring Romania, she made the decision to start the club. The club disseminates information, issues newsletters and books to members, and sponsors movie showings, trips, and meetings. It maintains a large research library, opened in 1970, which includes books on vampires and of the horror genre.

The club provides a wide range of services for its members including assistance in locating hard-to-find books and helping authors working on books about Count Dracula or vampirism. The club also sells vampire memorabilia and artifacts.

The club is organized into a number of divisions, including the Research Referral Centre, Dracula Press, Vampire Bookshop, Booksearch, the Moldavian Marketplace, Dracula World Enterprises, the Vampire Institute, Vampire Pen Friends Network, and the Bram Stoker Memorial Association. Young members (age 16 and under) are enrolled in Vampires Are Us, the junior division. There are also Werewolf in Fact, Fiction, and Fantasy and International Frankenstein Society divisions.

The 5,000-member club publishes four newsletters: The Dracula News-Journal, Bites & Pieces, Leterzine, and Undead Undulations. Address: 29 Washington Square W., Penthouse N., New York, NY 10011.

Sources:

Polidori, John, et al. The Count Dracula Fan Club Book of Vampire Stories. Chicago: Adams Press, 1980.

Youngson, Jeanne, ed. A Child's Garden of Vampires. Chicago: Adams Press, 1980.

———. The Count Dracula Book of Classic Vampire Tales. Chicago: Adams Press, 1981.

Youngson, Jeanne, and Shelley Leigh Hunt, ed. Do Vampires Exist? A Special Report from Dracula World Enterprises. New York: Dracula World Enterprises, 1993.

Count Dracula Society

Founded in 1962 by Dr. Donald A. Reed for the serious study of horror films and gothic literature. It is closely associated with the Academy of Science Fiction, Fantasy and Horror Films, dedicated to honoring films and filmmakers in the several genres. The society hosts regular screenings of vampire and horror films and also sponsors an annual gathering at which the Ann Radcliffe Award is given.

The Count Dracula Quarterly (also known at various times as The Castle Dracula Quarterly and The Gothick Gateway,) has been discontinued. Address: 334 W. 54th St. Los Angeles, CA 90037.

Sources:

Reed, Donald. The Vampire on the Screen. Inglewood, Calif.: Wagon & Star Publishers, 1965.

Counter Charms

Charms employed to counteract the effect of other charms. When magicians wished to disenchant animals, they sprinkled salt in a porringer (a small basin) with some blood from one of the bewitched creatures and repeated certain formulas for nine days.

The Count Ken Fan Club

Founded in 1984 by Ken Gilbert as a vampire interest organization. Last known address: 18 Palmer St., Salem, MA 01970.

Counts of Hell

Demons of superior order in the infernal hierarchy, who are said to command numerous legions. They may be evoked at all hours of the day, provided the evocation takes place in a wild, unfrequented spot. (See also Chevaliers de l'Enfer)

Courmes, Dominique Albert (1843–1914)

French naval officer and pioneer French Theosophist. Courmes was born on August 4, 1843, at Rouen. He joined the navy when he was 17 years old and after an outstanding career became its commandant. He was awarded the Legion of Honor at the time of his retirement in 1896.

In his middle years, Courmes studied Spiritualism, Spiritism, and Theosophy successively. He is credited with saving the records of Spiritist leader Allan Kardec when they were threatened during the days of the Paris Commune (1871). He also wrote the first article on Theosophy published in France, in 1877–78 in the Revue Spirite. In 1880 he joined the Theosophical Society and that same year translated the Buddhist Catechism, prepared by theosophical president Henry Steel Olcott, into French. He finally met Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, cofounder of the society, in 1884 and promised to translate her key work, The Secret Doctrine, into French. Sections of the translation began to appear serially in a French theosophical magazine in 1889 and were finally issued in a six-volume edition (1899–1910).

Courmes's retirement from the navy was prompted by the Theosophists' need of an editor for Le Lotus Bleu, their French-language journal. He made a number of notable contributions, including further translations of Blavatsky's writings and original essays of his own. He also translated the Hindu classic the Bhagavad Gita (1910). Courmes was the titular head of the theosophical movement in Paris until the organization of the French section of the Theosophical Society in 1900, when he proposed a colleague as the first general secretary.

Sources:

Courmes, D. A. A Theosophical Question Book. Translated from the French by Elin Salzer and Harry Banbery. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophist Office, 1898.

A Course in Miracles

A Course in Miracles (ACIM), published in 1975, emerged as the most successful channeled work to be produced in the English-speaking world in the last half of the twentieth century. By the end of the twentieth century, more than a million copies had been published. The material in ACIM was received quietly over eight years (1965–1973) by Dr. Helen Schucman (1910–1981), the assistant to the head of the Department of Psychology at Presbyterian Hospital in New York City, and an associate professor of psychology at Columbia University's College of Physicians and Surgeons.

In spite of having adopted a secular atheist perspective earlier in her life, Schucman began to have visionary experiences and to hear an inner voice. Then one day, the voice said, "This is a course in miracles. Please take notes." She confided this experience with a colleague, William N. Tetford, and he encouraged her to follow her inner instructions. She began to take notes in shorthand. That very evening she began receiving what was to become a 622-page textbook, the heart of the Course. Over the next seven years she also received the material for a 478-page Workbook and 88-page teacher's Manual.

The atheist Schucman continued to have intellectual problems with her channeling activity, problems complicated by the apparent source of the material she was receiving—the biblical Jesus Christ. The Course was published without her name, and her identity was kept confidential by the small inner circle of people who initially read the manuscript and assisted in the publication. Prominent among these was Judith Skutch. Once published in 1975, however, it quickly found an audience, especially in New Thought churches with whose perspective the ACIM largely agreed. The Foundation for Inner Peace was created to hold the copyrights of ACIM and to keep it in publication. However, the foundation made no attempt to control the efforts of people to form groups to study and disseminate the teachings. Numerous study groups were founded across North America and increasingly through the 1980s around the world. A new generation of teachers, including Marianne Williamson, Tara Singh, Dr. Gerald Jampolsky, and most prominently, Kenneth and Gloria Wapnick, emerged as leaders in the loosely organized movement.

In the vacuum left by the Foundation for Inner Peace, different organizations emerged to perform various functions. Saul Steinberg, owner of Coleman Graphics, which originally published A Course in Miracles, founded Miracle Life, Inc. (now Miracle Experiences, Inc.), to publish Course-related materials and promote conferences and workshops. Miracle Distribution Center has become the nexus of an international network of study groups. A center in San Francisco became the first group to evolve into a church and offer ministerial training and ordinations. Jampolsky's Center for Attitudinal Healing was the first organization to promote the use of the Course in the healing of psychological problems.

The thrust of the teachings received by Schucman concerned miracles as shifts in perception that move the individual from perceptions based on guilt to perceptions based on love, from perceptions based on ego to those based on God. The commonly held illusions lead to the disastrous belief that humanity is separated from God and deserving of punishment. The illusion of separation has itself created a separation that needs to be healed. However, we tend to deny the problem and suppress feelings of guilt, shame, and self-hate as well as the accompanying irrational projection of such feelings on others, both individuals and groups.

The Course teaches that humans have the ability to choose not to live with guilt, but must learn to see the real world and get themselves free of the harmful illusions. Forgiveness is the key to breaking the cycle of self-hate. Through forgiving others, people come to see hostile behavior patterns as a product of self-condemnation. Ultimately, salvation is a relational reality, and is found in a forgiving community. Such relationships make visible the tendency to project.

The Course also emphasizes that people generally need help from outside themselves to gain the new perspective they need. It teaches that humans have forgotten their divine nature and need to be awakened by God to the nature of the hell they have created for themselves. Sin, toward God, is an illusion. Thus individuals need to be awakened to their nature as God's children and from that point, learn to forgive.

The Foundation for Inner Peace is currently located at P. O. Box 798, Mill Valley, CA 94942-0598. It has a webpage at http://www.acim.org/. The foundation is leading the effort to translate ACIM, and German, French, and Spanish editions have already been published. The Miracle Distribution Center is located at 1141 East Ash Ave., Fullerton, CA 92831. Its Internet site is at http://www.miraclecenter.org/. The center publishes a list of ACIM study centers around the world.

Sources:

A Course in Miracles. 3 vols. New York: Foundation for Inner Peace, 1975.

Koggend, John. "The Gospel According to Helen." Psychology Today 14 (September 1980): 74–78.

Miller, D. Patrick. The Complete Story of the Course: The History, the People and the Controversies Behind A Course in Miracles. Berkeley, Calif.: Fearless Books, 1997.

Singh, Tara. How to Learn from A Course in Miracles. Los Angeles: Life Action Press, 1988.

Wapnick, Kenneth. Absence of Felicity: The Story of Helen Schucman and Her Scribing of A Course in Miracles. Roscoe, N.Y.: Foundation for "A Course in Miracles," 1991.

Covenant of the Goddess (CoG)

The Covenant of the Goddess (CoG) is the oldest and largest non-denominational organization of Witches in North America. Ten otherwise autonomous covens and several solitary practitioners in California founded CoG. They wanted to foster cooperation among Witches of various traditions and to ensure that practitioners of witchcraft are afforded the same rights and protections as clergy of other faith traditions.

Membership is open to covens and individual Witches. In addition to Wiccans, the Covenant's membership includes Dianic (goddess only) Witches, Stregheria (Italian Witches), family traditions, and diverse other eclectic Witches. CoG views the autonomy, secrecy, and diversity of covens and individuals as one of its strengths.

Prospective members must meet the following criteria:

1. Generally focus its liturgy, theology, and practices around the worship of the Goddess or the Goddess and the Old Gods;
2. agree to abide by a code of ethics compatible with that of the Covenant; have been meeting monthly or oftener for at least six months;
3. have three or more adult members, at least one of whom is an initiate;
4. and be a cohesive, self perpetuating group.

Applicants must be sponsored by at least two witches "known to CoG," meaning that they need not necessarily be members, and must agree to a set of guidelines on finances. The national membership reviews each applicant's statement of practice and letters of recommendation that are published in The CoG Newsletter before full membership is granted.

CoG has also established an associates program for covens, individuals, or campus groups that do not meet the criteria for full membership in CoG, but still wish to participate in the CoG community.

CoG is organized through 14 Local Councils nationwide as of 2000. In addition to Local Councils, there are covens at large, solitaries at large, and a few international members (currently only in Canada, although there have been members from the UK and Australia). Prospective members must join through their Local Council. If prospective members live in an area where there is no Local Council, they may join at the national level. When three or more covens of at least two different traditions (denominations) within a reasonable traveling distance of one another are granted membership, they are encouraged to form a Local Council in their area. Sometimes a Local Council grows large, and often "hives off," or divides into two or more Local Councils.

In late August or early September, business of the Covenant is conducted at an annual meeting called Grand Council. This convocation rotates around the country, being hosted by a different Local Council each year. Decisions are made through consensus process, with occasional exceptions.

The Covenant is empowered to issue clergy credentials to qualified members. CoG clergy marry and bury people and perform other duties traditionally done by clergy of other faith traditions. Some members volunteer within the prison system when the request is made by inmates and prison authorities. Others work in hospitals, hospices, schools, colleges, and in other venues when solicited.

Over the years CoG has sought to educate the media and law enforcement about witchcraft. CoG provides speakers to schools, colleges, interfaith groups, conservation groups, and the funeral industry, and CoG members serve as consultants to film and television producers. The U.S. Department of Defense consulted with CoG members in the publication of its 1988 directive entitled "Accommodation of Religious Practices Within the U.S. Military" (U.S. Military Chaplains' Manual). In addition, representatives of the Covenant have cosigned with other Pagans on statements of common concern, such as the July 4, 1999 Pagan Educational Network press release about First Amendment freedoms issued in the wake of Georgia's Republican Congressman Bob Barr's challenge to Wiccans serving in the military.

In 1993 CoG participated in the second-ever Parliament of World Religions (PWR) in Chicago. An important document, originally drafted by Swiss Roman Catholic theologian Hans Kung and modified by delegates to the Parliament, entitled "Toward a Recognition of a Global Ethic," was signed on behalf of CoG, Circle Sanctuary, and the EarthSpirit Community by CoG member Deborah Ann Light.

CoG continues to work in the areas of international interfaith with its active participation in the creation, formulation, and ongoing work of the Parliament of World Religions. The Parliament reconvened in Capetown, South Africa in 1999, and in the United Religions Initiative. In addition, CoG members in different localities participate in regional interfaith groups.

CoG has established a religion badge called the Hart and Crescent Award. This may be earned by young persons age 11 or older who is a member of any Nature-oriented religion (Witchcraft, Druid, Asatru, Native American, etc.). Members of the Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, and other youth organizations can also earn the award. An adult version, the Distinguished Youth Service Award, is for any adult who volunteers excellent service to youth. The award has been accepted by the Girls Scouts of America, but so far rejected by the Boy Scouts of America. The Hart and Crescent award have been granted to them nonetheless.

The group maintains a website at http://www.cog.org/. Among other things, this site contains a bibliography of children's books suitable for Witch children, a memorial page, and teen page. CoG may be contacted at P.O. Box 1226, Berkeley, CA 94701. In 2000, CoG had 139 member covens and 92 individual members.

Sources:

Starhawk. The Spiral Dance. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1979, 1989, 1999.

Covenant of Unitarian Universalist Pagans

The Unitarian Universalist Association began in the activity of various Christian ministers who rejected some of the doctrines that in the nineteenth century were considered essential to orthodox Christian faith. John Murray led a group who believed in universal salvation and rejected the idea of a judgmental God and a hell of eternal torment. William Ellery Channing led a group who rejected the idea of the Trinity and the associated idea of the divinity of Jesus. They believed in the unity of God and that Jesus was God's son. Unitarian and Universalists emerged as the most liberal wing of Protestant Christianity. Their commonalties led to their merging in 1961. By the time of the merger, both groups had become quite diverse and the drift from their Christian origin more pronounced. Within the organization were ministers and members who drew their inspiration from a variety of spiritual streams from Buddhism to Humanism, and groups were formed within the association to give voice to the different spiritual paths that were being followed.

By the mid-1980s, some Unitarians had come into contact with the emerging Wicca/Pagan community and the Goddess worship and feminism so central to it. At the 1985 meeting of the association, these pro-Pagans held a summer solstice ritual and discussed the possibility of establishing an ongoing organization. An interim steering committee began to function, a newsletter was begun, and Margo Adler, author of Drawing Down the Moon, a survey of modern Paganism, was invited to speak at the 1987 meeting. During that meeting the Covenant of Unitarian Universalist Pagans (CUUPs) was formally organized.

CUUPs quickly emerged as one of the strongest subgroups within the association. Many Unitarians, already committed to feminist values, were attracted to Goddess worship. Many Pagans, unhappy with their life disconnected from the established religious community, saw CUUPs as a means to remain Pagan but gain some legitimacy in the culture. CUUPs also became a means for Pagans to gain a seminary education at the Unitarian Universalist seminaries. Chapters emerged across the United States and by the end of the 1990s there were more than 80.

CUUPs is headed by a board of directors. It holds an annual gathering that has become one of the best attended sessions at the annual international summer meeting of the Unitarian Universalist Association. The CUUPs newsletter, Pagan NUUS, is published at the headquarters, which may be contacted at Box 640, Cambridge, MA 02140.

Sources:

Adler, Margot. Drawing Down the Moon. Rev. ed. Boston: Beacon Press, 1997.

Cox, Edward William (1809–1879)

Lawyer and well-known British psychical investigator in the days preceding the foundation of the Society for Psychical Research. Cox was born in 1809 in Taunton, England, and educated there. Cox's career in psychical research was concentrated during the last decade of his life. He was a member of the investigating committee of the London Dialectical Society, which published its famous Report on Spiritualism in 1871. He did not accept the "spirit" hypothesis and in its stead argued for the existence of a psychic force that would explain many forms of psychic phenomena. His idea was explained in a booklet, Spiritualism Scientifically Examined with Proofs of the Existence of a Psychic Force (1872), and in a larger work, The Mechanism of Man: An Answer to the Question "What Am I?" (1876). For systematic research into the mystery of psychic phenomena, he founded, in 1875, the Psychological Society for Great Britain.

Cox is most remembered for his work with William Crookes in his first experiments with D. D. Home. He was a shrewd and most capable investigator and well aware of most of the tricks used by fraudulent mediums in the production of fake materialization phenomena. Cox was supportive of Home's mediumship and shared his opinions in a letter to Crookes:

"In the investigations in which you so kindly assisted me there was nothing of this precaution and mystery. You sat with me anywhere, at any time, in my garden, and in my house; by day and by night; but always, with one memorable exception, in full light. You objected to no tests; on the contrary you invited them. I was permitted the full use of all my senses. The experiments were made in every form ingenuity could devise, and you were as desirous to learn the truth and the meaning of it as I was. You sat alone with me, and things were done which, if four confederates had been present, their united efforts could not have accomplished. Sometimes there were phenomena, sometimes there were none. When they occurred they were often such as no human hand could have produced without the machinery of the Egyptian Hall [the scene of conjuring magician J. N. Maskelyne's shows]. But these were in my own drawing-room, and library, and gardens, where no mechanism was possible. In this manner it was that I arrived at the conviction—opposed to all my prejudices and preconceptions—that there are forces about us of some kind, having both power and intelligence, but imperceptible to our senses, except under some imperfectly known conditions. . . ."

However, he was highly critical of Florence Cook and Mary Showers. Cox's letter to the medium D. D. Home, published in Home's Lights and Shadows of Spiritualism (1877), is thought to refer to these two mediums. He was present on the occasion in which Cook and Showers appeared in what was supposed to be a joint materialization. He noted that both materialized forms were solid flesh and breathed and perspired.

Cox died at his home in Middlesex, England, on November 24, 1879.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Cox, Edward W. The Mechanism of Man: An Answer to the Question "What Am I?" London: Longman, 1876.

———. What Am I?: A Popular Introduction to Mental Philosophy and Psychology. London: Longman, 1974.

Dingwall, E. J. The Critic's Dilemma: Further Comments on Some Nineteenth Century Investigations. Dewsbury, England: The Author, 1966.

Hall, Trevor H. Florence Cook & William Crookes: A Footnote to an Enquiry. London: Tomorrow Publications Ltd., 1963.

———. The Spiritualists: The Story of Florence Cook and William Crookes. New York: Helix Press, 1962.

Cox, William Edward (1915–1994)

Mechanical engineer and psychical researcher and lecturer. He was born September 12, 1915, at Wilmington, North Carolina, and was educated at Louisburg College, Antioch College, and the University of the South. As a young man he became interested in stage magic, which led him into the study of psychic phenomena and parapsychology. His primary research was devoted to psychokinesis, in which he developed some innovative experiments. In 1951 he introduced the PK-Placement method, a technique by which objects are released mechanically over an equally divided surface. The subject attempts to make the object fall to one side of the division. Cox also adapted ESP techniques for use in psychokinesis experiments. He was credited with keeping psychokinesis research alive during a period when it had largely been abandoned by parapsychology. In 1957 he won a prize presented by the Society for Psychical Research for the most original essay in parapsychology. Cox also became a research associate at the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke University and from that time on devoted the majority of his time to parapsychology. He later worked at the Institute for Parapsychology.

Cox wrote more than 50 articles on parapsychology. He was a charter member of the Parapsychological Association, a board member of the Foundation for Research on the Nature of Man, a member of various psychical research organizations, and an associate member of the Society of American Magicians. Cox died on June 12, 1994.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Cox, William E. "The Effects of PK on the Placement of Falling Objects." Journal of Parapsychology 15 (1951): 40–48.

———. Mentalis and Magicians: Some Conclusive Arguments about a Modern Problem. Singapore: Stamford College Press, 1972.

———. "Precognition and Intervention." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 50 (1956): 47–58.

Cox, William Sebron (1939–)

American parapsychologist on the research staff of the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke University, 1958–59. He was born January 11, 1939, at Laredo, Texas, and was educated at St. Mary's University, San Antonio, Texas (B.A., 1956). He is a member of the American Association for Advancement of Science, the Parapsychological Association, and the Speleological Society. He founded and was the first president of the Austin (Texas) Parapsychology Society. In collaboration with Christianne Vasse, he developed a new test for psychokinesis using colored cubes.

Sources:

Cox, William S. "An Experiment in Extra-Sensory Perception." Journal of Experimental Psychology 19 (1936): 429–37.

Craddock, Frederick G. Foster (ca. 1920)

British materialization medium with a colorful career, several times exposed in imposture. As early as 1879, in Manchester, the materialized spirit "Rosetta" was grabbed and the light revealed the medium in his shirt and one stocking. Craddock recovered from this incident and went on to practice his mediumship for many years. In 1904 he came back into the public limelight when Henry Llewellyn and Gambier Bolton related their experiences in Bolton's book Psychic Force (1904).

In 1906 Craddock was dragged into court by the Daily Express newspaper for obtaining money under false pretenses. Lt. Col. Mark Mayhew, writing in Light, March 24, 1906, described how the spirit "Abdullah" was seized and found to be the medium. Those present at the session also saw Craddock remove a false moustache and put it in his pocket.

Admiral Usborne Moore, also present at the sitting, then had the doors locked, took the key, and commanded a search. Craddock placed himself in a fighting position and his wife attacked the admiral with a fire shovel. The search was conducted anyway. In a drawer a small electric torch was found, the instrument of spirit lights. Craddock would not allow the search of his person. For this reason Moore, in Glimpses of the Next Slate (1911), could not excuse him.

Moore concluded, however, that Craddock was apparently in trance at the moment he was seized for when he scrambled up into his chair he chattered in the voice of "Graem," his principal control. Moore believed that Graem was an undesirable spirit. Admiral Moore concluded that Craddock was a sensitive who had prostituted his gift. Even if the voices of Graem and "Red Crow," a Native American control, could be assumed, he argued that it would be impossible to reproduce constantly and faithfully the voices and special modes of speech of "Adler," "Sister Aimee," "Joey Grimaldi" and the French girl "Cerise."

Moore's opinion now seems somewhat naive, considering the varied performances of stage ventriloquists who can reproduce a number of different voices at high speed. As for the impersonated spirit Abdullah, Moore recorded that he saw him twice in Toledo, through the mediumship of Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Jonson.

As a consequence of the exposure by Mayhew, Craddock was fined in the Edgware Police Court 10 pounds or one month's imprisonment. A week after Mayhew's article, William McDougall, of Oxford, told the story in Light, March 31, 1906, of a similar experience with Craddock six years before. Abdullah, the spirit, was found to be identical to Craddock. The story was originally related in the spiritualist magazine, The Two Worlds, but the editor withheld the name of the medium.

As a result of the scandal surrounding his 1906 exposures, Craddock withdrew from the limelight, but he did not give up professional mediumship. H. Dennis Bradley in The Wisdom of the Gods (1925) describes a direct voice sitting with him on December 5, 1924. Seemingly oblivious to the mechanisms of materialization and unaware of his former exposure, Bradley asserts,

"Throughout I could not help feeling a suggestion of supernormal impersonation. On the whole I am inclined to think that Craddock has considerable powers but I should imagine that these powers vary. His guides appeared to me to be very evasive in their replies to questions verging on any evidential point. I am inclined to think his mediumship is more upon the physical than the mental plane."

A few years later, in his The Tragedy of the Heavens (1930), Walter Gibbons described Craddock as one of the greatest direct voice mediums, as:

"The possessor of a power that is unique in strength and quality, and should he choose to utilize his exceptional gifts for gain, he could, by reason of so doing, be an exceedingly wealthy man. However, this could never be, so he lives the life of a recluse in a small country cottage in very humble circumstances, mainly supported by one or two friends."

Reading all the evidence, however, one would have to be excessively charitable to believe that Craddock was other than a persistent fraud.

Sources:

Bradley, H. Dennis. The Wisdom of the Gods. London: T. Werner Lavrie Ltd., 1925.

"Exposures of Mr. Craddock." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 12.

Gibbons, Walter. The Tragedy of the Heavens. N.p., 1930.

Cramp-Rings, Hallowing

A ceremony that took place in England on Good Friday. It consisted of the repetition of certain psalms and prayers, during which the king rubbed the rings between his hands. It was said that rings consecrated on Good Friday by the kings of England had the power of curing cramp. The rings, which were given away, were much in request even by foreign ambassadors. (See also king's evil)

Crandon, Mina Stinson ("Margery") (1889–1941)

Famous American medium of Boston, whose phenomena became the focus of a major controvery over fraud and physical mediumship. Mina Stinson was born July 29, 1889 on a farm in Princeton, Ontario. She moved to Boston in 1904 and worked as a secretary to the Union Congregational Church. In 1910 she married Earl P. Rand, a local grocer, and bore him a son. They were divorced in 1918, and soon afterward Mina married Dr. L. R. G. Crandon, professor of surgery at Harvard Medical School and author of a textbook on post surgical treatment. "Margery" had met Crandon when he performed surgery on her in 1917.

Crandon was a materialist, but one day he read W. J. Crawford's book on the Goligher Circle, and partly as a joke, partly out of curiosity, he began to experiment in his home. His wife, in a chance visit to a clairvoyant, received a communication from the alleged spirit of her older brother Walter Stinson, who was killed in a railroad accident years before. The first sitting in the Crandon house was held during May 1923. Out of six sitters Margery alone was found to have the power of animating the table. Answers were "tilted out" and gradually she developed as a medium.

Raps came as the second stage and trance as the third. Joining hands replaced table contact and Margery withdrew into a cabinet. But the trance was only intermittent. She remained alert for the better part of the sitting and only went into a trance when "Walter," the spirit, had a lot to say. He was in full charge of the proceedings; messages of lesser spirits had to be relayed through him.

Automatic writing, psychic music, and finally direct voice completed the development of Margery's mediumship. With the advent of the latter the trance phase was abandoned. Power ran high and the cabinet, as a demonstration, was wrecked by invisible hands. Clocks were stopped at announced times and Walter's activity was noticed all over the house.

At this stage, a Harvard group conducted the first of many trying scientific investigations into Margery's mediumship. Anxiously trying to find a normal explanation for the puzzling phenomena, the group accused Margery of using a carpet thread to make a piano stool appear to move by itself.

The charge was soon withdrawn, but though Walter agreed to restrict the phenomena to a single room for the purposes of better control, no progress was made. At the end of 1923 Margery and Dr. Crandon visited Europe. In Paris Margery sat for Gustav Geley, Charles Richet, and others. With the strictest control, excellent phenomena were produced.

Still more successful was a séance before the Society for Psychical Research in London. Harry Price's famous fraud-proof table was, in white light, twice levitated to a height of six inches. Other sittings at the British College of Psychic Science and psychic photography obtained with William Hope and Ada Emma Deane established Margery's reputation as a powerful medium.

It appeared that while in Europe, Margery learned some of the tricks of fraudulent mediumship and upon her return to America, she resolved to develop materialization. Psychic lights signalled the first phase; ghostly fingers lit up the darkness and produced contacts; curious forms, which Walter called his psychic pet animals, were observed; and independent writing developed on a phosphorescent background. Materialized hands performed pickpocketing stunts and—as a further evolution in vocal phenomena—tunes were produced by whistling and raps.

On April 12, 1924, the widely discussed investigation of the Scientific American committee began. Scientific instruments were introduced and recorded brand new phenomena.

Despite many striking demonstrations, however, the committee came to a deadlock and the only thing approaching a verdict was a series of individual statements published in the November 1924 issue of the magazine. Hereward Carrington pronounced the mediumship genuine; Harry Houdini fradulent; Walter Franklin Prince, William McDougall, and another fraudulent member were noncommittal.

J. Malcolm Bird, the secretary of the committee, was satisfied after 10–12 sittings that the phenomena were genuine. McDougall and Prince, however, even after further sittings, were unwilling to make a public commitment, though Prince had become convinced privately that Margery was a fraud, an opinion he would soon publish.

Another Harvard Committee also refused a final decision, and precise conclusions were absent from the report of E. J. Dingwall published in the Proceedings of the Society Psychical Research. From his sittings in January and February 1925, in Boston, Dingwall observed that "phenomena occurred hitherto unrecorded in mediumistic history . . . the mediumship remains one of the most remarkable in the history of psychical research," but troubled by the possibility of undetected hoaxing, he concluded that the mediumship "may be classed with those of Home, Moses and Palladino as showing the extreme difficulty of reaching finality in conclusions, notwithstanding the time and attention directed to the investigation of them."

Finally, J. B. Rhine, Prince, and others published an attack on Margery's mediumship. Dr. Crandon defended his wife in a pamphlet Margery, Harvard, Veritas published in 1925. The controversy over Margery had become so intense within the American Society for Psychical Research that the society was split. Those who had become her detractors, including Murphy and Prince, withdrew and founded the Boston Society for Psychic Research.

Sittings and experiments continued through the late 1920s, however, and two important experimental apparatus were introduced. One, a voice-cut-out machine offered evidence that Walter's voice was independent of the medium and sitters. The second, a glass cabinet, resembled a telephone booth and had small holes on the sides for the hands, which, together with Margery's ankles and neck, were wired to screw eyes.

Much excitement was produced in these sittings by a series of thumbprints obtained in wax that experts pronounced to be fraud-proof. They were partially identified with remains found on a razor of the thumbprints of Margery's dead brother Walter.

It was partly by such fingerprints that R. J. Tillyard, the famous Australian entomologist, became convinced—in a sitting alone with Margery on July 13, 1928. These experiments were repeated. On March 11, 1931, William H. Button, president of the American Society for Psychical Research, obtained a thumbprint he described as one of the best Walter prints yet obtained.

Later developments, however, considerably destroyed this part of Walter's achievements. Bulletin 18 (Fingerprint Demonstrations) of the Boston Society for Psychical Research, which contained a foreword by Prince and three articles by E. E. Dudley, Hereward Carrington, and Arthur Goadby, disclosed that the Walter fingerprints corresponded exactly with those of a Mr. Kerwin, an early sitter of the Margery circle. As the chances of the fingerprints of two persons being identical are said to be nil, Dudley inferred that Kerwin was "Walter." As the promised investigation by the American Society for Psychical Research continued without a definite conclusion, Prince, in Bulletin 19 (January 1933), alleged fraud, asserting, "For six years Walter has been claiming that the scores of issuing thumbprints, with a few exceptions, were his own, explaining the processes employed. In the light of the proved facts that claim is fraudulent."

The cross-correspondence, devised by Walter and reported by Dr. Mark Wyman Richardson in Psychic Research (May–September 1928) provided more evidence for evaluation, as they seemed to be methodologically sound and provided a fraud-proof technique to bar any eventual allegation of a collusion between experimenters and automatist.

The cross-correspondences occurred in March, 1928; several Chinese scripts came through. R. F. Johnson, of the Society for Psychical Research, attacked them and concluded that:

"whoever the communicator on this occasion may have been, he was certainly not the great Chinese sage (Confucius) whose name he adopted. It is also too obvious to need emphasis that the style of the writing is not ancient, that the whole contents of the script consist of ordinary modern Chinese written by a very poor scribe; that both pages of the script contain not a single word or line (barring a trifling exception) that is not a quotation."

Johnson's critique was answered by Malcolm Bird, who was research officer of the American Soceity for Psychical Research (ASPR). In an article in Psychic Research (August 1929), he pointed to important, unconsidered facts. First, he noted that the scripts did not identify their author as Confucius. Walter never made such a claim. He declared that Chinese spirits, the disciples of Confucius, helped him to get the test through. The important point, he said, was that the scripts were supernormally produced.

Margery delivered the first Chinese script on March 17, 1928, in red light, with closed eyes. She did not know Chinese, nor did the sitters. The very reason of the test was to demonstrate that minds other than the medium and sitters were at work. At the next séance, on March 22, two columns of Chinese were written in total darkness, on specially marked paper. Walter announced that he would try a Chinese-English cross-correspondence with Henry Hardwicke, of Niagara Falls, a distance of 450 miles from Boston. He asked Bird to pick out a sentence, which should be given through Hardwicke in Chinese. Bird chose "A rolling stone gathers no moss." The sitting was hardly over when a telegram arrived from Niagara Falls. A few days later it was followed by the original witnessed copy of Hardwicke's script. It showed a Maltese cross within the circle, a rectangle enclosing the name Kung-fu-tze, the symbols for Bird and Hill, and the Chinese sentence, the general meaning of which was, "A travelling agitator gathers no gold." Johnson's analysis revealed further important element. In the left hand column are found the words, "I am not dead, Confucius." The duplicate of this is in the right hand column of the Margery script of March 17.

In addition to that of Hardwicke, cross-correspondences were effected in Chinese through Sarah Litzelmann, who knew no Chinese either and lived in Ogunquit, Maine, a distance of 80 miles from Boston. Never before had she been in a trance.

In The Story of Psychic Science (1930), Hereward Carrington thus summarized his own conclusions about Margery:

"It certainly is one of the most baffling and extraordinary cases in history—and this is true, no matter how we choose to regard it. For my own part I occupy the same position as I did when rendering my formal Report in the Scientific American, which is that, despite the difficulties involved in arriving at any just estimate of this case, and despite the uncertainty of many of the phenomena and the complicated social, ethical, personal, physical and psychological factors involved, a number of seemingly genuine, supernormal manifestations yet remain, which are of the profoundest interest to psychical, as well as to ethico-sociological science."

As parapsychology has moved forward in its appraisal of Margery and other materialization mediums, however, Carrington's hesitancy appears to be a mixture of credulity and a will to believe.

Few today would attempt a defense of Margery. Possibly the final blow to her reputation came when it was revealed that in 1930 J. Malcolm Bird had submitted a report to the American Society for Psychical Research indicating that he was not only convinced that a measurable portion of the phenomena were fraudulently produced, but that he had been asked to participate in creating it. Shortly after producing that report, Bird resigned and disappeared. The American Society for Psychical Research, which had become committed to Margery, suppressed the report and published another in its place.

Mina Crandon died on November 1, 1941.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Bird, J. Malcolm. Margery the Medium. Boston: Small, Maynard, 1925.

Murchison, Carl A., ed. The Case For and Against Psychical Belief. Worchester, MA: Clark University, 1927. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

———. Psychical Belief. Worcester, Mass.: Clark University, 1927.

Tabori, Paul. Companions of the Unseen. London: H. A. Humphrey, 1968. Reprint, London: Souvenir Press, 1972.

Tietze, Thomas R. Margery. New York: Harper & Row, 1973.

Crawford, William Jackson (1881–1920)

Engineering professor at Queens University, Belfast, Ireland, and researcher in psychic phenomena. Crawford was born in New Zealand. He received his doctorate from the University of Glasgow. He resided in Belfast when around 1914 he began to investigate the physical phenomena of Kathleen Goligher and the group around her, known as the Goligher Circle. His investigation continued until his death in 1920.

From his research, he developed a set of speculations on the scientific laws behind the phenomenon of telekinesis (now known as psychokinesis or "PK"), which he presented in his books, The Reality of Psychic Phenomena (1916), Experiment in Psychic Science (1919), and The Psychic Structures in the Goligher Circle (1921). During his research, he converted to Spiritualism, though his theories played down the role of spirits in favor of a psychic force.

Crawford first tackled the problem of the alteration of weight as objects were lifted and displaced. He found that the weight of the levitated table was beared by the medium. Her increase in weight was usually well within five percent of that of the table. The difference was beared by the sitters. Similarly, if the table was glued down to the floor by the psychic force, the medium's weight decreased in proportion to the pressure borne by the floor. The levitation itself was effected, he reasoned, by an invisible substance that streamed out of the medium's body and became more or less solidified into what he called "psychic rods." These rods, which consisted of ectoplasm, found leverage in the medium's body and acted as cantilevers. If the weight to be lifted was too big, an elbow formation, transferring the pressure to the floor, was used. These psychic rods evolved with great rapidity and they could assume any shape and size. They were invisible but the ends were dense enough to be felt. This psychic substance according to Crawford, could rap, grip an object by suction, and perform delicate mechanical effects. If Crawford passed his hand in front of the medium's ankle, he could intercept the psychic rod and stop the raps. In so doing, he said, he felt something cold and clammy.

Putting the medium on a weighing machine he measured the amount of substance withdrawn for raps of varying loudness. The raps reacted on the medium's body, apparently in the region of the chest, but she was unconscious of the effect. He found that the withdrawal of ectoplasm was but a temporary loss. The medium, at the end of the séance, lost less in weight and was less exhausted than the sitters.

Crawford concluded from this that the psychic force that vitalizes the ectoplasm is drawn mostly from the sitters and used up. The sitters lost between five and ten ounces of weight. The maximum loss of weight, when ectoplasm was experimentally withdrawn in fluxes from the medium, was 54 pounds, nearly half of her normal weight. At the same time, the medium perceptibly shrank, her pulse gradually rose, and her muscles convulsed.

The flow of ectoplasm could carry particles of paint. By a colored track Crawford traced the flow from the ankles up to the hip and to the base of the spine. Powdered carmine was used for this purpose. When it was placed on the knickers, the track extended to the shoes and upward to the lower part of the trunk. This showed that the flow started from her trunk, passed down her feet, and returned. The fabric of her knickers and stockings was abraded in places. Crawford inferred that some frictional resistance was encountered. He also found that it was not the ectoplasm, but the medium which suffered from sudden exposures to light. By shielding her with black cloth he obtained many good flashlight photographs.

Crawford's conclusions were challenged by E. E. Fournier d'Albe in his book The Goligher Circle (1922). In 20 sittings with the same medium he obtained almost no results. He expressed the belief that the levitations recorded by Crawford were accomplished by the medium's legs.

Crawford committed suicide on July 30, 1920. Four days before his death he wrote, "I have been struck down mentally. I was perfectly all right up to a few weeks ago. It is not the psychic work. I enjoyed it too well. I am thankful to say that the work will stand. It is too thoroughly done for any material loopholes to be left."

In this belief Crawford relied in part upon the opinion of colleagues such as Sir William Barrett, who wrote on March 24, 1917, "I can testify to the genuineness and amazing character of these physical manifestations and also to the patient care and skill which have characterized Crawford's long and laborious investigations."

Sources:

Barham, A. "Dr. W. J. Crawford: His Work and Legacy in Psychokinesis." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 55 (1988): 113.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Crawford, E. F. Experiment in Psychic Science. N.p., 1919.

———. The Psychic Structures in the Goligher Circle. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co., 1921.

———. The Reality of Psychic Phenomena. London: J. M. Watkins, 1919.

Crehore, John Davenport (1891–1989)

Publisher, writer, and organic farmer with a background in languages and general science who took a special interest in parapsychology. He was born May 14, 1891, in Pottstown, Pennsylvania. Crehore wrote several items on the subject of telepathy, especially as it related to his interest in healing and organic foods. He died in February 1989.

Sources:

Crehore, John D. Mental Telepathy: Radiesthesia or Radesia, Our Sixth Sense. Cleveland, Ohio: J. E. Johnson, 1956.

Creme, Benjamin (1922–)

Scottish-born professional artist who paints images of an inner reality perceived through meditation and claims to be a herald of "the reappearance of the Christ" at the end of the twentieth century. Born in Glasgow in 1922, early in his life Creme became attracted to theosophical literature, especially the writings of Alice A. Bailey. In the 1950s he also joined the Aetherius Society, an occult-oriented flying saucer contact group founded by George King, in which he learned a form of meditation called "transmission" meditation.

Throughout the 1950s Creme was in direct contact with the Great White Brotherhood, the assembly of beings believed by Theosophists to guide the destiny of humankind. Creme claimed that in 1959 he received a telepathic communication from his own master, a member of the divine hierarchy, who told him that he would have a part to play in the return of Maitreya, the Christ. (In Theosophy, the person who walked the earth as Jesus, and is called the Christ by Christians, is identified as Maitreya, the bodhisattva whom many Buddhists expect to appear in the near future.) A constant and conscious telepathic link was established with this master, by which Creme received precise and up-to-date information about the reappearance of the Christ, which Bailey had predicted to occur toward the end of the twentieth century.

In 1974 Creme began to lecture extensively on the subject throughout Europe and North America. Also in 1974 Creme formed Share International Foundation, a group to prepare for the coming of the Christ, and according to Creme, messages and contacts with the Christ took place soon afterward. In an information sheet, "The Reappearance of the Christ and the Masters of Wisdom," Creme noted:

"There now lives among us a man who embodies in Himself the hope and aspiration of the religious groups as well as the practical aspirations of the political and economic thinkers for a better life for all.

"Awaited also by Buddhists as the Lord Maitreya, by Moslems as the Imam Mahdi, as the Bodhisattva by Hindus and as the Messiah by the Jews, the World Teacher made known in June 1945 . . . His intention to return to the world at the earliest possible moment. In Palestine, 2000 years ago, He manifested through His Disciple Jesus (Who is now the Master Jesus) by a process of overshadowing. This time he comes Himself, as World Teacher for the Aquarian Age.

"On July 19, 1977, Maitreya, the Christ, entered the modern world. Since then, He has been living as a member of the Asian Community of East London: an ordinary man, not known as the Christ, and not using His name Maitreya. . . .

"A number of TV and radio programs in which the Christ has taken part have already been broadcast. The Plan was that through media coverage of His public meetings He would gradually become well-known, first nationally and then internationally. However, due to the lack of response on the part of the media, this has not taken place.

"As part of a contingency plan, therefore, Benjamin Creme was allowed to disclose the Christ's location. At a press conference in Los Angeles on May 14, Benjamin Creme announced that the Christ had been living in London since 1977. . . ."

Creme predicted the appearance of the Christ in 1982 and offered many hints to the press as to where he could be found. Some journalists searched the Indian community in London for him, but the person did not appear. Benjamin Creme subsequently claimed that "materialistic forces, seen and unseen, planetary and cosmic" had opposed the appearance, and a decision was made to postpone the actual appearance. Afterward, Creme was dismissed by many people and through the remainder of the 1980s he redirected the program of the Share International Foundation and made few public appearances. In the 1990s he again made announcements of the presence of Maitreya and has even published photographs of his appearances to different groups around the world.

Creme has published a number of books about the reappearance of the Christ. However, the identity of the Christ has yet to be revealed, and there is still some doubt about the ultimate direction that Creme and the group will take.

Sources:

Creme, Benjamin. Maitreya's Mission. Amsterdam, The Netherlands: Share International, 1986.

———. Messages from Maitreya the Christ. 2 Vols. London: Tara Press, 1980.

———. The Reappearance of the Christ and the Masters of Wisdom. London: Tara Press, 1980.

———. Transmission: A Meditation for the New Age. North Hollywood, Calif.: Tara Center, 1983.

Melton, J. Gordon, Jerome Clark, and Aidan Kelly. New Age Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1990.

Crewe Circle (ca. 1906)

The friends of medium William Hope, whose psychic abilities were discovered in 1906. Two years later, Archdeacon Thomas Colley called together a group of people to sit for spirit photography. This group, which gathered in Crewe, England, became known as the Crewe Circle.

Sources:

Tweedale, Charles L. Man's Survival after Death. London: Psychic Book Club, n.d.

"Cristo d'Angelo"

Famous spirit control, first manifested in a direct voice séance of the medium George Valiantine in 1922 in the United States. Five years later, on March 25, 1927, the voice of "Cristo d'Angelo" was recorded on gramophone in Lord Charles Hope's apartment in London. It was heard a month later by the Italian Marquis Carlo Centurione Scotto in the apartment of H. Dennis Bradley at a Valiantine séance.

On request of the Marquis, "Cristo d'Angelo" established himself as his control from May 12, 1927, the day of the first Millesimo séance onward but also manifested several times at the "Margery" séances in Boston when Valiantine was present. The spirit control figured in some interesting cross-correspondences between Millesimo Castle and Boston records.

Cristo d'Angelo claimed he was a Sicilian shepherd on earth, a native of Sant Anselmo al Monte in the neighborhood of Palermo, and was with Garibaldi at Calatifimi. He died at age 76 of acute pneumonia. Dr. Carlo Marchese, a physician of Catania, attempted to trace his life. He found a village of the name in the province of Palermo, but obtained no further proof of the real existence of Cristo d'Angelo.

Sources:

Hack, Gwendolyn Kelley. Modern Psychic Mysteries; Millesimo Castle, Italy. London, 1929.

———. Venetian Voices. London, 1937.

Critomancy

Ancient method of divination by means of observing meats and cakes. The paste of cakes that were offered in sacrifice was closely examined, and from the flour spread upon them, omens were drawn, after being strewn upon sacrificial victims.

CRL See Consciousness Research Laboratory

Croiset, Gerard (1909–1980)

A Dutch sensitive and healer who lived at Enschede, Netherlands. He was extensively tested by Professor W. H. C. Tenhaeff, director of the Parapsychology Institute of the University of Utrecht, and by Hans Bender of the University of Freiburg in Germany. Croiset worked unobtrusively with the chief justice of Leeuwarden and with the chief of police at Harlem in tracing criminals or missing persons. He was not a professional psychic.

Croiset was born on March 10, 1909, in the town of Laren, North Holland. He manifested clairvoyant faculty as a child, but it was not until the mid-1930s that he began to use his psychic talents. He became associated with a Spiritualist group in Enschede, where he had settled as a young man. He gradually became known as a psychic and healer and was able to make his living in that manner through World War II. At the time he was discovered by parapsychologist Tenhaeff in 1945, Croiset was running a small healing clinic. After a series of tests over several months in Utrecht, Tenhaeff concluded that Croiset was one of the most remarkable subjects he had encountered, and he devoted much time and energy to developing and testing Croiset's unusual abilities. As these abilities matured, Tenhaeff concluded that they might be applied to solving social problems, and accordingly contacted Dutch police officials, who were sufficiently broadminded to cooperate. Eventually Croiset was consulted regularly to assist in locating missing children or solving crimes, and his successes became widely known.

Tenhaeff's career rose along with that of Croiset. He quickly moved from his unsalaried position to instructor (1951) and full professor (1953) at the Utrecht State University and then to director of the university's new Parapsychology Institute. In 1956 Croiset moved from Enschede, near the German border of the Netherlands, to Utrecht, where he was more conveniently situated close to Tenhaeff and the institute. To maintain himself and his family Croiset reestablished his spiritual healing clinic, but did not charge for his parapsychological work, and even when consulted by police he paid his own traveling expenses. He did, however, sometimes charge individuals for private consultations.

One of Croiset's most remarkable achievements in the field of parapsychological testing was the famous "chair test," which involved random selection of a chair number from a seating plan for a future meeting at which seats were not reserved or allocated to specific individuals. At a period of anywhere from one hour to 26 days before the meeting, Croiset would describe the individual who would sit in that chair at the meeting. These predictions were sealed and then opened at the meeting and checked detail by detail against the characteristics of the individual actually occupying the seat. Croiset's first chair test was in Amsterdam in October 1947 before the Studievereniging voor Psychical Research (Dutch Society for Psychical Research). Croiset seems to have had remarkable successes in this unusual type of clairvoyance.

In cases where Croiset himself was allowed to choose a chair number, his descriptions sometimes included information on the individual's past and future. Subsequent chair tests were set up in Austria, Italy, and Switzerland, as well as Holland. Some of these tests are described in detail in Tenhaeff's 1961 book De Voorschouw (Precognition). Other cases have been reported in the Dutch Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie.

Croiset's international reputation was spread by the publication of Jack Pollack's Croiset the Clairvoyant (1964) which was translated into German and French editions. The book discusses some seventy cases of various types, all verified by Tenhaeff. In the meantime, other Dutch parapsychologists were questioning Croiset's abilities. Dutch researcher Piet Hein Hoebens emerged as Croiset's and Tenhaeff's major critic. He claimed that in many of the cases, such as those reported by Pollack, Tenhaeff had misrepresented or even fabricated the facts. He also uncovered a number of cases on which Croiset had worked that had turned out to have been complete failures.

Hoebens also criticized the chair tests, noting their subjectivity (Croiset's descriptions of people were vague and could apply to a wide variety of individuals), and again alleged falsification of data by Tenhaeff. The discrediting of Tenhaeff, not only in relation to Croiset but in other work as well, has done much to tarnish the reputation of Croiset and cost doubt on the early evaluations of his abilities.

A biography of Croiset (in Dutch) titled Croiset Paragnost appeared in 1978. Croiset died July 20, 1980. His son has continued the work of the healing clinic.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Hoebens, Piet Hein. "Croiset and Professor Tenhaeff: Discrepancies in Claims of Clairvoyance." Zetetic Scholar 6, no. 2 (Winter 1981–82): 32–40.

Lyons, Arthur, and Marcello Truzzi. The Blue Sense: Psychic Detectives and Crime. New York: Mysterious Press, 1991.

Pollack, J. H. Croiset, the Clairvoyant. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1964.

Tenhaeff, W. H. C. "Psychoscopic Experiments on Behalf of the Police." Conference Report No. 41. Paper presented at the First International Conference of Parapsychological Studies, Utrecht, Holland, 1953.

Crollius, Oswaldus (1580–1609)

A disciple of the school of Paracelsus and author of Basilica Chymica (1612), the third part of which is the Book of Signatures. The preface contains a sketch of hermetic philosophy. The writer sought to demonstrate that God and Nature have "signed" all their works, that every product of a given natural force is as the sum of that force printed in indelible characters, so that he who is initiated in the occult writings can read as in an open book the sympathies and antipathies of things, the properties of substances, and all other secrets of creation. In his

The History of Magic (1860), occultist Éliphas Lévi, summarizes the doctrine of signatures:

"The characters of different writings were borrowed primitively from these natural signatures existing in stars and flowers, in mountains and the smallest pebble. . . . King Solomon alone is credited with having accomplished the dual labor; but the books of Solomon are lost. The enterprise of Crollius was not a reconstitution of these, but an attempt to discover the fundamental principles obtaining in the universal language of the creative world.

"It was recognized in these principles that the original hieroglyphics, based on the prime elements of geometry, corresponded to the constitutive and essential laws of forms, determined by alternating or combined movements, which, in their turn, were determined by equilibrator attractions. Simples were distinguished from composites by their external figures; and by the correspondence between figures and numbers it became possible to make a mathematical classification of all substances revealed by the lines of their surfaces. At the root of these endeavors, which are reminiscences of Aldonic science, there is a whole world of discoveries awaiting the sciences. Paracelsus had defined them, Crollius indicates them, another who shall follow will realize and provide the demonstration concerning them. What seemed the folly of yesterday will be the genius of tomorrow, and progress will hail the sublime seekers who first looked into his lost and recovered world, this Atlantis of human knowledge."

The doctrine of signatures has been a persistent one in folk medicine, where the shapes of plants have been considered symbolic of their medicinal virtues.

Sources:

Lévi, Éliphas. The History of Magic. 1860. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1969.

Pettigrew, T. J. Superstitions Connected with Medicine or Surgery. N.p., 1844.

Cromlech Temple

A British occult society contemporary with the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, with rituals and initiations based on a mixture of Kabala and Christian mysticism.

Sources:

Howe, Ellic. The Magicians of the Golden Dawn. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1972.

King, Francis. Ritual Magic in England, 1887 to the Present Day. London: Neville Spearman, 1970.

Cromniomancy

Form of divination by means of onions. It was usually practiced on Christmas Eve to obtain information about absent persons. One method was to inscribe the names of absent friends on individual onions and leave them undisturbed on a table until they began to sprout. The onion that sprouted most rapidly indicated that the person whose name had been inscribed on it was enjoying vigorous health.

Another method was to obtain an answer to a question by inscribing alternative answers on individual onions; the correct answer was said to be that on the onion which sprouted first. Some also believed that wishes would come true if they burned onion skins on a fire.

Crookall, Robert (1890–1981)

Geologist with the National Coal Board in London, England, who was an early British authority on astral projection or out-of-the-body travel. Crookall was born July 31, 1890, in Lancaster, England, and was educated at both Westminster College and Bristol University. He examined the evidence that people can leave their physical bodies and reenter them after traveling unseen in subtle bodies. In his many books he collated hundreds of cases from various individuals and established the characteristic features and implications of this strange phenomenon.

Crookall concluded that the accumulated evidence for out-of-the-body travel validated religious concepts of the soul and an afterlife. He promoted his views in a number of books through the 1960s and 1970s. The mass of data he collected is impressive, but his objectivity has been questioned and he tended not to consider alternative explanations of the astral travel experience. Crookall died in January 1981.

Sources:

Crookall, Robert. Casebook of Astral Projection. Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1972.

———. During Sleep: the Possibility of "Cooperation." London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1964.

———. Interpretation of Cosmic & Mystical Experiences. London: James Clarke, 1969.

———. More Astral Projections. London: Aquarian Press, 1964.

———. The Study and Practice of Astral Projection. London: Aquarian Press, 1961. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1966.

———. The Supreme Adventure: Analyses of Psychic Communications. London: James Clarke, 1961.

———. The Techniques of Astral Projection. London: Aquarian Press, 1964.

Crookes, Sir William (1832–1919)

One of the greatest physicists of the last century and an early exponent of scientific investigation of psychic phenomena. William Crookes was born June 17, 1832, in London, England, and educated at Chippenhurst Grammar School and the Royal College of Chemistry, London. Even without a graduate education, he became one of the most decorated scientists of his era.

In 1855 he became superintendent of the Meterological Department, Radcliffe Observatory, Oxford. In 1861 he made his first great discovery, the element thallium. Two years later, he became an Elected Fellow of the Royal Society.

Crookes seems to have been led into research on Spiritualism because of the untimely death of his brother Philip in 1867. He first came into contact with psychic phenomena in July 1869 in a sitting with Mary Marshall. He was further intrigued by trance speaker J. J. Morse in December, and in July 1870, after the arrival of Henry Slade in London, he announced his intention to investigate the phenomena of Spiritualism. In an early article (1870), he declares:

"Views or opinions I cannot be said to possess on a subject I do not pretend to understand. . . . I prefer to enter upon the inquiry with no preconceived notions whatever as to what can or cannot be, but with all my senses alert and ready to convey information to the brain; believing, as I do, that we have by no means exhausted all human knowledge or fathomed the depths of all the physical forces."

The investigation had been suggested to him "by eminent men exercising great influence on the thought of the country." Another sentence of the article throws light on his expectations:

"The increased employment of scientific methods promote exact observation and greater love of truth among inquirers, and will produce a race of observers who will drive the worthless residuum of spiritualism hence into the unknown limbo of magic and necromancy."

Newspaper reporters received the announcement with jubilation. It was taken for granted that Spiritualism would be shown as clear and simple humbug. They were disappointed. The investigation began in May 1871, after the return of D. D.

Home from Russia. It was witnessed by Crookes's chemical assistant, Williams; his brother Walter; Sir William Huggins, the eminent physicist and astronomer, and ex-president of the Royal Society; and Sergeant E. W. Cox, a prominent lawyer.

The secretaries of the Royal Society refused Crookes's invitation to participate. His report was submitted to the Royal Society on June 15, 1871, but his communications were refused because they did not demonstrate the fallacy of the alleged marvels of Spiritualism. Even the inscription of the title of the paper in the society's publications was denied.

It was only from the July 1871 issue of the Quarterly Journal of Science that the public became acquainted with the first account of Crookes's observations. This account contained the description of a séance held at Crookes's house in a well lit room, in which the alteration of the weight of bodies and the playing of an accordion without hands was attested by specially designed apparatus. Said Crookes, "Of all the persons endowed with a powerful development of this Psychic Force . . . Mr. Daniel Dunglas Home is the most remarkable, and it is mainly owing to the many opportunities I have had of carrying on my investigation in his presence that I am enabled to affirm so conclusively the existence of this force."

In a subsequent article, "Notes of an Enquiry into the Phenomena Called Spiritual, during the years 1870–73," (Quarterly Journal of Science, January 1874), Crookes observes,

"The phenomena I am prepared to attest are so extraordinary, and so directly oppose the most firmly rooted articles of scientific belief—amongst others, the ubiquity and invariable action of the force of gravitation—that, even now, on recalling the details of what I witnessed, there is an antagonism in my mind between reason, which pronounces it to be scientifically impossible, and the conciousness that my senses, both of touch and sight—and these corroborated, as they were, by the senses of all who were present—are not lying witnesses when they testify against my preconceptions."

The description of these experiments and the summary produced a furious anonymous attack, now known to have emanated from Dr. W. B. Carpenter, in the October 1871 issue of the Quarterly Review. The article described Crookes as a "specialist of the specialists," an investigator whose ability was "purely technical," and added, "We speak advisedly when we say that the Fellowship of the Royal Society was conferred on him with considerable hesitation." (In a special resolution the council of the Royal Society expressed its regret over this statement.)

Many other scientists questioned the experiments on every conceivable ground. Balfour Stewart in Nature (July 3, 1871) referred to the illusions produced by mesmerists and conjectured that the observers had been fooled. E. B. Tyler quoted Alfred Russel Wallace, who suggested, for a different purpose, that the werewolf superstition might have been due to mesmeric influence. Extending the suggestion to Spiritualistic marvels, he conjectured that Home and Agnes Guppy might have been werewolves, capable of influencing sensitive spectators.

But nothing could shake Crookes' belief in the accuracy of his scientific observations. He continued his experiments, and in an article in the January 1874 issue of the Quarterly Journal of Science, he gave a detailed account of all the phenomena he had tested.

While Crookes's report of 1874, based chiefly on experiments with D. D. Home and Kate Fox, was met with skepticism, accounts of his next adventure, attempting to establish the separate existence of the medium (Florence Cook, 1856–1904) and the materialized spirit ("Katie King"), would stretch their credulity to the breaking point.

Crookes held a series of sittings with the young and beautiful "Florrie" between December 1873 and May 21, 1874. As part of his observations of Cook and King, he measured the difference in height, noted the absence of a blister on Katie's neck, the absence of perforation in Katie's ears, and the difference in complexion, bodily proportion, manner, and expression. He had himself photographed with Katie King and Florence Cook in the same position and while his picture was the same in the two photographs, the discrepancy between the girls' photos was obvious. Later Crookes reported that he had been allowed to enter the study with Katie and saw, by the light of a phosphorus lamp, the medium in trance, while Katie was standing by her side. Another time, in the full blaze of the electric light, Katie and Cook were seen together by Crookes and eight other people.

Forty-four photographs showed differences between the medium and the apparition. In a letter published in The Spiritualist (June 5, 1874), Crookes describes the photographing of Katie King:

"But photography is as inadequate to depict the perfect beauty of Katie's face, as words are powerless to describe her charms of manner. Photography may, indeed, give a map of her countenance, but how can it reproduce the brilliant purity of her complexion, or the ever-varying expression of her most mobile features, now overshadowed with sadness when relating some of the bitter experiences of her past life, now smiling with all the innocence of happy girlhood when she had collected my children round her, and was amusing them by recounting anecdotes of her adventures in India?

Round her she made an atmosphere of life;
the very air seemed lighter from her eyes,
They were so soft and beautiful, and rife
With all we can imagine of the skies;
Her overpowering presence makes you feel
It would not be idolatory to kneel."

In the same letter, Crookes deals with accusations of fraud on the part of Cook:

"Every test that I have proposed she has at once agreed to submit to with the utmost willingness; she is open and straightforward in speech, and I have never seen anything approaching the slightest symptom of a wish to deceive. Indeed, I do not believe she could carry on a deception if she were to try, and if she did she would certainly be found out very quickly, for such a line of action is altogether foreign to her nature."

After the Cook experiments, Crookes conducted another set of experiments in his home with the American medium Annie Eva Fay. She produced a variety of psychokinetic effects and Crookes wrote a favorable report on her which was published in the March 12, 1875, issue of The Medium. In 1876 Fay faced the first of a series of exposures and ultimately finished her career as a stage magician.

After the Fay examination, Crookes abandoned the attempt to validate psychic phenomena by scientific method and concentrated on his more conventional scientific research, although from time to time affirming that he would not retract his earlier endorsement of psychic phenomena. He served as president of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR) for the years 1896–99. It was not generally known, however, that from time to time he attended séances, and at one of these, around 1916, the spirit of his late wife apparently manifested.

Crookes went on to become one of England's most celebrated and decorated scientists. He was awarded the Royal Gold Medal (1875), the Davy Medal (1888), and the Sir Joseph Copley Medal (1904). He was knighted in 1897 (while president of the SPR) and received the Order of Merit in 1910. At different times he served as president of the Royal Society, the Chemical Society, the Institution of Electrical Engineers, and the British Association. The honors were acknowledgment of his numerous scientific accomplishments, including invention of the radiometer, the spinthariscope, and the Crookes tube, the precursor to modern television. He was the founder of the Chemical News, and editor of Quarterly Journal of Science.

In the mid-1870s, Crookes abandoned his attempt to convince his scientific peers of the truth of his observations, but he never withdrew or modified his opinions. He responded to the fury of the controversy and became cautious. For example, he never allowed the circulation of a photograph in which he stood arm-in-arm with Katie King. In a letter to Angelo Brofferio in 1894 he said, "All that I am concerned in is that invisible and intelligent beings exist who say that they are the spirits of dead persons. But proof that they really are the individuals they assume to be I have never received" (Für den Spiritismus, Leipzig, 1894).

Before the British Association at Bristol in his presidential address in 1898, Crookes declared:

"Upon one other interest I have not yet touched—to me the weightiest and farthest-reaching of all. No incident in my scientific career is more widely known than the part I took many years ago in certain psychic researches. Thirty years have passed since I published an account of experiments tending to show that outside our scientific knowledge there exists a Force exercised by intelligence differing from the ordinary intelligence common to mortals. I have nothing to retract. I adhere to my already published statements. Indeed, I might add much thereto."

As late as 1917, in an interview published in The International Psychic Gazette, he reiterated: "I have never had any occasion to change my mind on the subject. I am perfectly satisfied with what I have said in earlier days. It is quite true that a connection has been set up between this world and the next."

The Continuing Controversy

While much of the controversy surrounding Crookes died as he withdrew from further psychical research, it never entirely disappeared. On occasion throughout his later life Crookes was questioned about his opinions on psychic phenomena.

No matter what extensive precautions Crookes employed, his results, in the eyes of the skeptics, were always unevidential. Charles Richet in his Thirty Years of Psychical Research (1923), published several years after Crookes's death, defended his colleague: "Until I had seen [Eusapia Palladino] at Milan I was absolutely sure that Crookes must have fallen into some terrible error. And so was [Julien] Ochorowicz; but he repented, and said, as I do, smiting my breast "Pater, peccavi."

The accusations against Crookes were fed by the fact that Mary Showers—who occasionally had performed joint séances (including one for Crookes, with Cook)—was later caught in a fraudulent materialization attempt and that Cook herself was caught cheating on two occasions in 1880 and 1889.

Cook continued to operate as a medium through the rest of the century and her sister Katie Cook succeeded her.

The most damaging allegations were made in June 1922, long after the death of Florence Cook. Francis G. H. Anderson, called at the offices of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, and made a statement to E. J. Dingwall, then the research officer of the society, that he had had an affair with Cook many years ago, and that one night she told him that her mediumship was fraudulent. Further more, he testified that she had confided in him that she had had an affair with William Crookes, and the famous séances were staged as a cover. In 1949 Anderson repeated and expanded his story to Mrs. K. M. Goldney of the Society for Psychical Research.

Assuming his recollection of what Florence Cook said was reasonably accurate, the claim that the mediumship was fraudulent carried more weight than charges that William Crookes had been an accomplice in order to carry on a love affair. Crookes's defenders argued that, if the materialization of Katie King was fraudulent, it is more likely that Crookes was deceived. He became convinced of the reality of the phenomena of Home. Also, some of the Cook séances were conducted at Crookes' own home, near his wife and children. Crookes wrote enthusiastic letters to the press about the séances, openly admitting that he embraced the phantom Katie King, which appeared as flesh and blood. He took photographs of himself and the phantom. None of these actions seem consistent with organizing the séances as a cover for a love affair.

The view that Crookes was simply duped by (rather than an accomplice with) the mediums he tested was given weight by Houdini, who in his book claimed that Fay described to him the way she had gotten around all of Crookes's gadgets and tricked him.

The controversy was continued in 1962 when Trevor H. Hall, in his book The Spiritualists, presented persuasive evidence that Cook was fraudulent, and also repeated Anderson's claims that Crookes connived at fraud to hide a love affair with her.

Crookes did not hide his attraction to Cook's beauty. Hall built his case more upon Cook's association with Showers, who, he suggests, was possibly an accomplice in fraud. Showers also claimed to materialize spirit forms, in particular the phantom "Florence Maple," which reportedly had the same substantiality as Florence Cook's "Katie King."

Showers and Cook gave a joint demonstration at the house of William Crookes in March 1874, when the spirit forms Florence Maple and Katie King walked around the room outside the cabinet, linked arm in arm, laughing and talking like real human beings. E. W. Cox, who was present at this astonishing séance, expressed his extreme skepticism in a letter published in The Spiritualist (May 15, 1874). In a letter to Home in November 1875, Crookes stated Showers had confessed to Fay that she was a fraud, and he had later obtained a written confession from Showers. Fraud on the part of Showers provided valid doubts on the genuineness of the phenomena of Cook. Whether Crookes can be regarded as an accomplice in such fraud in order to carry on an illicit love affair with Cook is a separate issue.

Many find it is hard to believe that Crookes, with his reputation as a scientist at stake, would make such imprudent statements as he made if he was indeed an accomplice in fraud for the sake of sexual favors. Others find it just as hard to believe that Crookes was deceived by the "innocent schoolgirl," who would have to have been a remarkable actress, capable of outwitting Crookes's tests and sustaining a phantom role with a variety of anecdotes of a past life in foreign countries.

Crookes was certainly fascinated by Katie King and/or Florence Cook. It may be that his fascination overrode his scientific and personal judgment. Cook may have mesmerized him much as Madame Blavatsky dazzled Henry Steel Olcott with her apparently miraculous powers. If Anderson's recollection is correct, Cook's claim of an illicit love affair may have been no more than a boastful recollection of the glamour cast over Crookes by Katie King, especially Crookes's public embracing of the phantom.

It is likely that Crookes's career in psychical research and his relation to Cook will remain a topic of discussion in parapsychological circles. In the last generation the discussion has shifted as the defenders of physical phenomena, especially materialization, have retreated from the scene.

Crookes died on April 4, 1919, in London.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Crookes, William. "Address by the President." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 12 (1896): 338.

———. "Notes of an Enquiry into the Phenomena called Spiritual." Quarterly Journal of Science (January 1874).

———. Researches in the Phenomena of Spiritualism. London, 1874.

———. Researches in Spiritualism. London: J. Burnes, 1875.

———. "Spiritualism Viewed by the Light of Modern Science." Quarterly Journal of Science 7 (July 1870).

Dingwall, E. J. The Critics' Dilemma: Further Comments on Some Nineteenth Century Investigations. Dewsbury, England: The Author, 1966.

Fournier d'Albe, E. E. The Life of Sir William Crookes, O.M., F.R.S. London: T. F. Unwin, 1923.

Hall, Trevor. Florence Cook & William Crookes: A Footnote to an Enquiry. London: Tomorrow Publications, 1963.

———. The Spiritualists: The Story of Florence Cook and William Crookes. New York: Helix Press, 1963. Reprinted as The Medium and the Scientist. Buffalo, N.Y: Prometheus Press, 1984.

Medhurst, R. G. Crookes and the Spirit World. London: Taplinger, 1972.

Medhurst, R. G., and K. M. Godney. "William Crookes and the Physical Phenomena of Mediumship." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 54, 195 (March 1964).

Thouless, R. H. "Crookes and Cook." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 42 (1963).

Crop Circles

Mysterious phenomena reported from Great Britain beginning in 1980. Large, wide circles, sometimes more than 100 feet in diameter, have appeared overnight in fields of grain. The grain in the circle is not dead, but the plant stems are flattened and sometimes darker in color than the surrounding grain. The first report of the circles appeared in the Wiltshire Times on August 15, 1980. It told of several circles that had appeared in the oat fields of John Scull farm near the town of Bratton. A year later a set of circles was discovered in Hampshire, near Cheesefoot Head. Unlike the earlier set, which had been randomly placed, this second set of three circles was in a straight line.

Most of the circles have been reported from the southern counties of Hampshire and Wiltshire, the same area already noted for its monolithic structures such as Stonehenge and Avebury. There are some occasional reports of similar phenomena in France, Canada, Australia, and the U.S. Between 1980 and 1987 approximately 120 circles appeared in the original area west of London. Then a dramatic increase occurred in 1988 with 112 reported. Over 300 were reported in 1989 and in 1990 over 1,000.

Over the years, the original circles gave way to ever more complex patterns, called "pictograms," which included circles arranged in geometric patterns, rectangles, crescents, and dumbbell shapes. In the case of concentric rings, the grain is sometimes flattened uniformly, at other times in contrary directions.

Typically, a new circle appears completely formed over one evening. The area forming the pattern is flattened, while the surrounding grain shows no sign of disturbance. The flattened grain shows no sign of damage other than being bent.

Explanations of the phenomenon include giant hailstones, crazed hedgehogs, too much or too little fertilization, and UFOs. There was even a suggestion that the circles may have been formed by helicopters flying upside down, but the absence of widespread helicopter wrecks disproved any dangerous practice of this kind. It is well known that small rings in grass meadows and lawns are known to be caused by mushrooms, but there is no evidence that the giant crop circles result from any known fungi. One theory that is distinct from speculations of paranormal effects is that of physicist George T. Meaden. He proposes a theory of atmospheric vortices that are electrically charged.

In 1991 Doug Bower and David Chorley claimed to have personally produced more than 250 of the circles. With the assistance of the British tabloid Today, they created a circle and invited Pat Delgado, the author of a popular text on the phenomenon, to inspect it. Once he pronounced the new circle genuine, the hoax was revealed. Other hoaxers had also produced circles that were judged genuine. However, those who believe in the mystery of the circles have suggested that hoaxing would only account for a few of the more than 2,000 circles. No one has been caught making a crop circle and none appear to have been left half finished. Additionally, it seems difficult to create some of the more complex pictograms in the dark. To date, monitoring of the area has failed to catch the formation of a circle on film or instrumentation.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. Encyclopedia of Strange and Unexplained Phenomena. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Delgado, Pat, and Colin Andrews. Circular Evidence: A Detailed Investigation of the Flattened Swirled Crop Phenomenon. London: Bloomsbury Publications, 1989.

———. Crop Circles: The Latest Evidence. London: Bloomsbury Publications, 1990.

Meaden, George Terence. The Circles Effect and its Mysteries. Bradford-on-Avon, England: Artetech Publishing, 1989.

———. Circles from the Sky. London: Souvenir Press, 1991.

Randles, Jenny, and Paul Fuller. The Controversy of the Circles. London: British UFO Research Association, 1989.

———. Crop Circles: A Mystery Solved. London: Robert Hale, 1990.

The Crop Watcher

One of several British periodicals concerned with the phenomenon of crop circles. Last known address: 3 Selbourne Ct., Tavistock Close, Romsey, Hampshire, SO51 7TY, UK.

Crosbie, Robert (1849–1919)

Robert Crosbie, founder of the United Lodge of Theosophists, was born on January 10, 1849, in Montreal, Canada. He was raised a Presbyterian by his Scottish immigrant parents, but declined to join the church as a teenager as its thought did not satisfactorily answer his questions about life. He and an older partner started a shoe manufacturing business in 1869 and eventually he married his partner's daughter. The death of his partner's wife occasioned an interest in Spiritualism and led further to his investigation of various psychic and occult phenomena. Then around 1886 Crosbie and his partner sold their business and moved to Boston, Massachusetts, where they started an even more successful business of the same kind. Here he attended the very first gathering of the new Theosophical Society and joined. When the national leader, William Quan Judge (1851–1896), came to Boston to speak, they met and became friends. Crosbie also began a correspondence with Madame Helena Petrovna Blavatsky (1831–1891), the main teacher in the society who at the time resided in England. He became president of the Boston Theosophical Society in 1892.

In the 1890s, when the American society under Judge became independent of the international Theosophical Society, Crosbie remained loyal to Judge and continued to work with his successor Katherine Tingley. He was one of the signatories on the new organization that Tingley created, the Universal Theosophical Brotherhood, designed to offer a practical demonstration of the theosophical principle of brotherhood. In 1900, soon after the founding of the theosophical community at Point Loma (San Diego), Crosbie relocated there to assist Tingley in her utopian experiment. However, over the next few years he came to feel the experiment valueless and the teachings espoused by Tingley an unacceptable departure from Theosophy as he understood it. In 1904 he left Point Loma and moved to South Pasadena, California, where he organized a study group that was chartered by the branch of the Theosophical Society still aligned with the international movement. However, in 1907 it became fully independent. In 1909, that group became the new independent society that he called the United Lodge of Theosophists. He sought to present Theosophy as he understood it to have been presented in the early years of the movement.

Crosbie was opposed to the creation of a strong central organization or to the emphasis upon charismatic personalities.

The various lodges that came to be associated with the United Lodge are autonomous centers for the dissemination of theosophical teachings. In the periodical he began in 1912, Theosophy, the articles were unsigned (unless copied from the writings of the theosophical founders). He also initiated an education program for the children of his members (called associates). Only in the years after his death on June 25, 1919, were his writings collected and published under his name in two books.

Sources:

Crosbie, Robert. Answers to Questions on the Ocean of Theosophy. Los Angeles: Theosophy Co., 1937.

———. The Friendly Philosopher. Los Angeles: Theosophy Co., 1934.

Ten Broeck, Dallas. "Brief Notes in Mr. Robert Crosbie's Life and Work." Unpublished paper in the American Religions Collection, Davidson Library, University of California-Santa Barbara.

The Theosophical Movement, 1875–1950. Los Angeles: Cunningham Press, 1951.

Crosland, Camilla (1812–1895)

Well-known author who, under her maiden name, Camilla Toulmin, became one of the early champions of Spiritualism in England. She was born in London on June 9, 1812, the daughter of a solicitor. Her father died when she was eight, leaving the family impoverished. Camilla's education was mostly the result of private study. During the 1850s a constant guest of her house, a young lady, was discovered as the possessor of remarkable mediumistic powers. Three years of investigation brought conviction of survival to both Camilla and her husband. In 1856 Newton Crosland published a small book entitled Apparitions. This was followed in 1857 by the more important work of Camilla's, Light in the Valley: My Experiences in Spiritualism. Because of strong public prejudice against the new Spiritualist ideas filtering into the country at the time, the Croslands suffered both financially and socially for publishing their opinions. As a result, however, several people, including Robert Chambers, Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall, and Mary and William Howitt, came to investigate. They all became convinced of the genuineness of the manifestations. Michael Faraday was invited to test his unconscious muscular action theory regarding table movement, but he sent John Tyndall instead. In Fragments of Science for Unscientific People (1871) Tyndall published a derisive account of the sitting.

Crosland went on to write a number of books. In her last work, Landmarks of a Literary Life (1893), she devoted a chapter to the bold defense and elucidation of Spiritualism. She died in East Dulwich, England, on February 16, 1895.

Sources:

Crosland, Newton. Apparitions. N.p., 1957.

Toulmin [Crosland], Camilla. Light in the Valley: My Experiences in Spiritualism. London; New York: G. Routledge & Co., 1957.

Tyndall, John. Fragments of Science for Unscientific People. New York: Appleton, 1872.

Cross-Correspondence

Concordant automatism, a scheme allegedly originated by the spirit of F. W. H. Myers to eliminate the hypothesis of telepathy from psychic communications.

Alice Johnson, research officer of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, first discovered that such an idea was in operation when messages were received through various mediums at about the same times in places as far apart as India, New York, and London. In the scripts of Rosina Thompson, Mrs. Forbes, Margaret Verrall, Winifred Willett (pseudonym of Winifred Coombe-Tennant), Leonora Piper, and others, she found fragmentary utterances that had no point or meaning but supplemented one and other when put together, forming coherent ideas.

Reflecting on her find, she noted:

"Thus, in one case, Mrs. Forbes' script, purporting to come from her son, Talbot, stated that he must now leave her, since he was looking for a sensitive who wrote automatically, in order that he might obtain corroboration of her own writing. Mrs. Verrall, on the same day, wrote of a fir-tree planted in a garden, and the script was signed with a sword and a suspended bugle. The latter was part of the badge of the regiment to which Talbot Forbes had belonged, and Mrs. Forbes had in her garden some fir-trees, grown from seed sent to her by her son. These facts were unknown to Mrs. Verrall."

She concluded:

"We have reason to believe that the idea of making a statement in one script complementary of a statement in another had not occurred to Mr. Myers in his lifetime—for there is no reference to it in any of his written utterances on the subject that I have been able to discover. Neither did those who have been investigating automatic script since his death invent this plan, if plan it be. It was not the automatists themselves that detected it, but a student of their scripts; it has every appearance of being an element imported from outside; it suggests an independent invention, an active intelligence constantly at work in the present, not a mere echo or remnant of individualities of the past."

After the death of A. W. Verrall, the eminent Greek scholar and psychical researcher, an intricate Greek mosaic and literary puzzle called the "Ear of Dionysius" was transmitted as cross-correspondence. In the opinion of Gerald Balfour, and other competent judges, this was one of the most striking evidences of survival yet obtained. In the Proceedings of the Society of Psychical Research, hundreds of pages are devoted to cross-correspondences. They are so ingenious and subtle that their disentanglement requires considerable literary skill.

The subject was thoroughly studied by the Verrall family, "Mrs. Holland" (pseudonym of Alice Fleming), J. G. Piddington, and Eleanor Sidgwick. Frederik Van Eeden obtained cross-correspondences between his own dreams and the trance utterances of "Nelly," Rosina Thompson's control. James H. Hyslop used it for research in cases of obsession.

Many experiments were made to establish cross-correspondence in thought-transference—to find out another's thoughts over distance.

Among the more baffling cases of cross-correspondences came from the mediumship of Margery (i.e., Mina Crandon). They were instigated by her control "Walter," and given simultaneously through Margery in Boston, George Valiantine in New York, Henry Hardwicke at Niagara Falls, and Sarah Litzelmann in Maine. Drawings, geometrical figures, and sentences were given in part through each medium, in some cases in Chinese characters. Their reception was immediately verified by telephone or telegraph and the message deciphered by joining the pieces into a whole.

The ingenuity of these cross-correspondences was illustrated by a single instance: A cardboard box was brought into the séance room. It contained slips of paper with certain symbols, and a calendar, the sheets of which could be torn off a sheet at a time, which show a desired number. Walter declared that he had torn off a sheet and added: "Margery will make up a problem and Valiantine and Hardwicke will each make half the answer." He then closed the box.

The sitter placed in charge of the box after the séance did not open it. Margery and the company moved into the library. There Margery passed into a light trance and wrote automatically: "11 x 2—to kick a dead." The box was now opened; they found in it at the left the calendar, the top sheet of which showed the date of the 11th, and next to it an X from the enclosed symbols and last the torn-off sheet which bore the number 2. The internal arrangements of the box, therefore, completely agreed with the part of the cross-correspondence Margery wrote.

In New York, Judge Cannon, who was in charge of the Valiantine circle, reported by telephone that they received from Walter the following message: "2—no one stops." The next morning a telegram from Hardwicke from Niagara Falls announced this fragment: "2 horse." The fragments put together show that the problem Walter worked out was this: "11 x 2 = 22. No one stops to kick a dead horse."

While many psychical researchers have been impressed by the cross-correspondence evidence, Eric J. Dingwall, for one, scoffed at the evidence presented since researchers not connected with the project were not allowed to examine the original documents.

Sources:

Dingwall, E. J. "The Need for Responsibility in Parapsychology." In A Skeptic's Handbook of Parapsychology, edited by Paul Kurtz. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1985.

Douglas, Alfred. Extra Sensory Powers: A Century of Psychical Research. Woodstock, N.Y.: Overlook Press, 1977.

Hall, Elizabeth. Possible Impossibilities: A Look at Parapsychology. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1977.

Haynes, Renée. The Society for Psychical Research, 1882–1982: A History. London: MacDonald, 1982.

Heywood, Rosalind. Beyond the Reach of Sense: An Inquiry into Extra-Sensory Perception. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1961.

Saltmarsh, H. F. Evidence of Personal Survival from Cross Correspondences. London: G. Bell & Sons, 1938.

Tietze, Thomas R. Margery. New York: Harper & Row, 1973.

Crosse, Andrew (1784–1855)

British amateur scientist and early experimenter with electricity, who may have been the model for Mary Shelley's creation of the main character in her novel, Frankenstein. In addition to his remarkable experiments in collecting atmospheric electricity in his laboratory, Crosse aroused fierce controversy through reports that he had spontaneously generated insect life through electrochemical experiments.

Crosse was born on June 17, 1784, at Fyne Court, Broomfield, Somersetshire, England. Fyne Court was the ancestral home of his family, whose forbears were granted a coat of arms in the seventeenth century. In 1793 he attended Dr. Seyer's School, Bristol, where he took a great interest in natural science and the developing study of electricity. His father was a friend of both Benjamin Franklin (1706–1790) and the scientist Joseph Priestley (1733–1804). In 1802 Crosse continued his education at Brasenose College, Oxford, as a gentleman commoner. He was not happy there, finding many of the students foolish and intemperate and the tutors unsatisfactory.

In 1805 the death of his mother left him an orphan; he had already lost his father, sister, uncle, and two of his best friends. He retired to a solitary life at Fyne Court, where he continued to study electricity, chemistry, and mineralogy. He became friendly with George Singer, who was then compiling his book Elements of Electricity and Electro-Chemistry, published in 1814. Starting in 1807, Crosse experimented in the formation of crystals through the action of electrical currents. The stimulus for this research was study of the formation of stalactites and stalagmites in Holywell Cavern at Broomfield. Crosse took some water from the cavern and connected it to the poles of a voltaic battery. After ten days, he observed the formation of crystals. This was the forerunner of a development 30 years later when he claimed to have observed the formation of insect life through electrocrystallization.

Crosse married Mary Anne Hamilton in 1809, and over the next ten years they had seven children, three of whom died in childbirth. In 1817 Crosse's friend Singer also died, three years after publication of his book on electricity. Crosse became increasingly reclusive and devoted himself to his scientific research. He erected a mile and a quarter of copper wires on poles at Fyne Court, connected to his "electrical room," where he experimented on the amount and nature of electricity in the atmosphere. He was regarded with awe by the local residents, who named him "the thunder and lightning man" and "the Wizard of the Quantocks" (the nearby Quantock Hills).

Crosse was linked with the poet Percy Bysshe Shelley and his young mistress Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin (later author of the novel Frankenstein) after they attended a lecture by Crosse in December 1814 in London, in which he explained his experiments with atmospheric electricity.

An account of a visit to Fyne Court by Edward W. Cox published in the Taunton Courier in Autumn 1836 reads like a description of a Hollywood film set for a Frankenstein film:

"But to proceed now into the penetralia of the mansion, the philosophical room, which is about sixty feet in length and upwards of twenty in height, with an arched roof—it was built originally as a music hall—and what wonderful things you will see . . . a great many rows of gallipots and jars, with some bits of metal, and wires passing from them into saucers containing some dirty-looking crystals. . . . It was the invention of a battery by which the stream of the electric fluid could be maintained without flagging, not for hours only, but for days, weeks, years, that was the foundation of some of Mr. Crosse's most remarkable discoveries. . . . Crystals of all kinds, many of them never made before by human skill, are in progress. . . . But you are startled in the midst of your observations, by the smart crackling sound that attends the passage of the electrical spark; you hear also the rumbling of distant thunder. The rain is already splashing in great drops against the glass, and the sound of the passing sparks continues to startle your ear. Your host is in high glee, for a battery of electricity is about to come within his reach a thousandfold more powerful than all those in the room strung together. You follow his hasty steps to the organ gallery, and curiously approach the spot whence the noise proceeds that has attracted your notice. You see at the window a huge brass conductor, with a discharging rod near it passing into the floor, and from the one knob to the other, sparks are leaping with increasing rapidity and noise, rap, rap, rap—bang, bang, bang; you are afraid to approach near this terrible engine, and well you may; for every spark that passes would kill twenty men at one blow, if they were linked together hand in hand, and the spark sent through the circle. Almost trembling, you note that from this conductor wires pass off without the window, and the electric fluid is conducted harmlessly away. On the instrument itself is inscribed in large letters the warning words,

"'Noli me tangere.' (Do not touch me)

"Nevertheless, your host does not fear. He approaches as boldly as if the flowing stream of fire were a harmless spark. Armed with his insulated rod, he plays with the mighty power; he directs it where he will; he sends it into his batteries: having charged them thus, he shows you how wire is melted, dissipated in a moment, by its passage; how metals—silver, gold and tin—are inflamed, and burn like paper, only with most brilliant hues. He shows you a mimic aurora, and a falling star, and so proves to you the cause of those beautiful phenomena; and then he tells you, that the wires you had noticed, as passing from tree to tree round the grounds, were connected with the conductor before you; that they collected the electricity of the atmosphere as it floated by, and brought it into the room in the shape of the sparks that you had witnessed with such awe."

Crosse's work on electrocrystallization appears to have anticipated that of A. C. Becquerel (1788–1878). Although Crosse did not disclose his discoveries to the British Association until 1836, he had been working on the subject before 1820. His fascination with the power of electricity and magnetism dated from early life, and as early as 1816, at a party of local residents, had exclaimed, "I prophesy that, by means of the electric agency, we shall be enabled to communicate our thoughts instantaneously with the uttermost ends of the earth."

In 1837 Crosse was working on electrocrystallization experiments when he observed tiny insects in metallic solutions believed to be fatal to life. Crosse made no formal report at the time, but confided his observations to an acquaintance, who spread the news—later featured in an unauthorized newspaper report, that Crosse had claimed to create life. Crosse was reviled all over England and Europe as a blasphemer for daring to usurp divine creative powers.

The appearance of the insects of the genus acarus (mites), under conditions which seemed to preclude contamination of the solutions, has remained one of the anomalies of science, and was a forerunner of the spontaneous generation controversies of Béchamp and Pasteur. At the height of the Crosse uproar, Faraday stated that he had noted similar appearances, although he was reluctant to ascribe them to production or revivification. An amateur experimenter named W. H. Weeks, of Sandwich, Kent, also repeated Crosse's experiments under stringent conditions and reported that the insects appeared.

Crosse reported his findings in the Transactions of the London Electrical Society (1838) and in the Annals of Electricity (October 1836–October 1837). Years later, in a letter to the writer Harriet Martineau dated August 12, 1849, he summarized these findings as follows:

"In a great number of my experiments, made by passing a long current of electricity through various fluids (and some of them were considered to be destructive to animal life), acari have made their appearance; but never excepting on an electrified surface kept constantly moistened, or beneath the surface of an electrified fluid. In some instances these little animals have been produced two inches below the surface of a poisonous liquid. . . . Their first appearance consists in a very minute whitish hemisphere, formed upon the surface of the electrified body, sometimes at the positive end, and sometimes at the negative, and occasionally between the two, or in the middle of the electrified current; and sometimes upon all. . . . Then commences the first filaments, they immediately shrink up and collapse like zoophytes upon moss, but expand again some time after the removal of the point. Some days afterwards these filaments become legs and bristles, and a perfect acarus is the result, which finally detaches itself from its birth-place, and if under a fluid, climbs up the electrical wire, and escapes from the vessel, and afterwards feeds either on the moisture or the outside of the vessel, or on paper or card, or other substance in its vicinity."

Crosse was also aware of the possibility that apparent insect formations might have been mineral crystallizations that have a strong resemblance to animal form. Such "osmostic growths" were investigated by Dr. Stéphane Leduc of Nantes, in the twentieth century. Leduc demonstrated that "artificial" structures formed in crystalloid solutions imitate the appearance and some of the properties of organic life. Leduc's experiments revived the concept of spontaneous generation in an evolutionary theory of life.

Andrew Crosse was hurt by the hostility that his experiments aroused, since he had never sought publicity or made any claims beyond the facts as he observed them. As he explained in his letter to Martineau:

"As to the appearance of the acari under long-continued electrical action, I have never in thought, word, or deed, given any one a right to suppose that I considered them as a creation, or even as a formation, from inorganic matter. To create is to form a something out of a nothing. To annihilate, is to reduce that something to a nothing. Both of these, of course, can only be the attributes of the Almighty. In fact, I can assure you most sacredly that I have never dreamed of any theory sufficient to account for their appearance. I confess that I was not a little surprised, and am so still, and quite as much as I was when the acari made their appearance. Again, I have never claimed any merit as attached to these experiments. It was a matter of chance. I was looking for silicious formations, and animal matter appeared instead. . . ."

In addition to the unwelcome notoriety caused by this controversy, Crosse's wife and brother died in January 1846. He continued his experiments at Fyne Court, although he lived more like a recluse than ever.

However, on July 22, 1850, he married for the second time. His new wife was Cornelia Burns, who took a great interest in his experiments and assisted him with great competence. Crosse also researched a mode of extracting metals from their ores and methods of purification of sea water and other fluids by electricity. He contributed a paper, "On the Perforation of Non-conducting Substances by the Mechanical Action of the Electric Fluid," and also investigated the connection between the growth of vegetation and electric influence. In 1854 he gave a paper to the British Association meeting at Liverpool, "On the Apparent Mechanical Action accompanying Electric Transfer."

He died at Fyne Court on July 6, 1855. In her Memorials . . . of Andrew Crosse, the Electrician (1857), his widow published details of the life and work of Crosse and included a selection of poems written by him.

Sources:

[Crosse, Cornelia A. H.] Memorials, Scientific and Literary, of Andrew Crosse, the Electrician. London: Longman, 1857.

Gould, Rupert T. Oddities: A Book of Unexplained Facts. London, 1928. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1965

Haining, Peter. The Man Who Was Frankenstein. London: Frederick Muller, 1979.

Leduc, Dr. Stéphane. Théorie Physicochimique de la Vie et Générations Spontanées. Translated as The Mechanism of Life. London: William Heinemann, 1911.

Cross-Reference

Simultaneous delivery of spirit messages through different mediums with a request to forward them to the right person. The idea, originated by the communicators themselves, was to disprove the suggestion that messages were merely the working of the medium's subconscious mind.

The earliest instance of cross-reference is registered in E. W. Capron's Modern Spiritualism (1885) from February 12, 1850. The medium was a Mrs. Draper. A large company was divided into two groups and sent to different rooms. The spirit of Benjamin Franklin purported to be present and spelled out a message telling the company not to move. The same message was then spelled out in the other room with instructions to go and compare. This method of communication was called "spiritual telegraphy" and was soon practiced between New York and Philadelphia or Washington, D.C., and between Baltimore and Pittsburgh.

A deceased sister announced herself to Robert Hare at Cape May, nearly a hundred miles from Philadelphia. Hare asked the spirit to go to Philadelphia and ask Mrs. B. Gourlay, a medium, to get her husband to go to a certain bank and inquire about a certain bill. On his return Hare found out that Dr. Gourlay had received the message and the bank testified that he came to inquire about the the bill.

Sources:

Bradley, H. Dennis. The Wisdom of the Gods. London: T. Werner Larvie Ltd., 1925.

Hare, Robert. Experimental Investigations of the Spirit Manifestations. New York: Partridge & Brittan, 1855.

Crow

The cawing of a crow is said to be an omen of evil. Another superstition claims that if a crow croaks an odd number of times, the weather will be bad; if even, the weather will be fine. In general, the crow has been considered a messenger of death since ancient times.

Crowley, Aleister (1875–1947)

The most renowned magic practitioner and theoretician of the twentieth century. He was born Edward Alexander Crowley on October 12, 1875, in Leamington, Warwickshire, England, the son of Exclusive Plymouth Brethren parents. As he grew up, Crowley found himself unsympathetic with the faith of his father—an elder in the fundamentalist group—and mother. For his refusal to fall into line both in belief and practice, his mother called him "the Beast 666" (the Antichrist, from Revelation 13:18), a title he eventually accepted with some pride. Following his father's death in 1887, Crowley was sent to public school.

In 1894 he entered King's College and went on to Trinity College, Cambridge, the next year. During his college years he emerged as a poet of some merit. He also spent his leisure time exploring the joys of sexuality, a theme that strongly influenced his poetry and led to some trouble with college authorities. He also discovered and made his first ventures into magic and the occult. He left college before completing his degree.

In 1898 he was initiated into the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, the pioneering ceremonial magic group, into which he was introduced by George Cecil Jones. He was an avid pupil and quickly progressed until he became involved in the split that had developed between the bulk of the members, who resided in England, and the head of the order, S. L. MacGregor Mathers, who lived in Paris. He sided with Mathers, which cut him off from fellow believers in London.

In 1903 Crowley married Rose Kelly, and in 1904 they traveled to Egypt. There, at his wife's insistence, he sat for a period on each of three days (April 9–11) and received (channeled) material from a spirit entity, Aiwass. The finished product, The Book of the Law, would provide the philosophical distinctives for what would become Crowley's own system of magic. The keynote of the new system would be thelema or will, and its basic admonition, "Do what thou will shall be the whole of the Law." This ambiguous phrase was often misunderstood by other magicians and by critics alike as promoting an amoral libertinism, but that was not Crowley's teaching or meaning. Rather, he taught that it was the magician's duty to discover his or her destiny (or true will), and, having discovered it, he or she had no choice but to align actions with the accomplishment of that true will.

Having left the Golden Dawn, in 1907 Crowley founded the Argentum Astrum (AA; Silver Star). On its behalf he began issuing a periodical, the Equinox, a semiannual journal in which he began to publish the teachings of the AA. The journal attracted attention, however, because Crowley also began to publish the secrets of the Golden Dawn, which he denounced as a juvenile organization.

Crowley was diverted from developing the AA in 1912, following an encounter with Theodore Reuss, the outer head of the Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO), a German sex magic group. Crowley had independently discovered sex magic and made his first experiments in it several years earlier. In The Book of Lies he had published a brief section that indicated to Reuss that he knew about the sex magic teaching of the OTO, and Reuss invited Crowley into its membership. He was immediately accepted into the highest levels of the OTO and appointed head of its British branch, which he organized under the name Mysteria Mystica Maxima. Crowley also rewrote the OTO rituals, adding an eleventh degree reflective of his own homosexuality.

In 1914 Crowley moved to America, where he waited for World War I to end. During his stay he conducted extensive sex magic experiments, established an OTO lodge in Vancouver, British Columbia, and initiated Charles Stanfeld Jones (later known publicly as "Frater Achad") into the order. Because of his own accomplishments and the unexpected coordination of Frater Achad's magic work, Crowley declared Achad his "magical child" and assumed the title of magus, the second-highest grade.

In 1919 Crowley moved to Sicily and established a small magic colony at Cefalu. He remained there for four years, during which time he proclaimed himself an ipsissimis. Banished by Mussolini in 1923, he resided for a while in Tunis and France before settling down in England, where he spent the last 15 years of his life.

All through his life Crowley continued his experimentation with magic, which soon led him into the use of consciousness-expanding drugs. Along the way he became a heroin addict, a condition he fought but was never able to overcome.

During his mature years he expended much energy in building the OTO and in getting his writings published though in both endeavors he was only partially successful. Not until the 1970s—about thirty years after his death—was the order successfully organized and lodges established across Europe and North America. Simultaneously, most of his writings, including his magic diaries, were published, and they have remained in print.

Following Crowley's death on December 1, 1947, in Hastings, England, Karl Germer became the new outer head of the order of the OTO but did little to assist its growth. Germer died in the 1960s, and in the 1970s Grady McMurtry, having learned of Germer's death, assumed leadership and built the order into a substantial international body.

Crowley's influence can be seen throughout popular culture through such rock bands as Led Zepplin and Ozzie Osborne, who claim to be Crowley fans and reflect his ideas in their music. In 1993 an album of his teachings was released and sold over 8,000 copies, exhibiting a constant interest in Aleister Crowley.

Sources:

Crowley, Aleister. Confessions. New York: Hill & Wang, 1969.

———. The Holy Books of Thelema. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1983.

———. Magick in Theory and Practice. New York: Castle Books, 1965. Reprint, St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1989.

———. Magick without Tears. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1973.

———. The Secret Rituals of the O.T.O. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1973.

King, Francis. The Magical World of Aleister Crowley. New York: Coward, McCann & Geoghegan, 1978.

Melton, J. Gordon, and Isotta Poggi. Magic, Witchcraft, and Paganism in America: A Bibliography. New York: Garland Publishing, 1992.

Parfitt, Will, and A. Drylie. A Crowley Cross-Index. Avon, England: ZRO, 1976.

Suster, Gerald. The Legacy of the Beast. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1989.

Symonds, John. The King of the Shadow Realm. London: Duckworth, 1989.

Crucifixion, Gnostic Conception of

Gnosticism was a pre-Christian religious movement that competed with Christianity for a number of centuries, beginning in the first century C.E. Gnosticism developed its own form of Christian theology, an alternative to that presented in the writings later assembled as the New Testament.

A basic tenet of Gnosticism is that the created, material world is evil. It was not created by the true God but by a lesser being. Only by escape from the material into the spirtual world can there be salvation. The Gnostics believed that this explained the presence of evil in the world, because the true God could not have created anything less than perfect.

Because the material body is inferior and evil, the spirit of an individual is dwelling in an alien environment. This belief led the Gnostics to view Jesus as a human who received his Christ component during his lifetime, probably at the moment of his baptism in the river Jordan. From that time forth, being supernaturally gifted, Jesus began to work miracles. Before that, he had been completely ignorant of his mission.

At the Crucifixion, therefore, Christ ascended to God, from whom he had come, for he did not (and could not) physically suffer on the cross and die; rather, Simon of Cyrene, who bore his cross, suffered in his place: "And they compel one Simon a Cyrenian, who passed by, coming out of the country, the father of Alexander and Rufus, to bear his cross" (Mark 15:21). The Gnostics contended that a portion of the real history of the Crucifixion was never written.

At the Resurrection, the gnostics believed, the man Jesus was given another body, made up of ether, which was why the disciples did not recognize him after the Resurrection. During his sojourn on earth after he had risen, he received from God the perfect knowledge of spiritual truth, or gnosis, which he communicated to the small number of the apostles who were capable of receiving it.

Sources:

Lacarriére, Jacques. The Gnostics. London, 1977.

Mead, G. R. S. Pistis Sophia: A Gnostic Miscellany. London, 1921. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1974.

Crumbaugh, James C(harles) (1912–)

American psychologist and parapsychologist. He was born December 11, 1912, in Terrell, Texas, and educated at Baylor University (B.A., 1935), Southern Methodist University (M.A., 1938), and the University of Texas (Ph.D., 1953). Crumbaugh's education was interrupted by World War II, when he served as an assistant psychologist in the U.S. Army Air Force Aviation Cadet Classification Program (1941–45). After the war he became an instructor in psychology at Memphis State University, a post he held while finishing his doctorate (1947–56). He served in the Veterans Administration Post-Doctoral Training Program in Clinical Psychology (1956–57); as chairman of the Department of Psychology, MacMurray College, Jacksonville, Illinois (1957–59), and as research director of the Bradley Center, Columbus, Georgia (1959–64). In 1964 he became a staff psychologist at the VA Hospital at Gulfport, Mississippi.

During the 1960s Crumbaugh received two grants from the Parapsychology Foundation for work on the repeatability of experiments in ESP. In spite of many years of experimentation, Crumbaugh did not discover significant psi effects, but stressed the importance of the experimenter and repeatability in parapsychology. His research resulted in articles contributed to various psychological and parapsychological journals.

Sources:

Crumbaugh, James C. "A Scientific Critique of Parapsychology." Behavior Psychology 2 (September–October 1966).

Cryptesthesia

A term coined by Charles Richet meaning a hidden sensibility, a perception of things by a mechanism unknown to us of which we are cognizant only of its effects. It indicated an all-inclusive psychic sense which comes into action by some mysterious external vibrations which Richet termed the "vibrations of reality," the so-called sixth sense. It includes clairvoyance, premonition, monition, psychometry, dowsing, and telepathy, for Richet believed that among the unknown vibrations that bring cryptesthesia into action, human thought is one that can most easily be transmitted.

He argued that telepathy as a hypothesis comes before cryptesthesia, since the reception of thought vibrations implies a new faculty. Psychometry and dowsing disclose knowledge of facts, so Richet classified them as pragmatic cryptesthesia.

The theory of cryptesthesia as a human faculty aimed at barring the spirit hypothesis. It did so at the price of investing the living with flashes of omniscience.

With the establishment of parapsychology as the dominant school within psychical research, the term psi has largely superseded cryptesthesia as an overall term for the psychic faculty.

Cryptomnesia

A term coined by Theodore Flournoy and used in psychical research to denote unconscious memory. It may be accessible in trance and explain much unusual information, or knowledge recalled under special circumstances.

Italian researcher Cesare Lombroso says in his book After Death—What? (1909):

"Under certain circumstances, i.e. when I am at great altitude, say six or seven thousand feet, I remember Italian, Latin and even Greek verses which had been forgotten for years. But I know very well that I read them in early youth. Similarly, during certain dreams in nights when I am afflicted with conditions showing intestinal poisonings disagreeable memories of years previous . . . are reproduced with precision, and with particulars so minute and exact that I could not possibly recall them when awake. Yet I observed that they are always fragmentary and incomplete recollections and depend more on the conditions of the sentiments than on the intelligence."

Cryptomnesia has been encountered in instances of plagiarism in which authors use material from other writers, without any conscious memory that they have acquired such material from their prior reading, rather than from their own creativity. Through the twentieth century, cryptomnesia has been increasingly used to explain some extraordinary information given by entranced persons.

It played an important role in explaining the case of Bridey Murphy. In a hypnotic state, Ruth Simmons (pseudonym of Virginia Tighe) described in some detail a former life as a person who lived in Ireland in the early nineteenth century. M. V. Kline was one of several psychologists who suggested that Simmons had compiled a number of forgotten memories to create the character of Bridey. It was also discovered that as a girl, Simmons had lived across the street from an Irish family which included a woman whose maiden name was Bridie Murphy. The critique of the Bridey Murphy case suggested cryptomnesia as an explanation of many past-life and similar memories produced by people under hypnotism. It has also been invoked to explain some instances of xenoglossis, in which people speak a language they have never learned.

Sources:

Reed, Graham. The Psychology of Anomalous Experience. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1974.

Cryptozoology

Term coined by zoologist Bernard Heuvelmans to characterize the study of "hidden animals." It includes the study of the existence of known animals in places where they were not expected to occur as well as the persistence of animals presumed to be extinct. The key trait of animals considered the object of cryptozoology is their unexpected nature. The idea of cryptozoology was suggested by the discovery of exotic animals through the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. They include the gorilla, the giant squid, and the coelecanth (a fish thought to be extinct for many millenia).

The primary interest of present-day cryptozoologists are such animals as the Loch Ness Monster and other lake monsters, Bigfoot and other living hominoids, and the possibility of various dinosaur survivals.

Heuvelmans established a Centre de Cryptozoologie in France.

Sources:

Heuvelsmans, Bernard. "What Is Cryptozoology?" Cryptozoology 1 (Winter 1982): 1–12.

Mackal, Roy P. Searching for Hidden Animals. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1980.

Michell, John, and Robert J. M. Rickard. Living Wonders: Mysteries and Curiosities of the Animal World. New York: Thames and Hudson, 1982.

Cryptozoology (Journal)

Official journal of the International Society of Cryptozoology, concerned with the study and discussion of anomalous animal phenomena (i.e., animals at present unknown to science, but occasionally reported to exist, and that could be legitimate new species). The journal includes expedition and field reports, scholarly theorizing, and in-depth studies relating to cryptozoology. The journal is issued by the International Society of Cryptozoology. Address: Box 43070, Tucson, AZ 85733. Website: http://www.izoo.org/isc.

Crystal Gazing (or Crystallomancy)

A mode of divination practiced from very early times with the aid of a crystal globe, a pool of water, a mirror, or indeed any transparent object. Divinations by means of water, ink, and such substances are also known by the name of hydromancy. The crystal gazer is often known as a "scryer" and the operation of gazing known as "scrying." Crystal gazing may be a very simple or a very elaborate performance, but in every case the object is to induce in the clairvoyant a form of hypnosis, so that he may see visions in the crystal.

The "crystal" most in favor among crystal gazers is a spherical or oval globe, about four inches in diameter, and preferably a genuine rock crystal. The crystal may be white, blue, violet, yellow, green, opalescent, or transparent. Blue or amethyst colored crystals are less tiring to the eyes. As a genuine rock crystal of this size and shape is necessarily expensive, a sphere of glass is frequently substituted, with very good results. It must, however, be a perfect sphere or oval, free from speck or flaw, highly polished, and traditionally based in a stand of polished ebony, ivory, or boxwood. Precious stones were also used by crystallomancers of the past, the favorite stone being beryl in pale sea green or reddish tints. Among the Hindus, a cup of treacle or a pool of ink was made to serve the same purpose.

Crystallomancy was practiced by the ancients to invoke spirits, and elaborate preparations and ceremonials were considered necessary. A practitioner had to first be a man of pure life and religious disposition. During the days immediately preceding inspection of the crystal, he made frequent ablutions and subjected himself to strict religious discipline, with prayer and fasting.

The crystal and its stand were inscribed with sacred characters, as was the floor of the room in which the invocation was to take place. A quiet spot where the gazer was free from all disturbances was suggested. The gazer's mental attitude was no less important than the material preparations. Perfect faith was an essential condition of success. If the magician wished to be accompanied by one or two of his friends, they had to conform to the same rules and be guided by the same principles.

The time of the invocation was chosen according to the position in the heavens of the various planets, all preparations having been made during the waxing of the moon. All instruments and accessories to be used in the performance—the sword, rod and compasses, the fire and the perfume to be burned thereon, as well as the crystal itself—were consecrated or "charged" prior to the actual ceremony.

During the process of invocation, the magician faced the east and summoned from the crystal the spirit he desired. Magic circles were inscribed on the floor, and the crystallomancer remained within these for some time after the spirit had been dismissed. It was essential that no part of the ceremonial be omitted; otherwise, the invocation would be a failure.

If the person on whose behalf the divination was to be performed was not clairvoyant, he or she sought a suitable medium, the best being a young boy or girl, born in wedlock, and perfectly pure and innocent. Prayers and magic words were said prior to the ceremony, and incense and perfumes were burned. Sometimes the child's forehead was anointed, and he himself provided garments suitable to the impressive nature of the ceremony.

Some early writers mention a formula of prayers, known as the "Call," that preceded the inspection of the crystal. After the crystal was "charged," it was handed over to the medium. The first indication of clairvoyant vision was the appearance of a mist or cloud in the crystal. This gradually cleared away, and the vision appeared.

Paracelsus and others declared that such elaborate ceremonies prior to crystal gazing were unnecessary, and that the magnes microcosmi (the magnetic principle in man) was sufficient to achieve the desired objective.

Modern crystal gazing is carried on in much the same manner as in ancient times, although the preparations are simpler. The crystal is spherical and of the size of an orange. When in use it may be held between the agent's finger and thumb, or, if the end is slightly flattened, placed on a table; alternatively, it may be held in the palm of the hand against a background of black cloth.

The operation is more readily carried out in a subdued light. A medium or clairvoyant acts as the seer and if the divination is made for anyone else it is advisable that he or she be allowed to hold the crystal in his or her hand for a few minutes before it is passed into the hands of the clairvoyant.

The object of crystal gazing is the induction of a kind of self-hypnotic state giving rise to visionary hallucinations, the reflection of light in the crystal forming points de repère for such hallucinations. The value of elaborate ceremonials and impressive rituals thus lies in their potency to affect the mind and imagination of the seer.

It has been widely reported that the appearance of a crystal vision is heralded by a milky clouding of the ball. This clouding is a kind of picture in itself. It depends on no optical conditions and is not the result of a strain on the eye; it persists and will be visible even after the scryer turns his head away. After the first pictures it acts as a kind of drop scene. It has been compared to the cloud in materialization séances; phantasmal figures reportedly emerge.

The pictures to which the cloud gives way may be small or may fill the sphere. The visions are often symbolic, and the pictures are either vague images or they have a clear sense. Lifelike visions are comparatively rare. In the majority of cases, crystal gazing is only an amusing psychical entertainment provided by the subconscious self.

According to Charles Richet, about one person in 20 may succeed in the experiment but perhaps one among 20 successful experimenters will receive genuine impressions that could not have been obtained by normal means. F. W. H. Myers considered crystal gazing a form of automatism by which the subconscious self may send messages to the conscious self. Misplaced objects may be found through the use of the crystal ball; forgotten dreams may be revived, and a systematic exploration of the subconscious mind may take place.

Margaret Verrall, a lecturer at Newnham College, England, concluded from personal experiences that the picture is created from the bright points of light reflected in the crystal. Once formed, she said, the picture has a reality and spontaneity quite unlike an imaginary scene called up voluntarily with closed eyes. The pictures are mostly colored but occasionally resemble black and white sketches. She was successful in tracing most of her visions to recent memories.

"Miss X" (Ada Goodrich-Freer), author of Essays in Psychical Research (1899) and an experienced crystal gazer, said the best way to begin scrying was to look about the room and observe some brightly colored object, close the eyes, and try to transfer the picture to the ball. If this is successful, the next stage should be an attempt to recall a vivid memory picture and to transfer it into the ball in the same way. After this it is very likely that spontaneous images will also appear. Miss X often traced her visions to forgotten memories, which she used the crystal to recall. Occasionally, she could see in the ball the characters of a work of fiction she was writing. If she did not know how to proceed with the plot she looked into the crystal and watched the figures enact the next steps of the story.

She also related a curious instance showing how unconscious observation may become externalized in the crystal:

"I saw, as if in a cutting from The Times, the announcement of the death of a lady, intimate with near friends of my own, and which I should certainly have regarded as an event of interest and consequence under whatever circumstances communicated. The announcement gave me every detail of place, name and date, with the additional statement that it was after a period of prolonged suffering. I had heard nothing of the lady—resident in America—for some months, and was quite willing to suppose the communication prophetic or clairvoyant. Of this flattering notion I was soon disabused. An examination of the paper of the day before soon showed that the advertisement was there, just as I had seen it in the crystal, and though at first I was inclined to protest that 'I had never looked at yesterday's paper' I presently remembered that I had, in fact, handled it, using it as a screen to shade my face from the fire, while talking with a friend in the afternoon. I may add the fact that we have since discovered that the lady in question is alive and well, and that the announcement related to someone else of the same name, by no means a common one."

The range of such unconscious observation may be very wide. "I have," stated Goodrich-Freer, "for example, occasionally been able to reproduce in the crystal the titles of books in a bookcase or of engravings on a wall, which after-experiment has shown to be beyond my range of vision." She also noted the play of possible thought transference in the origin of crystal images:

"We were talking of a house she had never seen, and I was describing the entrance hall. Presently she said: 'Wait, I see it; let me go on. Is there a curtained archway opposite the front door? And is there a gong in a recess by the stairs?' This was perfectly correct, and knowing my friend to have psychic faculty, I wondered how far this might be clairvoyance. On the other hand, so keen is my own power of visualizing, that I had all the time a vivid picture of the scene in my own mind. I looked into the crystal and planned my little test. 'Go into the dining room' I said. A correct description followed. 'The table is laid for lunch,' she proceeded, 'but why have they lighted the candles in broad daylight?' The fact was that, as soon as I saw that her attention was fixed on the table, I lighted the candles in my crystal picture. Hers followed suit, proving some, at least, of her impressions telepathic."

The most arresting question, of course, is whether the pictures are ever objective. There have been a very few instances in which the pictures have been reported to be reflected in a mirror, seen by several persons, and even photographed. There are, however, no verified cases of these reports.

A series of experiments and observations on the physiological changes in the eye that accompany crystal vision were recorded by Hereward Carrington in his book Modern Psychical Phenomena (1919). He found, for example, that the seer sometimes looks at a point in space nearer or further off than the crystal, and if the scene is distant the focus of the eye adjusts itself to the apparent perspective.

One of the most famous gazing crystals was that of the Elizabethan magician John Dee (1527–1608), kept for many years in the British Museum, London, but recently transferred to the Museum of Mankind in London. This "shew-stone" appears to be of polished coal. It was only one of several crystals possessed by Dee, one of which he claimed was brought to him by angels.

Sources:

Besterman, Theodore. Crystal-Gazing: A Study in the History, Distribution, Theory and Practice of Scrying. London: William Rider, 1924. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1965.

Frater Achad [Charles Stansfeld Jones]. Crystal Vision Through Crystal Gazing. Chicago: Yogi Publication Society, 1923.

Melville, John. Crystal-Gazing and The Wonders of Clairvoyance. London: Nichols, 1897. Reprinted as Crystal Gazing and Clairvoyance. Wellingborough, England: Aquarium Press, 1979.

Pelton, Robert W. Ancient Secrets of Fortune-Telling. South Brunswick, N.J.: A. S. Barnes, 1976.

Sepharial [W. G. Old]. How to Read the Crystal. London, 1922.

Seward, A. F. The Art of Crystal Gazing or Secrets of the Crystal Revealed. Chicago: A. F. Seward, 1873.

Thomas, Northcote W. Crystal Gazing: Its History and Practice, with a Discussion of the Evidence for Telepathic Scrying. London: Alexander Moring (The De La More Press), 1905.

X, Miss [Ada Goodrich-Freer]. Essays in Psychical Research. London: George Redway, 1899.

Crystal Healing

In recent years there was a surge of popular interest in the use of crystals for healing purposes, harking back to ancient times when priests and shamans of many cultures used crystals for healing, as well as for summoning the dead and scrying (i.e., crystal gazing) to obtain knowledge of distant events or to foretell the future.

Quartz crystals are a natural product formed by movements in the earth's crust. Silica in a molten state is moved toward the earth's surface. When it rises and cools, it changes structure, forming crystals on surrounding granite or sandstone cavities. The molecular structure of quartz crystal involves a perfect alignment and symmetry and imports unusual physical properties. Crystals can receive, amplify, convert, and focus energy, or store an electrical charge. If an electric current is passed through crystal it vibrates. If rubbed, a crystal generates an electrical current. Such properties have made crystals essential components of many modern devices, such as phonograph needles, watches, and microcomputers. Lasers use quartz crystal to convert electrical current into light and focus it as a beam of great intensity. These many interesting scientific properties and technological uses underlie much of the recent metaphysical attention to crystals.

Much of the modern interest in crystals in the New Age movement is rooted in the psychic readings of Edgar Cayce. In his readings mentioning Atlantis, Cayce described a large crystalline structure that supplied the power to run the Atlantean culture. He also spoke of the use of various crystals for individual personal needs. The references to crystals were later compiled in a booklet, Gems and Stones: Based on the Edgar Cayce Readings (1960).

In 1976 psychic channel Frank Alper began to convey a series of readings said to be from spirit entities. These readings were later published in a three-volume set and described the power system of Atlantis and the use of crystals in great healing temples. Alper claimed that crystals can actually absorb and store energy, which can later be discharged as a healing power.

According to Alper, crystals come in different shapes and sizes. Those with many facets are best for storing energy. Some crystals in the form of inverted pyramids were supposedly used for surgery on Atlantis. Flat, rectangular-shaped (emerald cut) crystals were used to filter light that rejuvenated the body. Alper also described the way in which a set of small crystals can be placed on or around the body of someone who desires to use the crystals' energy to either restore the body or elevate the consciousness.

Alper provided a comprehensive text on crystals. Through the 1980s his work was the basis of numerous texts on crystal power and elaborate speculations on the properties of crystalline structures. In his wake a considerable body of theory and practice has grown up around the use of crystals for healing purposes.

Marcel Vogel, a former research scientist at IBM, established a Psychic Research Institute in San Jose, California, to study, among other subjects, the claimed healing effects of crystals. He developed special techniques for "balancing and harmonizing" the body's energy field by means of crystals and claimed that many physicians and other healers were using such techniques. He videotaped his own experiments with hundreds of individuals and alleged improvements in relieving a variety of diseases, including Parkinson's disease, bursitis, arthritis, chronic back pain, and even blindness.

In spite of the efforts of people such as Vogel, however, acceptable evidence for the use of crystals as powerful storage batteries was not forthcoming, and only claims of its spiritual and metaphysical properties survived. Supporters still claim for example, that a crystal placed in a room will bring harmony and peace to the environment, in drinking water will improve the flavor, and set in a refrigerator will help keep food pure. Crystals are also believed to relieve mental and emotional tension if held in the hand and to bring about harmony and clarity if worn during meditation.

For such applications, the crystal must first be "cleared," that is, subjected to a process to neutralize existing vibrations and energies, usually by placing the crystal in a clear running stream, soaking it in salt water, or "charging" it with one's own breath. A new word, crystaphile, has been coined to indicate lovers of crystals who believe that they may have occult applications.

Without scientific backing for crystals' physical properties, however, interest in them largely died out by the beginning of the 1980s. As William Jarvis of the National Council Against Health Fraud in Loma Linda, California, has noted,

"As far as I know, there is no convincing published data to indicate that crystals have any efficacy in healing. The effects that are claimed are more in the realm of the metaphysical than the physical. They cannot really be measured, and can be readily understood as placebo effects. Until there is scientific documentation, these treatments should be presented only as medical experiments, not as valid medical therapy." Meanwhile, the Chiropractic Board of Examiners in Massachusetts has banned the use of crystals in chiropractic work in the state.

Sources:

Baer, Randall, and Vicki Baer. The Crystal Connection: A Guidebook for Personal and Planetary Ascension. New York: Harper & Row, 1986.

Bonewitz, Ra. Cosmic Crystals: Crystal Consciousness and the New Age. Van Nuys, Calif.: Newcastle Publishing, 1983.

Gems and Stones: Based on the Edgar Cayce Readings. Virginia Beach, Va.: Association for Research and Enlightenment, 1960.

Gold, Gari. Crystal Energy. Chicago: Contemporary Books, 1987.

Raphaell, Katrina. Crystal Enlightenment: The Transforming Properties of Crystals and Healing Stones. Sante Fe, N. Mex.: Aurora Press, 1985.

———. Crystal Healing: The Therapeutic Application of Crystals and Stones. Santa Fe, N. Mex.: Aurora Press, 1987.

Crystallization of the God Flame (Magazine)

Former monthly publication presenting the teachings of Elizabeth Clare Prophet, the leader of the Church Universal and Triumphant.

Crystals

Solid mineral objects having naturally formed plane faces. Their orderly external appearance derives from the regularity of their internal structure.

According to folk belief, crystals prevailed against unpleasant dreams, dissolved enchantments, and served as a medium for magical visions. Crystals bruised with honey were believed to fill the breasts with milk. Before the manufacture of glass, rock crystal was widely used for bowls, figurines, and drinking vessels. Magicians in Australia and elsewhere used rock crystal in rainmaking ceremonies. Rock crystal shaped into polished balls was also the favorite material for crystal gazing. (See also Crystal Skull.)

From ancient times crystal objects have been used as amulets and talismans. In ancient Israel, 12 stones (one for each of the 12 tribes) were placed on the breastplate of the high priest (see Exodus 39). Later, 12 gemstones were identified with the 12 signs of the zodiac. These survive today as birthstones.

Sources:

Bonewitz, Ra. Cosmic Crystals: Crystal Consciousness and the New Age. Van Nuys, Calif.: Newcastle Publishing, 1983.

Crow, W. B. Precious Stones. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1968.

Crystal Skull

Ancient Mayan skull shaped from rock crystal, discovered at Lubaantun, British Honduras, in 1927 by explorer F. A. Mitchell-Hedges. The skull may be anywhere from 3,600 to 12,000 years old, and is believed to have been laboriously shaped by a succession of Mayan priests from a large block of pure rock-crystal by rubbing with sand. Such a method might have taken many years to complete.

Like the so-called curse of the Pharaohs, the skull is supposed to bring doom upon those who mock it. Reliable observers have reported extraordinary light effects, sounds and odors, suggesting occult properties. Extensive laboratory tests by the Hewlett-Packard Company, Santa Clara, California, revealed that the skull had remarkable optical properties that it would be virtually impossible to duplicate with modern equipment.

The only counterpart to this strange artifact is a rock crystal skull in the British Museum discovered in Mexico in 1889. It is much cruder in execution than the Mitchell-Hedges skull, and may have been a rough model for it. After the death of Mitchell-Hedges in 1959, the skull became the property of his adopted daughter Anna Le Guillon Mitchell-Hedges.

Sources:

Bowen, Sandra, F. R. Nick Nocerino, and Joshua Shapiro. Mysteries of the Crystal Skulls Revealed. Pacifica, Calif.: Aquarian Networking, 1887. Revised edition, 1988.

Mitchell-Hedges, F. A. Danger My Ally. Boston: Little-Brown, 1955.

Morrill, Sibley. Ambrose Bierce, F. A. Mitchell-Hedges and the Crystal Skull. San Francisco: Cadleon Press, 1972.

Garvin, Richard. The Crystal Skull. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1973. Reprint, New York: Pocket Books, 1974.

Crystal Well

Former neopagan journal published by the Labrys Foundation that sought to restore interest in "the ancient religion" of magic and mystery. It was published in the 1970s from Seal Beach, California.

Crystal Well: A Journal of the Old Religion

Neopagan periodical originally titled Waxing Moon. It was published through the 1970s from Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

Crystaphile

Term used to indicate a lover of crystal who believes that it may have occult applications. (See also crystal healing)

CSA See Christian Spiritual Alliance, Church of the

CSAR See Center for Scientific Anomalies Research

CSICOP See Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal

Cthulhu Mythos

Term coined by August Derleth, biographer and editor of H. P. Lovecraft, writer of supernatural fiction. The term denotes the mythology invented by Lovecraft for a group of horror stories. According to Derleth, Lovecraft once told him, "All my stories, unconnected as they may be, are based on the fundamental lore or legend that this world was inhabited at one time by another race who, in practicing black magic, lost their foothold and were expelled, yet live on the outside, ever ready to take possession of this earth again."

Sources:

Carter, Lin. Lovecraft: A Look Behind the Cthulhu Mythos. New York: Ballantine Books, 1972.

Schweitzer, Darrell. The Dream Quest of H. P. Lovecraft. San Bernardino, Calif.: Borgo Press, 1978.

Cuadernos de Parapsicologia Journal

Quarterly journal of parapsychology published in Argentina. Address: Zabala 1930, 1712 Castelar, Prov. Buenos Aires, Argentina.

Cuchulain

Legendary hero warrior of Irish romance, son of the solar god Lugh and Dectera. His name means "Hound of Cullan," and his mighty deeds dominate Ulster lore. In order to marry Emer, daughter of Forgall, he was obliged to pass through the ordeals of the Land of Shadow and the warrior goddess Skatha, cross the Bridge of Leaps, learn the arts of war, and slay 100 men. Cuchulain also featured in the great Cattle Raid of Quelgny, described in the Book of Leinster of Finn MacGorman, bishop of Kildare, recorded in 1150.

In the twelfth century Book of the Dun Cow, Cuchulain is summoned from hell by St. Patrick to describe the terrors of hell to the pagan king of Ireland Laery MacNeill. As a result, the King was converted to Christianity and Cuchulain allowed to enter heaven. The deeds of Cuchulain as related in the Ulster Cycle of the Knights of the Red Branch are thought to have influenced the development of traditions of King Arthur in Wales and England.

Cuddon, Eric (1905–)

British barrister, hypnotist, and writer who engaged in parapsychological investigations. He was born January 18, 1905, in London, educated at Oxford University (B.A., 1927; B.C.L., 1928; M.A., 1931), and became a barrister in 1928. During World War II he was a squadron leader in the Royal Air Force Volunteer Reserve (General Service and Defense medals). He practiced hypnotherapy and was particularly interested in telepathy and mediumship. He was a member of the council of the International Institute for Psychical Research, London, and took part in investigations of poltergeist phenomena with Nandor Fodor.

Sources:

Cuddon, Eric. Hypnosis: its Meaning and Practice. N.p., 1938.

CUFOS

Acronym for J. Allan Hynek Center for UFO Studies, founded by astrophysicist J. Allen Hynek (1910–1986) to study UFO data.

Cuisinier, Jeanne A(dele) L(ucie) (1890– ?)

French anthropologist and research worker at the French National Center for Scientific Research, who also wrote on parapsychological subjects. She was born October 30, 1890, in Neuilly-sur-Seine, and studied at the Ecole des Langues Orientales Vivantes, Paris, the Institut de Phonétique Malais, and the Sorbonne, where she received her doctorate in 1944. Cuisinier studied magic beliefs and rituals among Asian peoples and published books on social geography and sociology, sacred dance in Indochina and Indonesia, and the shadow play in Kelantan. She also reviewed books for the International Journal of Parapsychology.

Culpepper, Nicolas (1616–1654)

Nicolas Culpepper, one of the most influential astrologers of all time, was born in Ockley, Surrey, England, on October 18, 1616. His father died shortly before he was born and he was raised by his mother and her father, a Church of England minister who taught him Greek and Latin. His good elementary education allowed him to attend Cambridge, where a life-changing tragedy afflicted him. Engaged to a young woman, he planned to run away with her and be married. However, on the way to their rendezvous point, she was killed in a freak accident. Culpepper suffered a nervous breakdown and refused to return to school. When he was disowned by his mother's family and left financially destitute, he apprenticed himself to an apothecary.

While becoming an accomplished apothecary, Culpepper also mastered astrology, and he began to link the two. His prosperity ensured by his 1640 marriage to a wealthy woman, he settled in London as herbalist. In 1649 Culpepper took the step that would earn him both his long-standing fame and the hostility of his colleagues. He published an English translation of the Pharmacopea, the book of healing remedies, a closely guarded secret of doctors and pharmacologists. He added to the volume his own astrological reflections, and his enemies used it as a means to ridicule him.

Culpepper developed tuberculosis probably in 1642 when he participated in the Battle of Edgehill with forces opposed to King Charles I. He was only 38 when on January 10, 1654, his illness caught up with him. His single book lived on as a standard medical reference book for several centuries and is still used today by people who prefer natural forms of healing. During the darkest days of astrology, in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, it remained in print and was a major source for people who began the astrological revival in the nineteenth century. It remains in print to the present.

Sources:

Culpepper, Nicolas. Culpepper's English Physician and Herbal Remedies. North Hollywood, Calif.: Wilshire, 1971.

Inglis, Brian, and Ruth West. The Alternative Health Guide. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1983.

Cults

A term used for many years in social science to refer to religious groups whose basic religious beliefs and practices differ markedly from those dominant in the particular culture in which they are found. The term cult has, however, since the 1970s become a pejorative term used to describe unpopular religious groups. Many groups labeled as "cults" are Spiritualist, occult, and metaphysical groups. The Theosophical Society, the Spiritualist movement, Christian Science, and occult groups such as the Rosicrucians were among the first groups so negatively labeled. In social science, the term has been replaced by the less prejudicial terms "new religion," new religious movement, or "alternative religion."

Contemporary use of cult was nurtured for many decades by Evangelical Christian organizations, some organized as late as the 1930s, to oppose groups that deviated from Christian orthodoxy. In the mid-1970s, a more secular anticult movement developed in the United States to oppose several new religions that focused their attention on young adult recruits. The major organization of the contemporary anticult movement is the Cult Awareness Network, which grew out of the older Citizens Freedom Foundation. It has nurtured a number of similar organizations in Europe and South America.

The anticult movement has encouraged the publication of a vast literature denouncing "cults." This literature is characterized by adoption of the "brainwashing" hypothesis to explain the destructive nature of the groups under attack. Such groups are said to have an unusual power to control the minds of their members to the extent that they lose the ability to think straight and evaluate their experience. According to the literature, members have been "programmed" and act like robots following every command of their leaders; they cannot choose to leave the harmful situation in which they have been trapped. This analysis justifies an intrusion into their lives by anticult forces. In extreme cases, such intrusions take the form of "deprogramming," a forceful removal of the person from the group and the application of social and psychological pressure to convince the person to break his or her relationship with the group.

In 1987–88, the American Psychological Association examined the issue of brainwashing or mind control in relation to new religions and other groups, such as psychological training groups, that had been accused of using techniques of "coercive persuasion" against their adherents. The association concluded that such theories were based on insufficient scientific data and that the work done was severely flawed methodologically. This opinion was confirmed by the American Sociological Association and the Society for the Scientific Study of Religion. Most scholars on new religions had rejected the brainwashing hypothesis shortly after its proposal in the early 1980s, and those opinions by the several scholarly bodies have been decisive in moving discussion of the so-called cults to other issues.

The anticult movement has joined the ranks of various opposition groups (anti-Catholic, anti-Mormon, anti-Semitic) that have dotted the religious landscape in recent centuries. In the meantime, scholars have noted a radical jump in religious pluralism in Western society.

Sources:

Ellwood, Robert S., Jr. Alternative Altars: Unconventional and Eastern Spirituality in America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979.

———. Religious and Spiritual Groups in Modern America. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1973.

Melton, J. Gordon. The Encyclopedic Handbook of the Cults. New York: Garland Publishing, 1992.

Melton, J. Gordon, and Robert L. Moore. The Cult Experience. New York: Pilgrim Press, 1982.

Cuma

Cuma, the first Greek city established in Italy, is located northwest of Naples. In ancient times, it was the site of a famous prophesying sibyl. Virgil (70–19 B.C.E.), the poet most known for the Aenead, resided in the area and left an account of one prophecy that became well known, especially as Christian leaders interpreted it as a foretelling of the appearance of Christ. The prophecy, recorded in the Fourth Eclogue, included in its text,

> The First-born of the New Age is already on his way from high heaven down to Earth. With him, the Iron race shall end and Golden Man inherit all the world. Smile on the baby's birth. . . this glorious Age will dawn. . . the ox will not be frightened of the lion.

Justin Martyr, the first of the post-Apostolic church fathers, had high praise for the sibyl at Cuma. He described her as teaching the people after ascending to a high place and that she had left behind a prophet of the Christ child. No less a personage than the Roman Emperor Constantine (the first to convert to Christianity), speaking before the First Council of Nicea in the fourth century, cited this prophecy as referring to Jesus, as did leading theologians such as St. Augustine.

Many references to the Cuma sibyl appear in ancient Greek and Roman literature. Over the centuries, the pronouncements of the successive sibyls were gathered and saved at Rome. Cicero, who held office of Augur of Rome, had access to the archive of prophecies, which were written in blank verse. He noted that the verses were frequently encoded so that the whole of the paragraph on each subject is continued in the initial letters of every verse of that paragraph. The encoding implied that the content of the oracles was carefully thought out.

The sibyl of Cuma was closely related to the oracle at Baia located only a few miles away. It was the Cuma sibyl who referred Aeneas to the oracle (as recounted in Virgil's Aeneid) and accompanied him on his journey to the Underworld to make contact with his deceased father.

In more modern times, the sybil ceased to function and the cave out of which she operated was abandoned. The cave was rediscovered and excavated in 1932 by Professor Amedeo Maiuri.

Sources:

Monteiro, Mariana. As "David and the Sybils Say": A Sketch of the Sibyls and the Sibylline Oracles. Edinburgh: Sands and Co., 1905.

Temple, Robert K. G. Conversations with Eternity: Ancient Man's Attempt to Know the Future. London: Rider, 1984.

Virgil: The Pastoral Poems. Translated by E. V. Reiu. Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin, 1967.

Cummins, Geraldine Dorothy (1890–1969)

Medium, channel, and Spiritualist author. Cummins was born January 24, 1890 in Cork, Ireland, the daughter of Prof. Ashley Cummins. She had a modest education yet was well traveled. The development of her mediumship began in December 1923 in sittings with Miss E. B. Gibbes. Ordinarily her work of composition was very slow, but her automatic writing speed was remarkable. On March 16, 1926, for example, she channeled 1,750 words in one hour and five minutes.

Her first books, beginning with The Spirits of Cleophas (1928), claimed to supplement the biblical books of the Acts of the Apostles and the epistles of St. Paul. It was a historic narrative of the early church and the work of the apostles from immediately after the death of Jesus to St. Paul's departure from Berea for Athens.

In the production of the first two sections of the book, Cummins was associated with F. Bligh Bond, but she received the scripts independently afterward. In her second volume, Paul in Athens (1930), the narrative is taken up and continued. The third, The Great Days of Ephesus (1933), followed the same line of thought.

The production of these automatic scripts was witnessed by several theologians, and the scholars who edited her books endorsed their intrinsic merit. They offered new interpretations of several obscure passages in the Acts of the Apostles, apparently showing close acquaintance with the early church and that age. For example, it was claimed that only a profound student could have given the head of the Jewish community in Antioch the title "Archon," because the usual title was "ethnarch" not long before the time referred to in the chronicle of Cleophas. Cleophas was not the immediate agent in the production of the scripts. They came through "the messenger." A total of seven scribes were said to be guided by Cleophas. The chronicle stated that it had been used in the early church but the existing few copies had perished. A more skeptical approach was adopted by Rodger I. Anderson, who examined Cummins's work in an article for Theta in 1983.

Cummins's fourth book, The Road to Immortality (1932), a series of communications purportedly from F. W. H. Myers, gives a stupendous vision of the progression of the human spirit through eternity. Sir Oliver Lodge offered his observations of Cummins's genuineness in the book's preface: "I believe this to be a genuine attempt to convey approximately true ideas, through an amanuensis of reasonable education, characterized by ready willingness for devoted service, and of transparent honesty."

Cummins wrote a detailed study of her automatic scripts received from the deceased "Mrs. Willett" (pseudonym of Winifred Coombe-Tennant) in the Swan on a Black Sea; a Study in Automatic Writing; the Cummins-Willett Scripts (1970). This highly regarded work contains a foreword by parapsychologist Professor C. D. Broad. Cummins also wrote The Fate of Colonel Fawcett (1955), dealing with psychically acquired information about the fate of the famous missing explorer, and worked with doctors on a project to heal neurotic patients through extrasensory exploration of the subconscious mind. Her book Unseen Adventures (1951) contains autobiographical material. Cummins died on August 24, 1969.

Sources:

Anderson, R. I. "The Mediumship of Geraldine Cummins." Theta 11, 3 (Autumn 1983).

Connell, R., and Geraldine Cummins. Perceptive Healing. London: Psychic Book Club. 1945.

Cummins, Geraldine. Beyond Human Personality. London: Psychic Press, 1935. Revised edition, 1952.

———. The Fate of Colonel Fawcett. London, 1955.

———. The Road to Immortality. London: Ivor Nicholson & Watson, 1933.

———. Swan on a Black Sea: a Study in Automatic Writing: the Cummins-Willett Scripts. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

———. Travelers in Eternity. Compiled by E. B. Gibbs. London: Psychic Press, 1984.

———. Unseen Adventures. London: Rider, 1951.

Heywood, Rosalind. "Notes on the Mediumship of Geraldine Cummins." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 45, 746 (December 1970).

Cunning

In addition to normal usage implying "crafty," cunning has an ancient meaning of "skillful" or "wise," especially when applied to occult or magic knowledge. The Anglo-Saxon term wortcunning means a knowledge of the medical and occult properties of plants (wort) and was applied to herbalists. In the course of time, the term cunning-man or cunning-woman was applied to so-called white witches, who practiced simple spells and claimed to discover those putting "the evil eye" on cattle, and who also cured ailments by herbs and magic practices.

Sources:

Cockayne, T. O., ed. Leechdoms, Wortcunning, & Starcraft. 2 vols. London: Longman, Green, 1864–66. Reprint, N.p., 1968.

Cunningham, Donna

Donna Cunningham, a contemporary psychologist and astrologer, grew up in Iowa and attended Grennel College, from which she earned a psychology degree in 1964. She went on to study at Columbia University, where she was awarded her master's in social work. Following graduation she began her counseling career and soon brought her astrological knowledge into her practice. Over the next two decades she became a leader in integrating astrological and psychological insights.

Cunningham began to make her impact nationally with her early text, An Astrological Guide to Self-Awareness, which appeared in 1979. She has subsequently authored ten additional books. These reflect not only her astrological interest but her belief in additional healing tools such as psychic healing and the use of flower essences (healing remedies first extracted from wild flowers by British physician Edward Bach in the 1930s). She edited Shooting Star, a flower essences journal, for several years (1989–91), and her book on flower essences appeared in 1992. She advises her colleagues to employ a broad range of techniques in their work and to adapt them for different astrological types.

Cunningham has been widely acknowledged by her colleagues for her work as an astrological counselor and has written a guidebook to assist new counselors in developing their practice. In 1986 she received the annual award from Professional Astrologers Incorporated for her contributions to the field. Cunningham resides in Port Townsend, Washington, and has become one of the more prolific American writers on astrology. She has written numerous articles for astrological periodicals such as The Mountain Astrologer authors and monthly column for Horoscope magazine.

Sources:

Cunningham, Donna. An Astrological Guide to Self-Awareness. Sebastopol, Calif.: CRSC Publications, 1979.

———. The Consulting Astrologer's Guidebook. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1994.

———. Flower Remedies Handbook. New York: Sterling Publishing, 1992.

———. The Moon in Your Life: Being a Lunar Type in a Solar World. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1996.

Fairfield, Gail, and Donna Cunningham. Choice-Centered Astrology: The Basics. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1998.

Cunningham, Scott (1956–1993)

Scott Cunningham, author of a number of book on contemporary Witchcraft, was born in Royal Oak, Michigan, on June 27, 1956, but moved with his family to San Diego, California, in 1961. His father, Chet Cunningham, was a writer and the author of more than 100 books. In 1971 Scott read a book his mother had acquired, The Supernatural by Douglas Hill and Pat Williams, which introduced him to the world of magic. He became fascinated with magic and witchcraft, and a short time later met a classmate who had begun practicing Wicca, the contemporary Neo-Pagan Witchcraft. Following graduation he attended San Diego State University to study creative writing. He left after two years, having already launched his writing career.

Cunningham jumped from short fiction and magazine articles to books in 1980 with the publication of his first novel, The Cliffside Horrors. Over the next two years he wrote more than a dozen novels in various genres from adventure to horror. He published one gothic romance novel under the pseudonym Cathy Cunningham and a series of Westerns as Dirk Fletcher. In the mid-1980s he authored two scripts for the popular television program "Knot's Landing."

Through the 1970s, Cunningham continued his study of magic. He made contact with several covens and studied in several different traditions, though ultimately he withdrew from coven participation and decided to practice as a solitary. He also developed his interest in nature and became knowledgeable in herbalism and the various substances used by magicians in their practice. Along with his novels he began writing textbooks and reference books for Wiccans. These began appearing at a time when the variety of books available to those interested in Wicca was still relatively limited.

His first Wiccan book, Magical Herbalism (1982), met with a popular response and he began to write regularly for Llewellyn Publications, the primary publisher of Wiccan materials in the United States. His research culminated in Cunningham's Encyclopedia of Magical Herbs (1985), Cunningham's Encyclopedia of Crystal, Gem and Metal Magic (1987), and The Complete Book of Incense, Oils, and Brews (1989).

Cunningham's most important and successful book was Wicca: A Guide for the Solitary Practitioner (1988). Wicca grew up as a coven-centered practice, but through the 1980s there had been increasing awareness of the presence and legitimacy of solitaries, witches who followed Neo-Pagan belief but practiced alone. However, little material had been produced for solitaries. The response to Cunningham's book made Wiccan leaders aware that the solitaries formed a much larger segment of the community than many suspected.

That same year Cunningham also finished The Truth about Witchcraft Today, a full-length version of a booklet published the previous year. This introductory text proved equally popular as his work for solitaries, and many Wiccans credit it with making them initially aware of the existence of the Craft. Cunningham became a popular speaker at Wiccan events and appeared to be on his way to long-term leadership in the Wiccan community, but had already manifested the illness that would lead to his untimely death on March 23, 1993. He continued to write until his passing, and several of his manuscripts were published posthumously.

Sources:

Cunningham, Scott. Cunningham's Encyclopedia of Magical Herbs. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1985.

———. Hawai'ian Religion and Magic. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1994.

———. The Magic of Incense, Oils, and Brews. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1989.

———. Magical Herbalism. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1982.

———. The Truth about Witchcraft Today. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1988.

———. Wicca: A Guide for the Solitary Practitioner. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1988.

Curnow, W. Leslie (d. 1926)

Australian-born journalist who became prominent as a Spiritualist in Britain. He was born in New South Wales and studied at Sydney University (B.A.). He was a journalist on the staff of the Sydney Morning Herald and then moved to London in 1913 to write for the Times.

Curnow became a member of the Society for Psychical Research and was assistant editor of the Spiritualist journal Light. He contributed articles to a variety of psychic periodicals and was responsible for several books, including The W. T. Stead Borderland Library Catalogue (1923) and The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism: A Historical Survey (1925).

He is chiefly remembered for his involvement with Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's famous two-volume work The History of Spiritualism, first published at the author's own expense in 1924 and reprinted in 1975. In this work Doyle gratefully acknowledges his indebtedness to Curnow, pointing out that such a history needed more research than his own busy life permitted. Doyle also states in his preface, "I cannot admit too fully the loyal assistance which he (Curnow) has given me, and if I have not conjoined his name with my own upon the title-page it is for reasons which he understands and in which he acquiesces." Curnow died February 11, 1926.

Sources:

Doyle, Arthur Conan. The History of Spiritualism. 2 vols. London: The Author, 1924. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Curran, Pearl Lenore (Pollard) (1883–1937)

A housewife in St. Louis, Missouri, through whom the Patience Worth books were produced. On July 8, 1913, Curran and a friend Emily Grant Hutchings were playing with the Ouija board when it moved under her hands at a rapid rate. A message was spelled out that read, "Many moons ago I lived. Again I come—Patience Worth my name." Patience Worth, whoever or whatever she was, continued to communicate through Curran for the next quarter-century, at first through the Ouija board and then directly. She produced poems, prayers, and several full-length novels. Of the novels, The Sorry Tale, set in the time of Jesus, elicited the most response, including praise from a reviewer in the New York Times. During the early years, Worth communicated in an archaic English that, although it proved to be a language never spoken, nevertheless consisted almost entirely of Anglo-Saxon root words and no modernisms.

Some psychical researchers found much to praise in Curran's work. They noted that she had received material from sources far beyond her knowledge while in a waking state. Walter Franklin Prince believed that if the Spiritualist hypothesis that Patience Worth was a disembodied spirit communicating through Curran was not accepted, then a reappraisal of our understanding of the subconscious must be revised. Of course, over the last few decades that is exactly what has happened, and Curran's production, while notable, has been duplicated and does not seem as extraordinary.

Sources:

Hickman, Irene. I Knew Patience Worth. Sacramento, Calif.: The Author, 1971.

Litvag, Irving. Singer in the Shadows: the Strange Story of Patience Worth. New York: Macmillan, 1972.

Prince, Walter F. The Case of Patience Worth. Boston: Boston Society for Psychical Research, 1927.

Worth, Patience. Hope Trueblood. New York: Henry Holt, 1918.

———. Light from Beyond: Poems of Patience Worth. Compiled by Herman Behr. New York: Patience Worth Publishing, 1923.

———. The Pot Upon the Wheel. St. Louis, Mo.: Dorset Press, 1921.

———. The Sorry Tale. New York: Henry Holt, 1917.

Cursed Bread

Used in ancient times for divination or "ordeal by flour or bread." A piece of bread, about an ounce in weight, over which a spell had been cast, was administered to the suspected person. If it caused sickness or choking, the person was said to be guilty; if not, he or she was regarded as innocent. Barley bread was often used for this form of divination, since it was more likely to cause choking. This method of trial was practiced among the Anglo-Saxons.

Curtiss, Harriette Augusta (1856–1932)

Harriette Augusta Curtiss was the author of a number of influential occult books and the cofounder, with her husband, F. Homer Curtiss, of the Order of Christian Mystics. Born in 1856 in Philadelphia, she was given a good education and was headed for a career on the stage when her mother asked her not to pursue such a course. She eventually became a clairvoyant. She was 51 years old when she married F. Homer Curtiss and they began a very successful collaboration as occult leaders and teachers. The year of their marriage they founded the Order of the 15, whose task was the correlation of theosophical and orthodox Christian teachings. Through it she issued monthly lessons for students.

The Order of the 15 evolved into the Order of Christian Mystics. Curtiss assumed the role of teacher for the order and operated under the religious name Rahmea. Meanwhile, Homer Curtiss served as the order's secretary. Harriette Curtiss's first book was assembled from correspondence to students and published as Letters from the Teacher. The monthly lessons were later gathered into the order's basic text, The Voice of Isis, and the more advanced text, The Message of Aquaria.

During World War I the Curtisses formed the Church of the Wisdom Religion, a more esoteric group, to work alongside the Order of Christian Mystics. The church was later incorporated as the Universal Religious Foundation. Through the fruitful years of leading these two organizations, Curtiss wrote more than 20 books and booklets covering a variety of occult topics. She died September 22, 1932, in Washington, D.C.

Sources:

Curtiss, Harriette Augusta, and Homer Curtiss. The Key of Destiny. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1991.

———. Letters from the Teacher. 2 vols. Hollywood, Calif.: Curtiss Philosophic, 1918.

———. The Message of Aquaria. San Francisco: Curtiss Philosophic, 1921.

———. The Voice of Isis. Washington, D.C.: Curtiss Philosophic, 1935.

Cutten, John H(ector)

British author of textbooks on radar and psychical researcher. Cutten served for a number of years as secretary of the Society for Psychical Research, London, and had a special interest in telepathy, clairvoyance, and the evidence for existence of the human aura.

Cutten invented what he called the "Ghost Detector," a complex apparatus consisting of a main control box containing the electronics, a camera loaded with infrared film, a wind vane and vibrator, an ordinary flash unit, a flash unit with an infrared filter, a tape recorder, a photoelectric cell, a microphone, a pilot light, and a thermostatic control.

It is often claimed that ghostly visitations are accompanied by drafts of air, vibrations, changes in the illumination of the room, noises, changes in temperature, or physical disturbances. If any such changes took place in a haunted room, the ghost detector operated automatically. The first camera took a photograph with infrared film. Simultaneously, a buzzer was automatically switched on. The investigator could then press the remote control bulb to take an ordinary photograph with the standard film unit. The arrangement also included a thin wire trained around the room that triggered the equipment if touched.

Sources:

Haynes, Renée. The Society for Psychical Research, 1882–1982: A History. London: Macdonald, 1982.

CWA See Congregational Witchcraft Association

Cyamba

The chief of the Egbo Society, a secret council of tribes in Calabar, near the Niger delta, in earlier times. The Egbo practiced a form of sorcery and magic called Obeah.

Cycles (Journal)

Journal of the Foundation for the Study of Cycles, published in nine issues per year, which discusses recurring patterns that occur in the physical world. Issues include the economy, the arts and natural and social sciences. Address: 214 Carnegie Center, Ste. 204, Princeton, NJ 08540. The foundation has a website at http://www.cycles.org/.

Sources:

Foundation for the Study of Cycles. http://www.cycles.org/. March 8, 2000.

D

D.O.M.E., the Inner Guide Meditation Center

D.O.M.E., the Inner Guide Meditation Center, was founded in Santa Fe, New Mexico, in 1975 around the teachings of Ed Steinbrecher who had brought together a group with a diverse interest in occult matters including astrology, I Ching, the tarot, Jungian psychology, and meditation. It moved to its present location in Los Angeles, California, in 1984. D.O.M.E. stands for a latin phrase, "Dei Omnes Munda Edunt," translated as, "All the Gods/Goddesses bring forth/eat the worlds." The Inner Guide is described as an individual's lost teacher who stands ready to lead the seeker along the inward spiritual path toward the union with the higher self and to the mystic experience of oneness. The Inner Guide teaches practical ways to create harmony and balance by cooperating with the Universal Archetypes (familiar from Jungian thought), considered the principles of spirit and nature.

The actual practice of the Inner Guide Meditation Center is found in Steinbrecher's book, The Inner Guide Meditation: A Spiritual Technology for the 21st Century, originally published in 1975. The book introduces the Inner Guide Meditation and prepares the individual for initiation into the experience in which he/she is assisted to make contact with a guide and with some of the universal archetypes.

The center in Los Angeles offers a wide range of services designed to assist individuals in exploring their inner self. Those trained in Inner Guide techniques may assist people going through various distressful life situations such as divorce or lawsuits, but place an emphasis on helping people develop better relationships and find success in their business or professional life. More metaphysical sessions are provided for exploration of past lives. Inner Guide practitioners also offer a full range of astrological and tarot counseling, including a special service for discovering the best dates for important actions (wedding, signing a contract, beginning a new project, etc.).

The Inner Guide Meditation Center may be contacted at P.O. Box 46146, Los Angeles, CA 90046-0146. It holds its meetings at the D.O.M.E. Meeting House (1526 N. Fairfax Ave.) in Los Angeles. It supports a webpage at http://www.dome-igm.com/.

Sources:

D.O.M.E. http://www.dome-igm.com/. May 17, 2000.

Steinbrecher, Ed. The Inner Guide Meditation: A Spiritual Technology for the 21st Century. 1975. 6th ed. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1988.

D'Abadie, Jeannette (ca. 1609)

Self-confessed 16-year-old witch from the village of Sibôurre, in Gascony, France. According to Pierre De Lancre, she once claimed to have been transported to sea by a demon, where she saw other sorcerers raising storms to sink ships.

One day as she was sleeping a demon carried her off to the devil's sabbath, where she awoke to find herself in the midst of a large company. She saw that the principal demon had two faces, like the Roman god Janus. She did not participate in the revelry, and was transported home. On the threshold she found her amulet, which the demon had removed from her bosom before taking her away. She confessed all that had happened, renounced her practice of witchcraft, and saved herself from the common fate of witches and sorcerers of her day.

Dactylomancy

A term covering various forms of divination practiced with the aid of rings. One method resembles the table-tipping or raps of Spiritualism. A round table is inscribed with the letters of the alphabet, and a ring suspended above it. The ring, it is said, will indicate certain letters, which make up the message required. According to the historian Ammianus Marcellinus (320–390 C.E.), this method was used to find the successor to Flavius Valens (d. 378 C.E.); the name Theodosius was correctly indicated. Solemn religious services accompanied this mode of divination.

Another form of dactylomancy, of which there is no detailed account, was practiced with rings of gold, silver, copper, iron, or lead, placed on the fingernails in certain conjunctions of the planets.

Today a wedding ring is most popular for this purpose. Another way to divine an answer is to suspend the ring near a glass tumbler so that it touches the glass when swung. A code may then be arranged, the ring striking the glass once for an affirmative, twice for a negative answer, and so on. (See also pendulums)

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, NJ: University Books, 1974.

Dactyls

A class of sorcerers and scientific physicians originating in ancient Phrygia around the fifth century B.C.E. The number of members was given differently by different sources. Some said it equaled the number of fingers on the hands—five male and five female. Pausanias said five, Perecydes 52 (20 right and 32 left), while Orpheus the Argonaut mentioned a larger number.

The dactyls were magicians, exorcists, conjurers, and soothsayers. Plutarch said they made their appearance in Italy as sorcerers. Their mysterious practices threw the people of Samothrace into consternation. They were credited with the first a use of minerals and with developing the notes of the musical scale, as well as with the discovery and use of the Ephesian mines.

They supposedly introduced fire into Crete and musical instruments into Greece. They were good runners and dancers and were skilled in science and learning. They were said by some to have been the magnetic powers and spirits, whose head was Hercules.

Sources:

Eliade, Mircea. Forgerons et Alchimistes. Flammarion, 1965. Translated as The Forge and the Crucible. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1962.

"Daemonologie"

A book by James VI, king of Scotland (later James I of England). The king's books were greatly admired in his day, winning the praise of Bacon, Izaak Walton, and numerous equally eminent men of letters. Published in 1597, Daemonologie is written in "[the] forme of ane dialogue," the speakers being Philomathes a skeptic of magic, and Epistemon, who enlightens Philomathes on the subject. Epistemon names many famous acts of witchcraft for the sake of analysis, but when Philomathes asks why the black art is considered wicked Epistemon fails to give a satisfactory answer. He merely rails against the practice, making trite statements. Epistemon is converted to the other speaker's point of view, declaring loudly that all sorcerers and the like "ought to be put to death according to the law of God, the civill and imperiall Law, and municipall Law of all Christian Nations."

The book was indicative of James's credulity toward witchcraft. He attended some witchcraft trials in Scotland and was impressed with the evidence presented. Later, Puritan Bible translators seeking James I's approval of their work translated the Hebrew word ob as "witch" to gain his favor. That translation in the King James Version of the Bible provided the English-speaking world with phrases such as "Thou shalt not suffer a witch (ob) to live" and the "witch (ob) of Endow."

Sources:

James I. Daemonologie. 1597. New York: De Capo Press, 1969.

Macdougall, Norman. James IV. Edinburgh: John Donald Publishers, 1989.

Dahl, Ingeborg (Mrs. Koeber)

Daughter of Judge Ludwig Dahl of Fredrikstad, Norway, whose trance mediumship provided many in the 1930s with what they considered impressive evidence for spirit return.

Thorstein Wereide, a professor at the University of Oslo, describes his experiences in an article in Psychic Science (April 1931). In 1925 Wereide and his wife moved into an apartment in an old wooden house in Oslo. On February 23, 1926, in the middle of the night, Mrs. Wereide was awakened by three loud knocks on the front door. Thinking that guests of the family below had mistaken the apartment, she ignored the knocks, but soon afterward was startled by the same knocking at the door of her sitting room. She entered the room and saw no one, but when she went into the entrance hall she saw a tall man in evening dress with a sad expression. He asked her to help him, and specifically to remember a date. "It was the 23rd of February yesterday," he said, then suddenly vanished. The electric light was on and the doors were closed. The man was seen again on three occasions, and he always disappeared near a small room in the corner of the apartment.

The following year, on the same day, Wereide awoke to hear his wife holding a loud conversation with an invisible person while she was sitting up in bed. She was in a state of trance, which lasted half an hour. Wereide wrote down her side of the conversation, from which it emerged that the ghost claimed to be a man who had lived in the house. He said he was not really dead, and told Mrs. Wereide, "I cannot get into contact with other people who are dead."

The Wereides then decided to experiment with Ingeborg Dahl, a medium they knew. Without mentioning their experience, they invited her to spend an evening with them during the autumn of 1928. Dahl went into a waking trance and her control "Ludvig" immediately contacted the ghost. The control requested that on a certain day Dahl sit down in her home with paper and pencil. When she did this, a name was written on the paper.

On May 29, 1929, the Wereides again invited Dahl to their home. She went into a waking trance; the ghost said there was something in the house that must be destroyed and that he needed her help. She took the hand of the ghost and went to the small room where he always disappeared. At her suggestion, the door to another room was closed, so that light entered only from the street through a window. The medium then asked, "Was it here?" A slight tap was heard and in a moment there appeared in her hand two old letters, tied together with red ribbon. The medium went back into the bedroom and stood in front of a stove, insisting that the letters be burned. The Wereideses hesitated, noting that the paper was yellow with age and the ink very pale, then reluctantly burned them.

Through the medium the ghost then said,

"Now I have reached what I tried to do all this time. I understand very well that you were eager to have the letters, but then all my work would have been done in vain. The letters concerned a lady who has lived in the house, and her honor was threatened as long as the letters were there. It was my fault."

Afterward there were no further ghostly phenomena, and Wereide, who had formerly accepted the possibility of all psychic phenomena except apports, now accepted apport phenomena.

Dahl (by that time known under her married name, Ingeborg Koeber) was also the subject of a strange trial at the Oslo Criminal Court in 1935. On August 8, 1934, her father, Judge Ludwig Dahl, the mayor of Bergen, drowned while swimming in the sea. She reportedly heard him call for help and swam out to rescue him. She brought him safely to shore, but he died in her arms. At the inquest, the mayor's deputy, Christian Apenes, told the coroner that on December 4, 1933, he attended a Spiritualist séance with Judge Dahl. The medium was Koeber, and in a trance she communicated a message allegedly from her dead brother, Regnar Dahl. The message was that their father would die within a year, but that Apenes must not tell anyone this, including Koeber, who would not remember the message when she came out of the trance. The spirit also stated that the same message would be communicated to another medium, a Mrs. Stolt-Nielsen, who was to make a note of it and place it in a sealed envelope.

After Judge Dahl's death, Apenes asked Stolt-Nielsen if she had received the message, and she produced a sealed envelope. Opened in the presence of witnesses, it contained the message, "In August 1934 Mayor Ludwig Dahl shall lose his life in an accident." When these prophecies were revealed by the press, there was considerable scandal and controversy. Some people thought the mayor might have committed suicide under subconscious suggestion, others that his daughter had drowned him before bringing him back to shore. It was even suggested that Apenes had hypnotized her and suggested that she murder her father.

Koeber took the matter to court to clear her name of such rumors. The investigation lasted three years, during which it was revealed that her father's life insurance policy had expired on the day of his death. The court then found that Judge Dahl's death accidental, but the judge's wife, who had suffered great strain, committed suicide before her daughter's name was cleared.

The case was discussed in a book by Cornelius Tabori, as well as by Harry Price, who had attended a séance with the Dahl family in 1927. Price had been so impressed by the Dahls' sincerity that he helped Judge Dahl find a London publisher for his book We Are Here (1931), to which Sir Oliver Lodge contributed a foreword.

Sources:

Price, Harry. Fifty Years of Psychical Research. N.p., 1939.

Tabori, Cornelius. My Occult Diary. London, 1951.

Dahne, Micki

A modern sensitive whose predictions about famous people were covered by the National Enquirer in the mid-1970s and who has since hosted her own radio shows. A bright, cheerful blonde, she interpreted ESP as "extra-sensitive perception" and has stated that she dislikes psychic connotations. She believes this sensitivity to be present in many individuals, and has encouraged her own children to develop it.

After coverage by the tabloid press began, she delivered alleged communications from such deceased celebrities as Mary Jo Kopechne (of the Kennedy-Chappaquiddick tragedy) and Marilyn Monroe.

Daim, Wilfried (1923–)

Austrian psychologist and psychotherapist who investigated areas of parapsychology. He was born July 21, 1923, in Vienna, and received his Ph.D. at the University of Vienna in 1948. He began the practice of psychotherapy and in 1958 was named head of the Institute for Political Psychology, Vienna. Apart from several books on psychology, Daim has written on experimental dream telepathy and various related topics and published a book describing his interest in the psychic realm, Experimente mit der Seele (1949).

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Dalai Lama, The Fourteenth (1935–)

The Dalai Lama is the traditional head of the Tibetan people and the spiritual leader of the Gelugpa sect of Tibetan Buddhism. The Office of the Dalai Lama was instituted by Tsongkhapa (1357–1419), the reformist leader who had established the Gelugpa tradition and went to Lhasa to confront the traditional Nyingpa leadership. Tsongkhapa's goal was to tighten monastic discipline, reduce the emphasis on magic, and enforce rules on celibacy. He established a monastery at Panchen, and he led in the founding of several other monastic centers at key locations. Gedun Drub (1391–1474), the first Dalai Lama, was a disciple of Tsongkhapa. He established Tshilhunpo monastery, the Gelugpa center in Tsang province. The Gelugpa reforms gradually gained the upper hand, and the Great Fifth Dalai Lama seized temporal power in Tibet and moved to Llasa, where he turned the Potala, an old meditation pavilion, into a large palace.

The person of the Dalai Lama is as an emanation of Chenresi, the Buddha of Compassion, and it is believed that incarnations of the original Dalai Lama have continued to hold the office through the centuries. Traditionally, following the death of the Dalai Lama, leaders of the Gelugpa sect search among the children of the land for his reincarnation. Candidates will be tested with a set of objects, some of which were owned by the late Dalai Lama. The child recognized as the returned Dalai Lama will choose the object owned by the former Dalai Lama and has been known spontaneously to recite Buddhist scriptures he had not been taught or to recognize associates of the former Dalai Lama. The new Dalai Lama is then taken to a monastery to be raised.

The present Dalai Lama, Jampel Ngawang Lobsang Yeshe Tenzin Gyatso, was born on July 6, 1935, in Taktser, Amdo, Tibet, into a peasant family. His father was a farmer. He was brought to Lhasa in 1939 and enthroned the following year. Throughout World War II (1939–45), he was educated by some of the eminent scholars of the land, and as a youth also had what became his famous encounters with Austrian war refugee Heinrich Herrar, recounted in the book and movie, Seven Years in Tibet. Due to the postwar pressures created by an expansive communist China, he assumed formal powers at the age of 16. At the age of 24 he finished his education with the degree of Lharampa Geshe.

The Dalai Lama had little time to enjoy his position. Unable to hold the Chinese back, on March 17, 1959, he was forced to flee Tibet and to establish his government in exile in Dharmasala, India. More than 100,000 Tibetans fled at the same time. A mirror of the traditional Tibetan community, complete with monasteries and headquarters of all of the Tibetan Buddhist sects, have been created in India and Nepal. He set about the task of regaining independence for Tibet, which has been incorporated into China. As Tibetan Buddhism spread from India into the world, especially the West, he opened offices of the Tibetan government-in-exile in many countries sympathetic to his cause. In 1989 he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize, though his efforts to liberate Tibet show no signs of bearing fruit.

Through the 1990s, the maturing Dalai Lama, who travels widely, has also arisen as a world spiritual leader. He studied with teachers in all of the major schools of Tibetan lineages whose leaders recognize his accomplished scholarship. He has lectured widely both as the Gelugpa spiritual leader and Tibet's titular leader. He has also authored two autobiographies and a number of books expounding meditation and Tibetan Buddhist teachings.

Sources:

Coleman, Graham, ed. A Handbook of Tibetan Culture. Boston: Shambhala, 1993.

H. H. Dalai Lama. The Dalai Lama at Harvard: Lectures on the Buddhist Path to Peace. Ithaca, N.Y.: Snow Lion Publications, 1988.

———. The Meaning of Life from a Buddhist Perspective. Translated by Jeffrey Hopkins. Boston: Wisdom Publications, 1992.

———. My Land and My People: Memoirs of the Dalai Lama of Tibet. 1962. Reprint, New York: Potala Corp., 1983.

———. Transcendent Wisdom. Translated by B. Alan Wallace. Ithaca, N.Y.: Snow Lion Publications, 1988.

Dalan

A druid who figures in the medieval Irish legend of Conary Mor, high king of Ireland.

Dale, Laura A(bbott) (1919–1983)

Prominent member of the American Society for Psychical Research (ASPR) who for 25 years edited the society's Journal. Dale was born August 22, 1919, in Cornwall, New York, and attended private schools in New York City before studying at the Sorbonne in Paris. Her research included experiments in dream telepathy and proxy sittings with medium Eileen Garrett. She was also closely concerned with the medical section of the society beginning in 1948.

Dale was author or coauthor of a score of papers in the Journal of the ASPR and collaborated with Gardner Murphy on his book Challenge of Psychical Research: A Primer of Parapsychology (1966). She became editor of the society's Journal in 1941 and was later appointed research associate and publications editor for the ASPR. She resigned as editor of the Journal in 1947 to devote time to her research projects and work as a clinical assistant at the Department of Psychiatry, Maimonides Hospital, Brooklyn, New York. She continued to be actively involved in production of the Journal and the Proceedings.

In 1960, Dale left the ASPR staff for three years when she moved from New York to a house on Long Island. She became an editorial associate at University Books in New York, concerned with its publication program devoted to psychical research. In 1963 she returned to the ASPR as editor of the Journal and Proceedings. She was a charter member of the Parapsychological Association. She died February 2, 1983, on Long Island, New York. (For a bibliography of her publications, compiled by Rhea A. White, see the Journal of the ASPR October 1983.)

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Dale, Laura A., and Gardner Murphy. Challenge of Psychical Research: A Primer of Parapsychology. New York: Harper & Row, 1966.

Dale, Laura A., and Rhea A. White. Parapsychology: Sources of Information. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1973.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Dallas, Helen Alexandria (1856–1944)

An early British investigator of psychical research and author of several books on the subject. Dallas was born July 12, 1856, in India, and was educated privately. Deeply religious, she was preoccupied with the question of evidence for survival and its connection with religion. Her interests led her to translate Gabriel Delanne's L'Ame est immortelle into English, as Evidence for a Future Life (1904). She also sat with such famous mediums as Florence Cook and wrote many articles published in British periodicals such as Light and Psychic Science. She died May 10, 1944, in London.

Sources:

Dallas, Helen A. Across the Barrier. N.p., 1913.

———. Comrades on the Homeward Path. N.p., 1930.

———. Comrades on the Homeward Way. N.p., 1929.

———. Human Survival and Its Implications. N.p., 1930.

———. Leaves from a Psychic Notebook. N.p., 1927.

———. Mors Janus Vitae? A Discussion of Certain Communications Purporting to be from Frederic W. H. Myers. London: William Rider and Son, 1910.

———. The Nurseries of Heaven. N.p., 1920.

———. Objections to Spiritualism Answered. Manchester, England: Two Worlds Publishing, 1916.

———. The Victory that Overcometh. N.p., 1901.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Dalton, Joseph Grinnell (1828–1898)

Boston astronomer and astrologer who became an important figure in the development of astrology by developing and publishing an accurate ephemeris and table of houses, the two basic tabulations needed by astrologers to prepare a horoscope chart. The ephemeris charts the position of the sun, moon, and planets for each day of the year. The table of houses shows the astrologer how to rotate the chart to accurately reflect the exact minute of the client's birth, thus representing the heavens on the client's birthday. Dalton's table of houses, originally published as The Spherical Basis of Astrology (1893), has continued to be reprinted and used throughout the twentieth century under the title Dalton's Table of Houses. Dalton also published the first ephemeris of the newly discovered planets Neptune and Uranus.

Sources:

Dalton, J. G. The Boston Ephemeris. Boston: Occult Publishing, 1898.

———. The Sixteen Principal Stars. Boston: Occult Publishing, 1898.

———. The Spherical Basis of Astrology. Boston: Arena Publishing, 1893.

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, AZ: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

Dalton, Thomas (ca. 1450)

The history of this alchemist is veiled in obscurity, but he appears to have lived about the middle of the fifteenth century. Since he is mentioned in the Ordinall of Alchimy by Thomas Norton, who died in 1477, it is likely that he studied alchemy with, or at least was friends with, Norton.

Dalton was a churchman, resident at an abbey in Gloucester, and it is believed that he was once brought before King Edward IV, and charged with the secret practice of magic, in those days a capital crime. His accuser was one Debois, to whom Dalton had at one time been chaplain; Debois affirmed on oath that he had seen the alchemist create a thousand pounds of pure gold in a day. Dalton reminded his accuser that he had sworn never to reveal this or any such facts. Debois acknowledged his breach of trust, but added that he was acting for the good of the commonwealth.

The alchemist then addressed the king, telling him that he had been given the power of projection by a certain canon of Litchfield, and that since then he had been in such a constant state of trepidation that he had ultimately destroyed the precious gift. Edward granted him his freedom, and gave him money for his journey home.

On his way there he was seized by Thomas Herbert, who had heard of the accusation brought against the churchman and was naturally inquisitive. Herbert carried his victim to the castle of Gloucester, and, incarcerating him there, tried every means to make him disclose the secret. His efforts were in vain, however, and Dalton was condemned to death by his persecutor.

When he was brought out to be beheaded in the courtyard of the castle, he placed his head on the block and cried to God to receive his soul. He asked the executioner to strike speedily, but the axe was barely raised when Herbert sprang forward to avert it, declaring that he dared not shed innocent blood. The projected execution was no more than a plot conceived by Herbert to make the alchemist confess all when his life was at stake. Since the plan failed, Dalton was allowed to go free. He returned to his abbey in Gloucestershire and lived quietly for the rest of his days.

Damanhur

Damanhur is a large esoteric community founded in 1979 in the Valchiusella valley north of Turin, Italy. The community grew out of the work of Oberto Airaudi (b. 1950), a precocious young man who involved himself in the lively metaphysical community of Turin in the early 1970s. He became a psychic healer and a Spiritualist medium. By 1974 he had established a following which he brought together in the Horus Center. Airaudi began to advocate the ideal of communal living and in 1976 a settlement was established on the present site of the community, which was officially constituted in 1979.

In 1981 the community promulgated a constitution that emphasized the notion that Damanhur was a separate state. A government was organized and a currency issued. The idea of operating as a separate state created tension with the local authorities. That tension was increased when community members founded successively their own day school, elementary school, and high school. Local authorities finally relented on the school issue and soon discovered from standardized tests that students were scoring above the national average.

Damanhur operates out of a modified Gnostic/theosophical myth. God is unknowable and approached only through a number of intermediate deities. The universe is also populated with a number of lesser entities, including angels, nature spirits, and demons. In the prehistoric past human beings fell into matter, and one of the objects of spiritual esoteric work is the return to the primeval state. Aside from the more common arts of alchemy and magic, the community also promotes Selfica, the science of the accumulation and use of subtle energies. The ancient arts related to Selfica have been enhanced in the modern context through the use of various contemporary technologies. The citizens of Damanhur also have developed a special relationship to the animal world, and each person takes a second name as an animal.

Damanhur jumped into the news in 1992 when it was discovered that for some years the community had been involved in the creation of a vast underground temple complex. A member of the leadership revealed the existence of the complex when no amicable parting settlement could be reached. The beautiful temple was carved out of solid rock and includes many rooms of paintings, frescos, stained glass, and mosaic art. The temple has been designed for the various magical and ritual purposes of the larger community, and is ultimately tied to the occult, and unrevealed goals of the group.

Damanhur has developed a number of businesses that support the community. Though nuclear families dominate, marriages are for a specific length of time, after which they are renewed or terminated. As the 1990s drew to a close there were approximately 400 resident members and an additional 300 associate members who lived in the vicinity. Damanhur may be visited on the Internet at http://www.damanhur.org/.

Sources:

Airaudi, Oberto. Tales from Damanhur. Translated by Esperide and Ileana Troni. Canavese, Italy: Damanhur Editrice, 1997.

Intrivigne, Massimo. "Damanhur: A Magical Community in Italy." Communal Studies 16 (1996): 71-84.

Merrifield, Jeff. Damanhur: The Real Dream. London: Thorsons, 1998.

Damaran-Nata (or Dumbarim Nardir)

One of the classes of attendants or companions of the Hindu devas, whose special duty was to play upon a kind of drum. (See also Deva-Loka)

Damcar

According to Rosicrucian legend, Damcar was a mystical city of secret Arabia, inhabited by a group of adepts.

Damian, John ("Master John") (ca. 1500)

Alchemist who first appeared at the court of James IV, king of Scotland, as a surgeon around 1500. He was originally from Lombardy and practiced surgery in France. He was also employed by James in the practice of alchemy and was later appointed abbot of Tungland in Galloway, Scotland.

The Danaans

The people of the goddess Dana, often mentioned in Irish medieval romance. They were one of the three Nemedian families who survived the Fomorian victory and returned to Ireland at a later period. Some said they came "out of heaven," and others that they sprang from four cities, where they learned science and craftsmanship. They were said to have brought a treasure from each city: from Falias the Lia Fail (Stone of Destiny), from Gorias an invincible sword, from Finias a magical spear, and from Murias the cauldron of the Dagda. They were believed to have been wafted to Ireland on an enchanted cloud, carrying their treasures with them. After a victorious battle they took possession of the whole of Ireland, except Connacht, which was given to the vanquished.

The Danaans represented power, beauty, science, and poetry to the writer of the myth; to the common people they were gods of earth. In their battles they were subject to death, but they conquered their mortal foes with special powers.

D'Anania (or D'Agnany, Giovanni Lorenzo) (d. 1458)

A lawyer of the fifteenth century who wrote a four-volume work entitled De Naturà Daemonum and a treatise on magic and witchcraft, neither of which is well known. He died in Italy in 1458.

The Dance of the Deer Foundation

The Dance of the Deer Foundation, Center for Shamanic Studies, was founded in 1979 to preserve the shamanic practices and traditions of the Huichol culture of central Mexico. The Huichol people are a small ethnic group of some 15,000 individuals residing near Ixtlan in the Sierra Madre Mountains noteworthy for the preservation of their pre-Columbian traditions. Integral to Huichol culture is the work of its shamans and healers, who appear to practice today in the same manner as their ancient forefathers. Huichol shamanism honors creation, especially the spirit of nature, and involves healing and empowerment through personal transformation as well as the healing of the larger social context. Each individual is pictured as a miniature model of the whole universe, within whom possesses the wisdom of the whole. Shamanism teaches its practitioners to apprehend that arrangement and to understand and to live in harmony with the natural and spiritual worlds.

The foundation was established by Brant Secunda, who had been inspired by his grandfather and teacher, Don José Matsuwa (1880–1990), the renowned Huichol shaman. Don José believed that the Huichol traditions were available for everyone with an open heart and hoped that those people who learned of the Huichol way would want to support the survival of his people. He commissioned his grandson to continue his work. For his part, Secunda completed 12 years of apprenticeship with his grandfather prior to assuming his role as director of the foundation. He has as a major goal the integration of shamanism into the world of modern medicine.

The foundation sponsors a range of workshops, pilgrimages, vision quests, and holistic medical conferences at many locations around the world. It also works to build an economic base for the Huichol people so they can continue their primarily corn-oriented agricultural existence. The foundation is headquartered at P.O. Box 699, Soquel, CA 95073. Its webpage may be found at http://www.shamanism.com/.

Sources:

Dance of the Deer Foundation. http://www.shamanism.com/. February 25, 2000.

Daphnomancy

Ancient method of divination by means of the laurel. A branch was thrown into the fire, if it crackled in burning, it was a happy sign, but if it burned without crackling, the prognostication was false.

D'Aquin, Mordecai (d. 1650)

A learned rabbi of Carpentras who died in 1650. He became a Christian and changed his name from Mordecai to Philippe. He was the author of an Interpretation of the Tree of the Hebrew Kabala.

The Dark

A druid of Irish medieval legend who turned Saba into a fawn because she did not return his love. When the fawn was protected by the hero Finn Mac Cummal, she changed back to a beautiful woman and became Mac Cummal's wife.

Dark They Were And Golden Eyed

Well-known British bookshop formerly in St. Anne's Court, London, specializing in science fiction, occultism, Atlantis, UFOs, and yoga. It was started by "Bram" Stokes and Diane Lister in 1969. The name was taken from the title of a science-fiction story by Ray Bradbury. The bookshop closed in 1981.

D'Ars, Curé (1786–1859)

Jean Marie Baptiste Vianney, a French minister of deep religious beliefs and fervent faith whose life was replete with extraordinary psychic manifestations. Vianney was born May 8, 1786, in Dardilly, a village near Lyons, France. Although a poor student, who found it difficult to learn Latin and theology, he was ordained a priest. He built chapels, homes for destitute children and friendless women, and provided for the poor. He did not have a penny in the world, yet he regularly maintained more than 100 poor women and children, for help always seemed to come in answer to his prayer.

Persons afflicted with disease soon began to experience sudden cures while praying before the altar or making confessions to the curé, or parish priest. According to the biographer Abbé Monnin, upward of 20,000 persons came annually from Germany, Italy, Belgium, all parts of France, and even from England to be cured by him. His church was open day and night, and immense crowds waited for hours and days. Omnibuses were established to convey patients from Lyons to d'Ars, and the Saone was covered with boats full of anxious pilgrims.

His powers of clairvoyance developed to such a degree it was reported that by walking in the crowd he could tell the names, connections, and circumstances of the patients as soon as he cast his eye upon them.

For 35 years he was persecuted by violent poltergeist disturbances. Loud knocks resounded at the gate, a storm of blows descended upon the furniture, and sometimes there were sounds as if a wild horse were rearing in the hall below his room, striking the ceiling with its hoofs and stamping with all four feet on the tiled floor. At other times a great flock of sheep appeared to be passing above his head, or a gendarme seemed to be ascending the stairs in heavy boots. He always expected these disturbances when someone was on his way to seek consolation from him and attributed it to the envy of the demons for the good he was going to do. He said that once the devil amused himself by pushing him about his chamber all night on a bed on castors. The next day when he entered his confessional he felt himself lifted up and tossed about as though he had been in a boat on a rough sea.

According to William Howitt,

"The truth probably is that M. Vianney had so reduced his body by fasting, penance and enormous exertion, that he had opened himself to all kinds of spiritual impressions, to which the devil was sure to have his share. But most likely many of these ghostly visitors were merely spirits of a low order who like to amuse themselves, as they found the curé accessible to them. Many, no doubt, like those who visited the Seeress of Prevorst, would have been glad of his prayers, had he not been so completely shut up on that head, by his catholic demonophobia."

Vianney died on August 4, 1859 in Ars, France. He was the subject of a papal process beginning in 1862, as a result of which he was declared venerable in 1872, blessed in 1905, canonized in 1925, and declared heavenly patron for all parish priests in 1929.

Sources:

De Saint Pierre, Michel. The Remarkable Cure of Ars: The Life and Achievement of St. John Marie Vianney. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1963.

Fourrey, René. The Curé D'Ars. London: Burns & Oates, 1959.

Trochu, Francis. The Curé D'Ars. London: Burns & Oates, 1936. Reprint, Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1950.

———. The Insight of the Cure D'Ars. London: Burns Oates & Washburn, 1934.

Trouncer, Margaret. Miser of Souls. London: Hutchinson, 1959.

Das Gupta, Narenda Kumar (1910–)

University lecturer in India, at Visva-Bharati University, Santiniketan, West Bengal, beginning in 1954, with a special interest in parapsychology. He was born January 1, 1910, in Barisal, Bengal, and was educated at the University of Calcutta. In 1937 he married Gouri Sen Gupta. His research in parapsychology centered on telepathy, psychokinesis, and parapsychology in relation to yoga and religion, about which he published a number of papers.

He served as the secretary of the Parapsychology Club, Santiniketan, and was a member of the editorial board of the Indian Journal of Parapsychology. He was a life member of the Indian Psychological Association and contributed a number of articles to its Journal. He also published a book on problems of tribal education among the Santals. Das Gupta was a member of the Indian Science Congress and the academic council of Visva-Bharati University.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

D'Aspilette, Marie (ca. sixteenth century)

Witch of Andaye, in the Labourd area of the Basque country, who lived during the reign of Henry IV. She was arrested at age 19 and confessed that she had been led to the sabbat and made to perform various witchcraft rites.

Davenport Brothers, Ira Erastus (1839–1911) and William Henry (1841–1877)

Famous American demonstrators of claimed spirit mediumship who performed before large audiences on the theatrical stage. Their father was a police official in Buffalo, New York, where Ira was born on September 17, 1839, and William on February 1, 1841.

In 1846—two years before an outbreak of paramormal activity at Hydesville, New York—"raps, thumps, loud noises, snaps, crackling noises" were reportedly heard at the Davenport home during the night. In 1850, in the wake of the widely reported events in Hydesville, the Davenport boys and their younger sister Elisabeth tried table-turning. According to their father, the table soon moved, raps were heard, messages were spelled out, and Ira's hand began to write automatically. A little later a simultaneous levitation of the three children was witnessed by all present. On the fifth night of the experiments, to comply with rapping directions, Ira fired a pistol into a vacant corner of the room. At the instant of firing the pistol was taken from his hand and in the flash a human figure was seen holding it and smiling at the company. The apparition was the first appearance of "John King," their self-appointed control. It lasted for an instant only, and with the extinction of the flash the figure vanished, the pistol falling to the floor.

A short time later a public rope-tying performance, for which the brothers became famous, was instituted on direction from the spirits. The brothers released themselves from the most complicated knots remarkably quickly. In due course both direct-writing and direct voice phenomena developed, and the brothers took to the road as performers, holding public séances amid challenging circumstances. Public committees were set up to examine the Davenports' phenomena, and their rope tying developed into an art of torture.

In 1857 the Boston Courier offered a reward of $500 for the production of genuine physical phenomena. Dr. H. F. Gardner of Boston accepted the challenge and arranged, before a committee of Harvard professors (consisting of Benjamin Pierce, Louis Agassiz, B. A. Gould, and E. N. Horsford), a series of séances with the sisters Kate Fox and Leah Fish, J. W. Mansfield, Dr. G. A. Redman, and the Davenport brothers. The Davenports were tied in the most brutal manner, the ropes drawn through holes bored in the cabinet and firmly knotted outside to make a network; the knots were tied with linen. Pierce sat in the cabinet between the mediums. As soon as he entered, an invisible hand shot the bolt, and the din of musical instruments began. A phantom hand was thrust through a small, curtained opening near the top of the middle door of the wardrobelike cabinet, and the professor felt it touch his head and face.

At the end of the séance, the mediums were found released, and (according to T. L. Nichols's biography) the ropes were found twisted around Pierce's neck. (The latter statement, however, was pronounced "shamelessly false" by the Boston Courier.) The committee issued only a brief negative report; a complete report was never published. It was countered by the report of Dr. Loomis, a professor of chemistry and toxicology at Georgetown Medical College, who also investigated the brothers. He concluded that the manifestations were produced through some new unknown force.

A Professor Mapes also had interesting experiences with the Davenports in Buffalo. He conversed with "John King" in direct voice for half an hour. His hand was seized in a powerful grasp, and when it was taken a second time, the phantom hand increased in size and was covered with hair. A large table on the elevated platform where the mediums were sitting was carried in an instant over the heads of the sitters and deposited in the most distant part of the room.

While some found the phenomena inexplicable, charges and evidence of fraud soon emerged. For example, a letter from Dr. John F. Gray, a well-known New York Spiritualist, to Epes Sargent (June 7, 1864) states: "I have not seen the Davenports this time here; but I entertain no doubt of the genuineness of the manifestations made in their presence. When they were here some years ago they were detected in making spurious manifestations when the genuine failed."

As a means of control, investigators often filled the hands of the mediums with flour or placed pennies on their shoes after carefully drawing the outline of the shoes on a piece of paper beneath them. When the door of the cabinet was opened, the flour was found in the brothers' hands as before, no white spots were on their clothes, and the pennies were in place.

The performance while sitting in the cabinet was called the light séance. There was a second part, the dark séance, in which the lights in the room were extinguished and the mediums sat tightly bound to their chairs between the other sitters. Tying and releasing occurred as in the cabinet. The swishing of rope was heard. The knots presented no obstacle. Sometimes every intermediate knot was left undone, with the seal at the end, yet the mediums were found free. As an additional amusement the rope was often coiled around the neck of some sitter. Then through the ropes, in some mysterious way, the coats of the mediums, or their waistcoats underneath, were whisked off and on again.

Those who entered the cabinet to sit with the brothers in the light séance were usually victims of strange pranks. Their handkerchiefs were taken, their breast pins removed and stuck into their coats, and their spectacles transferred to the face of one of the mediums.

"I have, at different times," wrote Robert Cooper, who spent seven months with the Davenport brothers in England and on the Continent, "seen at least three hundred persons enter the cabinet, all of whom certified that there was no movement on the part of the Brothers."

The Davenport brothers arrived in England in 1864. They were accompanied by the Rev. J. B. Ferguson, a former pastor from Nashville, Tennessee, who was famous throughout the South; D. Palmer, their operatic manager, who acted as secretary; and William M. Fay, another physical medium. Their stay in England was strenuous. Public opposition was violent, but interest in their feats was tremendous, and the Spiritualists reaped rewards of favorable press.

Their first séance in London was held privately at the residence of Dion Boucicault, the famous actor and author, in the presence of scientists and members of the press. In a report on the séance, after describing the babel generated by the musical instruments playing in the light and dark séances, a correspondent for The Times continues:

"A new experiment was now made. Darkness having regained its supremacy, one of the brothers expressed a desire to be relieved of his coat. Returning light showed him in his shirtsleeves, though his hands were still firmly bound behind the chair. It was now stated that he was prepared to put on the coat of any one of the company willing to 'loan' that article of attire, and an assenting gentleman having been found, the coat, after a short interval of darkness, was worn in proper fashion by a person for whom it had not been designed by the tailor. Finally, the brothers desired a release, and one of the company, certainly not an accomplice, requested that the rope might fall into his lap. During the interval of darkness a rushing sound as of swiftly-drawn cords was audible, and the ropes reached the required knees, after striking the face of the person in the next chair."

The Times correspondent said he was not sure that he had witnessed simple conjuring. An account in The Standard says the knots were tied by a sailor who was "profound" at knot tying, and the reporter of the Daily Telegraph was not certain whether the feats were "the annihilation of what are called material laws" or a display of some extraordinary physical dexterity. He was unsure whether to regard the believers in Spiritualism as "the embodiment of a mutual and colossal self-deceit, or the silent heralds of a social revolution which must shake the world."

The Davenport public séances began in October 1864 at the Queen's Court Concert Rooms, Hanover Square, London. They continued almost nightly until the end of the year. No committee could pinpoint the brothers' fraud, though a group of stage magicians attempted to prove that the performance was fraudulent.

It is probable that a sailor could tie a magician so that he could not free himself. "But no person," declares T. L. Nichols in Supramundane Facts in the Life of the Rev. J. B. Ferguson (1865), "of all the hundreds who have tried, has ever tied the Davenports or Mr. Fay so that they were not freed in a few minutes, nor so that the manifestations, which must have been made either by them or by an intelligent, invisible force attending them, did not occur in two seconds."

Although their stay in London was somewhat successful, the Davenports and Fay met with open hostility in the countryside. In Liverpool, for example, two members selected from the audience tied the mediums with a peculiarly intricate knot. The mediums protested that it was unfairly tight and injured their circulation. A doctor from the audience made an examination and pronounced against them. The Davenports refused to sit and asked Ferguson to cut the knot. The next night a riot broke out and the party left town. At Hull, Huddersfield, and Leeds they found a hostile public, inclined to lynch them. Since they did not find the police protection sufficient, they broke off their engagements. In a letter to Ferguson, the Davenports later wrote:

"Were we mere jugglers we should meet with no violence, or we should find protection. Could we declare that these things done in our presence were deception of the senses, we should, no doubt, reap a plentiful harvest of money and applause. As tricks they would transcend, according to the testimony of experienced observers, any ever exhibited in Occident or Orient. The wonders of the cabinet, or still more, of the dark séance, surpass all pretentions of conjurers. We should safely defy the world to equal them, and be honoured for our dexterity. But we are not jugglers, and truthfully declare that we are not, and we are mobbed from town to town, our property destroyed and our lives imperilled."

The truth of these wonders was solemnly promulgated by Ferguson:

"I have in their presence had articulate and audible conversation with a voice which was not theirs, nor that of any living person. With this I have conversed as a man talks with his friend, while the power or being from which the voice proceeded made its presence and reality known to me by other physical manifestations. In railway carriages, when in company with the Brothers Davenport and Mr. Fay, in passing through dark tunnels, I have been manipulated all over my body by hands seemingly human, sometimes unexpectedly, others at my request, when no one present could have touched me without my knowledge."

Robert Cooper's Spiritual Experiences (1867) thus sums up seven months' of close observation:

"I can truly say that during the whole time I was with them, extending over a period of seven months, I never saw aught to indicate that they were anything but passive instruments, the manifestations being produced by a power outside themselves. Indeed, I feel quite sure they could not accomplish these things by natural means without being detected every week of their lives; and I give it as my deliberate conviction after all the opportunities I have had of forming an opinion, that their manifestations are a reality; if they are not, then all creation is a myth and our senses nothing worth."

In France, where the Davenports traveled after their misadventures in England, they could not get the necessary permit to exhibit in public for some time, since the authorities feared similar disturbances. When the time finally arrived for their first performance, an emissary of a conjurer named Robin stepped onto the platform. Under pretense of examining the cabinet, he tore off the rail that supported one of the seats and, holding it up before the excited crowd, asserted that he had discovered a secret spring. Because of the confusion that arose, the police cleared the room. A few days later the séances continued, but by order of the prefect attendance was restricted to 60 persons.

Some magicians were more friendly, however. The famous conjurer Hamilton, and one Rhys, a manufacturer of conjuring implements, state in letters to the Davenports published in the Gazette des Etrangers (September 27, 1865) that the phenomena were inexplicable and could not be attributed to fraud. In later years a Professor Jacobs similarly testified that the phenomena seen in Paris "were absolutely true and belonged to the spiritual order of things in every respect." Before they left Paris, the Davenports were summoned to appear before the Emperor and the Empress Napoleon at the palace of St. Cloud. A party of 40 witnessed their demonstration with astonishment. They were well received in Belgium and appeared in St. Petersburg before the czar in the Winter Palace. Their first public séance in St. Petersburg was attended by a thousand people.

In 1868 they returned to England. At Cooper's initiative the Anthropological Society appointed a committee to investigate their phenomena. A trial séance was held, which the committee considered a failure. The conditions they proposed were found unacceptable by the mediums, and the investigation was broken off.

In 1876 the Davenports visited Australia. The following year William Davenport died in Sydney on July 1, 1877. His brother had the cabinet, ropes, and so forth engraved on William's tombstone. Ira returned to Mayville, New York, and continued to give stage demonstrations with another partner in Boston, Washington, and Pennsylvania. In 1906 he toured Jamaica and Cuba. His last performance was on November 19, 1906, for an American regiment near Santiago de Cuba. He died on his farm in Mayville, July 8, 1911.

The general conclusion regarding the Davenport brothers' pheonomena is that their performance was simple stage conjuring. Trick cabinets and rope tying were standard items of stage magic at the time, and Harry Houdini and his students demonstrated feats equal to and surpassing those of the Davenports. The brothers' refusal to continue with a performance in England when their wrists were tied too tightly argues against spirit agency, since this should have operated even in such unfavorable circumstances considering other marvels that were demonstrated. They escaped any exposure of trickery though, in spite of observation by alert and intelligent investigators (which other mediums also accomplished only to be caught later), and their release from binding with strong ropes was phenomenally rapid—often taking only two or three minutes.

Futhermore, during their long and checkered career the Davenports never claimed to know how their phenomena occurred. In a letter he wrote to Houdini, Ira Davenport declares,

"We never in public affirmed our belief in spiritualism. That we regarded as no business of the public, nor did we offer our entertainment as the result of sleight-of-hand or, on the other hand, as spiritualism. We let our friends and foes settle that as best they could between themselves but, unfortunately, we were often the victims of their disagreement."

In A Magician Among the Spirits (1924) Houdini claims that Ira Davenport admitted that he was a fraud and described how the rope trick was performed. There is no independent confirmation of this admission, however, and Houdini privately voiced different opinions to Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. In The Edge of the Unknown (1930), Doyle asserts, "I was an intimate friend of Ira Erastus Davenport. I can make the positive assertion that the Davenport Brothers never were exposed. . . . I know more about the Davenports than anyone living."

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Cooper, Robert. Spiritual Experiences, Including Seven Months with the Brothers Davenport. London, 1867.

Doyle, Arthur Conan. The Edge of the Unknown. N.p., 1930.

Ferguson, J. B. Supramundane Facts of the Life of Rev. J. B. Ferguson. London, 1865.

Houdini, Harry. A Magician Among the Spirits. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1924. Reprinted as Houdini: A Magician Among the Spirits. New York: Arno Press, 1972.

Nichols, T. L. A Biography of the Brothers Davenport. London, 1864.

Randolph, P. B. The Davenport Brothers. Boston, 1869.

Davey, S. T. (1864–1891)

A member of the Society for Psychical Research, London, who in 1886 gave imitations of the slate-writing performances of mediums William Eglinton and Henry Slade, with a view to exposing what he believed to be their fraud. Such fraud was a major problem in evaluating Spiritualism. By simple conjuring he succeeded in emulating all their feats, his successes becoming the subject of a series of important articles. Davey's future as a valuable force in psychical research ended abruptly when he died of typhoid fever at age 27.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Davey, S. T. "Spurious Mediumship." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 3 (1888): 199–207.

Hodgson, Richard. "Mr. Davey's Imitations by Conjuring of Phenomena Sometimes Attributed to Spirit Agency." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 8, 22 (1892): 253–310.

David-Neel, Alexandra (1868–1969)

French traveler, author, and Tibetan scholar. Born in the Paris suburb of Saint-Mandé on October 24, 1868, Alexandra David-Neel had a lonely childhood and spent much of her time reading about Eastern religions and philosophy. David-Neel was a practicing Buddhist and the first European woman to enter the forbidden city of Lhasa in Tibet. She spent 14 years in Tibet, living simply and studying Tibetan religion and occultism. Her two major books, translated into English as Magic and Mystery in Tibet and Initiations and Initiates in Tibet, are accounts of her first-hand observation of Tibetan occult and religious feats and have been frequently reprinted.

David-Neel received many honors for her books, including the gold medal of the Geographical Society of Paris, the French Legion of Honor, the Insigne of the Chinese Order of the Brilliant Star, and the silver medal of the Royal Belgian Geographical Society. She has also been the subject of several biographies since her death on September 8, 1969, in Pigne, France.

Sources:

David-Neel, Alexandra. Buddhism: Its Doctrines and Its Methods. New York: St. Martin's, 1939. Reprint, London: Bodley Head, 1977.

———. Initiations and Initiates in Tibet. London, 1932. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1959.

———. Magic and Mystery in Tibet. Rev. ed., New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1956. Reprint, New York: Dover Publications, 1971.

———. My Journey to Lhasa. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1927.

———. The Secret Oral Tradition in Tibetan Buddhist Sects. San Francisco: City Lights, 1964. Reprint, Calcutta: Maha Bodhi Society of India, 1971.

Foster, Barbara M., and Michael Foster. Forbidden Journey: The Life of Alexandra David-Neel. New York: Harper and Row, 1987.

Davidson, Peter (1842–1929)

Peter Davidson, cofounder of the Hermetic Brotherhood of Light (HBL), a nineteenth-century British occult order, was born and raised in Forres, Scotland. In 1866 he married Christina Ross. He became a violin maker and in 1871 published a book, The Violin, that surveyed the historical and technical aspects of the instrument. At the same time, he was a student of the occult and corresponded with various occult notables throughout Britain, including Hargrave Jennings. He may have become an initiate of Pascal Beverly Randolph (1825–1875), whose teachings he would later integrate into those of the brotherhood. Much of this occult interest seems to have been stimulated by occasional visions of angelic beings. He may also have been contacted by an Oriental adept, similar to one of the mahatmas with whom Helena Petrovna Blavatsky of the Theosophical Society (TS) had claimed contact. He would later suggest that the HBL and the TS had been founded by the same order of beings. In 1878, he published The Philosophy of Man, which manifested his interest in both the occult and alternative medicine, and invited contact by readers who shared his ideas.

At some point in the early 1880s, Davidson became acquainted with Thomas Burgoyne, an occult student who had learned to contact clairvoyantly the beings who made up an inner order of adepts whom he would begin to refer to as the Interior Circle. He had learned this ability from one Max Theon, a Polish occult teacher living in London. In 1884, Davidson, Burgoyne, and Theon founded the Hermetic Brotherhood of Light and in February 1885 began issuing The Occult Magazine as a periodical through which the public could learn of its existence.

By this time, Davidson began to harbor a dream of creating a utopian colony in the United States and began to speak of it in The Occult Magazine. His plans to move to America were accelerated in the spring of 1886 when Theosophists discovered that Burgoyne was in fact a man named Thomas Dalton who had been convicted of mail fraud in Leeds in 1883. Davidson and Burgoyne left for America as the scandal grew. Davidson and his family settled on a farm near Loudsville, Georgia. Although the brotherhood was largely destroyed in England, it had a growing membership in France and the United States. Burgoyne soon moved to the West Coast, where he established what was in effect a separate HBL that would eventually give birth to the presently existing Church of Light.

In Georgia, Davidson established himself as a herbalist and practitioner of alternative medicine. He authored several books, including Masonic Mysteries Unveiled and The Book of Light and Life. From 1892 to 1910 he edited The Morning Star, a periodical similar to The Occult Magazine he had published in the 1880s. He also came into contact with the Martinists, who had emerged in France under the leadership of Papus (Gérald Encausse). The Martinists had become the dominant occult group in France and had attracted the interest of Albert Farcheux (also known as F.Ch. Barlet), the HBL leader in Paris.

Through the 1890s, Davidson contended with several problems. He was arrested for practicing medicine without a license, though he was acquitted. He had problems with Edouard Blitz, the Martinist leader in America who attempted to destroy Davidson's relationship with Papus. At the beginning of the new century, he reestablished contact with Max Theon, then living in Algiers, and offered the pages of The Morning Star as an outlet in English for his Cosmic Philosophy, a doctrine he had developed from the channeled teaching coming through his wife.

Davidson died in 1929. His family had become established in White County and his son was the editor of the newspaper in Cleveland, Georgia. His descendants can still be found in the county.

Sources:

Davidson, Peter. The Mistletoe and Its Philosophy. Loudsville, Ga: The Author, 1892.

———. The Violin. Glagow: Porteous Bros., 1871.

Godwin, Joscelyn. The Theosophical Enlightenment. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994.

———, Christian Chanel, and John P. Deveney. The Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor: Initiatic and Historical Documents of an Order of Practical Occultism. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1995.

Davies, Lady Eleanor (1603–1652)

Eleanor Touchet, daughter of George, Lord Audley, and wife of Sir John Davies, an eminent lawyer in the time of James I and author of a poem of considerable merit, "Immortality of the Soul." Sir John Davies seems to have highly valued Eleanor's gift of prophecy, which led to her publishing a book, Strange and Wonderfull Prophesies (1649). She claimed to receive her prophecies from a spirit that communicated to her audibly (i.e., by clairaudience), although the voice could be heard by no other person. Amid her numerous other writings are Amend; Amend; Gods Kingdome is at Hand; Amen, Amen (1643) and Before the Lord's Second Coming: Of the Last Days to be Visited (1650).

Sir John Davies was nominated lord chief justice of the king's bench in 1626. Before he was inducted into office, Lady Eleanor, sitting with him at dinner, suddenly burst into tears. Sir John asked her what made her weep, and she replied, "These are your funeral tears." Sir John dismissed the prediction. Within a few days he suffered a stroke and died.

Lady Eleanor also predicted the death of the duke of Buckingham the same year. For the assumption of the gift of prophecy, she was cited before the high commission court in 1633 and was imprisoned briefly and fined.

Sources:

Davies, Lady Eleanor. Great Britains Visitation. London, 1645.

———. The Revelation Interpreted. London, 1645.

———. Of Times and Seasons, Their Mystery. London, 1651.

Davis, Andrew Jackson (1826–1910)

Medium, channel, and one of the founders of modern Spiritualism. He was born August 11, 1826, at Blooming Grove, Orange County, New York. Young Davis had gifts of clairvoyance and heard voices at an early age. On advice so obtained he pursuaded his father in 1838 to move to Poughkeepsie, New York (Andrew would later be known as "the Poughkeepsie Seer"). Up to age 16 he received no formal education. Apprenticed to a shoemaker named Armstrong, he worked at the trade for two years.

In 1843 Dr. J. S. Grimes, professor of jurisprudence in the Castleton Medical College, visited the city and delivered a series of lectures on mesmerism. Davis attended and was tried as a subject with no result. Later, a local tailor, William Livingston, made fresh attempts; he threw Davis into "magnetic sleep" and discovered that in this state the human body became transparent to Davis's eyes, enabling him to give accurate diagnosis of disease.

In 1844 Davis had a strange experience that was to have an enduring effect on his life. In a state of semitrance he wandered away from home and awoke the next morning 40 miles away in the mountains. There he claimed to have met two venerable men—whom he later identified as the ancient physician Galen and the Swedish seer Emanuel Swedenborg—and experienced a state of mental illumination.

He began teaching and published a small pamphlet, Lectures on Clairmativeness, about the mysteries of human magnetism and electricity. He did not include this pamphlet among his later works but explained in his Autobiography that the title was meant to be Clairlativeness.

During a professional tour he met a Dr. Lyon, a Bridgeport musician, and the Reverend William Fishbough. Lyon was appointed his magnetizer (i.e., mesmerist) and Fishbough his scribe. With their assistance, in November 1845 Davis began to dictate his great work, The Principles of Nature, Her Divine Revelations, and a Voice to Mankind. The dictation lasted for 15 months. Lyon repeated each trance utterance, and Fishbough transcribed them. They both insisted that except for grammatical corrections they performed no editing. During the dictation, the sole means of livelihood for the trio was the seer's earning power in giving medical diagnoses. When this proved insufficient the lady whom Davis later married came to their assistance.

There were many enthusiastic witnesses to the delivery of the dictation. Dr. George Bush, professor of Hebrew at the University of New York, declared that he heard Davis correctly quote Hebrew. The seer's good faith was also established by his answers to impromptu questions put to him as tests while he was in the clairvoyant state. Bush said, "Taken as a whole the work is a profound and elaborate discussion of the philosophy of the universe, and for grandeur of conception, soundness of principle, clearness of illustration, order of arrangement and encyclopaedic range of subjects, I know no work of any single mind that will bear away from it the palm."

It was partly due to Bush's enthusiasm that the book, published in 1847, was received with such interest. Within a few weeks of its appearance, however, Bush published a pamphlet, Davis' Revelations Revealed, warning the public against being misled by the numerous errors, absurdities, and falsities contained in Davis's work. It was clear to him, he said, that Davis, although apparently an honest and singlehearted young man, had been made the mouthpiece of uninstructive and deceiving spirits. This rapid change of opinion was later explained by Frank Podmore in his book Modern Spiritualism (1902) as stemming from the seer's attitude toward Christianity in the section of the book on divine revelations, which Bush probably did not read in advance and which contradicted Davis's views as expressed in his Lectures on Clairmativeness.

The book soon went through many editions, which testified to the appeal of the style and the remarkable qualities of this extraordinary work. This opening passage about the Creation is an example:

"In the beginning the Univercoelum was one boundless, undefinable, and unimaginable ocean of Liquid Fire. The most vigorous and ambitious imagination is not capable of forming an adequate conception of the height and depth and length and breadth thereof. There was one vast expanse of liquid substance. It was without bounds—inconceivable—and with qualities and essences incomprehensible. This was the original condition of Matter. It was without forms, for it was but one Form. It had not motions, but it was an eternity of Motion. It was without parts, for it was a Whole. Particles did not exist, but the Whole was as one Particle. There were not suns, but it was one Eternal Sun. It had no beginning and it was without end. It had not circles, for it was one Infinite Circle. It had not disconnected power, but it was the very essence of all Power. Its inconceivable magnitude and constitution were such as not to develop forces, but Omnipotent Power.

"Matter and Power were existing as a Whole, inseparable. The Matter contained the substance to produce all suns, all worlds, and systems of worlds, throughout the immensity of Space. It contained the qualities to produce all things that are existing upon each of those worlds. The Power contained Wisdom and Goodness, Justice, Mercy and Truth. It contained the original and essential Principle that is displayed throughout immensity of Space, controlling worlds and systems of worlds, and producing Motion, Life, Sensation and Intelligence, to be impartially disseminated upon their surfaces as Ultimates."

The first part of the book is the exposition of a mystical philosophy, the second reviews the books of the Old Testament, contests their infallibility, and describes Christ as a great moral reformer but not divine. The third advances a system of socialism.

The originality of the book as a whole was never contested. Bush, however, pointed out a strange coincidence. The revelations, for the most part, express views similar to Emanuel Swedenborg's; the language is in several cases "all but absolutely verbal [verbatim]," and there is a striking similarity to Swedenborg's book The Economy of the Animal Kingdom, a few English copies of which had just reached the United States.

Bush used this as an argument for Davis's supernatural powers, because it was doubtful the book could have reached him. In fact, Davis believed he was controlled by Swedenborg while he produced the book. In his publication Mesmer and Swedenborg (1847) Bush printed a letter from Davis accompanying a paper written in a cave near Poughkeepsie, on June 15, 1846. The paper accurately quoted long passages from Swedenborg's Earths in the Universe. Bush was satisfied that Davis had never heard of the book, but it is difficult to believe that Davis had not read it.

An apparently more serious charge could have been leveled against Davis's The Great Harmonia (1852). There are long passages in the book that correspond with the text of Sunderland's Pathetism (1847). But even Frank Podmore, a noted skeptic, believed that Davis could not have copied these passages and that the explanation lay in an extraordinary memory.

The statements concerning astronomy in the divine revelations section of The Principles of Nature are revealing. In March 1846, when the existence of an eighth planet was yet an astronomical supposition (the discovery of Neptune, verifying Leverrier's calculations, did not take place until September 1846), the book spoke of nine planets. The density of the eighth planet as given by Davis agreed with later findings. (The ninth planet, Pluto, was discovered in 1933.) On the other hand, Davis spoke of four planetoids—Ceres, Pallas, Juno, and Vesta—whereas there are now believed to be hundreds. He also said that the solar system revolves around a great center together with all the other stars. Davis further believed Saturn to be inhabited by a more advanced humanity than ours, Jupiter and Mars were also inhabited, and on Venus and Mercury the development of humanity was less advanced than on Earth. The three outer planets he declared lifeless.

His prediction of the coming of Spiritualism was often quoted:

"It is a truth that spirits commune with one another while one is in the body and the other in the higher spheres—and this, too, when the person in the body is unconscious of the influx, and hence cannot be convinced of the fact; and this truth will ere long present itself in the form of a living demonstration. And the world will hail with delight the ushering-in that era when the interiors of men will be opened, and the spiritual communion will be established such as is now being enjoyed by the inhabitants of Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn."

In his notes dated March 31, 1848, the following statement occurs: "About daylight this morning a warm breathing passed over my face and I heard a voice, tender and strong, saying: 'Brother, the good work has begun—behold, a living demonstration is born.' I was left wondering what could be meant by such a message."

The publication of The Principals of Nature made Davis famous and he was soon surrounded by a band of enthusiasts. As their mouthpiece, on December 4, 1847, the first issue of the Univercoelum (apparently coined from Swedenborg's "universum coelum") appeared. Universalist minister S. B. Brittan became editor in chief. Assisting were a number of outstanding contemporaries, including Fishbough, Thomas Lake Harris, W. M. Fernald, J. K. Ingalls, Dr. Chivers, and Frances Green. The object of the publication was "the establishment of a universal system of truth, the reform and the reorganization of society." Davis contributed many articles that were later incorporated into The Great Harmonia.

After 12 months in existence, the Univercoelum absorbed the Christian Rationalist, a similar organ, however, its publication came to an end in July 1849. It was succeeded by W. M. Channing's The Present Age, a largely socialist organ to which Davis and his friends no longer contributed. They accepted as their new mouthpiece The Spirit Messenger of Springfield, Massachusetts, which was jointly edited by Rev. R. P. Ambler and Apollos Munn. As Davis's friends were scattered, other periodicals were founded and his "harmonial philosophy" was independently carried on.

About the time the Univercoelum was founded, Davis disposed of the services of his mesmerizer. By an effort of will he could by that time throw himself into what he called "the superior condition." He also remembered his experiences while in trance and wrote his subsequent books in his own hand. He disclaimed dictation by the spirits and said that he could write them by a process of inner perception. Except for seeing apparitions, he was unacquainted with abnormal physical phenomena until 1850, when he paid a visit to Dr. Eliakim Phelps's house in Stratford, Connecticut, which was the scene of violent poltergeist disturbances. In the same year he published a pamphlet on his observations, entitled The Philosophy of Spiritual Intercourse.

Davis's teachings left a deep impression on his age. The Great Harmonia passed through 40 editions. His autobiography The Magic Staff extended only to the year 1857, but was later supplemented with a sequel, Beyond the Valley (1885). In 1860 he started the Herald of Progress, a weekly that absorbed the Spiritual Telegraph. In the late years of his life he had a small bookshop in Boston. There he sold books and, having earned a degree in natural medicine, prescribed herbal remedies for his patients.

Davis died January 13, 1910. He was an important influence in the early development of Spiritualism, particularly in his association of mediumistic revelations with religious principles. His concepts of after-death spheres for departed spirits, which he named "Summerland," are still part of the beliefs of many modern Spiritualists. He influenced most subsequent Spiritualist movements, including those of Thomas Lake Harris. It even seems possible that Edgar Allan Poe's "Eureka" owes its inception to Davis's Principles of Nature.

In his practice of diagnosing and treating illness in a trance condition, Davis also anticipated the rationale of the modern seer Edgar Cayce.

Sources:

Brown, Slater. The Heyday of Spiritualism. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1970.

Davis, Andrew J. Answers to Ever-Recurring Questions from People: A Sequel to the Penetralia. Boston: Banner of Light Publishing, 1862.

———. Beyond the Valley; A Sequel to the Magic Staff: An Autobiography. Boston: Colby & Rich, 1885.

———. The Great Harmonia. New York: J. S. Redfield, Fowler & Wells, 1853.

———. The Magic Staff: An Autobiography of Andrew Jackson Davis. New York, 1857.

———. Penetralia: Being Harmonial Answers to Important Questions. Boston: Bela Marsh, 1858.

Doyle, Arthur Conan. The History of Spiritualism. 2 vols. London, 1926. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Podmore, Frank. Modern Spiritualism. 2 vols. London, 1902. Reprinted as Mediums of the 19th Century. 2 vols. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Davis, Courtney (1946–)

Artist Courtney Davis, a major voice in the contemporary revival of Celtic Paganism, was born on October 31, 1946, in Blackwood, South Wales. He grew up in London where he attended Bransbury School for Boys. Much of the normal activity pursued by males was denied to him due to chronic back problems, and as a young man in the late 1960s he had to have major surgery on his back. During the period of recovery he had the first of a series of mystical experiences. He felt that his departed grandmother was massaging his body bringing healing powers to bear. He then had a vision of the wall of a hospital ward opening to a brilliant light and otherworldly beings. A group of monks surrounded him and appeared to carry out an operation on his back. In the midst of their work, they lifted him above his physical body as they probed his internal past.

Since that operation, though he was not completely healed, he was able to develop his artistry and continue his career to the present. During this time he has saturated himself in Celtic lore and beginning in 1984, with his self-published volume, Merlin the Immortal, has written and/or illustrated a number of books. Several of his books are entirely devoted to Celtic art and design. Others, such as The Celtic Tarot (1990) and Pathway through the Labyrinth (1988), focus more directly on esoteric themes. He has also illustrated several volumes of Celtic Pagan lore.

Davis' art was widely displayed in Europe in the early 1990s and he held his first American exhibit in 1995. He was the guest of honor for the 1998 Celtic Festival in Tokyo. Most recently, his art has been transferred to stained glass by American artist Mark Duro. Davis has a webpage exhibiting his art at http://www.celtic-art.com/.

Sources:

Davis, Courtney. The Celtic Tarot. London: Thorsons, 1990.

———. Merlin the Immortal. London: Spirit of Celtia, 1984.

———. Pathway through the Labyrinth. Shaftesbury, Dorset, UK: Element Books, 1988.

Dawn (Magazine) See Yoga International

Dawn Horse Communion See Free Daist Communion

Dawson-Scott, Catharine Amy (1865–1934)

Author of more than 20 novels and founder of several Spiritualist organizations, including the P.E.N. Club, the Tomorrow Club, and the Survival League. Born in 1865 in Dulwich, England, she believed in survival and communication with the departed and wrote two psychic books: From Four Who Are Dead and Is This Wilson? She also edited three small volumes of The Guide to Psychic Knowledge, containing questions and answers on the problems of afterlife obtained through mediums. She died November 4, 1934.

Day of the Dead

The Day of the Dead (Dia de los Muertos) is a popular holiday celebrated throughout Latin American countries. In Mexico it has become a major annual event anticipated several weeks before the actual celebration, with massive altars covered with offerings to deceased loved ones. Though now tied to the Roman Catholic feast days of All Hallows' Eve, All Saints' Day and All Souls' Day (October 31–November 2), the Day of the Dead is rooted in the observances followed by Native Americans for centuries prior to the Spanish conquests. As with the Neo-Pagan celebration of Halloween, the Day of the Dead is seen as a time in which the spirits of the departed are seen as especially close and communication is possible. It is a time of remembrance, and the sorrow of the departure of loved ones is caught up in a celebration of the continuance of life.

In the belief system underlying the celebration, there are three possible resting places for the departed, one less desirable place called Mictlan and two more desirable. The final resting place is determined by the quality and number of acts committed in this life that were pleasing to the gods. At the time of death, the deceased is given a send-off that will assist in negotiating the passages to his/her final resting place. On the Day of the Dead, the home and/or graveyard is lit with candles, strong incense is burned, and loud music is played as part of the observance to assist the souls in finding their way back from their resting place to join in the celebration.

As Halloween has become one of the most observed holidays in North America (second only to Christmas in the number of homes decorated), so the Day of the Dead is widely observed from Ecuador to Mexico and southern California. Typical decorations include food offerings and cempazuchitl flower arrangements consisting of marigolds and candles. Food substances typically include chocolate, fruits, tamales, taquila, and mascal. Included in the decoration may be a set of marzipan skulls (bread shaped like a skull) surrounding the picture of a loved one especially remembered, or the pan de muerto, loaves of bread sometimes in the shape of the human body, topped with a crossed bone design. The decorations set the stage for a massive party in which music is played, food eaten, and drinks designed appropriately to alter one's consciousness consumed.

Evidence of a celebratory period of acknowledgment of the deceased at the end of the harvest season has been found by archeologists in many pre-Columbian sites, especially in Mexico and Central America. Following the Spanish conquest and the establishment of Catholicism as the state religion, this period of acknowledgement was incorporated into All Saints' day and All Souls' Day, which conveniently coincided with the period, and emerged as the Day of the Dead. In Mexican culture it includes a belief in the unity of death and life.

Sources:

Carmichael, Elizabeth. The Skeleton at the Feast: The Day of the Dead in Mexico. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1992.

Gonzalez-Crussi, Frank. The Day of the Dead: And Other Moral Reflections. San Diego: Harcourt-Brace, 1994.

Harrington, Kent. Día de los Muertos/Day of the Dead. Tucson, Ariz.: Dennis McMillan Publications, 1997.

Dean, Eric Douglas (1916–)

British physical chemist and parapsychologist. He was born June 21, 1916, at Rock Ferry, Cheshire, England. He was educated at Liverpool University (B.S., 1937; B.S., 1938; M.S., 1939) and did graduate work at Cambridge University. He moved to the United States in 1951 as a fellow of the American Electrochemical Society at Princeton University.

Dean conducted research at the Educational Testing Service in Princeton, New Jersey (1954–59), and then became the assistant director of research for the Parapsychology Foundation (1959–62). In 1962 he became a research associate at Newark College of Engineering in Newark, New Jersey. There he and his associate John Mihalasky initiated the PSI Communications Project, out of which a number of papers were generated concerned with different ways that psychic communications can be monitored and measured. The major product of the research, however, was a volume describing how psychic activity supports successful businesspeople. Executive ESP appeared in 1974. While at Newark College, Dean also served a term as president of its Parapsychological Association (1967–69) and oversaw the affiliation with the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

He left Newark in 1976 and held several positions in industry. He served as head of the Parapsychology/Paraphysics department of the International College in Montreal, Canada. Dean also served as president of the International Kirlian Research Association, which focused on kirlian aura photography (a line of research that has proved a dead end). His interest in kirlian effects was part of a larger interest in psychic healing that led him to assume the presidency of the American Healers Association in 1976. In 1977 he was elected vice president of the World Federation of Healing. The Mystery of Healing, which Dean authored, was published in 1993. He was also a board member and also active in the Academy of Religion and Psychical Research. Dean strives to make reiki-type healing more accepted and used in U.S. hospitals.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Dean, E. Douglas, John Mihalasky, Sheila Ostrander, and Lynn Schroeder. Executive ESP. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1974.

———. The Mystery of Healing: Still a Mystery after 60,000 Years. New York: Search, 1987.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Deane, Ada Emma (ca. 1930)

Well-known British exponent of spirit photography. In June 1920 an extra face was discovered on a photograph taken by her. Her subsequent psychic career was the subject of much criticism and suspicion because of her strange habit of keeping the plates for "magnetising." This objection lessened as the years passed, and after November 1924 Deane—in her sittings at the W. T. Stead Borderland Library—never had the plates in her possession or handled them in any way before the sitting. It was, however, discovered even before that if the plates were exchanged without her knowledge the supernormal effects still appeared.

The Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (ASPR) reported in 1921 a remarkable sitting that Dr. Allerton Cushman, director of the National Laboratories of Washington, had with Deane. He obtained on his own plate a striking portrait of his daughter, who had died the previous year.

In the following year the Occult Committee of the Magic Circle published a report in which they claimed to have caught Deane in fraud. Wide publicity was given in the Daily Press to Deane's experiment in taking a photograph on November 11, 1922, during the two-minute Armistice silence at the Cenotaph in Whitehall, London. She was assisted by Estelle Stead. Many spirit faces appeared on the plate. The experiment was repeated during three successive years. In several cases people claimed to recognize the faces.

A remarkable communication was received by H. Dennis Bradley, apparently from the spirit of his brother-in-law, W. A., regarding the Armistice photograph taken in 1923. As told in Bradley's book Towards the Stars (1924), the communicator said in the direct voice that he was in the right-hand side of the photograph, near the top. On the following day Bradley obtained a copy of the photograph. To his astonishment, among the 50 spirit heads visible in the picture, he found one in the position described, which, under a magnifying glass, looked surprisingly like W. A.

The 1924 picture drew extraordinary revelations. The Topical Press Agency declared that "the spirit extras" were reproductions of the agency's well-known photographs of living sportsmen. The alleged exposure was published in the newspaper Daily Sketch, but the story was never fully told. In Proceedings of the SPR (vol. 41, 1933), Fred Barlow, in a report on psychic photography, also charged Deane with fraud.

Stead, in her booklet Faces of the Living Dead, printed some unpublished documents, among them Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's letter to the editor of the Daily Sketch. In it he states that he submitted the two sets of faces published in the Daily Sketch to Sir Arthur Keith, the greatest authority on anthropometric matters. Keith replied, "Not one of the photographs reproduced by the Daily Sketch is identical with any of the representations or photos reproduced in the spirit photographs." Stead give the following testimony in her booklet:

"I have known Mrs. Deane and worked with her for the last four years and have the highest regard for her honesty and integrity of purpose. I know her cameras well, both inside and out, having examined them so often—also the dark slides used for these sittings. Both cameras and slides are continually left in my studio for days together, and I and others have plenty of opportunities to examine them at our leisure. The plates are always developed in my darkroom, and I can assure those doughty champions who explain so glibly how these are 'faked' that there are no developing dishes with transparent xylonite bases let into the dark room table, nor any concealed electric lights in my dark room. We use porcelain dishes, which are washed out after every sitting."

Hereward Carrington writes in the Journal of the ASPR (May 1925) of his experiences with Deane on September 5, 1921:

"Upon six of my plates curious marks appeared. On two plates these marks are mere smudges, which are not evidential, though I think curious. On the next plate, however, the result is quite striking. I had silently willed that a shaft of white light should emerge from my right shoulder, and appear on the plate. Sure enough, upon development, a column of white light, surmounted by a sort of psychic cabbage, was distinctly visible. It will be remembered that this was upon my own plate, placed in the camera, and afterwards removed and developed by myself. The odd thing to my mind is why I should have willed so curious a thing: what prompted me to wish for it? Was it a pure thought photograph? Or did some external intelligence first of all impress upon my mind this idea, and afterwards produce the image upon the plate? A very similar result was obtained by a friend of mine, Miss M., the following year at a sitting with Mrs. Deane. She was looking intently at her own hand and thinking about it, during the exposure of the plate (thinking of her new ring, as a matter of fact, which had just been given to her) and when the plate was developed, a hand appeared on the sitter's head, surrounded by an ectoplasmic cloud. The resemblance to her own hand is quite striking, and it is certainly a feminine hand."

The following year Carrington obtained further curious results, peculiar cometlike lights and a woman's face on his own plates. They were secretly marked by X-rays, but since Deane had kept them for some time, he did not accept the pictures as evidential. However, he notes:

"Nevertheless, I am inclined to regard these results with considerable interest for two reasons. In the first place, if these plates had been 'doctored' by Mrs. Deane in her own home, before the sitting, she would almost certainly have imprinted faces upon the plates instead of these bizarre lights, it seems to me. Further, knowing that Cushman was to have a sitting, and knowing of her own brilliant success in producing, at a previous séance, under excellent conditions, a psychic extra recognised by Cushman and members of his family as his daughter Agnes (the case is a celebrated one) she would, I submit, have seen to it that Agnes appeared. Again, these lights are intrinsically striking, interesting, when studied closely."

Sources:

Carrington, Hereward. The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism: Fraudulent and Genuine. Boston, 1907. Reprint, New York: Dodd, Mead, 1920.

Coates, James. Photographing the Invisible. London, 1911.

Doyle, Arthur Conan. The Case for Spirit Photography. London, [1922].

———. The History of Spiritualism. New York: Charles H. Doran, 1926. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Death

Accounts of the moments before and after death abound with reports of paranormal phenomena, including apparitions of the dying in distant places and phantom forms seen by the dying and occasionally by others. Such near-death apparitions remain a topic of intense debate in both psychological and parapsychological circles. Those who accept a psychic explanation of near-death experiences assert that the individual's spirit, when near to being freed from its connection to the body, is immersed in two planes of existence and acts in both the material and spiritual worlds. Many reports also exist in which persons who were dead returned to life and remembered their experience of death. They verify an often-told story that in the last moments of earthly existence a panorama of the person's life flashes by.

Near-Death Experiences

A Professor Heiron of Zurich slipped in the Alps on a snow covered crag, slid head first about a mile, and then shot 60 feet through the air, landing on his head and shoulders. He was not killed. Returning to consciousness, he not only testified to having seen a panoramic view of his life but also said he had heard the most delightful music. He interviewed many people who had a similar experiences; the great rapidity of mental action and the absence of terror and pain was narrated by all of them.

Prof. A. Pastore of the Royal Lyceum at Genoa relates his experience in the Annals of Psychic Science of February 1906:

"I have been through a very severe illness. At the crisis, when I had entirely lost consciousness of physical pain, the power of my imagination was increased by an extraordinary degree, and I saw clearly in a most distinct confusion (two words which do not accord, but which, in this case, are the only ones which will express the idea). I saw myself as a little boy, a youth, a man, at various periods of my life; a dream, but a most powerful, intense living dream. In that immense, blue, luminous space my mother met me—my mother who had died four years previously. It was an indescribable sensation. Rereading the Phaedo of Plato after that experience, I was better able to understand what Socrates meant."

Still more is told by Leslie Grant Scott in Psychic Research (March 1931):

"Dying is really not such a terrifying experience. I speak as one who has died and come back, and who found Death one of the easiest things in life—but not the returning. That was difficult and full of fear. The will to live had left me and so I died. I had been ill for some time but not seriously so. I was in a run-down condition, aggravated by the tropical climate in which I was then living. I was in bed, a large old fashioned bed, in which I seemed lost. I lay there quietly thinking and feeling more at peace than I had felt for some time. Suddenly my whole life began to unroll before me and I saw the purpose of it. All bitterness was wiped out for I knew the meaning of every event and I saw its place in the pattern. I seemed to view it all impersonally, but yet with intense interest and, although much that was crystal clear to me then has again become somewhat veiled in shadow, I have never forgotten or lost the sense of essential justice and rightness of things."

After telling of the doctor's visit and his attempts at reviving him, Scott continues:

"My consciousness was growing more and more acute. It seemed to have expanded beyond the limits of my physical brain. I was aware of things I had never contacted. My vision was also extended so that I could see what was going on behind my back, in the next room, even in distant places. I wondered if I should close my eyes or leave them open. I thought that it would be less gruesome for those around me if they were closed, and so I tried to shut them—but found that I could not. I no longer had any control over my body. I was dead. Yet I could think, hear and see more widely than ever before. From the next room came great engulfing waves of emotion, the sadness of a childhood companion. My increased sensitiveness made me feel and understand these things with an intensity hitherto unknown to me. The effort to return to my body was accompanied by an almost unimaginable sensation of horror and terror. I had left without the slightest struggle. I returned by an almost superhuman effort of will."

Sometimes, it appears, the return is automatic and against the will of the dying. In the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR) (vol. 8, 1892), F. W. H. Myers published the narrative of a Dr. Wiltse (first printed in the St. Louis Medical and Surgical Journal, November 1889), who, in a state of apparent death, lost all power of thought or knowledge of existence. Half an hour later, his narrative continues,

"I came again into a state of conscious existence and discovered that I was still in the body and I had no longer any interests in common. I looked with astonishment and joy for the first time upon myself—the me, the real Ego, while the not me closed upon all sides like a sepulchre of clay. With all the interest of a physician I beheld the wonders of my bodily anatomy, intimately interwoven with which even tissue for tissue, was I, the living soul of that dead body. . . . I realised my condition and calmly reasoned thus, I have died, as man terms death, and yet I am as much a man as ever. I am about to get out of the body. I watched the interesting process of the separation of soul and body. By some power, apparently not my own, the Ego was rocked to and fro, laterally as the cradle is rocked, by which process its connection with the tissues of the body was broken up. After a little while the lateral motion ceased, and along the soles of the feet, beginning at the toes, passing rapidly to the heels, I felt and heard, as it seemed, the snapping of innumerable small cords. When this was accomplished I began slowly to retreat from the feet, towards the head, as a rubber cord shortens. I remember reaching the hips and saying to myself: 'Now there is no life below the hips.' I can recall no memory of passing through the abdomen and chest, but recollect distinctly when my whole self was collected in the head, when I reflected thus: 'I am all the head now, and I shall soon be free.' I passed around the brain as if I were hollow, compressing it and its membranes slightly on all sides towards the centre and peeped out between the sutures of the skull, emerging like the flattened edges of a bag of membranes. I recollect distinctly how I appeared to myself something like a jelly-fish as regards colour and form. As I emerged, I saw two ladies sitting at my head. I measured the distance between the head of my cot and the knees of the lady opposite the head and concluded there was room for me to stand, but felt considerable embarrassment as I reflected that I was about to emerge naked before her, but comforted myself with the thought that in all probability she could not see me with her bodily eyes, as I was a spirit. As I emerged from the head I floated up and down and laterally like a soap bubble attached to the bowl of a pipe, until I at last broke loose from the body and fell lightly to the floor, where I slowly rose and expanded to the full stature of a man. I seemed to be translucent, of a bluish cast and perfectly naked. With a painful sense of embarrassment, I fled towards the partially open door to escape the eyes of the two ladies whom I was facing, as well as others whom I knew were about me, but upon reaching the door I found myself clothed, and satisfied upon that point, I turned and faced the company. As I turned, my left elbow came in contact with the arm of one of two gentlemen who were standing in the door. To my surprise, his arm passed through mine without apparent resistance, the severed parts closing again without pain, as air reunites. I looked quickly up at his face to see if he had noticed the contact but he gave me no sign—only stood and gazed toward the couch I had just left. I directed my gaze in the direction of his, and saw my own dead body. . . .

"Suddenly I discovered that I was looking at the straight seam down the back of my coat. How is this, I thought, how do I see my back? and I looked again, to reassure myself, down the back of the coat or down the back of my legs to the very heels. I put my hand to my face and felt for my eyes. They are where they should be, I thought. Am I like an owl that I can turn my head half way round? I tried the experiment and failed.

"No! Then it must be that having been out of the body but a few moments I have yet the power to use the eyes of the body, and I turned about and looked back in at the open door where I could see the head of my body in a line with me. I discovered then a small cord, like a spider's web, running from my shoulders back to my body and attaching to it at the base of the neck, in front.

"I was satisfied with the conclusion that by means of that cord, I was using the eyes of my body and turning, walked down the street. . . . a small, densely black cloud appeared in front of me and advanced toward my face. I knew that I was to be stopped. I felt the power to move or to think leaving me. My hands fell powerless at my side, my shoulders and my head dropped forward and I knew no more.

"Without previous thought and without great effort on my part, my eyes opened. I looked at my hands and then at the little white cot upon which I was lying and, realising that I was in the body, in astonishment and disappointment I exclaimed: What in the world has happened to me? Must I die again?"

The clairvoyant description by Spiritualist medium Andrew Jackson Davis of the process of dying in Death and the After Life (1865) is often quoted. He writes:

"Suppose the person is now dying. It is to be a rapid death. The feet first grow cold. The clairvoyant sees right over the head what may be called a magnetic halo, an ethereal emanation, in appearance golden, and throbbing as though conscious. The body is now cold up to the knees and elbows, and the emanation has ascended higher in the air. The legs are cold to the hips and the arms to the shoulders; and the emanation, though it has not risen higher in the room, is more expanded. The death-coldness steals over the breast and around on either side, and the emanation has attained a higher position near the ceiling. The person has ceased to breathe, the pulse is still, and the emanation is elongated and fashioned in the outline of the human form. Beneath it is connected with the brain. The head of the person is internally throbbing—a slow, deep throb—not painful, like the beat of the sea. Hence, the thinking faculties are rational, while nearly every part of the person is dead. Owing to the brain's momentum, I have seen a dying person, even at the last feeble pulsebeat, rouse impulsively and rise up in bed to converse with a friend; but the next instant he was gone—his brain being the last to yield up the life principle. The golden emanation, which extends up midway to the ceiling, is connected with the brain by a very fine life-thread. Now the body of the emanation ascends. Then appears something white and shining, like a human head; next, in a very few moments, a faint outline of the face divine; then the fair neck and beautiful shoulders; then, in rapid succession, come all parts of the new body down to the feet—a bright shining image, a little smaller than its physical body, but a perfect prototype, or reproduction in all except its disfigurements. The fine life-thread continues attached to the old brain. The next thing is the withdrawal of the electric principle. When this thread "snaps" the spiritual body is free and prepared to accompany its guardians to the Summer Land. Yes, there is a spiritual body; it is sown in dishonor and raised in brightness."

The description is paralleled by the curious case sent by a Dr. Burgers to Richard Hodgson in 1902 and published in the Journal of the SPR (vol. 13, 1908). In it a Mr. G. gives this account of the death of his wife:

"At half-past six I urged our friends, the physician and nurses to take dinner. . . . All but two left the room in obedience to my request.

"Fifteen minutes later . . . I happened to look towards the door, when I saw floating through the doorway three separate and distinct clouds in strata. Each cloud appeared to be about four feet in length, from six to eight inches in width, the lower one about two feet from the ground, the others at intervals of about six inches.

"My first thought was that some of our friends . . . were standing outside the bedroom smoking, and that the smoke from their cigars was being wafted into the room. With this idea I started up to rebuke them, when lo! I discovered there was no one standing by the door, no one in the hall-way, no one in the adjoining rooms. Overcome with astonishment I watched the clouds; and slowly, but surely these clouds approached the bed until they completely enveloped it. Then, gazing through the mist, I beheld standing at the head of my dying wife a woman's figure about three feet in height, transparent, yet like a sheen of brightest gold; a figure so glorious in its appearance that no words can be used fitly to describe it. She was dressed in the Grecian costume, with long loose and flowing sleeves—upon her head a brilliant crown. In all its splendour and beauty the figure remained motionless with hands uplifted over my wife, seeming to express a welcome with a quiet glad countenance, with a dignity of calmness and peace. Two figures in white knelt by my wife's bedside, apparently leaning towards her; other figures hovered above the bed, more or less distinct.

"Above my wife, and connected with a cord proceeding from her forehead, over the left eye, there floated in a horizontal position a nude, white figure, apparently her astral body. At times the suspended figure would lie perfectly quiet, at other times it would shrink in size until it was no longer than perhaps eighteen inches, but always was the figure perfect and distinct; a perfect head, a perfect body, perfect arms and perfect legs. When the astral body diminished in size it struggled violently, threw out its arms and legs in an apparent effort to escape. It would struggle until it seemed to exhaust itself, then become calm, increase in size, only to repeat the same performance again and again.

"This vision, or whatever it may be called, I saw continuously during the five hours preceding the death of my wife. Interruptions, as speaking to my friends, closing my eyes, turning away my head, failed to destroy the illusion, for whenever I looked towards that deathbed the spiritual vision was there. All through these five hours I felt a strange feeling of oppression and weight upon my head and limbs; my eyes were heavy as if with sleep, and during this period the sensations were so peculiar and the visions so continuous and vivid that I believed I was insane, and from time to time would say to the physician in charge: 'Doctor, I am going insane.'

"At last the fatal moment arrived; with a gasp, the astral figure struggling, my wife ceased to breathe, she apparently was dead: however, a few seconds later she breathed again, twice, and then all was still. With her last breath and last gasp, as the soul left the body, the cord was severed suddenly and the astral figure vanished. The clouds and the spirit forms disappeared instantly, and, strange to say, all the oppression that weighed upon me was gone; I was myself, cool, calm and deliberate, able to direct, from the moment of death, the disposition of the body, its preparation for a final resting place."

Mr. G. was known to be hostile to Spiritualism, and the physician in attendance appended a statement to the effect that he had known him long enough to affirm that he had no tendency to any form of mental delusion.

Phenomena at Death

Watchers by the deathbed have often claimed to hear rushing sounds and see some kind of curious luminosity. Hyppolite Baraduc attempted to secure a photographic record when his son and wife died. He found that in each case a luminous, cloud-like mass apparently hovered over the bodies and appeared on the photographic plate.

Telekinetic phenomena (see movement) have been known to occur before death. A Mme. Martillet and a Mme. Claudet, who nursed Alfred de Musset in his last illness, said that as he lay in his armchair they saw by the light of the lamp that he was looking at the bell near the mantelpiece. But he was so feeble that he could not rise. "At the moment," says Martillet, "we were surprised and frightened; the bell-pull that the sick man had not reached, moved, as if by an invisible hand, and my sister and I took each other's hands, saying: 'Did you hear? Did you see? He did not leave his chair.' The servant came, having heard the bell" (Annales des Sciences Psychiques [1899]).

Charles Richet, in a report on the case, inquires,

"Should the singular phenomena mentioned in all ages as accompanying a death or serious event be considered as akin to hauntings? There are legends of clocks stopping, pictures falling, some object noisily breaking, etc., but it is difficult to determine the part played by chance coincidence."

George Micklebury reported in the Daily Graphic (October 4, 1905) a startling instance of clairaudient premonition of impending death that occurred as he was listening to the High Mass in London. He suddenly heard his daughter's distressful voice: "Pray for me, father, I am drowning." Two friends, between whom he was kneeling, heard nothing, but asked him whether he was ill, because he looked so startled. After the mass he took a train to the farm where his daughter was working and found her in bed, alarmed, but safe. She had fallen into the river from a capsized boat and become entangled in weeds. She had lost consciousness before she was rescued. During the moments of unconsciousness, she said, she saw her father at High Mass between two friends, whom she named, and also saw Father Pycke, the celebrant. Then she saw no more.

The vision of traditional family apparitions, death-coaches, banshees, and phantasmal animals often proves to be a true premonition of death. In the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 10, 1894), Mrs. E. L. Kearney narrates:

"My step-grandfather was lying ill in my father's house. I was coming downstairs when I saw a strange cat coming towards me along the hall. When it saw me it ran behind a green baize door which separated one part of the hall from the other. This door was fastened open, and I went forward quickly to hunt the strange cat (as I thought) away, but to my utter astonishment there was no cat there, or anywhere else in the hall. I at once told my mother (and she told me the other day that she remembers the occurrence). My grandfather died the next day. Taken in connection with the above the following is interesting. My mother told me that the day before he died she saw a cat walk round her father's bed: she also went to hunt it out, but it was not there."

After Death

The question, what happens immediately after death? is more difficult to answer since it is beyond observation and researchers must rely on accounts of after-death communications. They do not even know for certain whether the apparitions of the dead are the result of a voluntary effort or a simple repercussion of strong thought and emotions on the material plane.

Death-compact cases and purposive apparitions, conveying in some form a definite message, suggest conscious action of which the living remain ignorant. Such cases imply that the thoughts and emotional reactions of the dead may greatly depend on the circumstances of their dying. For example, a Private Dowding, who died by shell explosion, said through a medium.

"Something struck, hard, hard, hard against my neck. Shall I ever lose the memory of that hardness? It is the only unpleasant incident that I can remember. I fell, and as I did so, without passing through any apparent interval of unconsciousness, I found myself outside myself. You see, I am telling my story simply; you will find it easier to understand. You will know what a small incident dying is."

"Pelham" (the control of Leonora Piper), who claimed to have died in a horse-riding accident, described his death as follows: "All was dark to me. Then consciousness returned but in a dim, twilight way as when one wakens before dawn. When I comprehended that I was not dead at all I was very glad." Significance should be attached to the phrase "When I comprehended."

According to numerous communications, many of those who died did not realize that they were dead at all, and finding themselves fully conscious and in a body which, to their perception, was just as material as the earthly one, refused to believe they were in the Beyond. It is still said that these "ghosts" keep performing their former actions in an aimless, automatic way—the physician continues to visit his patients, the minister continues preaching. It is usually not until they meet the spirit of someone who died before them that they realize what has happened and begin to learn the conditions of their new existence.

Of the nature of this life, in spite of scores of descriptive accounts, man has only vague notions. William T. Stead, in a message quoted by Estelle Stead in a magazine article "My Father," is reported to have said, "When I think of the ideas that I had of the life I am now living, when I was in the world in which you are, I marvel at the hopeless inadequacy of my dreams. The reality is so much, so very much greater than ever I imagined. It is a new life, the nature of which you cannot understand."

A deceased friend of Richard Hodgson's gave an incoherent communication through Leonora Piper's husband. The control Pelham insisted that they should not go on because the spirit would be confused for some time, having suffered from headaches and neurasthenia while on Earth. Sometimes even the clearest minds give the impression of mental debility if they communicate too soon after death. Pelham said on this, "The words of the wisest persons who have left the material world but a short time ago are incoherent and inexact owing to the severe shock of being disincarnated and their arrival in a new environment where everything is unintelligible."

Public interest in death and claimed after-death communications is regularly stimulated by the loss of so many by unnatural causes during and immediately after wars. The intense interest in communicating with loved ones who have died frequently overrides a more rational approach to death. Many of the learned through the early twentieth century saw the secular approach as leading to an abandonment of belief in the afterlife by the public. However, numerous contemporary studies, such as those of Robert Crookall, who collected and collated hundreds of accounts of out-of-the-body travel experiences, have given a sense of scientific support to belief in survival of death and have contributed some knowledge of after-death consciousness. Whereas astral projection or out-of-body travel can be regarded as a temporary release from the physical body, death is the final release. Through the 1960s Crookall drew attention to many accounts from individuals who nearly died, or who were briefly dead but revived. Their accounts of another sphere of existence may have been colored by their religious background or expectations, but still demand careful consideration. In particular Crookall drew attention to reports of paradise and hell-like conditions in the accounts.

Since World War II a number of specialists in studies of death and dying (thanatology) have arisen. While most of these studies have been rather mundane, the work of pioneering thanatologist Elisabeth Kübler-Ross has caught the popular imagination. Kübler-Ross is a psychiatrist who has spent many years dealing with dying patients and studying related states of consciousness. Her work since the early 1970s has added a spiritual dimension to the purely physical and medical aspects of death in dealing with terminally ill patients.

Experiences of the clinically dead have been widely reported by Raymond A. Moody, Jr., in his books Life After Life (1975) and Reflections on Life After Life (1977). A similarly conducted study by Kenneth Ring in 1978–79 confirmed many of Moody's observations (see Theta, vol. 7, no. 2, 1979).

A more specialized area of research into death has been the study of claims of reincarnation by psychiatrist Ian Stevenson and several associates at the University of Virginia. In the face of a growing belief in reincarnation by Westerners, a wide variety of attempts to demonstrate its reality have been made including those of hypnotists, such as Arnall Bloxham, who have obtained accounts from hypnotized subjects claiming to remember former earthly lives.

Sources:

Baird, Alexander T. One Hundred Cases for Survival After Death. New York: Bernard Ackerman, 1944.

Barker, Elsa. Letters From A Living Dead Man. London, 1914.

Barrett, Sir William. Death Bed Visions. London, 1926.

Beard, Paul. Survival of Death: For and Against. London, 1966.

Carington, W. W. The Foundations of Spiritualism. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1920.

Carrington, Hereward, and J. Meader. Death, Its Causes & Phenomena. London, 1911.

Crookall, Robert. Case-Book of Astral Projection. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1972.

———. The Study & Practice of Astral Projection. London, 1960. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1966.

Delacour, J. B. [Hanns Kurth]. Glimpses of the Beyond. New York: Delacorte Press, 1974.

Ducasse, C. J. A Critical Examination of the Belief in a Life After Death. Springfield, IL: Thomas, 1961.

Flammarion, Camille. Death and Its Mystery. 3 vols. London: Century, 1921–23.

Guirdham, Arthur. The Cathars & Reincarnation. London, 1970. Reprint, Theosophical Publishing House, 1978.

Knight, David C., ed. The ESP Reader. New York: Grosset & Dunlap, 1969.

Kübler-Ross, Elisabeth. Death; The Final Stage of Growth. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1975.

———. On Death & Dying. New York: Macmillan, 1970.

———. Questions & Answers on Death & Dying. New York: Macmillan, 1974.

Kutscher, M. L., et al., eds. A Comprehensive Bibliography of the Thanatology Literature. New York: Irvington Publications, 1975.

Lodge, Sir Oliver. Raymond, or Life and Death. London, 1917.

Lombroso, Cesare. After Death—What? Cambridge, MA: Small Maynard, 1909.

Mead, G. R. S. The Doctrine of the Subtle Body in Western Tradition. London, 1919.

Miller, Albert J., and M. J. Acrí. Death: A Bibliographical Guide. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1977.

Moody, Raymond A., Jr. Life After Life. Covington, GA: Mockingbird Books, 1975. Reprint, New York: Bantam Books, 1976.

———. Reflections on Life After Life. New York: Bantam Books, 1977.

Muldoon, Sylvan, and Hereward Carrington. The Phenomena of Astral Projection. London: Rider, 1951. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, n.d.

Myers, F. W. H. Human Personality & Its Survival of Bodily Death. 2 vols. London: Longmans, Green, 1954.

Osis, Karlis. Deathbed Observations by Physicians and Nurses. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1961.

Ring, Kenneth. Life at Death: A Scientific Investigation of the Near-Death Experience. New York: William Morrow, 1980.

Simpson, M. A. Death and Grief: A Critically Annotated Bibliography & Source Book of Thanatology and Terminal Care. New York: Plenum, 1979.

[Stead, William T.] Letters from Julia; or Light from the Borderland: A Series of Messages as to the Life Beyond the Grave Received by Automatic Writing. London, 1897.

Stevenson, Ian. Twenty Cases Suggestive of Reincarnation. New York: American Society for Psychical Research, 1966.

Stokes, Doris. Voices in My Ear. London: Futura, 1980.

Tyrrell, G. N. M. Apparitions. London, 1943. Reprint, New York: Macmillan, 1962.

Death Coach

There is a widespread superstitious belief that Death goes around in a coach picking up souls. The form of the belief varies, of course, with the locality. In some parts of England and Wales, for example, the death coach passes silently at midnight, without sound of hoof or wheels. Both coach and horse are black, and a black hound runs in front. In some localities the horses and coachman are headless, which doubtless adds to the effectiveness of the apparition. In Ireland, when the coach with headless driver stops at the door of a house, this means someone in the house will die the following day. The Breton peasant hears the approach at midnight of a cart with a creaking axle. It is the Ankou (Death), and when the cart stops before a dwelling someone within must die.

Deathwatch Beetle

The ticking or tapping sound of the deathwatch beetle, a small insect found in decaying wood, is thought by the superstitious to presage death. In reality the sound is believed to be a call from one beetle to another, made by beating its head against the wood.

De Biragues, Flaminio (ca. 1580)

Author of a work entitled l'Enfer de la mere Cardine (Paris, 1585), which treats the dreadful battle in hell on the occasion of the marriage of Cerberus and Cardine. It is a satire on the demonography of the times. Didot reprinted the work in 1793. The author was a nephew of a chancellor of France, Rene de Biragues, and also published a volume of his own poems.

De Boni, Gastone (1908–1986)

Italian physician, author, and editor. He was born January 22, 1908, in Padua, Italy, and was educated at the University of Padua (M.D. 1932). He inherited the substantial library of psychical researcher Ernesto Bozzano (1862–1943), to which he added some six thousand volumes. After World War II he opened the library, which contains both his and Bozzano's correspondence and papers, for public research.

De Boni's own literary contribution to Italian parapsychology included editing translations of 40 volumes by psychical researchers and parapsychologists. In 1941 he published the first book on psychical research in Italy. He also edited Luce e Ombra, an Italian journal of parapsychology, from 1947 until his death 30 years later. His own books include Metapsychics: Science of the Soul (1947) and Man and the Conquest of the Soul (1960).

De Boni favored Spiritualism and imposed such a perspective on Luce e Ombra. In spite of criticism from other parapsychologists, he was able to remain a vital part of the parapsychological community. He became president of Società Italiana di Parapsicologia in 1955 and was an honorary associate of the Society for Psychical Research, London. He died September 23, 1986, at Verona, Italy.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

De Bonnevault, Maturin

Father of Pierre Bonnevault. De Bonnevault was accused of sorcery when he was visited by experts who found on his right shoulder a mark resembling a small rose, into which a long pin was thrust. He displayed such signs of distress that the experts judged that he must be a sorcerer. He confessed his betrothal to Berthomée de la Bedouche, who with her father and mother practiced sorcery, and related how he sought serpents and toads for their sorceries.

De Bonnevault testified that the witch sabbat was held four times yearly, at the feasts of Saint John the Baptist, Christmas, Mardi Gras, and Páques. He confessed to having slain seven persons by sorcery and avowed that he had been a sorcerer since he was seven years of age. Like his son Pierre, he was put to death.

De Boville (or Bovillus or Bovelles), Charles (ca. 1470–ca. 1553)

A French mathematician and philologist who also wrote on occult philosophy. He was born in Saucourt, Picardy, France, around 1470, the son of an aristocrat. He was educated in Paris, traveled across Europe, and became a priest. De Boville promulgated in his work De sensu the opinion held in ancient times that the world is alive, an idea also imagined by Felix Nogaret. (Twentieth-century books on this theme include The Living Universe, by Sir Francis Younghusband (1933), and The Earth is Alive, by François Derrey (1968).) Other works by De Boville include his Lettres, the Life of Raymond Lully, Traite des douze nombres, and Trois Dialogues sur l'Immortalitè de l'Ame, le Rèsurrection, et la Fin du Monde. He died in Noyon, France, about 1553.

De Brath, Stanley (1854–1937)

British psychical researcher, author, and translator. De Brath was born in October 1854. He was trained as a civil engineer and spent 20 years in government service in India before becoming headmaster of a preparatory school in England. In 1890 he attended a séance by Cecil Husk (later exposed as a fraud) and thereafter became intensely interested in psychical research and Spiritualism. His own contributions centered upon his writing, editing, and translating work. His early books include Psychic Philosophy (under the pseudonym "C. Desertis") (1909), The Mysteries of Life (1915), and The Science of Peace (1916).

In 1918 he began spending time in Paris, collaborating with the French researcher Gustave Geley at the Institut Métapsychique International. During this period he was responsible for the English translation of Geley's From the Unconscious to the Conscious (1920), as well as Supernormal Faculties in Man (1923), by Eugèn Osty, and Thirty Years of Psychical Research (1923) by Charles Richet.

In 1924 he assumed editorship of the journal Psychic Science, published by the British College of Psychic Science, London. De Brath's books include Psychical Research, Science and Religion (1925), Religion of the Spirit (1927), and The Drama of Europe (1930). He died December 20, 1937, at Kew, London.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Decline Effect

Term used by parapsychologists to indicate a falling off in frequency of high scores when a test of psi is repeated. It is also called the "decline curve," referring to the appearance when the data is put into graphical form.

De Crespigny, Rose Champion (1860–1935)

Daughter of the Right Honorable Sir Astley Cooper-Key (First Sea Lord of the Admiralty) and author of more than 20 novels. After the death of her husband, Philip de Crespigny, she consulted a medium, Etta Wriedt, through whom she believed to have obtained evidence of survival. As a result she became a Spiritualist, the honorary principal of the British College of Psychic Science, and a national lecturer on psychic subjects.

Her experiences became the substance of many of her novels. For example, The Dark Sea (1927) deals with direct voice experiences and The Mark with reincarnation. She also wrote several pamphlets on Spiritualist themes. She died February 10, 1935.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

De Cressac Bachelerie, Bertrande (1899– ?)

French engineer and author who lectured extensively on parapsychology in France, Belgium, Morocco, Algeria, and Italy. De Cressac Bachelerie was born January 2, 1899, at Limoges (Haute-Vienne). He received his B.S. degree in 1916 and an engineering degree in 1922 from l'Ecole Centrale des Arts et Manufactures, Paris. He wrote a number of books and many articles on parapsychology for French, Italian, and Belgian journals.

Sources:

De Cressac Bachelerie, Bertrande. Démonstrations experimentales de la télépathie (Experimental demonstrations of telepathy). N.p., 1946.

———. Etudes sur la télépathie des sensations (Studies on the telepathy 423';of sensations). N.p., 1954.

———. Etudes sur la voyance (Studies in clairvoyance). N.p., 1942.

———. La Métapsychique devant la science (Parapsychology in relation to science). N.p., 1948.

———. Le Miracle, illusion ou réalite (The miracle, illusion or reality). N.p., 1961.

———. Mise en évidence de l'effet psychocinétique (Revelation of the psychokinetic effect). N.p., 1960.

De Cressac Bachelerie, Bertrande, and Marige George Chevalier. La Métapsychique—probleme crucial (Parapsychology: a crucial problem). N.p., 1960.

Dectera

A figure of Irish medieval romance. She was the daughter of Cathbad the Druid and mother of Cuchulain. Dectera and 50 other maidens disappeared from the court of Conor mac Nessa. Three years later, while pursuing a flock of birds that were spoiling the crops, the king and courtiers came upon a magnificent palace inhabited by a youth of noble mien, a beautiful woman, and 50 maidens. These were recognized as Dectera and her companions, and the youth as Lugh, the sun god. Conor summoned Dectera to him, but she sent him instead her newborn son, Cuchulain.

Dee, John (1527–1608)

Renowned sixteenth-century mathematician and astrologer most remembered for his numerous experiments with crystal gazing. He was also a scholar, a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, England, and the author of 49 books on scientific subjects. His delving into the occult made him a person of strange reputation and career.

Born in London July 13, 1527, Dee is said to have descended from a noble Welsh family, the Dees of Nant y Groes in Radnorshire. He claimed that one of his direct ancestors was Roderick the Great, Prince of Wales. Dee's father appears to have been a gentleman server at the court of Henry VIII and therefore affluent and able to give his son a good education. So at age 15, John Dee went to Cambridge University and after two years there took his bachelor of arts. Soon afterward he became intensely interested in astronomy and decided to leave England to study abroad. In 1547 he went to the Low Countries (modern Belgium, Luxembourg, and the Netherlands), where he consorted with numerous scholars. He returned to England with the first astronomer's staff of brass and also with two globes constructed by geographer Gerard Mercator (famed for his cartographic projection).

In 1548 he traveled to France, living for some time at Louvain. In 1550 he spent several months in Paris, lecturing on the principles of geometry. He was offered a permanent post at the Sorbonne, but declined, returning in 1551 to England, where on the recommendation of Edward VI he was granted the rectory of Upton-upon-Severn, Worcestershire.

Dee was now in a delightful and enviable position, having a comfortable home and assured income, he was able to devote himself exclusively to the studies he loved. But he had hardly begun to enjoy these benefits when, on the accession of Queen Mary in 1553, he was accused of trying to take the new sovereign's life by means of magic and was imprisoned at Hampton Court.

He gained his liberty soon afterward, but he felt that many people looked on him with distrust because of his scientific predilections. In a preface he wrote for an English translation of Euclid, he complains bitterly of being regarded as "a companion of the hellhounds, a caller and a conjuror of wicked and damned spirits."

During the reign of Queen Elizabeth I his fortune began to improve again, and after making another long tour abroad (going on as far as St. Helena), he returned and took a house at Mortlake on the Thames.

While staying there he rapidly became famous for his intimate knowledge of astronomy. In 1572—on the advent of a new star—people flocked to hear Dee speak on the subject; when a mysterious comet appeared five years later, the scholar was again granted ample opportunity to display his learning. Queen Elizabeth herself was among those who came to ask him what this addition to the stellar bodies might portend.

First Crystal Visions

The most interesting circumstances in Dee's life are those dealing with his experiments in crystallomancy. Living in comparative solitude, practicing astrology for bread, but studying alchemy for pleasure, brooding over Talmudic mysteries and Rosicrucian theories, immersed in constant contemplation of wonders he longed to penetrate, and dazzled by visions of the elixir of life and the philosophers' stone, Dee soon reached such a condition of mystic exaltation that his visions seemed real, and he persuaded himself that he was the favored of the invisible world. In his Diary he recorded that he first saw spirits in his crystal globe on May 25, 1581.

One day in November 1582, while on his knees and fervently praying, Dee became aware of a sudden glory that filled the west window of his laboratory and in the midst of which shone the bright angel Uriel. It was impossible for Dee to speak. Uriel smiled benignly upon him, gave him a convex piece of crystal, and told him that when he wished to communicate with the beings of another world he had but to examine it intently, and they would immediately appear and reveal the mysteries of the future. Then the angel vanished.

Dee used the crystal but discovered that it was necessary to concentrate all his faculties upon it before the spirits would obey him. Also, he could never remember what the spirits said in their frequent conversations with him. He resolved to find a fellow worker, or a neophyte, who would converse with the spirits while he recorded the interesting dialogue. He found the assistant he sought in Edward Kelley, who unfortunately possessed the boldness and cunning for making a dupe of the amiable and credulous enthusiast.

Kelley was a native of Lancashire, born, according to Dee, in 1555. Nothing is known of his early years, but after having been convicted at Lancaster of coining, he was punished by having his ears cropped. He concealed the loss of his ears by a black skullcap. He later moved to Worcester and established himself as a druggist. Carnal, ambitious, and self-indulgent, he longed for wealth; and despairing of getting it through honest work, he began to seek the philosophers' stone and to employ what secrets he picked up in taking advantage of the ignorant and extravagant.

Before his acquaintance with Dee, he obtained some repute as a necromancer and alchemist who could make the dead utter the secrets of the future. One night he took a wealthy man and some of his servants into the park of Walton le Dale, near Preston in Lancashire, and alarmed him with the most frightening incantations. He then exhumed a recently interred corpse from the neighboring churchyard and pretended to make it utter wisdom.

Dee is believed to have employed a scryer, or seer, named Barnabas Saul before he met Kelley. He recorded in his Diary on October 9, 1581, that Saul was strangely troubled by a "spiritual creature" about midnight. On December 2 he willed his scryer to look into the "great crystalline globe" for the apparition of the holy angel Anael. Saul looked and apparently saw, but when he confessed the following March that he neither saw nor heard spiritual creatures any longer, Dee dismissed him. Then came Kelley (who was also called Talbot), and the conferences with the spirits rapidly increased in importance as well as curiosity.

The Visions of Edward Kelley

In his work with Kelley, Dee saw nothing. The visions seemed to exist solely in Kelley's fertile imagination. The entities who reportedly communicated through Kelley bore names such as Madini, Gabriel, Uriel, Nalvage, Il, Morvorgran, and Jubanladace. Some of them were said to be angels.

A record of the séances held in 1582–87 was published in Meric Casaubon's A True and Faithful Relation of What Passed between Dr. Dee and Some Spirits; Tending, Had it Succeeded, to a General Alteration of Most States and Kingdoms in the World (1659). The spirits offered occult instructions—how to make the elixir of life, how to search for the philosophers' stone, how to involve the spirits. They also gave information on the hierarchy of spiritual beings and disclosed the secrets of the primeval tongue that the angels and Adam spoke, which was corrupted into Hebrew after the Fall. This original speech bore an organic relation to the outer world. Each name expressed the properties of the thing spoken of, and the utterance of that name had a compelling power over that creature. Dee was supposed to write a book in this tongue under spirit influence. He was later relieved of the task, however. The prophecies that were given through the crystal mostly failed. The physical phenomena were few—occasional movements of objects, direct writing, and direct voice.

In light of Kelley's low moral character the séance records must be considered dubious documents, but the extraordinary detail and scope of these claimed visions (including the complex angelic language) seems to go beyond mere fraudulent invention. Kelley's later activities, however, were undoubtedly suspect.

Dee and Kelley acquired a considerable reputation for the occult, which spread from Mortlake to continental Europe. Dee declared that he possessed the elixir of life, which he claimed to have found among the ruins of Glastonbury Abbey, so the curious were drawn to his house by a double attraction. Gold flowed into his coffers, but his experiments in the transmutation of metals absorbed a great portion of his money.

At that time the court of England was visited by a Polish nobleman named Albert Laski, Count Palatine of Siradz, who wanted to see the famous "Gloriana." Queen Elizabeth received him with the flattering welcome she always accorded to distinguished strangers and placed him in the charge of the earl of Leicester. Laski visited all the England of the sixteenth century worth showing, especially its two universities, but was disappointed at not finding the famous Dr. Dee at Oxford. "I would not have come hither," he said to the earl, "had I wot that Dee was not here." Leicester promised to introduce him to the learned philosopher on their return to London, and so soothed his discontent.

A few days afterward Laski and the earl of Leicester were waiting in the antechamber at Whitehall for an audience with the queen when Dee arrived. Leicester embraced the opportunity and introduced him to Laski. The interview between two genial spirits was interesting and led to frequent visits from Laski to Dee's house at Mortlake. Kelley consulted the "great crystalline globe" and began to reveal hints and predictions that excited Laski's fancy. He claimed to see in the globe magnificent projects for the reconstruction of Europe, to be accomplished with Laski's help. According to Kelley's spirit revelations, Laski was descended from the Anglo-Norman family of the Lacies and was destined to effect the regeneration of the world. After that disclosure the two men could talk about nothing but hazy politics.

A careful perusal of Dee's Diary suggests that he was duped by Kelley and that he accepted all his revelations as the actual utterances of the spirits. It seems that Kelley not only knew something of the optical delusions then practiced by pretended necromancers, but also may have possessed considerable ventriloquial powers, which assisted him in deceptions.

It did not serve Kelley's purposes to bring matters too suddenly to an end, and hoping to show the value of his services, he renewed his complaints about the wickedness of dealing with spirit and his fear of the perilous enterprises they might enjoin. He threatened to abandon his task, which greatly disturbed Dee. Where indeed could he hope to meet with another scryer of such infinite ability?

Once when Kelley expressed his desire to ride from Mortlake to Islington on some business, the doctor grew afraid that it was only an excuse to cover his escape. Following is Dee's only account of the events:

"Whereupon, I asked him why he so hasted to ride thither, and I said if it were to ride to Mr. Harry Lee I would go thither, and to be acquainted with him, seeing now I had so good leisure, being eased of the book writing. Then he said that one told him the other day that the duke (Laski) did but flatter him, and told him other things both against the duke and me. I answered for the duke and myself, and also said that if the forty pounds annuity which Mr. Lee did offer him was the chief cause of his mind setting that way (contrary to many of his former promises to me), that then I would assure him of fifty pounds yearly, and would do my best, by following of my suit, to bring it to pass as soon as I possibly could; and thereupon did make him promise upon the Bible.

"Then Edward Kelley again upon the same Bible did swear unto me constant friendship, and never to forsake me; and moreover said that unless this had so fallen about he would have gone beyond the seas, taking ship at Newcastle within eight days next.

"And so we plight our faith each to the other, taking each other by the hand, upon these points of brotherly and friendly fidelity during life, which covenant I beseech God to turn to his honour, glory, and service, and the comfort of our brethren (his children) here on earth."

Kelley then returned to Dee's crystal and his visions and soon persuaded Laski that he was destined by the spirits to achieve great victories over the Saracens and win enduring glory. To do so he needed to return to Poland.

Adventures in Europe

Laski returned to Poland, taking with him Dee and Kelley and their wives and families. The spirits continued to respond to their inquiries even while at sea. They landed at the Brill on July 30, 1583, and traversed Holland and Friesland to the wealthy town of Lubeck. There they lived sumptuously for a few weeks, and with new strength set out for Poland. On Christmas Day they arrived at Stettin, where they stayed until the middle of January 1584. They reached Lasco, Laski's estate, early in February.

Immediately work began for the transmutation of iron into gold, since boundless wealth was obviously needed for so grand an enterprise as the regeneration of Europe. Laski liberally supplied them with means, but the alchemists always failed on the very threshold of success.

It became apparent to the swindlers that Laski's fortune was nearly exhausted. At the same time, ironically, the angels Madini, Uriel, and their comrades in the crystal began to doubt whether Laski was, after all, the great regenerator intended to revolutionize Europe.

The whole party lived at Cracow from March 1584 until the end of July and made daily appeals to the spirits in reference to the Polish prince. They grew more and more discouraging in their replies, and Laski began to suspect that he had been duped. He proposed to furnish the alchemists with sufficient funds for a journey to Prague and letters of introduction to Emperor Rudolph. At that very moment the spirits revealed that Dee should bear a divine message to the emperor, and so Laski's proposal was gladly accepted.

At Prague the two alchemists were well received by the emperor. They found him willing to believe in the existence of the famous philosophers' stone. He was courteous to Dee, a man of European celebrity, but was very suspicious of Kelley. They stayed several months at Prague, living on the funds Laski had supplied and hoping to be drafted into the imperial service.

At last the papal nuncio complained about the tolerance afforded to heretical magicians, and the emperor was obliged to order them to leave within 24 hours. They complied, and so escaped prison or the stake, to which the nuncio had received orders from Rome to consign them in May 1586.

They traveled to the German town of Erfurt, and from there to Cassel. Meeting with a cold reception, however, they made their way once more to Cracow. There they earned a scanty living by telling fortunes and casting nativities.

After a while, they found a new patron in Stephen, king of Poland, to whom Kelley's spirits predicted that Emperor Rudolph would soon be assassinated and that the Germans would elect him to the imperial throne. But Stephen, like Laski, grew weary of the ceaseless demands for pecuniary support. Then came a new disciple, Count Rosenberg, a wealthy nobleman of Trebona, in Bohemia. At his castle they remained for nearly two years, eagerly pursuing their alchemical studies but never coming any closer to the desired result.

Dee's enthusiasm and credulity had made him utterly dependent on Kelley, but the trickster was nevertheless jealous of the superior respect that Dee enjoyed as a man of remarkable scholarship and considerable ability. Frequent quarrels broke out between them, aggravated by the passion Kelley had developed for the doctor's young and beautiful wife—which he was determined to gratify. He concocted an artful plan to get what he wanted.

Knowing Dee's dependence upon him as a scryer, he suddenly announced his intention of resigning, and only consented to remain when the doctor begged him. That day, April 18, 1587, they consulted the spirits. Kelley pretended to be shocked at the revelation they made and refused to repeat it. Dee's curiosity was aroused, and he insisted on hearing it, but was extremely upset when Kelley said that the spirits had commanded the two philosophers to have their wives in common.

Dee rebuked the spirit Madini for such an improper proposal, but eventually reluctantly consented to the arrangement. Accordingly Dee, Kelley, and their wives signed an agreement on May 3, 1587, pledging obedience to the angelic demand.

Soon afterward, Dee requested permission from Queen Elizabeth to return to England and left the castle of Trebona after finally separating from Kelley. The latter, who had been knighted at Prague, proceeded to the Bohemian capital, taking with him the elixir found at Glastonbury Abbey. He was immediately arrested by order of the emperor and imprisoned.

Kelley was later released and wandered throughout Germany, telling fortunes and propagating the cause of magic. He was again arrested as a heretic and sorcerer. In a desperate attempt to avoid imprisonment he tried to escape, but fell from the dungeon wall and broke two ribs and both his legs. He died of his injuries in February 1593.

Dee's Final Years

Dee set out from Trebona with a splendid train, the expenses of his journey defrayed by the generous Bohemian noble Count Rosenberg. In England he was well received by the queen and settled again at Mortlake, resuming his chemical studies and his pursuit of the philosophers' stone.

But nothing went well with the unfortunate enthusiast. He employed two scryers—a rogue named Bartholomew and a charlatan named Heckman—but neither could discover anything satisfactory in the "great crystalline globe." He grew poorer and poorer; he sank into indigence and wearied the queen with his importunity. At length he obtained a small appointment as chancellor of St. Paul's Cathedral, which in 1595 he exchanged for the wardenship of Manchester College. He served in this position until age and failing intellect compelled him to resign it about 1602 or 1603.

He then retired to his old house at Mortlake, where he practiced as a fortune-teller, gaining little in return but an unenviable reputation as a wizard, "a conjuror, a caller, or invocator of devils." On June 5, 1604, he petitioned James I for protection against such calumnies, declaring that none of the "very strange and frivolous fables or histories reported and told of him (as to have been of his doing) were true."

Dee was an exceptionally interesting figure, and he must have been a man of rare intellectual activity. His calculations facilitated the adoption of the Gregorian calendar in England, and he foresaw the formation of the Historical Manuscripts Commission, addressing to the Crown a petition on the desirability of preserving the old, unpublished records of England's past, many of which were kept in the archives of monasteries. He was a voluminous writer on science, his works including Monas Hieroglyphica (1564), De Trigono (1565), Testamentum Johannis Dee Philosophi Summi ad Johannem Guryun Transmissum (1568) and An Account of the Manner in which a Certayn Coppersmith in the Land of Moores, and a Certayn Moore Transmuted Copper to Gold (1576).

It is usual to dismiss Kelley as a rogue and Dee as his dupe, but if the angelic visions were purely for money, they both could have done better for themselves. Dee seemed to be an honest man of unusual talents, devoting his life to science and the pursuit of mystical knowledge. The angelic language called Enochian, which Dee and Kelley used when invoking spirits in the crystal, is a construction of great intricacy, far beyond the capacity or the requirements of simple fraud. It combines magic, mathematics, astrology, and cryptography. An intriguing suggestion is that the angelic conversations were a system of codes to convey secrets, and that Dee and Kelley's visits in Europe were for purposes of espionage. In later times, Enochian rituals were revived by the magical Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn and became a common element in ceremonial magic. Some Enochian rituals were adapted by Anton LaVey and the Church of Satan, which he founded.

Dee's reputation suffered much from the scorn of Meric Casaubon, who published some of the angelic conversations and represented them as delusive. The scholar Theodore Besterman, however, in his book Crystal-Gazing (1929), adopted Dee as a pioneer Spiritualist, and contemporary magicians have seen him as one of their ancestors.

Dee was miserably poor in his last years and was even obliged to sell his precious books in order to sustain himself. He was planning a journey to Germany when he died in December 1608; he was buried in the chancel of Mortlake Church. The seventeenth-century antiquary John Aubrey assembled an interesting character description of Dee:

"He had a very fair, clear, sanguine complexion, a long beard as white as milke. A very handsome man. . . . He was a great peacemaker; if any of the neighbours fell out, he would never lett them alone till he had made them friends. He was tall and slender. He wore a gowne like an artist's gowne, with hanging sleeves, and a slitt. A might good man he was."

One of his crystals used for scrying was supposed to have been given to Dee by an angel. It is on display in the British Museum, London, which also houses some of the mystical cakes of wax consecrated by Dee for his ceremonies and some of his manuscripts in the Cottonian collection.

Several centuries after his death, on April 18, 1873, Dee supposedly communicated via automatic writing through the mediumship of Stainton Moses. The communications gave some evidential details of his life that were verified by research at the British Museum Library, but his signature was found to be dissimilar to the one preserved there.

Sources:

Besterman, Theodore. Crystal-Gazing. London, 1929. Reprint, New York, 1965.

Burland, C. A. The Arts of the Alchemists. London, 1967.

Clulee, Nicholas H. John Dee's Natural Philosophy: Between Science and Religion. New York: Routledge, 1988.

Deacon, R. John Dee: Scientist, Astrologer & Secret Agent to Elizabeth. London: Frederick Muller, 1968.

Dee, John. The Diaries of John Dee. Edited by Edward Fenton. Oxfordshire, UK: Day Books, 1998.

———. The Hieroglyphic Monad. Translated by J. W. Hamilton Jones. London, 1847.

———. A True and Faithful Relation of What Passed for Many Years Between Dr. John Dee . . . and Some Spirits. . . . London, 1659. Reprint, Askin, 1974.

French, Peter J. John Dee: The World of an Elizabethan Magus. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1972.

Halliwell, J. O., ed. The Private Diary of Dr. John Dee, and the Catalogue of His Library of Manuscripts. London: Camden Society, 1842.

Turner, Robert. Elizabethan Magic. Longmead, Dorset, U.K.: Element Books, 1989.

Yates, Frances A. The Rosicrucian Enlightenment. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1972.

De Fontenay, Guillaume (1861–1914)

Prominent French psychical investigator, especially known for his researches into psychic photography. In important works such as Action des encres sur la plaque photographique, La Chimicographie et la Prétendue Photographie du Rayonnement vital, and Note relative aux prétendues radiations organiques du commandant Dorget, he offers an explanation for emanation photographs of the human body. He also wrote excellent books on the mediumship of Eusapia Palladino and Linda Gazzera. He died in 1914 in France.

Sources:

De Fontenay, Guillaume. Apropos d'Eusapia Palladino. N.p., 1898.

Deganawidah

Deganawidah, the prophet whose vision of peace led to the establishment of the Iroquois Confederacy and the ending of centuries of strife between the Mohawk, Onondaga, Seneca, Oneida, and Cayuga Nations, was born at an unknown date, most likely between 1400 and 1600 C.E., among the Huron people. According to the oral tradition from which knowledge of him derives, his mother became pregnant though still a virgin. His grandmother had a vision that he would grow up and live among foreigners and raise a great tree of Peace. He would also indirectly be the cause of the demise of the Huron people. To prevent the latter from happening, the two women tried to kill him, but he would not die.

At about the age of 18, Deganwidah left home and made the first convert to the vision of peace that he claimed he had been sent by the Master of Life to deliver. The convert was a young Mohawk named Hiawatha, an eloquent speaker who would become the public voice of his teacher. Under Deganawidah's counsel, Hiawatha changed from a man filled with hate (due to the massacre of his family) to a man of peace. The message called people to three principles: health of body and mind, righteous in conduct and equality and justice among people, and the maintenance of authority. He also wrote a song of peace that he and Hiawatha taught to the people among whom they moved.

When they approached the Mohawks, Deganawidah proposed a test of his message. He climbed to the top of a tall tree that hung over the Mohawk River. He then had the Mohawks cut the tree out from under him. He plunged into the swift river. All thought him dead. However, they found him the next morning cooking breakfast. He explained that the Master of Life had given him power over his own death.

It took him five years to bring the Mohawks, Oneida, Seneca, and Cayuga into the original confederacy based on the three principles. He and Hiawatha then moved to Onondaga land, the land ruled by the man who had killed Hiawatha's wife. Here he performed a miracle of healing on the chief, who was mentally ill. Deganawidah is said to have combed the snakes (evil and insane thoughts) from his head. The chief became an immediate convert. At the ceremony creating the League of Five Nations, he led in the planting of a Tree of Peace, and uprooting another tree, the peoples' weapons were symbolically tossed into the hole. The league was a representative democracy well known to Benjamin Franklin and has been seen as one of the models upon which the United States government was finally created.

Deganawidah was only about 23 years old when he completed the task of uniting the people. According to the tradition, he then got in a canoe and left. Where he went and what eventually happened to him is unknown. The last prophecy of his grandmother came true in 1649 when the league attacked the Hurons and forced the survivors to assimilate into the confederacy.

Sources:

Colden, Cadawallader. The History of the Five Nations: Depending on the Province of New York in America. 1727. Reprint, Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1958.

Hewitt, J. N. B. "Legend of the Founding of the Iroquois League." American Anthropologist 5 (1892): 2.

Peterson, Scott. Native American Prophecies. New York: Paragon House, 1990.

De Gasparin, Count Agenor (1810–1871)

French politician, minister plenipotentiary, and one of the first investigators of table-turning and telekinesis. His book Des Tables Tournantes, du Surnaturel engénéral, et des Esprits (1854) describes his experiments at Velleyres, Switzerland, which were constructed under stringent test conditions.

The results of his research were quite positive and seemed to support a Spiritualist explanation (i.e., he demonstrated to his own satisfaction the intelligence manifesting behind the phenomena). Because of his own orthodox Christian commitments, however, he could not accept the spirit hypothesis. Instead he settled for a more mundane conclusion suggestive of what later would be termed telekinesis. He suggested that the will—in a certain condition of the human organism—can act, from a distance, upon inert bodies, and by an agency different from that of the muscular. He also believed that, under the same conditions, thought can be communicated directly, though unconsciously, from one individual to another.

In a preface to an 1888 edition of his book he states that the problem had not been resolved in the 30 years that had elapsed but that "some day an edifice would be erected on the same stone which was laid in 1854."

De Gerson, Jean Charlier (1363–1429)

French theologian and chancellor of the University of Paris. De Gerson was the author of many works, including the Examination of Spirits, which contains rules for distinguishing true revelations from false, and the popular Astrology Reformed.

De Gert, Berthomine (ca. 1608)

A sorceress of the town of Préchac in Gascony who confessed about the year 1608 that when a sorceress returning from the sabbat is killed, the devil takes her shape and makes her reappear and die in her own dwelling so as to preserve her good reputation. But if the murderer has a wax candle and with it makes the sign of the cross on the witch's body, the devil cannot with all his strength remove her and is forced to leave her there.

Deitton

An astrological book of Indian origin in use in Myanmar, similar to the Dittharana. (See also astrology)

Déjà Vu

A French term used by psychical researchers to characterize the feeling people sometimes have that some scene or experience in the present also occurred in the past. Déjà vu (already seen) is often coupled with déjà entendu (already heard). Through the years, many have related the feelings of déjà vu to the phenomenon of astral projection or out-of-the-body travel, when individuals apparently visit a distant place in an astral or etheric body during sleep. Déjà vu is also associated with fulfillment of a prior premonition of a forthcoming event.

More recently, déjà vu has been connected to experiences of reincarnation, when a feeling of prior knowledge is so strong that people feel sure it must have come from a former incarnation. In a celebrated case in India, a little girl named Shanti Devi, born in Delhi in 1926, claimed that she had lived elsewhere in a former birth, and even named the city. When taken there, she correctly identified the house, family, and other circumstantial details.

Feelings of déjà vu are rarely evidential or even reliable. Scenes in the present may only appear familiar because they contain some element connected with a past experience and reactivate the sensation of familiarity. Psychologists have characterized the phenomenon of false remembering as "postidentifying paramnesia."

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

De Lancre, Pierre (1553–1631)

French judge at witchcraft trials who claimed to have discovered that virtually the entire population (30,000) of a Basque area, including priests, was affected by witchcraft. Born in Bordeaux, De Lancre studied law at Turin and Bohemia and became a lawyer at the Parlement of Bordeaux in 1588. In 1608 he was commissioned by Henry IV to investigate witchcraft in the Basque territories. He actually boasted that as a trial judge he had sentenced 600 to be burned.

His writings include Tableau de l'inconstance des mauvaisanges (1612), L'incredulité et mescréance dusortilé (1622), and Du Sortilege (1627). He died at Loubeur-sur-Garonne in 1631.

Sources:

Robbins, Rossell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1959.

Delanne, Gabriel (1857–1926)

A leading French Spiritualist and psychical researcher. He was born March 23, 1857, in Paris. He became an engineer, and his experience assisted him in becoming what Theodore Flournoy called "the most scientific of French spiritists."

Delanne pioneered the use of paraffin casts to obtain evidence of materialization. He also collected evidence of reincarnation. For many years he edited the Revue Scientifique et

Moderne de Spiritisme. He wrote several books based on his investigations that marshall a case for life after death. Though he gradually went blind, he continued to participate in psychical research until shortly before his death on February 15, 1926.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Delanne, Gabriel. L' Ame est Immortelle. N.p., 1904.

———. Les Apparitions Materialisées des Vivants et des Morts. N.p., 1909.

———. L'Evolution Animique. N.p., 1897.

———. Le Phenom Agene Spirite. N.p., 1894.

———. Récherches sur la Mediumnité. N.p., 1896.

———. Le Spiritisme devant la Science. N.p., 1895.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

De Launoy, Jean (1603–1678)

A celebrated doctor of the Sorbonne, canonist, and historian, De Launoy was born in Valdesie, Normandy, France. He studied at the University of Paris and after being ordained as a priest was admitted as a doctor of divinity at Navarre. He resisted the claims of the court of Rome and specialized in exposing legendary religious fables and demolishing dubious claims for saints. He thinned the ranks of sainthood by his keen scrutiny. One commentator remarked, "He suspected the whole martyrology, and examined all the saints as they do the nobility of France." In spite of his severe judgments, he was known as a kindhearted and benevolent man. He wrote several books based upon his work.

De La Warr, George (1905–1969)

British expert in radionics, a subject related to radiesthesia and dowsing, and which uses an apparatus to identify claimed subtle radiation in humans and objects. The primary use of the tool was to diagnose illnesses. Born on August 19, 1904, in Southwick, Sussex, England, and educated at Brighton Technical College, De La Warr served as a captain with the British army in the Royal Engineers. De La Warr was best known for his device that was developed from the black box of Albert Abrams but used the method of stroking a rubber pad with the fingers instead of tapping the abdomen of a patient. The rubber detector pad was set in a frame with a wire circuit connection to a box containing various knobs and dials. A blood sample from the patient was placed in this circuit, and the rubber pad was stroked by the operator's finger until it indicated a "sticking" sensation at various dial readings. It was claimed that the dial markings denoted various pathological conditions of the patient whose blood sample was being tested.

In addition to diagnosis of disease, the apparatus was used for absent treatment of the patient by "correcting wave forms," sometimes in conjunction with exposure of a photographic plate inserted in the box, resulting in a kind of "psychic photograph." There was no conventional electric or magnetic circuit in black boxes, so their inventors (including De La Warr) were often charged with fraud.

De La Warr founded a research laboratory at Oxford, England, Delawarr Laboratories, and developed various black boxes for medical purposes, including the thought energy detector, an art appreciation apparatus, the Psychoplot, and the vibrograph, which detects molecular changes. He also experimented with photographs related to radiation from blood samples. His theories about subtle radiation are presented in detail in the book New Worlds Beyond the Atom (1956).

He received considerable support from a variety of eminent individuals, including Air Marshal Sir Victor Goddard, Methodist minister Leslie Weatherhead, and Kenneth Walker (a student of Georgei I. Gurdjieff). None had medical credentials nor could their enthusiasm stop the medical community from condemning De La Warr's work (as it had earlier denounced Abrams's).

Deleuze, Jean Philippe François (1753–1835)

French naturalist and adept in animal magnetism or mesmerism. He was born at Sisteron, Lower Alps, in March 1753. He became an early advocate of magnetism, which he believed to be a function of the rapport between patient and magnetizer. He also came to believe in the ability of clairvoyants to diagnose disease.

Sources:

Deleuze, Jean P. F. Défense du Magnétisme. N.p., 1819.

———. Histoire Critique du Magnétisme. N.p., 1813–19.

———. Instruction Pratique sur le Magnétisme Animale. 1819. Translated as Practical Instruction in Animal Magnetism. New York: Samuel R. Wells, 1879.

———. Mémoire sur la Faculté de Prevision. N.p., 1836.

De Lisle (ca. 1710)

De Lisle was a French alchemist. Both Lenglet du Fresnoy, in his Histoire de la Philosophie Hérmetique (ca. 1742), and nineteenth-century alchemist G. Louis Figuier wrote about De Lisle; neither supplied his first name or his date and place of birth. Some believe he was a Provençal.

De Lisle was known to have been active during the first decade of the eighteenth century, so it may be assumed that he was born toward the close of the previous century. He seems at an early age to have entered the service of a scientist who apparently was a pupil of the alchemist Lascaris. This unnamed scientist got into trouble of some sort, probably because of his predilection for the occult. He left Provence and set out for Switzerland, taking with him his young pupil, De Lisle. On the way the youth murdered his patron and employer and took all his alchemistic property, notably some precious transmuting powder. Then, about the year 1708, he returned to his native France, where he soon attracted attention by supposedly changing masses of lead and iron into silver and gold.

Noble and influential people now began to seek his company and his scientific services, and he soon found himself safely and comfortably housed in the castle of La Palud. There he received many visitors and demonstrated his skill before them.

He eventually grew weary of this and began an affair with a Madame Alnys, a married woman. He traveled with her from place to place, and a son was eventually born to the pair. Madame Alnys's husband was still alive, but that did not prevent De Lisle from continuing to elicit patronage and favor from the rich and famous.

For example, in 1710, at the Château de St. Auban, he performed a curious experiment in the presence of a Monsieur St. Maurice, then president of the royal mint. Going into the grounds of the château one evening, De Lisle showed St. Maurice a basket sunk in the ground and had him bring it into the dining hall, where it was opened, revealing some earth of a blackish color. After distilling a yellow liquid from the earth, De Lisle projected this on hot quicksilver and quickly produced three ounces of gold, later also succeeding in concocting a quantity of silver. Some of the gold was sent to Paris to be refined. Three medals were struck from it; one, bearing the inscription Aurum Arte Factum, was placed in the cabinet of the king.

As a result of the incident at St. Auban, De Lisle was invited to visit the court in Paris, but he declined, saying the southern climate in which he lived was necessary to the success of his experiments, since the preparations he worked with were purely vegetable. It is probable that, having been successful in impressing his clientèle so far, he felt it wise to refrain from further endeavors that might prove futile and destroy his reputation.

Nothing is written of De Lisle later than 1760, so presumably he died about that time. His son by Madame Alnys, however, seems to have inherited some of his father's predilections and a fair amount of his skill. Wandering for many years through Italy and Germany, Alnys was reported to have affected transmutations successfully before various petty nobles. In Vienna he attracted the attention of the Duc de Richelieu, then acting as French ambassador to the Viennese court. Richelieu afterward assured the Abbé Lenglet that he not only saw the operation of gold making performed, but did it himself by carrying out instructions given him by the alchemist.

Alnys latter gradually acquired great wealth, but, falling under suspicion, he was imprisoned for a time at Marseilles. He ultimately escaped to Brussels. There he continued, not altogether unsuccessfully, to engage in alchemy.

It was in Brussels that he became acquainted with Percell, the brother of Lenglet du Fresnoy, to whom he is said to have confided some valuable scientific secrets. Eventually the mysterious death of one Grefier, known to have been working in Alnys's laboratory, made the Brussels authorities suspicious about Alnys's character, so he left the town stealthily, never to be heard from again.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Secret Tradition in Alchemy. London, 1926.

DeLouise, Joseph (1927–)

Successful Chicago psychic famous for his predictions of future events. DeLouise was born in Gibellina, Sicily, on November 10, 1927. Both his father and grandfather were healers, and his grandfather introduced him to meditation and psychic experiences. At age five, DeLouise had his initial psychic "feeling," which led to the family's securing enough money to move to the United States.

DeLouise grew up in Chicago. He dropped out of school after finishing the elementary grades and on his seventeenth birthday joined the navy. His career was marked by service in the Pacific. In an incident shortly before his discharge in 1946, he had a "feeling" of a major disaster in an ammo depository on Guam where he was working. Refusing to return to work saved his life when the place exploded.

After the war, he married, attended beauty school, and settled down to a normal life. He was divorced in 1950, which led to his separation from the Roman Catholic Church. He began to receive psychic impressions from the women whose hair he styled, and he practiced giving brief readings to them, gaining a reputation as a psychic. He also attended séances and eventually became a Spiritualist minister. He learned to work with a crystal ball to increase his concentration.

In November 1967, during an interview on a Chicago radio show, DeLouise predicted a major bridge collapse before the year was out. Twenty-one days later, the Silver Bridge across the Ohio River at Point Pleasant, West Virginia, collapsed. It matched in every detail the collapse described by DeLouise on the air. Then in 1969 he predicted a major train crash, the drowning of Mary Jo Kopechne (while a passenger in a car being driven by Sen. Edward Kennedy), and an airplane disaster in Indianapolis and gave his insights into the connection of the Manson Family to the murder of actress Sharon Tate. Whereas the 1967 prediction had made him famous in Chicago, the 1969 predictions established his reputation across America.

DeLousie has since operated as a professional psychic with offices in Chicago. He sees individual clients and also works with groups.

Sources:

Delfano, M. M. The Living Prophets. New York: Dell, 1972.

DeLouise, Joseph, and Tom Valentine. Psychic Mission. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1971.

Delphi

The famous oracle of ancient Greece, where the priestess Pythia was consulted concerning the future and gave her answers in a state of trance, induced by intoxicating fumes. According to Justinian, "In a dark and narrow recess of a cliff at Delphi there was a little open glade and in this a hole, or cleft in the earth, out of which blew a strong draft or air straight up and as if impelled by a wind, which filled the minds of poets with madness." Lake Avernus, Heraclea, and Phigaleia were qualified for the evocation of the dead by similar intoxicating fumes.

According to Plutarch, the Delphian oracle had not been convicted of falsehood in a single instance. On the contrary, the verification of the oracles has filled the temple with gifts from all parts of Greece and foreign countries. In discussing the question "Why the Prophetess Pythia giveth no Answers now from the Oracle in Verse," Plutarch explained that the replies were always couched in enigmatical language when kings and states consulted the oracle on weighty matters that might have done harm if made public, but that private persons always received direct answers in the plainest terms.

Herodotus told of a successful test of the oracles by Croesus, King of Lydia. He dispatched envoys to the best six oracles: Delphi, Dodona, Branchidae, Zeus Ammon, Trophonius, and Amphiaraus. The envoys were instructed to ask on the hundredth day of their departure what Croesus was doing at home in Sardis at a particular moment. Four oracles entirely failed. Delphi was perfectly right. Herodotus quoted the reply:

I can count the sands, and I can measure the Ocean;
I have ears for the silent, and know what the dumb man meaneth;
Lo! on my sense there striketh the smell of shell-covered tortoise,
Boiling now on fire, with the flesh of a lamb, in a cauldron,
Brass in the vessel below, and brass to cover above it.

Croesus wished to think out an action that could not be guessed at. He took a tortoise and a lamb, cut them to pieces, and boiled them in a covered brazen cauldron.

The decline of the oracles began two or three centuries before Christ. That of Delphi was closed in the fourth century by a decree of Theodosius. After a long period of disuse, attempts were made to revive the oracle at the opening of the second century C.E. under Plutarch's priesthood. During the period of Christianity under Constantine the oracle became finally silent.

Delphic Circle

A regular gathering of mediums at Hertford Lodge, Battersea, England, organized by Frederick Thurstan to promote collective mediumistic development. Mrs. Thompson, Alfred Vout Peters, and Laura I. Finch (Charles Richet's subject) were developed at these reunions. The group flourished about 1930 and no longer exists.

Del Rio, Martin Antoine (1551–1608)

Famous Jesuit scholar regarded as an authority on witchcraft during the great persecutions of the sixteenth century. Del Rio was born in 5551 at Antwerp, Belgium, of a distinguished Spanish family. He studied classical literature and works in Hebrew, Chaldean, and other languages. At age 19, he published an edition of Seneca, and was only 24 when he became vice-chancellor and attorney general for the Belgian province of Brabant.

In 1580 he entered the Jesuit order, teaching at various Jesuit centers and gathering material for his major work on witchcraft and demonology, Disquisitionum Magicarum Libri Sex, published in 1599. This encyclopedic work discusses magic, alchemy, witchcraft, prophecy, and apparitions, and gives instructions to judges at witchcraft trials, reviving the intolerance caused a century earlier by the sinister Malleus Maleficarum (1486) of Jakob Sprenger and Heinrich Kramer.

Del Rio died in 1608.

Sources:

Del Rio, Martin Antoine. Disquisitionum Magicarum Libri Sex. Moguntiae: Typis Joannis Albini, 1600.

De Marigny, Enguerrand (d. 1315)

A minister of Louis X, king of France. De Marigny entered the stream of occult history after having been arrested and imprisoned. Soon after his arrest his wife and her sister were accused of using various enchantments to harm the king, his brother Charles, and other barons. Their ultimate intention was to free de Marigny. The ladies were arrested and along with them Jacques Dulot, a magician, who was believed to have helped in these sorceries. Dulot committed suicide in prison, after his wife was burned.

Dulot's death convinced many that de Marigny was guilty, and the ex-minister was tried and condemned. On April 30, 1315, he was hanged on a gibbet that he had erected during his term of office. The tide of popular opinion turned at the sight of his misfortune, however, and the judges refused to condemn his wife and sister-in-law. The king himself repented of having abandoned de Marigny to his enemies and in his will left a sum of money to his family.

De Martino, Ernesto (1908–1965)

Italian professor of the history of religions, considered to be one of the most significant and influential figures in modern Italian folk studies and anthropology. De Martino was born December 1, 1908, in Naples, Italy, and studied at the University of Naples. He developed an active interest in parapsychology as related to ethnology and anthropology, about which he wrote several books.

Sources:

De Martino, Ernesto. Morte e Pianto rituale nel Mondo antico (Death and ritual dirge in the ancient world). N.p., 1958.

———. Sud e Magia (South Italy and magic). 2nd ed. Milan: Feltrinelli, 1971.

———. La Terra del Rimorso (The land of remorse). N.p., 1961. Winters, Christopher, ed. International Dictionary of Anthropologists. New York: Garland, 1991.

Dematerialization

The phenomenon of disappearance of phantom forms, human beings, or objects after being manifested or materialized. The terms apports and asports refer to the materialization and dematerialization of objects, involving their disappearance at one place and reappearance at another place some distance away. No satisfactory scientific theory for reported materialization or dematerialization has yet been offered, and little evidence has been produced to suggest that such phenomena in fact occur.

There are, of course, numerous anecdotal tales of materialization and dematerialization. Cases have been reported of disappearance and reappearance of persons, sometimes over hundreds of miles, often referred to as teleportation and transfiguration.

In the case of phantoms or spirits of the dead, the materialization is said to be formed from ectoplasm, a mysterious psychic substance exuded by a medium. Ectoplasm was often faked by mediums through the use of phosphor-covered cheesecloth and similar artifacts. Cases have also been reported of partial materialization and dematerialization by mediums such as Elizabeth d'Esperance.

Dement, William Charles (1928–)

Psychiatrist and researcher into phenomena relating to dreams. He was born in Wenatchee, Washington, July 29, 1928, and received his education at the University of Washington (B.S., 1951) and the University of Chicago (M.D., 1955). He joined the faculty of the Stanford University Medical School in 1963 as director of the Sleep Laboratory.

Dement and his colleagues found that sleep was essential for physical and psychological health and that deprivation tended to make individuals irritable or subject to memory loss. With his colleagues he investigated the phenomenon of the connection between a sleeper's rapid eye movements and the imagery of dreams. Although external sensory stimuli could influence dream imagery, Dement concluded that the themes of dreams arose primarily from the sleeper's mental or emotional processes.

Sources:

Dement, William C. and Christopher Vaughan. The Promise of Sleep. New York: Dell Books, 2000.

Dement, William C. Some Must Watch While Some Must Sleep. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford Alumni Association, 1972.

Demonius

A stone so called from the supposed demoniacal rainbow said to appear in it.

Demonocracy

The government of demons, the immediate influence of evil spirits, or the religion of certain peoples of the Americas, Africa, and Asia who claim to worship devils.

Demonography

The history and description of demons and all that concerns them. Authors who write about this subject—such as Johan Weyer, Pierre De Lancre, and Pierre Le Loyer—are sometimes called demonographers.

Demonology

The study of demons or evil spirits; also a branch of magic that deals with such beings. In religious science it has come to indicate knowledge regarding supernatural beings that are not deities. The Greek term daimon originally indicated "genius" or "spirit," and Socrates claimed to have had intercourse with his daimon. However, with the advent of Christianity it came to mean a malevolent spirit entity. Demonology was especially developed during the Middle Ages.

Ancient demonology is discussed in the entries Egypt, Semites, Genius, and Devil Worship, and the demonology in preindustrial societies is examined in the entries on the various countries and peoples of its origin.

According to Michael Psellus (1018–ca. 1079), author of De Operatione Daemonum Dialogus, demons are divided into six main bodies: the demons of fire; of the air; of the earth; those of the waters and rivers, who cause tempests and floods; the subterranean who prepare earthquakes and excite volcanic eruptions, and the shadowy ones who are somewhat like ghosts. (St. Augustine (354–430 C.E.) considered all demons under the last category.) Psellus's classification is not unlike the system of the Middle Ages, which divided all spirits into those belonging to the four elements: fire, air, earth, and water (salamanders, sylphs, gnomes, and undines, respectively).

Early Concepts of Demonology

The medieval idea of demons, of course, evolved from ancient Christian and Gnostic belief, especially from the accounts of demons in the Bible. Among the Jews, the gods of the surrounding nations were called demons, and those nations were condemned for making sacrifices to demons instead of to the one God, Yahweh (Deut. 32:17; Ps. 106:37). The Christian New Testament speaks of demons as inferior spirits who operate as subjects of the devil. Such demons can take possession of a human being causing various illnesses and physical ailments. Demons were named as causative factors in disease in a prescientific age.

Demons have an expansive role in the biblical record. They can affect the behavior of swine (Matt. 8:30–32) and speak with a knowledge beyond that of an ordinary person (Mark 1:23–24). Biblical authors did understand demons as objectively present in the world and pictured the apostles as trying to drive them away. Considering demons as having an objective existence placed many questions about the nature of their origin, existence, operation, and habitation on the theological agenda. By the third century, the angel Lucifer, who fell from heaven (Isa. 14:12), was identified with Satan, and the fallen angels with demons.

The Gnostics (who competed for members with the early Christians), imitating Plato's classification of the orders of spirits, attempted a similar arrangement with respect to a hierarchy of angels. The first and highest order was named seraphim; the second, cherubim; the third was the order of thrones; the fourth, dominions; the fifth, virtues; the sixth, powers; the seventh, principalities; the eighth, archangels; and the ninth, and lowest, angels.

This classification was censured by the Christian church, yet almost outlived the pneumatologists of the Middle Ages. These scholars—studying the account in which the angel Lucifer rebelled against heaven (Isa. 14:12), and that in which Michael, the archangel, warred against him (Rev. 12:7)—long asked the momentous question, "What orders of angels fell on this occasion?"

At length it became the prevailing opinion that Lucifer was of the order of seraphim. It was also asserted, after laborious research, that Agares, Belial, and Barbatos, each of whom deposed angels of great rank, had been of the order of virtues; that Bileth, Focalor, and Phoenix had been of the order of thrones; that Goap had been of the order of powers; that Purson had been of both the order of virtues and the order of thrones; and that Murmur had belonged to both the order of thrones and the order of angels. The pedigree of many other noble devils was likewise determined.

As the centuries progressed, theologians began to inquire, "How many fallen angels were engaged in the contest?" This was a question of vital importance, and it gave rise to the most strenuous research and to a variety of discordant opinions.

Others asked, "Where was the battle fought—in the inferior heaven, in the highest region of the air, in the firmament, or in Paradise?" and "How long did it last?" These were difficult questions, but the notion that ultimately prevailed was that the engagement was concluded in exactly three seconds, and that while Lucifer, with a number of his followers, fell into hell, the rest were left in the air to tempt man.

A newer question rose out of these investigations: whether a greater number of angels fell with Lucifer or remained in heaven with Michael. Noted scribes were inclined to think that the rebel chief had been beaten by a superior force, and that consequently devils of darkness were fewer in number than angels of light.

These discussions, which for centuries interested the whole of Christendom, exercised the talents of some of the most erudite persons in Europe. The last objective of demonologists was to assess Lucifer's routed forces and reorganize them into a decided form of subordination or government. Hence, extensive districts were given to certain chiefs who fought under the general Lucifer.

There was Zimimar, "the lordly monarch of the north," as Shakespeare calls him, who had his distinct province of devils; Gorson, the king of the South; Amaymon, the king of the East; and Goap, the prince of the West. These sovereigns had many noble spirits subordinate to them whose various ranks were settled with all the preciseness of heraldic distinction. There were devil dukes, devil marquises, devil counts, devil earls, devil knights, devil presidents, and devil prelates.

As a picture of the infernal kingdom was constructed, it was determined that the armed host under Lucifer had been composed of nearly twenty-four hundred legions, of which each demon of rank commanded a certain number. Beleth for instance, who has been described as "a great king and terrible, riding on a pale horse, before whom go trumpets and all melodious music," commanded 85 legions; Agares, the first duke under the power of the East, commanded 31 legions; Leraie, a great marquis, 30 legions; Morax, a great earl and a president, 36 legions; Furcas, a knight, 20 legions. The forces of the other devil chieftains were enumerated after the same manner.

The Appearance of Demons

The strange and hideous forms connected with the popular image of demons were derived from the descriptive writings of the early demonologists, who maintained that demons possessed a decidedly corporeal form and were mortal, or that, like Milton's spirits, they could assume any sex and take any shape they chose. In the Middle Ages, when conjuration was regularly practiced in Europe, devils of rank were supposed to appear under characteristic forms by which they were as well recognized as the head of any ancient family would be by his crest and armorial bearings.

Along with their names and characters were registered the shapes they were said to adopt. A devil would appear like an angel seated in a fiery chariot or riding on an infernal dragon and carrying a viper in his right hand; or he would assume a lion's head, a goose's feet, and a hare's tail; or put on a raven's head and come mounted on a strong wolf.

Among other forms taken by demons were those of a fierce warrior, or of an old man with a hawk in his hand riding upon a crocodile. A human figure would arise having the wings of a griffin or sporting three heads, two of them like those of a toad and one like a cat's; or displaying huge teeth and horns and armed with a sword; or exhibiting a dog's teeth and a large raven's head; or mounted upon a pale horse and exhibiting a serpent's tail; or gloriously crowned and riding upon a dromedary; or presenting the face of a lion; or bestriding a bear while grasping a viper.

Other forms were those of a goodly knight, or of one who bore lance, ensigns, and even a scepter, or of a soldier, either riding on a black horse and surrounded by a flame of fire, or wearing a duke's crown and mounted on a crocodile.

Hundreds of such varied shapes were assumed by devils of rank. In his Sketches of the Philosophy of Apparitions (1824), Dr. S. Hibbert comments:

"It would therefore betray too much of the aristocratical spirit to omit noticing the forms which the lower orders of such beings displayed. In an ancient Latin poem, describing the lamentable vision of a devoted hermit, and supposed to have been written by St. Bernard in the year 1238, those spirits, who had no more important business upon earth than to carry away condemned souls, were described as blacker than pitch; as having teeth like lions, nails on their fingers like those of a wildboar, on their fore-head horns, through the extremities of which poison was emitted, having wide ears flowing with corruption, and discharging serpents from their nostrils. The devout writer of these verses has even accompanied them from drawings, in which the addition of the cloven feet is not omitted. But this appendage, as Sir Thomas Brown has proved, is a mistake, which has arisen from the devil frequently appearing to the Jews in the shape of a rough and hairy goat, this animal being the emblem of sin-offering.''

The form of the demons described by St. Bernard (1090–1153) differs little from that which was no less carefully portrayed by English writer Reginald Scot 450 years later, and, perhaps, by the demonologists of modern times. ''In our childhood,'' says Scot, ''our mother's maids have so terrified us with an ouglie divell having horns on his head, fier in his mouth, and a tail on his breech, eies like a bason, fangs like a dog, clawes like a beare, . . . and a voice like a roaring lion.''

The Powers of Demons

Although the leading tenets of the occult science of demonology may be traced to the Jews and early Christians, they matured through communication with the Moors of Spain, who were the chief philosophers of the early Middle Ages. There was much intercultural exchange between the moors and the natives of France and Italy. Toledo, Seville, and Salamanca became the great schools of magic. At Salamanca discourses on the black art were, in keeping with the solemnity of the subject, delivered within the walls of a vast and gloomy cavern.

The instructors taught that all knowledge and power might be obtained from the fallen angels. They were skilled in the abstract sciences, in the knowledge of precious stones, in alchemy, in the various languages of mankind and of the lower animals, in belles lettres, in moral philosophy, pneumatology, divinity, magic, history, and prophecy, it was told. The demons could control the winds, the waters, and the influence of the stars; they could raise earthquakes; induce diseases or cure them; accomplish vast mechanical tasks; and release souls from purgatory. It was said that they could influence the passions of the mind, procure the reconciliation of friends or foes, engender mutual discord, induce mania and melancholy, or direct the force and objects of sexual affection.

Hierarchy of Demons

According to Johan Weyer, the prominent sixteenth-century Protestant demonologist, demons were divided into a great many classes, into regular kingdoms and principalities, and into mobility and commoners. According to Weyer, Satan was by no means the great sovereign of this monarchy; this honor was held by Beelzebub. Satan was alluded to by Weyer as a dethroned monarch and chief of the opposition; Moloch was called chief of the army; Pluto, prince of fire; and Leonard, grand master of the sphere. The masters of these infernal courts were Adramelech, grand chancellor; Astaroth, grand treasurer; Nergal, chief of the secret police; Baal, chief of the satanic army.

Weyer maintained that each state in Europe also had its infernal ambassadors. Belphegor is assigned to France, Mammon to England, Belial to Turkey, Rimmon to Russia, Thamuz to Spain, Hutjin to Italy, and Martinet to Switzerland.

According to Weyer's calculations the infernal regions contained an army of 7,405,926 devils and demons, organized into 1,111 divisions of 6,666 each.

One of the strangest authorities on demonology was surely Alexis Vincent Charles Berbiguier, known as ''the Scourge of the Demons,'' author of the three-volume encyclopedic work Les Farfadets, ou tous les démons ne sont pas de l'autre monde (1821). In this great study, he describes the infernal court: ''This court has representatives on earth. These mandatories are innumerable. I give nomenclature and degree of power of each: Moreau, magician and sorcerer of Paris, represents Beelzebub; Pinel, a doctor of Saltpétrière, represents Satan; Bouge, represents Pluto; Nicholas, a doctor of Avigum, represents Moloch.'' But Berbiguier was not just a theorist, since he claimed to have caught thousands of demons, impaling them on pins like a butterfly hunter and sealing them in bottles.

Modern Demonology

Belief in demons possibly reached its lowest ebb in the nineteenth century, though occultists such as William Barrett proposed their own demonic hierarchies. By the beginning of the twentieth century, demonology was unfashionable, even in occult circles, but during the occult boom of the 1960s and 1970s, the theme of demonic possession was revived in conservative Christian circles and given widespread coverage in books and movies like The Exorcist, by William P. Blatty. The idea of demons became a divisive force in the church, with some churchmen reviving rituals of exorcism and others remaining adamant in their unwillingness to endorse ancient concepts of demonology. At any rate, the sensationalist aspect of possession by demons is in keeping with the apocalyptic character of modern life, and demons have once again become part of theological discourse.

Sources:

Bodin, Jean. De la démonomania des sorciers. Paris, 1580.

Conway, Moncure D. Demonology and Devil-Lore. 2 vols. London: Chatto & Windus, 1879.

Ebon, Martin, ed. Exorcism: Fact Not Fiction. New York: New American Library, 1974.

Irvine, Doreen. From Witchcraft to Christ. London: Concordia Press, 1973.

Nauman, St. Elmo, Jr. Exorcism Through the Ages. New York: Philosophical Library, 1974.

Neil-Smith, Christopher. The Exorcist and the Possessed. Cornwall, England: James Pike, 1974.

Remy, Nicolas. Demonolatry. 1595. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1974.

Robbins, Rossell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1959.

Scott, Sir Walter. Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft. London, 1830. Reprint, New York: Citadel Press, 1970.

Shepard, Leslie. How to Protect Yourself Against Black Magic and Witchcraft. New York: Citadel Press, 1978.

Strachan, Francoise. Casting Out the Devils. London: Aquarian Press, 1972.

Wall, J. Charles. Devils. London, 1904. Reprint, Detroit: Singing Tree Press, 1968.

Weyer, Johan. Witches, Devils and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johan Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval & Renaissance Texts & Studies, 1991.

Demonology and Witchcraft (by Sir Walter Scott)

This work, first published in 1830 under the full title Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft, occupies a curious place in Sir Walter Scott's vast literary output. Four years after his financial collapse in 1826, the author sustained a mild stroke; shortly after, John Murray, who was then issuing a series known as The Family Library, asked Scott to contribute a volume on demonology. He readily consented, but—as an entry in Scott's journal makes clear—he did not greatly care for the work and really engaged in it to help pay off his debts.

The book attempts to develop broad theories on such subjects as the prevalence of belief in witchcraft in the Middle Ages. Scott was far more accomplished in dealing with particular instances of occult history—such as his account of demonology in France and in Sweden and his assessment of Joan of Arc. Moreover, his intimate knowledge of early Scottish literature gives a singular importance to chapters concerned with his native land, and it is interesting to find that here and there he offers something of a sidelight on his own novels (e.g., when he discusses the specters he dealt with in Woodstock).

Demonology and Witchcraft is written in the form of a series of letters to the author's son-in-law. Scott died two years after publication in 1832. The book has been reprinted frequently.

Sources:

Scott, Sir Walter. Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft. London: J. Murray, 1830.

Demonomancy

Divination by means of demons. Such divination takes place by the oracles they make or by the answers they give to those who evoke them.

Demonomania

The mania of those who believe all that was told concerning demons and sorcerers, such as Jean Bodin, Pierre De Lancre, Pierre Le Loyer, and others. Bodin's 1580 book Demonomania of the Sorcerers, on devilry, is a vivid account of demonomania.

De Morgan, Augustus (1806–1871)

A famous English mathematician, de Morgan was one of the first English scientists who investigated the phenomena of Spiritualism and became convinced of its paranormal nature. He was born in 1806 in Madura, Madras, India. At the age of seven months, his family moved to England. At an early age he lost the use of one eye. He attended several schools, eventually entering Trinity College, Cambridge University, in 1823. It was there that he displayed his mathematical ability. After earning his M.A., he began a career in law, but soon abandoned that and was elected as the first professor of mathematics at the University of London (later known as University College, London).

De Morgan was a brilliant mathematician and was responsible for the complete geometrical interpretation of the square root of minus one. He had a great love of algebra, puzzles, puns, and paradoxes. Beyond his long career at the university, he was secretary to the Royal Astronomical Society for 18 years, an influential member of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, and the author of such standard works as Formal Logic, The Differential Calculus (1847) and the An Essay on Probabilities (1838).

His first paranormal experience occurred in 1849. Ellen Dawson, a clairvoyant patient of a London surgeon named Hands, was sent, in a state of trance, on a clairvoyant journey after de Morgan. The sitting took place in the house of Mrs. de Morgan. The clairvoyant gave a description of de Morgan's acts and surroundings in a house where he was a guest. The description corresponded with the facts to the minutest details.

The first continuing series of investigations in which de Morgan participated took place with the well-known American medium Maria B. Hayden in de Morgan's own house. In 1854 Mrs. de Morgan discovered that her young servant Jane was a medium. She produced raps and movement of the table and saw visions. Her phenomena lasted for two years.

A report of this and the previous investigation with Hayden was published anonymously in 1863 under the title From Matter to Spirit, the Result of Ten Years' Experience in Spirit Manifestations, by C. D. (i.e., Mrs. de Morgan), with a preface by A. B. (i.e., de Morgan). In his preface, de Morgan writes:

"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me. But when it comes to what is the cause of these phenomena, I find I cannot adopt any explanation which has yet been suggested."

Writing anonymously, he shows some concern for the opinions of his colleagues: "My state of mind, which refers the whole either to some unseen intelligence, or something which man has never had any conception of, proves me to be out of the pale of the Royal Society." He was more definite and outspoken in his work Mind, published later the same year. He declared that he had come to believe that the only satisfactory hypothesis to explain the facts was that they occurred through some superhuman intelligence.

He finally gave up his anonymity by allowing the second edition of From Matter to Spirit to be advertised under his true name. At the Lyon-Home trial in 1868 (see D. D. Home) extracts from his preface were read in the court. He died March 18, 1871.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

De Morgan, Augustus. A Budget of Paradoxes. La Salle, Ill.: Open Court, 1915. Reprinted as Encyclopedia of Eccentrics. N.p., 1971.

De Morgan, Sophia Elizabeth. Three Score Years and Ten; Reminiscences of the Late Sophia Elizabeth De Morgan. London: R. Bentley, 1895.

Prince, Walter F. Noted Witnesses for Psychic Occurrences. Boston: Boston Society for Psychical Research, 1928. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Denis, Leon (1846–1927)

The apostle of French Spiritism (the name by which Spiritualism is generally termed in France, distinguished by its acceptance of the ideas surrounding reincarnation) on whom the mantle of Allan Kardec fell. He claimed to have been directly inspired by the spirit of Kardec in his activity as a tireless propagandist, teacher, and author of important and popular books. Another influence was a spirit, "Jerome of Prague," that communicated through typtology beginning in 1892 and addressed Denis as "my son."

Sources:

Baumard, Claire. Leon Denis intime. N.p., n.d.

Denis, Leon. d'Apres la Mort. N.p., n.d.

———. Dans l'Invisible (Spiritisme et Mediumnité). N.p., n.d.

———. Genie Celtique, et le Monde Invisible. N.p., n.d.

———. Jeanne d'Arc Medium: L'Au-delà et la Survivance de l'Etré, La Grande Énigme. Translated as The Mystery of Joan of Arc. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1925.

Luce, Gaston. Leon Denis l'apotre du spiritisme, sa vie, son oeuvre. N.p., n.d.

Le Probleme de l'Etre et de la Destinée: Christianisme et Spiritisme. Translated as Christianity & Spiritualism. London,, [1904].

Denis, Lorimer (1904–1957)

Ethnologist, born in Haiti October 24, 1904, who wrote several books and various articles on Haitian history, folklore, and ethnology. He was also concerned with the subject of parapsychology, on which he wrote two books: Bapteme de feu dans le vodou (Baptism of Fire in Voodoo) and La religion populaire: Evolution stadiale du vodou (The Popular Religion: The Evolution in Stages of Voodoo).

Dentistry, Psychic

A special area of psychic healing involving paranormal dental filling or even tooth renewal, associated with spiritual faith and the power of prayer. This extraordinary form of healing was first practiced in the United States by a traveling evangelist,

A. C. McCabe, who would conduct a service and then announce to his audience, "If you have cavities in your teeth, . . . if you have gum disorders, whatever it is, you come and I'll pray for you and God will meet your dental needs." McCabe then laid hands on each person in turn and prayed. He offered a mirror and flashlight so that individuals could see dental healing taking place.

One of these healing services, at Shreveport, Louisiana, was attended by Willard Fuller, another evangelist who practiced spiritual healing. Fuller witnessed more than two hours of dental healing and saw one woman receive a silver filling in a tooth cavity through paranormal means. McCabe told Fuller that he could also perform such healing, but it was several weeks before Fuller found the courage to invite members of his own congregations to come forward for dental treatment. After curing a man of a stomach ulcer, the same man came back to his services and asked him to pray for the healing of a tooth cavity. Fuller laid hands on the man's head and prayed, "In the name of Jesus, be thou everywhere whole," and the man confirmed that his tooth cavity was healed.

Fuller reportedly began demonstrating significant numbers of dental healings in 1960. They involved instantaneous filling of cavities with gold, silver, or porcelain, straightening of crooked teeth, and healing of decayed teeth or gums. Eyewitnesses described the paranormal filling as beginning with a small bright spot that rapidly enlarged until it filled the whole cavity. Journalist Bryce Bond (associate editor of the Psychic Observer magazine) testified to witnessing such dental healing and even experienced healing in his own gums. Fuller simply touched the subject on both cheeks at the same time, saying, "In the name of Jesus, be thou whole." Not all the healing was instantaneous, however. Fuller stated that in some cases healing took several days or weeks.

Analysis of some of the gold of these paranormal fillings shows it to be purer than that normally used for dental work. Some subjects even claim that earlier silver fillings turned to gold.

During a demonstration at the Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship summer conference at Wagner College, Staten Island, New York, in 1979, Dr. Audrey Kargere of Stockholm, Sweden, claimed that she received several paranormal gold dental fillings, as well as healing of one leg that had become swollen after a fall.

British psychic Matthew Manning attended one of Fuller's demonstrations in New York with great skepticism, but afterward testified that he witnessed a paranormal filling. He said that one woman had "a very decayed tooth which was black" and he "saw it fill with something white which appeared to be a kind of ceramic substance. When finished, she had a new white tooth." (Bond has stated that several dentists and scientists have witnessed such healing but would not allow their names to be used for testimonies.)

This type of healing is bound to attract skepticism from individuals who have had no firsthand experience of the healing sessions. Such healing goes beyond that claimed by other spiritual healers and is not subject to explanations such as spontaneous remission because the alleged paranormal production of porcelain and rare metals in dental cavities would have to be either fraudulemt or real, with little room for other nonparanormal explanations. There is little written from a scientific perspective. Fuller appeared to be a sincere individual with a simple lifestyle and did not charge a fee for his healing work. His ministry was maintained only by voluntary contributions. Bond claimed that about 25,000 people in the United States experienced Fuller's allegedly miraculous dental healing.

Sources:

St. Clair, David. Psychic Healers. Rev. ed., New York: Bantam Books, 1979.

Denton, William (1823–1883)

William Denton was born in Darlington, England in January of 1823. A professor of geology in Boston who became famous for his research in psychometry, begun for the purpose of controlling Joseph Rhodes Buchanan's experiments. His sister, Anna Denton Cridge, developed the gift of giving descriptions of character, surroundings, and personal appearance—to the color of the hair and eyes—of the writers of letters she held in her hand.

Denton applied this mysterious ability to geology and found that the history of geological specimens passed before the gaze of the seer like a grand panoramic view. Cridge's vision was sometimes rapid, like lightning; sometimes it could be easily followed. All sources of error apparently were carefully excluded. From thousands of experiments conducted from 1853 until his death in 1883, Denton concluded that the existence of psychometric ability is unquestionable.

From a fragment of lava from Kilauea, Hawaii (the sensitive had no idea of the origin and nature), the following picture was sensed:

"I see the ocean and ships are sailing on it. This must be an island, for water is all around. Now I am turned from where I saw the vessels, and am looking at something most terrific. It seems as if an ocean of fire were pouring over a precipice, and boiling as it pours. The sight permeates my whole being, and inspires me with terror. I see it flow into the ocean and the water boils intensely."

A pebble of a limestone, with glacial scratches on its surface, was given to Cridge. She said:

"I feel as if I were below an immense body of water—so deep that I cannot see down through it, and yet it seems that I could see upward through it for miles. Now I am going, going, and there is something above and around me. It must be ice; I am frozen in it. The motion of the mass I am in is not uniform; it pitches forward then halts and pitches again, then goes grinding, pressing and rushing along—a mountain mass.

Fossils and minerals also brought forth lengthy descriptions. In Nature's Secrets (1863), Denton states, "From the first dawn of light upon this infant globe, when round its cradle the stormy curtains hung, Nature has been photographing every moment. What a picture gallery is hers!" A further exposition of his psychometric studies is given in The Soul of Things (1863) and in Our Planet, Its Past and Future (1869).

Denton was also concerned with psychical research, and in 1875 in Boston, working with the medium Mary M. Hardy, he produced what was said to be the impression of a spirit face in paraffin wax. This experiment anticipated the later researches of Gustav Geley and Charles Richet with the medium Franek Kluski.

Denton died in New Guinea on a speaking tour in 1883.

Sources:

Denton, William. Our Planet, Its Past and Future; or, Lectures on Geology. Wellesley, MA: Denton Publishing, 1868.

———. The Soul of Things: Psychometric Experiments for Reliving History. 1863. Reprint, Wellingborough, Northampton, England: Aquarian Press, 1988.

Deoca (or The Woman of the South)

A princess of Munster, mentioned in Irish medieval legend. It is said that she was betrothed to Lairgnen and asked of him as a marriage gift the children of Lir, who had been magically changed by their stepmother into four wonderful singing swans. The hermit who looked after them refused to give them to Lairgnen, who then seized them. When brought into the presence of Deoca they were transformed into their human form—withered, white-haired, miserable beings. The hermit baptized them before they died, and sorrowed for them so much that he himself was laid in their grave.

Department of Personality Studies, University of Virginia

Formerly known as "Division of Parapsychology, University of Virginia," the Department of Personality Studies was established in 1968 to develop a broad program of investigations into various aspects of parapsychology. The founding director was Ian Stevenson, noted for his scientific search for evidence of reincarnation. Address: Division of Personality Studies, Department of Behavioral Medicine & Psychiatry, Box 152, Medical Center, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, VA 22908. (See also Division of Personality Studies, University of Virginia)

Department of Psychology and Parapsychology, Andhra University, India

Established in 1967 by the University Grants Commission of Andhra University, and at the time the only university-level department of parapsychology in the world. Students are admitted for graduate study and a Ph.D. in parapsychology is awarded. Noted parapsychologist K. Ramakrishna Rao headed the department at the time of its founding until he moved to the United States as a staff member of the Institute for Parapsychology in Durham, North Carolina. In 1984 he returned to India for five years and resumed leadership of the department. The department publishes the Psi Newsletter for private circulation. Address: Andhra University, Visakhapatam 530003, Andhra Pradesh, India.

Depossession

Depossession, a term used in past-life therapy, emerged when therapists encountered phenomena not accounted for by reference to past incarnation of their subjects. Depossession is similar to exorcism, but differs in that no reference is implied to demonic spirits. In her research, psychologist Edith Fiore, the person most responsible for developing past-life therapy as a specialization within psychology, discovered that what appeared to be attached spirits were interfering with the exploration of past lives of patients. These spirits are thought to be deceased human beings who have remained in the Earth plane rather than moving on with their life experience. Such deceased spirits commonly attach themselves to a family member, but may also choose a person weakened by alcoholism or drug abuse or a severe illness, or a person with a significant hostility component in his/her personality.

The idea of treating patients with possessing entities echoes the work of rescue circles in Spiritualism. Such work was pioneered by Dr. Charles Wickland and his wife in the early twentieth century and subsequently became a popular practice in the Spiritualist community. Spiritualists moved beyond the idea of demon possession, but placed their work in the context of attempting spirit contact and the continued upward evolution of spirit entities. Wickland was also working at a time when psychological sciences were still in their infancy. In their rescue work, Wickland's wife Anna would operate as a medium and invite the possessing entity to speak through her. Thus, conversation with the entity would not occur through the patient as is the case in past-life therapy.

Like Wickland, Fiore hypothesizes that most possessing entities are deceased humans. Depossession is accomplished by confronting the possessing entity and persuading it to leave. Such entities are seen as attached to the spirit/soul of the patient and may have been attached for many years, the original attachment having occurred during a past incarnation. Fiore's colleagues have noted that some past-life reports that they obtained from patients were in fact the past lives of the possessing entity. On occasion nonhuman entities, described as elementals or evil-natured entities, have been encountered.

Possessing entities account for a range of symptoms from mood swings, chronic pains and illness, or suicidal urges. They frequently are associated with the use of alcohol and mood-altering drugs. Patients are rarely aware of the attached entity, but once "releasement" has occurred, they report positive changes.

Ongoing research based upon the idea of depossession is reported periodically in The Journal of Regression Therapy, a scholarly journal that grew out of therapy based on the idea of treating psychological problems as the product of past lives. Critics have suggested that the past lives that Fiore and her colleagues have elicited from patients, however useful in treatment, do not offer evidence of reincarnation, the fact of the patient's prior existence in another life, or of the existence of possessing entities. The phenomena reported by past-life therapists, similar to forgotten memory syndrome, can as easily be seen as stories that have a certain psychological truth for the patient without providing any objective report on what had actually occurred.

Sources:

Fiore, Edith. The Unquiet Dead: A Psychologist Treats Spirit Possession. Garden City, N.Y.: Dolphin/Doubleday, 1987.

Ireland-Frey, Louise. "Clinical Depossession: Releasement of Attached Entities from Suspecting Hosts." The Journal of Regression Therapy 1, no. 2 (fall 1986): 90–101.

de Rais, Gilles (1404–1440)

Gilles de Rais, a fifteenth-century French military hero, serial killer, and occultist, was born at the chateau de Camptocé, the family estate near Nantes, France. He was the son of Guy XI de Montmorency–Laval, the Baron de Rais, and Marie de Craon. They both died in 1415 when Gilles was 11 years old, and Gilles and his younger brother were placed in the care of their grandfather, Jean de Craon. In 1417 he was betrothed to a rich heiress, Jeanne Peynel, then four years old. However, the arrangement was put aside and in 1419, Gilles was married to Catherine de Thouars, another wealthy heiress. Unfortunately, Catherine was a cousin, and only after a papal dispensation were they remarried in 1422 with the blessing of the church.

During the later 1420s, de Rais began to make a name for himself in the French wars with England, who held Normandy and had advanced south and east. He was among the leaders in the king's army in 1429 when the visionary Jeanne d'Arc appeared and convinced the king that she had a role to play in the wars. She led the French army in the recapture of Orleans and de Rais was at her side when she was wounded. He followed her to Reims and at the subsequent coronation of Charles VII, was an honor guard. At the age of 25, he was named a marshall. The war with England, after initial success, climaxed with the betrayal of the youthful commander and her execution by the British in 1431. During that time, de Rais' streak of cruelty manifested when he ordered the wholesale slaughter of prisoners of war. That same year, his grandfather died and he became master of the family estates.

Now one of the wealthiest men in Europe, following his victory at Lagny he retired to his estate, where he lived an ostentatious life and began to practice alchemy and magic, in part to replenish the money he was spending to support his lavish lifestyle. He also entered into the ranks of world-class villains by his habit of kidnapping and torturing male children. His hero status, wealth, and aristocratic rank kept him protected from any repercussions of his crimes. However, his arrogance and grandiosity caught up with him.

In 1440 he insulted Geoffroi de Ferron, the powerful treasurer of the neighboring province of Brittany by having his brother beaten and imprisoned. As a result of the complaint, de Rais was summoned to an inquiry by the Bishop of Nantes and the Inquisitor General. The man who had been beaten, a priest, charged him with heresy. The charges were later extended to include his practice of black magic and his rape and killing of the children. Those in charge of the prosecution had powerful friends and would be able to confiscate some of de Rais' estate if he were convicted. To increase the body of evidence, both de Rais and his servants were tortured. While much of the evidence would be unacceptable in a modern court, enough was available to convict de Rais of infanticide and murder. The exact number of children he killed will never be known, but several hundred were well documented. Additional hundreds less so. He was executed on October 23, 1440. He would later be called Bluebeard, seemingly because of his black beard that contrasted sharply with his blond hair.

Sources:

Wolf, Leonard. Bluebeard. New York: C. N. Potter, 1980.

Wyndham Lewis, W. D. The Soul of Marshall Gilles de Rais. London: Eyre & Spottiswood, 1952.

Derenberger, Woodrow

Woodrow Derenberger, flying saucer contactee and subject of the book Visitors from Lanulos, claimed to have had a series of strange adventures that began on November 2, 1966. When driving home from Parkersville to his suburban home in Mineralwells, West Virginia, he suddenly found the highway blocked by a large gray object. Someone emerged from the object and walked to the passenger side window of his car. At the same time, the object moved upward some 50 feet. The man introduced himself as a searcher, and brought words of happiness. After noting that he would come again, he stepped back into the object and it rose out of sight. Derenberger went home and told his story to his wife. He then called the police and the press.

Two days later while driving in his car, he began to receive a telepathic communication from the man he had seen earlier. He described himself as from the "galaxy of Ganymede." He also supplied some information about his life, including the observation that people on his planet lived from 125 to 175 Earth years. Over the next weeks, other stories would accumulate that substantiated at least parts of Derenberger's story, including independent UFO sightings on November 4. An initial investigation concluded that Derenberger was not a fraud or hoaxer, but hallucinations could not be ruled out.

Throughout this period Derenberger's direct contacts with the man from Ganymede, whose name was Indrid Cold, continued. He learned much about Cold's people and their desire for friendly contact. He clarified his home as the planet Lanulos from the Ganymede star cluster. In 1967 Cold took Derenberger for a ride in his spaceship. They visited Cold's home planet. On a second visit he walked around the planet and discovered that they wore no clothes.

Derenberger told his story frequently over the next few years and in 1971, with the assistance of Harold W. Hubbard, he authored a book-length account of his adventures, Visitors from Lanulos. His story was also given extended treatment by writer John A. Keel in several books. Through the 1980s he assumed a low profile, though he continued to correspond with a small group of people who believed his accounts. To several of these he sent letters purportedly from Cold and his associates. By this time, ufologists had dismissed his unsubstantiated stories of extraterrestrial contact.

Sources:

Derenberger, Woodrow W., and Harold W. Hubbard. Visitors from Lanulos. New York: Vantage Press, 1971.

Keel, John. Mothman Prophecies. New York: Saturday Review Press/E. P. Dutton, 1975.

———. Strange Creatures from Time and Space. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett Gold Medal, 1970.

———. UFOs: Operation Trojan Horse. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1970.

Dermatoglyphics

Dermatoglyphics, a subdiscipline of palmistry that attempts to discern personality from the study of the epidermal ridges (especially the fingerprints) of the hand, grew out of the study of the papillary ridges on the hands and feet in the 1820s by Johannes Evangelista Purkinje, a Czech physiologist. He developed a nine-pattern classification system of fingerprints, which would be picked up late in the century and applied to the popular use of fingerprints as a means of individual identification by law enforcement.

In 1926, Harold Cummins, a professor of anatomy at Tulane University, coined the term dermatoglyphics, which he first used in a paper in the American Journal of Physical Anthropology. The initial paper grew into a book, Finger Prints, Palms and Soles: An Introduction to Dermatoglyphics (1943). Cummins' work would have been less interesting had he not developed an interest in the psychology revealed in the patterns in the hand and become aware of dactylomancy, the practice of predicting the human condition and even the future by interpreting the loops and whorls of the fingerprints.

Only later did Western scientists become aware that there was a long history in the East of dermatoglyphics and that Western palmists had become interested earlier in the twentieth century. It was mentioned by William Benham in his famous 1900 book, The Laws of Scientific Hand Reading, and became a matter of intensive research by Benham's student, Noel Jaquin, in the 1930s. As early as 1933, he speculated that the whorl pattern that he had found present in an unusually high number of criminals indicated a moral defect in the individual. He eventually developed more neutral psychological associations for each major pattern type. Through the 1950s and 1960s, Jaquin and his associate Beryl Hutchinson at the Society for the Study of Physiological Patterns created a large database of fingerprints to pursue this study. Hutchinson's book, Your Life in Your Hands (1967), was followed in the 1970s by two books by American psychic Beverly Jaegers.

During the last quarter of the twentieth century, numerous works on dermatoglyphics were published and the field became an established part of palmistry. In the more recent works, dermatoglyphics has been integrated into the more popular study of the lines and mounds of the palm rather than used as a separate mean of personality interpretation.

Sources:

Campbell, Edward C. "Fingerprints & Palmar Dermatoglyphics." http://www.edcampbell.com/PalmD-History.htm. May 16, 2000.

Hutchinson, Beryl. Your Life in Your Hands. London: Sphere, 1967.

Jaegers, Beverly C. You and Your Hand. Creve Cour, Mo.: Aries Productions, 1974.

Jaquin, Noel. The Hand of Man. London: Faber, 1933.

Dermography

The psychic phenomenon of skin writing, related to stigmata but with one essential difference—stigmatic writings last for months, years, or throughout a lifetime, whereas skin writing disappears in a few minutes or in a few hours at the most. For that very reason the possibilities of fraud in skin writing are high. Given the sensitive skin of neuropsychopaths, writing may appear in a few minutes after the letters are directly traced by any blunt instrument or the fingernails.

As a preliminary to a skin writing demonstration, or pellet reading, some mediums burn up the pellet on which a name or question is written and rub their arm or forehead with the ashes. The rubbing process may give a good opportunity for covertly tracing the intended message.

However, in at least one case on record this tracing was reportedly done via telekinesis. In 1869 Manuel Eyre testified before a committee of the London Dialectical Society on his experience with a Mrs. Seymour at Waukegan, near Chicago, as follows:

"In trance she would hold out one arm, and with the forefinger of the other hand make a rapid motion as if writing, the movement of the finger being in the air about a foot from the arm; a few minutes after she stripped off her sleeve, and there on her arm, so distinctly written that it could be read across the room, was the peculiar signature of the spirit giving the communication."

According to the American Spiritualist newspaper Spiritual Telegraph, the writing on Seymour's arm appeared in raised letters and could both be seen and felt distinctly for 15 or 20 minutes. Gradually it faded away, leaving the skin natural, smooth and uncolored. Seymour appeared several times before an investigating committee in Milwaukee, but the committee could find no explanation.

In the case of a Miss Coggswell of Vermont, the writing appeared on her arms and forehead in answer to mental questions. Skin markings have also been produced by suggestion in experiments with hypnotism. The part that suggestion may play in such demonstrations was shown in 1933 at the Institute Métapsychique International of Paris, where Olga Kahl produced on her skin a mentally communicated word or image.

Psychologist Richard von Kraft-Ebing recorded that the writing traced on the anesthetic right side of d'Ilma S. appeared reversed on the left side.

Thomas Killigrew testified to the appearance of the names of St. Joseph and the Virgin upon the hands of the prioress of the Ursuline nuns at Loudun in France about the year 1635. He said, "I saw her hand, white as my hand, in an instant change color all along the vein and become red and all of a sudden a word distinctly appeared, and the word was Joseph."

During a period of religious revival in Northern Ireland, writing on the skin was a common occurrence.

In the case of mediums, the demonstration of skin writing, while interesting, is of little value for contemporary parapsychology because of the variety of mundane ways in which it can be produced. It was reported occasionally in the nineteenth-century Spiritualist press, however. British medium Stainton Moses reported October 12, 1873, that the following names appeared on his arm: "Imperator," "Mentor," "Solon" and "Plato." Solon's name was impressed with a capital Sigma. The names were those of Moses' spirit controls. Charles H. Foster, "the Salem Seer," gave abundant demonstrations of the phenomenon. Before the London Dialectical Society, Edward Laman Blanchard told the story of how the name of his father appeared in red letters on the arm of the medium and immediately afterward, in answer to a question, the number 24 appeared on the palm of his hand, indicating the number of years since his father's death. The phenomenon was very rapid, the letters and numbers disappearing in the sight of those present without the arm of the medium being withdrawn. A Dr. Ashburner examined Foster's skin letters under a magnifying glass. He observed clearly that they were in relief and that the coloring matter was under the skin. The color disappeared after two or three minutes.

Foster's biographer, George C. Bartlett, described an amusing incident. A certain Mr. Adams came to consult Foster. He saw the room was filled with spirits in Foster's presence. About two o'clock the next morning he woke up, complaining to Bartlett that he could not sleep because the room was still filled with spirits of the Adams family. They were writing their names all over the seer. To his astonishment Bartlett counted 11 distinct names, one written across Foster's forehead, others on his arms, and several on his back.

In 1926 psychical researcher Harry Price carried out a series of careful tests on the psychic Eleonore Zügun and obtained stigmatic marking phenomena under laboratory conditions.

On occasion, skin writing is pictographic. One such case was reported in the American Spiritual Telegraph regarding the appearance of a clearly defined human heart with a wound, as if made by a bullet, on the arm of one Coggewell in answer to the request by a sitter that his friend, who died when shot in the heart, should manifest.

A more graphic phenomenon was exhibited in New England by an African-American woman then working as a servant to Lewis Burtis. As narrated by Emma Hardinge Britten in Modern American Spiritualism (1870), red lines had formed "into a distinct and beautifully-represented picture of a kneeling man, with a woolly head and African cast of features, a chain round his waist terminating in two balls, which were ingeniously fitted into the veins at the end of the arm, whilst above the whole was written in fine character the words: 'A poor old slave.'&43" The woman servant was nearly illiterate. Messages frequently appeared on her arm while she was at her household work and would disappear after having been read by the Burtises.

Dermography differs from stigmata, where as, for example in the case of Thérèse Neumann and Padre Pio, actual bleeding appeared on their hands and feet, indicating identification with the suffering of Christ. Stigmata reproduces the wounds of Christ as reported in the Bible's New Testament.

Dermot of the Love-spot (Dermot O'Dyna)

A typical lover in Irish legend and the hero of the myth of Dermot and Grania. One night Dermot and three companions entered a hut for a night's shelter. In the hut lived an old man, a young girl (Youth), a wether (the World), and a cat (Death). During the night, the girl put the love-spot on Dermot's forehead, and thenceforth, it was said, no woman could see him without loving him. He came to be loved by Grania, the betrothed of Finn Mac Cummal, and she forced him to run away with her.

The couple was pursued all over Ireland, but after 16 years of outlawry, Dermot was allowed to return to his patrimony. He was killed by his stepbrother, who through an enchantment had taken the form of Bulben, the Boar of Ben. His body was borne away on a gilded bier by the people of Dana, and it was given a soul by Angus Og, the Irish god of love, so that he might return each day and talk with the god. Dermot may represent the sun in this legend, and the bearing away of his body may symbolize the sunset.

Dero

"Detrimental Robot"—a term coined by writer Richard Shaver to indicate malevolent dwarfs living in underground caverns. In his story "I Remember Lemuria," first published as a series in Amazing Stories beginning in March 1945 (and reprinted in The Hidden World in the 1960s), the deros used advanced machinery to harass human beings. This series of stories, which hypothesized a hollow earth and underground civilization, was presented as fact rather than fiction and stimulated paranoid fantasies on the part of many readers.

Sources:

Palmer, Ray. "Invitation to Adventure." The Hidden World A–1 (Spring 1961): 4–14.

Shaver, Richard. "I Remember Lemuria." Amazing Stories March 1945. Reprinted in The Hidden World A–1 (Spring 1961): 52–134.

De Rupecissa, Johannes (or Jean de Roquetaillade) (d. ca. 1362)

Alchemist and ancestor of Montfauçon, the distinguished archaeologist. His name suggests that he was a man of gentle birth, while it is commonly supposed that he was a French monk of the order of St. Francis.

In 1357, presumably because of his alchemistic predilections, De Rupecissa was imprisoned by Pope Innocent VI. Much mystery surrounded his life and death. Some said he was released from prison in 1378 by Pope Urban VI, others that he died in prison. Another rumor was that he was burned at the stake in 1362.

De Rupecissa contributed four volumes to the literature of alchemy and hermetic philosophy: Coelum Philosophorum (1543), De Quinta Essentia Rerum Omniam (1561), De Secretis Alchemiae (1579), and Livre de Lumière (n.d.). These were admired by a number of the author's successors, but their value is literary rather than scientific.

Dervishes

A subgroup within Sufism, the mystical movement in Islam distinguished by a form of ecstatic whirling dance. When first observed by Westerners they were described as the "whirling dervishes." The word dervish indicates a poor man, religious mendicant, or ecstatic. The dervishes follow a semiesoteric doctrine. Their various "paths" or systems may date back as far as the ancient rites of Persia and Egypt.

The Bektash Sufis offer a representative example of the dervishes. In the fifteenth century Bektash of Bokhara received his mantle from Ahmed Yesevee, who claimed descent from the father-in-law of Mohammed. Bektash established a "path" to spiritual truth consisting nominally of seven degrees, only four of which, however, were essential. These aimed to establish an affinity between the aspirant and the sheik, the latter leading the aspirant, through the agency of the spirit of Bektash, and that of Mohammed, to Allah.

The initiation ceremony provided a severe test. The aspirant was tried for a year with false secrets. When his time of probation expired, a lamb was slain, from the carcass of which a cord was made for his neck and a girdle for his loins. Two armed attendants then led him into a square chamber, where he was presented to the sheik as "a slave who desires to know truth." He was then placed before a stone altar, on which were 12 scallops.

The sheik, attended by 11 others, gripped the hand of the aspirant in a particular way and administered the oath of the order, in which the neophyte promised to be poor, chaste, and obedient. The aspirant was then informed that the penalty for betraying the order was death. He then stated, "Mohammed is my guide, Ali [Mohammed's son-in-law] is my director," and was asked by the sheik, "Do you accept me as your guide?" The reply being made in the affirmative, the sheik added, "Then I accept you as my son."

Among the Bektosh sect's important symbols were the double triangles and two triangles joined at the apex. One of their maxims was, The man must die that the saint may be born. For a jewel they made use of a small marble cube with red spots, to typify the blood of the martyred Ali.

The dervish sects were held suspect by many orthodox Moslems, who said they devoted themselves entirely to the well-being of their order rather than to Islam as a whole.

The whirling dervishes originated in Konya, on the Anatolian plateau of Turkey. They were organized by Jalal al-din Rumi (born in Afghanistan in 1207), also known to his disciples as Mevlana (Our Master). Rumi was a theological scholar who came under the spiritual influence of the wandering dervish Shams Tabriz. Tabriz was murdered by disciples who were jealous of Rumi's devotion. After this, Rumi adopted the mourning costume of the period (tall felt hat, white skirt, and black cloak) and gyrated in his garden, repeating the name of God until he passed into an ecstatic trance.

Rumi's dance became the basis of the sema, a sacred ceremony of the dervishes that has survived into modern times. It commences with the sound of a reed flute, symbolizing a longing for reunion. The costume worn is also regarded as symbolic of the tomb, the shroud, and the tombstone. The floor is said to indicate the Last Judgment. The whirling dance itself symbolizes the movement of the planets in relation to the sun (represented by the sheik, who supervises the dance).

The whirling dervishes are also known as Mevlevis, and their organization has recently spread to other parts of the world through a revival of interest in Sufi doctrines. Today there are British and American Sufis who have learned to practice the sema.

Sources:

Brown, John P. The Darvishes; or Oriental Spiritualism. London, 1927. Rev. ed., London: Frank Cass, 1968.

Burke, O. M. Among the Dervishes. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1973.

Farzan, Massud. The Tale of the Reed Pipe. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1974.

Friedlander, Ira. The Whirling Dervishes. New York: Macmillan, 1975.

Desertis, V. C.

Pseudonym of Stanley De Brath for his book Psychic Philosophy (1909).

Desmond, Gerald (d. 1583)

Sixteenth earl of Desmond, in Ireland, who was killed in 1583. He had some reputation as a magician and was known as "the Great Earl." Many curious stories have been told about him.

He lived in a castle on a small island in Lough Gur, and there he took his young bride, to whom he was so passionately attached that he could deny her nothing. Seeking him one day in the chamber where he worked his magic spells, she demanded to know the secret of the black cat. In vain he told her of the terrible things she must witness. She would not be dissuaded, so he warned her solemnly that if she uttered a word the castle would sink to the bottom of Lough Gur. Then he set to work with his magic spells.

Terrible indeed were the sights she beheld, but she stood firm and uttered neither word nor cry, until her husband lay down on the floor and stretched till he reached almost from end to end of the room. Then she uttered a wild shriek, and the castle sank instantly to the bottom of Lough Gur, where it still remains.

The legend says that once in every seven years Desmond, mounted on a white horse, rises from the water and rides around the Lough. His horse is shod with silver shoes, and when they wear out the spell will be broken. Desmond will return, and his vast estates will be restored to him.

Desmond, Shaw (1877–1960)

Irish novelist and dramatist, born on January 19, 1877, who studied psychic phenomena for 25 years. He was president of the Survival League and once said that he believed it impossible for anything to stop him from surviving. He was an eloquent propagandist of Spiritualism and lectured around the world. Three of his books, Passion, Gods, and Echo, have a psychic background, while Tales of the Little Sisters of Saint Francis is based on the author's experience with fairies. Windjammer: The Book of the Horn is an account of a 7,000-mile journey, undertaken partly to study black magic.

Desmond was born in county Waterford, Ireland, January 19, 1877, and was educated by Irish monks. At the age of 15 he left school to go into business in London, but returned to Ireland to farm. In 1909 he concentrated on literature and journalism. He founded the short-lived International Institute for Psychical Research, and wrote more than 60 books, many of which have psychic themes. He died December 23, 1960.

Sources:

Desmond, Shaw. Healing: Psychic and Divine. London: Rider, 1956. Reprinted as The Power of Faith Healing. New York: Award Books, 1969.

———. Ragnarok. N.p., 1926.

———. Reincarnation for Everyman. N.p., 1939.

———. Spiritualism? N.p., 1941.

———. We Do Not Die. N.p., 1934.

———. You Can Speak With Your Dead. N.p., 1941.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

D'Espagnet, Jean (ca. 1640)

A Hermetic philosopher who left two treatises, Enchiridion Physicae Restitutae (1623) and Arcanum Philosophiae Hermitacae (ca. 1623), which were also said to be the works of one who called himself "the Chevalier Imperial." The Secret of Hermetic Philosophy embraces the practical side of the magnum opus, and the Enchiridion explores the physical possibility of transmutation of metals. D'Espagnet also wrote the preface to the Tableau de l'inconstance des démons by Pierre De Lancre.

The Arcanum is better known as The Canons of Espagnet and has been called a treatise on mystical alchemy. The author states, however, that "the science of producing Nature's grand Secret is a perfect knowledge of nature universally and of Art, concerning the realm of Metals; the practice whereof is conversant in finding the principles of Metals by analysis."

The authorities cited by D'Espagnet were those who, like Bernard Trévisan, are known to have devoted their lives to practical alchemy. While much of the treatise discusses physical objects, it may also be extended to the psychic side of the hermetic or alchemical art.

D'Esperance, Elizabeth (1855–1919)

Pseudonym of Elizabeth Hope Reed, a nonprofessional medium, the story of whose life and work was recounted by William Oxley in Angelic Revelations (1885) and by Reed in her autobiography Shadow Land (1897). The latter work is particularly important for the account of her own experiences. In his preface, Russian psychical researcher Alexander Aksakof describes the book as the frank but sorrowful story of the author's search for the truth at the mercy of unknown but potent powers.

Born Elizabeth Hope, her earliest recollections included seeing (in the ancient house where the family lived) "strangers" continually passing to and fro, some of whom nodded and smiled as she held up her doll for their inspection. These shadow people were her earliest friends. She did not associate them with ghosts, of which she was told frightful tales by the maid. For her there was nothing supernatural about them, although they shrank from her touch and she could not feel anything if her hand came into contact with them. They for months at a time vanished and on the whole they made her life miserable. Her mother discouraged her telling "stories" of unseen visitors, and the family doctor terrorized her by warning that those who see things that do not exist are usually mad and become dangerous.

A long cruise in 1867 on a boat that her father captained was the brightest recollection of her teens. The sleepwalking that had troubled her earlier was now cured and the shadow people stayed away, but the happiness that was hers for many weeks was finally marred by the terrifying vision of a shadow ship that passed right through their own.

Another unusual experience befell her later at the end of the school term. She had to write an essay on "nature." She could not manage a single thought. The last night came and even then she went to bed in despair, praying in tears and crying until she fell asleep, leaving sheets of paper and some pencils littered across her desk. In the morning she found the sheets covered with her own handwriting, containing an astonishing essay on the subject. The teacher was greatly surprised by the quality of the essay, and when she heard the story she spoke to the rector about it. On examination day, the rector himself read the essay and explained it as a direct answer to prayer.

At age 19, she married and settled at Newcastle-on-Tyne, England. After her marriage the shadow people came back into her life. By chance she heard of Spiritualism and table rapping, which she then considered tomfoolery. Challenged by a friend, she sat in a circle of six. The table soon began to vibrate, heave, and answer questions. It even disclosed the unknown whereabouts of her father, which was found afterward to be correct.

More extraordinary phenomena followed. A pair of studs disappeared from before their eyes and from information rapped out by the table they were found in the next room beneath the undisturbed, compacted soil in a flower pot. The wanderings of these studs amazed the circle. Once they were found in a locked Japanese box on a high shelf; another time they dropped from the ceiling into the cup of a guest at coffee time.

An experiment in clairvoyance was crowned with remarkable success. Reed's eyes were covered by a Mr. F. in the dark and she described an incident in his life that occurred 12 years earlier. She recognized him in the vision.

Her interest was now thoroughly aroused. She spoke of the shadow people to friends, and though the idea that she was a medium was at first repugnant to her, she agreed to play the part. It was suggested that she should attempt automatic writing to establish a more efficient means of communication. It soon came about with a tingling, pricking, and aching sensation in her arm, and thereafter the circle reported contact with spirit visitors: "Walter Tracey," a bright, jovial American, "Humnur Stafford," the self-constituted philosopher guide, and "Ninia," a child of seven. The control of each could be distinguished by the sensation in Reed's arm and hand.

The next phase of her development came when she saw a luminous cloud concentrated in the darkness of the room slowly evolve into the form of a child. No one else could see the strange apparition that she sketched, but the new development was hailed with delight. People soon began to talk about it in Newcastle and overwhelmed d'Esperance (the name she began to use in her new public life) with requests for the portraits of their dead friends. To better her art she studied for a few months, but as her sketching improved her power of seeing the luminous figures diminished and violent headaches followed the attempts at drawing.

Then T. P. Barkas, an intellectual of Newcastle, joined the circle. One evening he introduced a series of popular lectures on science, illustrated with practical experiments which he intended to deliver. The medium's hand passed remarks through automatic writing that claimed the theories advocated by Barkas were wrong.

This was the beginning of a scientific period of mediumship that lasted for several months. Hammer Stafford described in detail an instrument that proved later to be the telephone, and another by which messages could be forwarded to great distances in the original handwriting. Barkas delivered his lectures and closed them with one titled "Recent Experiments in Psychology: Extraordinary Replies to Questions on Scientific Subjects by a Young Lady of Very Limited Education."

After a year, the medium's failing health put an end to the scientific séances. She went to the south of France to recuperate. On her recovery she became filled with the missionary spirit, but in trying to make converts for the new truth of Spiritualism that she had glimpsed, she discovered—to her dismay—that the psychic powers could not be consciously summoned. Her ability to write on scientific subjects appeared to fail, and her clairvoyant faculty became feeble when conscious exhibition was needed.

Yet she achieved one result—the reconciliation between a Professor Friese of Bremen and Johann Zöllner. The alienation had taken place when Zöllner accepted Spiritualism. It was Zöllner who wrote to Friese about her. As a result she spent weeks in the professor's house. One day he publicly declared that he had become a Spiritualist, resigned his chair, and began to write books, later published under the titles Jenseits des Grabens and Stimmen aus der Geister Reich. A visit to Bremen by d'Esperance was followed by a long stay in Sweden. A new line of experiment was tried there. She read letters, written in various languages and enclosed in seven envelopes, the words of which she had to spell out letter by letter. This power also fluctuated, and determined efforts usually resulted in failure.

It was here that she first tried to sit for materialization. In the darkness of the cabinet, she reported, she soon became conscious of a curious disturbance; the air seemed to be agitated as though a bird were fluttering about and at the second attempt she felt as if fine threads were being drawn out of the pores of her skin.

A face was seen by the sitters outside the curtains, but she did not see it from within. So she stood up, feeling her knees strangely weak, put her head out, and above her head she recognized the merry, laughing eyes of "Walter." During a six-week trial Walter learned the art of full materialization.

During his visits she felt strangely listless. Thoughts and impressions swirled like lightning through her brain. She was conscious of the thoughts and feelings of everyone in the room. While d'Esperance was in this state any movement required a great effort, which invariably compelled the materialized forms to retire into the cabinet, as though deprived of power to stand or support themselves.

"Yolande," a young Arab girl of 15, soon made an appearance and remained a constant visitor. She was inquisitive and continually mystified her audience by making things in the room invisible and producing a variety of apports in the form of flowers and plants. It took her about ten to fifteen minutes to build up her body from a cloudy patch on the floor, while the process of melting away usually took place in two to five minutes, the drapery being the last to disappear, in one-half to two minutes.

Yolande's flower apports were very strange. She usually asked in advance for water, sand, and a water carafe. After the water and sand were mixed in the carafe she covered it with a part of her drapery. In a séance held on August 4, 1880, an exotic plant grew up in the carafe. It was an Ixora crocata, 22 inches high, with a thick woody stem that filled the neck of the bottle, the roots firmly planted inside the glass. The natural home of this plant is India. It was produced for William Oxley of Manchester, and it lived for three months in his gardener's care.

Sitters frequently brought fern leaves and asked Yolande to match them. She always complied. Roses were produced from nothing and freely given away. Yolande's last and greatest work was achieved on June 28, 1890, when she apported a seven-foot high golden lily with 11 blossoms. The feat was witnessed by Professors Boutlerof, Fiedler, Aksakof, and others. The power was not sufficient for its dematerialization (Yolande insisted that the plant was borrowed and she had to return it), and she instructed the sitters to keep it in darkness. The lily remained in the house for eight days and then vanished in an instant, filling the room with an overpowering perfume.

Materialization Fraud

Bitter experiences were also in store for d'Esperance. The first befell her in Newcastle in 1880. It came after observations that one of the materialized phantoms, "the French lady," bore a bewildering resemblance to the medium.

A suspicious sitter seized the form of Yolande while the medium was believed sitting inside the cabinet. D'Esperance describes her experience when this occurred:

"All I knew was a horrible excruciating sensation of being doubled up and squeezed together, as I can imagine a hollow gutta percha doll would feel, if it had sensation, when violently embraced by its baby owner. A sense of terror and agonizing pain came over me, as though I was losing hold of life and was falling into some fearful abyss, yet knowing nothing, hearing nothing, except the echo of a scream I heard as at a distance. I felt I was sinking down, I knew not where. I tried to save myself, to grasp at something, but missed it; and then came a blank from which I awakened with a shuddering horror and sense of being bruised to death."

The result of this experience was the outbreak of the earlier hemorrhage of her lungs and a prolonged illness. In Sweden, after her recovery, successful photographic experiments were conducted to obtain portraits of the materialized entities and spirit photographs without a formal séance. These experiments proved to be a drain on her nervous energy, so they were dropped after a while.

In the later materialization séances she invariably observed the rule of sitting before the cabinet and exhibiting herself and the phantom at the same time. Her unique description of double identity dates from these days and reads:

"Now comes another figure, shorter, slenderer, and with out-stretched arms. Somebody rises up at the far end of the circle and comes forward and the two are clasped in each other's arms. Then inarticulate cries of "Anna! Oh, Anna! My child! My loved one!

"Then somebody else gets up and puts her arms round the figure; then sobs, cries and blessings get mixed up. I feel my body swayed to and fro and all gets dark before my eyes. I feel somebody's arms round me although I sit on my chair alone. I feel somebody's heart beating against my breast. I feel that something is happening. No one is near me except the two children. No one is taking any notice of me. All eyes and thoughts seem concentrated on the white slender figure standing there with the arms of the two black-robed women around it.

"It must be my own heart I feel beating so distinctly. Yet those arms round me? Surely never did I feel a touch so plainly. I begin to wonder which is I. Am I the white figure or am I the one in the chair? Are they my hands round the old lady's neck, or are these mine that are lying on the knees of me, or on the knees of the figure if it be not I, on the chair?

"Certainly they are my lips that are being kissed. It is my face that is wet with the tears which these good women are shedding so plentifully. Yet how can it be? It is a horrible feeling, thus losing hold of one's identity. I long to put one of these hands that are lying so helplessly, and touch some one just to know if I am myself or only a dream—if Anna be I, and I am lost as it were, in her identity."

In 1893 at the house of a Professor E. of Christiana, an Egyptian beauty calling herself "Nepenthes," materialized in the midst of the circle and was seen at the same time with the medium. At the sitters' request she dipped her hand into a paraffin wax bucket and left behind a plaster mold of rare beauty, which the modeler said must have been produced by sorcery as it was obviously impossible to extricate the hand from the wax glove without ruining it.

Nepenthes vanished from their presence as she came. She lowered her head, on which a diadem shone, little by little became a luminous cloud, and gradually faded away. Before her disappearance she wrote a message in her own hand in ancient Greek in the pocketbook of one of the sitters. All present were ignorant of ancient Greek letters. The translation read: "I am Nepenthes thy friend; when thy soul is oppressed by too much pain, call on me, Nepenthes, and I will come at once to relieve thy trouble."

From time to time d'Esperance felt greatly troubled. The theories of subliminal consciousness and orthodox religious objections that the phenomena had to do with the devil disturbed her to a growing extent. An out-of-the-body travel experience, however, enlightened her; she realized the great truth behind the phenomenal side of Spiritualism and, fortified in courage, continued her missionary work.

Three times her life was endangered because of injuries received by those who tried to catch her in fraud. The worst experience befell her in Helsingfors in 1893, when an attempt to violate Yolande caused nearly two years of indisposition, turning her hair white and grey.

The outrage followed the most enigmatic phenomenon of her mediumship: the partial dematerialization of her body from the waist down. Aksakof made an investigation and, with the testimonies of those present, published the full story in his book A Case of Partial Dematerialization (1898). This alleged phenomenon occurred on the evening of December 11, 1893, at the house of a Professor Seiling, with some 15 people present at the séance.

Fourteen years later, Hereward Carrington published a lengthy criticism of the case in the Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research (March 1907), which was answered by James H. Hyslop. Carrington discussed how the incident might have been achieved by trickery. If d'Esperance was using deception, she was never caught.

Materialization mediumship has largely disappeared under the impact of numerous revelations of fraud and the inability of mediums to produce such phenomena as described in relation to d'Esperance under controlled conditions with competent observers. At best, her case must remain open, though there is every reason to believe that she simply was never caught.

In addition to many articles she wrote for the Spiritualist press, d'Esperance wrote two books, Shadow Land (1897) and Northern Lights (1900), the latter a collection of psychic stories and experiences. At the outbreak of the World War I d'Esperance found herself virtually a prisoner in Germany, where she then resided. All her papers were seized, among them the manuscript of a second volume to Shadow Land. It was destroyed, probably along with a quantity of séance reports in shorthand.

Sources:

Aksakof, Alexander. A Case of Partial Dematerialization. N.p., 1898.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Carrington, Hereward. "An Examination and Analysis of the Evidence for Dematerialization as Demonstrated in Mons. Aksakof's Book." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (March 1907).

Oxley, William. Angelic Revelations. 5 vols. N.p., 1885.

Dessoir, Max (1867–1947)

German psychologist who had a special interest in parapsychology—he coined the term during or before 1889. He also had both talent and interest in art and aesthetics. A precocious child, he was an accomplished musician who played the violin for the German emperor. His experiments in muscle reading and thought-transference were undertaken in 1885 at the age of 18 and reported in the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (1885). Three years later he founded the Gesellschaft fur Experimental Psychologie (Society for Experimental Psychology), dedicated to the study of hypnosis and paranormal phenomena.

Dessoir collaborated with Albert Moll on experiments in hypnotic rapport. He originated a theory of "Doppel-Ich" or double ego, suggesting that human consciousness is not a unit merely to our own consciousness, but actually consists of at least two distinguishable personalities, each held together by its own chain of memories. Because of this, an action that is quite intelligible can be performed unconsciously (i.e., without the agent noticing what he or she is doing, or even breaking off a conversation).

As he matured, Dessoir saw himself as an instrument for educating the German public on psychical research. He founded the periodical Zeitschrift für kritischen Okkultismus and wrote Vom Jenseits der Seele (1917). He also investigated several mediums including Eusapia Palladino.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Dessoir, Max. Aesthetics and the Theory of Art. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1970.

———. Einleitung in die Philosophie. N.p., 1946.

———. "Experiments in Muscle-Reading and Thought-Transference." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 4 (1889): 111.

———. Das Ich, der Traum, der Tod. N.p., 1947.

———. Psychologische Briefe. N.p., 1948.

———. Die Rede als Kunst. N.p., 1948.

Hövelman, G. H. "Neglected Figures in the History of Parapsychology. I. Some General Reflections." In Liber Amicorum in Honoue of G. A. M. Zorab, edited by F. W. J. J. Snel. Amsterdam: Nederlander Vereniging voor Parapsychologie, 1986.

De Tonquedec, Joseph (1868–1962)

Jesuit priest and writer on parapsychology. De Tonquedec was born December 27, 1868, at Morlaix (Finistère), France. He received his doctorate in philosophy in 1899 and his doctorate in theology in 1905. He was the professor of philosophy at Collège St. Grégoire, Tours, from 1899 to 1901. He died November 21, 1962.

Sources:

De Tonquedec, Joseph. La Critique de la connaissance (Criticism of knowledge). N.p., n.d.

———. Introduction a l'étude du merveilleux et du miracle (Introduction to the study of the marvelous and the miracle). N.p., n.d.

———. Maladies neuveuses ou mentales et manifestations diaboliques (Nervous or mental diseases and diabolical manifestations). N.p., n.d.

———. Merveilleux métapsychique et miracle Chrétien (The marvelous in parapsychology and the Christian miracle). N.p., n.d.

———. La Notion de Verite dans la "Philosophie Nouvelle" (The concept of truth in the "new philosophy"). N.p., n.d.

———. La Philosophie de la natur (Philosophy of nature). N.p., n.d.

De Tromelin Cylinder

A device for the detection of psychic forces was invented by the Count de Tromelin at the opening of the twentieth century. A paper cylinder with a crosspiece of straw revolves on a fine point when a human hand is in the vicinity or when the operator wills the device to move. It is also known as the fluid motor.

Many variant devices of this kind have been made to demonstrate the supposed action of psychic force or willpower on a lightly suspended object. One such indicator is a square of paper, folded across the diagonals so that it can revolve on a firmly fixed needle point.

One problem with all such devices is the lack of controls to exclude the possibility of the movement being caused by air currents or the heat of the operator's hand. The most impressive devices are those enclosed within a glass cover to exclude air movements (see sthenometer).

One very interesting instrument of this kind was developed by the British physician Charles Russ and was described by him in the July 3, 1931, issue of the respected British medical journal the Lancet as "An Instrument Which is Set in Motion by Vision." (See also biometer of Baraduc; magnetometer)

Sources:

Russ, Charles. "An Instrument Which is Set in Motion by Vision." Lancet, July 3, 1931.

"Deuce Take You"

A saying of ancient origin. Deuce is practically synonymous with the devil, the word being derived from Dusins, the ancient name given by the Gauls to a sort of demon or devil.

Deunov, Peter Konstantinov (1864–1944)

Peter Konstantinov Deunov, Bulgarian esotericist and founder of the White Brotherhood, was born on July 11, 1864, in Hadurcha (now Nikolaevka), Bulgaria, the son of an Orthodox priest. He received his elementary education locally, but went to secondary school in Varna and the American School of Theology and Science in Svishtov, from which he graduated in 1886. He taught school for two years before leaving for the United States, where he studied theology at Drew Theological Seminary and Boston University (both Methodist schools). After completing his course in 1893, he took a year of medicine before returning to Bulgaria in 1895.

Deunov had already decided upon his life work as an independent spiritual teacher. He prepared himself with five years of seclusion in study and meditation. In the United States he had encountered the Rosicrucians and was also conscious of the Bogomil heritage in his own land. His first book, Science and Education, appeared in 1896. The following year he had a mystical initiation experience and assumed the spiritual name by which he would be commonly known, Beinsa Douno. With only two students, in 1900 he organized the White Brotherhood. He also began to prepare lesson material offering a broad introduction to occultism. This was bolstered by material he received through his own meditations, the first such sets being published as the Seven Conversations with the Spirit of God and The Three Things, both issued in 1900.

In 1914 he proclaimed the advent of the Age of Aquarius and increasingly shifted his teaching activity to Sofia, the capital. It being wartime, his activities came under official scrutiny, and signs of tension with authorities appeared. In August of 1915, the annual meeting was disrupted and Douno expelled from the town in which it was held. In 1917, the Holy Synod of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church pressured the authorities to have the brotherhood expelled from Sofia. Finally in 1922, in response to Douno's opening a School of the Great White Brotherhood in Sofia, the church excommunicated Douno and many of his followers.

Through the 1920s and 1930s, the brotherhood expanded and Douno continued to teach and write. Also, many of his lectures were taken down in shorthand and transcribed. He began a periodical, Wheat Grain, in 1924 and opened a center called The Sunrise, outside of Sofia in 1926. In 1934 he instituted a cycle of 28 exercises, body movements with accompanying music, which he called paneurhythmy.

In 1936 he was able to extend his work to the West, when a center opened in Paris. Douno continued to teach until his death in 1944. The emergence of a Marxist government would dampen the movement in the years after World War II (1939–45). The headquarters and printing press were taken over by the government for its own use. In 1957 all of Douno's books were confiscated. It was not until the 1970s that meetings began to be held again and the outward work of the order revived. Concurrently, Douno's teachings were revived in France and the United States. However, in the meanwhile, one of his students, Omraam Michael Aivanhov, who had been sent by Douno to France in 1937, organized a separate organization, now known as the Universal Great Brotherhood, to carry forward the teachings. Today, in the West, most people are aware of Douno through Aivanhov's movement.

Douno's Bulgarian followers have translated a number of his works into English, the first of which appeared in the 1960s. Most recently, they developed an extensive Internet presence anchored by the official site at http://www.vega.bg/~beinsa_douno/.

Sources:

Douno, Beinsa. The Master Speaks: The Word of the Great White Brotherhood. Los Angeles: Sunrise Press & Books, 1970.

———. Reminiscences: Talks with the Master. Los Angeles: Sunrise Press, 1968.

———. The Teachings of Beinsa Douno: Pearls of Love. Glasgow: Beyond the Rising Sun Publications, n.d.

Deva-Loka (or Daiver-Logum)

The world of Hindu gods, especially Indra, also known as Swarga. Said to be situated between the sun and polar star, it is a region of splendor and magnificence, inhabited by many gods, nature spirits, and angels.

Devas (or Daivers)

Hindu gods, who inhabit their world of Deva-Loka. The term derives from the root div (to shine) and may be related to the Persian divs. Indra was foremost among the ancient Hindu gods and Deva-Loka was his heaven. In later mythology, Indra became inferior to Agni, Vayu, and Surya, but remained in power over other gods and spirits. The Deva-Loka of the gods included many nature spirits and angels.

According to theosophical teachings (which partially derive from Hinduism) devas constitute the ranks or orders of spirits who compose the hierarchy that rules the universe under the deity. Their numbers are vast and their functions are not all known to mankind, though generally these functions may be said to be connected with the evolution of systems and of life.

Of devas there are three kinds—bodiless devas, form devas, and passion devas. Bodiless devas belong to the higher mental world; their bodies are composed of mental elemental essence, and they belong to the first elemental kingdom. Form devas belong to the lower mental world; while their bodies are composed also of mental elemental essence, they belong to the second elemental kingdom. Passion devas belong to the astral world and their bodies are composed of astral elemental essence. Devas are superlatively great and glorious creatures; they have vast knowledge and power, are calm yet irresistible, and are in appearance altogether magnificent.

Devas at Findhorn

Devas came into Western thought in a powerful way at the New Age community of Findhorn. In 1963, while struggling to survive in the trailer camp that would later become the community site, Peter and Eileen Caddy and Dorothy MacLean were gardening. In her meditations that spring, MacLean's attention was called to the presence of the forces of nature. She was told to cooperate with nature by thinking about the higher nature spirits, the spirits of different forms from the clouds to the varieties of different plants.

Getting over some initial skepticism, she made contact and began to receive instructions from the devas that allowed them to produce a spectacular garden in the spartan conditions of northern Scotland. Over the next few years hundreds of messages were received and published from the devas which also began to articulate a philosophy of the wholeness of creation.

Sources:

Findhorn Community. The Findhorn Garden. New York: Harper & Row, 1975.

Hawken, Paul. The Magic of Findhorn. New York: Harper & Row, 1975.

MacLean, Dorothy. To Hear the Angels Sing. Middleton, WI: Lorian Press, 1980.

Devereux, George (1908–1985)

Professor of research in ethnopsychiatry, author, and editor who engaged in parapsychological research. He was born September 13, 1908, in Lugos, Hungary. He studied at the School of Oriental Languages in Paris and the Institute of Ethnology, University of Paris (Ph.D., Anthropology, 1935), and later at the University of California and the Topeka Institute for Psychoanalysis, Topeka, Kansas. After World War II he accepted a position as the director of research and staff ethnologist at Winter Veterans Hospital. Subsequently he became a professor of research in ethnopsychiatry, at Temple University School of Medicine, Philadelphia.

In addition to his many publications in anthropology and psychology, Devereaux made several contributions to parapsychology. He edited the important volume Psychoanalysis and the Occult (1953) and contributed a variety of articles on levitation, Haitian voudou, superstitions, and dreams–many of which grew out of his early anthropological fieldwork—to parapsychological journals.

Devereux died in May of 1985.

Sources:

Devereux, George. Basic Problems of Psychiatry. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980.

———. "Bridey Murphy, a Psychoanalytic View." Tomorrow (Summer 1956).

Devereux, George, ed. Psychoanalysis and the Occult. New York: International Universities Press, 1953.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

De Vesme, Count Cesar Baudi (1862–1938)

A distinguished European author and psychical researcher, de Vesme was born November 12, 1862, in Turin, Italy. He was secretary general of the Société des Amis de l'Institut Métapsychique Internationale (Paris) from 1934 to 1938. He was drawn to the study of psychical phenomena upon reading the narrative of the following incident:

"One night in 1871 cries of despair were heard from M. de M.'s mother. She was found in a state of terror, declaring that she was carried by spirits to the foot of her bed. At seven o'clock the following morning Col. Daviso, a stranger [,] called. He was informed at a spiritistic séance that the spirits were about to play a trick upon a lady in the house of M. de M. He came to verify the information."

In 1898, after the death of Giovanni Ermacora, the renowned psychical researcher Cesare Lombroso entrusted de Vesme with the editorship of the Rivista di Studi Psichici. He arranged for a simultaneous French edition under the title Revue des Etudes Psychiques which he also edited. In 1905 this journal was merged with the Annales des Sciences Psychiques, of which Charles Richet and Dr. X. Dariex were the directors, and de Vesme became its editor in chief. He made extensive studies with Eusapia Palladino, Stanislawa Tomczyk, Eva C., and other famous mediums. He acknowledged mediumistic phenomena and sympathized with the Spiritualist hypothesis. He still had serious reservations, however.

In 1930 de Vesme published an excellent book on predictions in games of chance (Le Merveilleux dans les jeux de hasard) that is extensively quoted by Richet in L'Avenir et la Premonition. His main work, however, was A History of Experimental Spiritualism (1931), a book lauded by the French Academy of Science. Versions appeared in English, Italian, and German. The first volume of this two-volume work, Primitive Man, discusses the nature and origin of religious beliefs. The second, Peoples of Antiquity, deals with the experimental elements in the spiritualistic doctrines of early civilizations.

De Vesme died July 18, 1938, in Paris.

Sources:

De Vesme, Cesar. A History of Experimental Spiritualism. 2 vols. London, 1931.

Devi, Indra (1899–)

Pioneer teacher, writer, and lecturer on hatha yoga. She was born on May 12, 1899, in Riga, Russia, as Eugenie Petersen of Russian and Swedish parentage. Petersen was educated in St. Petersburg. Her first marriage was to a diplomat, her second to Sigfrid Knauer, a medical doctor, on March 14, 1953. She was fascinated by Oriental philosophy and mysticism and lived in India for 12 years and in Shanghai, China, for seven years.

While in India Petersen actively supported the movement for Indian freedom and was friends with Mahatma Gandhi, Rabindranath Tagore, and Pandit Nehru. She suffered from a supposedly incurable heart disease for some years, but was cured miraculously by yogic healing. As a result she studied hatha yoga under Swami Kuvalanayananda, one of two yogis who helped revive hatha yoga as a new "scientific" health discipline. Petersen took the name Indra Devi. She started a school of yoga in Shanghai, which she maintained throughout the Japanese occupation and introduced to Australia.

After the war she returned to India, where she was the first Western woman to teach yoga. In 1947 she went to the United States, where she started the Indra Devi Yoga Foundation, a yoga school in Los Angeles. She also traveled widely, lecturing on yoga. During her lecture tours she visited the U.S.S.R. and lectured on yoga to a group that included members of the presidium. She also introduced yoga to the health spa created by Edmond Bordeaux Szekely in Tecate, Baja California, Mexico. In 1958 she became a consultant to the Instituto de Filosofia Yoga in Mexico. Along the way she met Sai Baba, the contemporary Indian teacher, and became one of his early advocates in America. She founded the Sai Yoga Academy in Baja, California, and Mexico. As of the year 2000, Indra Devi is still alive at the age of 100 and is working on a book about Sai Yoga.

Sources:

Devi, Indra. Forever Young, Forever Healthy. New York: Prentice-Hall, 1954.

———. Renew Your Life through Yoga. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1963.

———. Yoga for Americans. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1959.

———. Yoga—the Technique of Health and Happiness. Kitabistan, India, 1948.

Devil

A name derived from the Greek diabolos, meaning "slanderer." The name is used for the supreme spirit of evil, the enemy of God and man, also known as Satan (or "adversary") in Mat. 4:8–11 and Rev. 12:9.

The idea of Satan was most fully developed in postapostolic Christianity, but as the personification of evil, Satan has many precursors and analogous representations in other religions. Possibly the clearest precursor was Set (or Seth), the antagonist of the Egyptian god of light, Horus. Set was the deity of the desert; Horus, of the life-giving Nile. Set's color was red, and red-haired and ruddy-complected people were on occasion sacrificed because they were identified with him.

In early polygamous religious systems, the gods were pictured in quite human terms, possessing both admirable and detestable attributes at the same time. Very few of them were seen as evil like the devils in Christianity or Islam. In Egypt and Babylon, figures like Apepi and Tiawath, although clearly in the line of evolution toward a satanic personality, were by no means rulers of the infernal regions. Again, the Hades of the Greeks is merely a ruler of the ghosts of the dead, not an enemy of Olympus or of mankind.

It is strange that in Mexico, Mictlantecutli, lord of hell, is a much more directly satanic figure than any European or Asiatic ruler of the realms of the dead. But in some mythologies, there are frequent allusions to monsters that may quite easily have colored the modern concept of Satan. Such is the Hindu serpent Ahi, the Hebrew Leviathan, and the principle of Chaos. Teutonic mythology has the menacing Loki, originally a god of fire, but afterward the personification of evil.

The concept of Satan, too, appears to have some deeply rooted connection with ancient serpent worship, which seems to have penetrated most Oriental countries. Thus we find the Tempter in the Old Testament (Gen. 3) in the guise of a serpent. The serpent or dragon is generally regarded as the personification of night, who swallows the sun and envelops the world in darkness.

It is generally thought that the Hebrew concept of Satan really developed in the postexilic period, though Satan is a major character in the Book of Job, one of the earliest Hebrew writings, and exhibits traces of Babylonian or Assyrian influence. It is unlikely that before the captivity any specific doctrine respecting evil spirits was held by the Hebrews. Writing on this subject, F. T. Hall in his book The Pedigree of the Devil (1883) states:

"The term 'Satan' and 'Satans' which occur in the Old Testament, are certainly not applicable to the modern conception of Satan as a spirit of evil; although it is not difficult to detect in the Old Hebrew mind a fruitful soil, in which the idea, afterwards evolved, would readily take root. The original idea of a 'Satan' is that of an 'adversary,' or agent of 'opposition.' The angel which is said to have withstood Balaam is in the same breath spoken of as 'The angel of the Lord,' and a 'Satan.' When the Philistines under Achish their king were about to commence hostilities against the Israelites under Saul and David and his men were about to march with the Philistines; the latter objected, lest, in the day of battle, David should become a 'Satan' to them, by deserting to the enemy. When David, in later life, was returning to Jerusalem, after Absalom's rebellion and death; and his lately disaffected subjects were, in turn, making their submission; amongst them came the truculent Shimei; Abishai, David's nephew, one of the fierce sons of Zeruiah, advised that Shimei should be put to death: this grated upon David's feelings, at a time when he was filled with exuberant joy at his own restoration; and he rebuked Abishai as a 'Satan.' Again Satan is said to have provoked David to number Israel, and at the same time, that 'the Lord moved David to number Israel;' a course strenuously opposed by Joab, another of the sons of Zeruiah. Solomon in his message to Hiram, king of Tyre, congratulated himself on having no 'Satans' and that this peaceful immunity from discord enabled him to build the Temple, which had been forbidden to his warlike father, David. This immunity was not, however, lasting; for Hadad, the Edomite, and Regon, of Zobah, became 'Satans' to Solomon, after his profuse luxury had opened the way for corruption and disaffection. In all these cases, the idea is simply identical with the plain meaning of the word: a Satan is an opponent, an adversary. In the elaborate curse embodied in the 109th Psalm, the writer speaks of his enemies as his 'Satans' and prays that the object of his anathema may have 'Satan' standing at his right hand. The Psalmist himself, in the sequel, fairly assumes the office of his enemy's 'Satan,' by enumerating his crimes and failings, and exposing them in their worst light. In the 71st Psalm, enemies (v. 10) are identified with 'Satans' or adversaries (v. 13).

"The only other places in the Old Testament where the word occurs, are in the Book of Job, and the prophecy of Zechariah. In the Book of Job, Satan appears with a distinct personality, and is associated with the sons of God, and in attendance with them before the throne of Jehovah. He is the cynical critic of Job's actions, and in that character he accuses him of insincerity and instability; and receives permission from Jehovah to test the justice of this accusation, by afflicting Job in everything he holds dear. We have here the spy, the informer, the public prosecutor, the executioner; all embodied in Satan, the adversary: these attributes are not amiable ones, but the writer does not suggest the absolute antagonism between Jehovah and Satan, which is a fundamental dogma of modern Christianity."

In later Judaism the concept of Satan is strongly colored by Persian dualism, and it has been supposed that Asmodeus of the Book of Tobit is the same as Aeshara Daewa of the ancient Persians. Both "Satan" and "Satans" are mentioned in the Book of Enoch; in Ecclesiasticus, Satan is identified with the serpent of Genesis; and in the Book of the Secrets of Enoch his revolt against God and expulsion from heaven are described. In the Jewish Targinn, Samael, highest of the angels, merges with Satan into a single personality.

Satan in the Christian New Testament clearly builds on these later Jewish forms. In Matthew he is alluded to as the "Prince of Demons," and in Ephesians he is spoken of as ruling over a world of evil beings who dwell in the lower heavens. Thus he is prince of the powers of the air. In Revelation the war in heaven between God and Satan is described, and Satan's imprisonment is foreshadowed after the overthrow of the Beast and the kings of the earth; he will be chained in the bottomless pit for 1,000 years (Rev. 20). After another period of freedom he will be cast into the lake of brimstone forever.

The orthodox doctrine of Satan developed over a number of centuries. Satan as an independent topic of theological inquiry was not prominent. Christ was seen as gaining the victory over Satan and his kingdom, and only in the early Middle Ages did theologians turn their attention to a consideration of Satan's continuing influence in the world. Over the centuries a complete picture of Satan and his cohorts would grow, and with his emergence would come a new appreciation of the devil's continued active opposition to the church.

A major step in the definition of Satan occurred in the late fifteenth century with the new definition of witchcraft—previously understood as a surviving remnant of paganism—as Satanism, (i.e., devil worship). During the three centuries of the great witch-hunts, the devil was assigned a new and significant role as the supernatural cause of evil in the mundane world. That belief was not disturbed by the Reformation of the sixteenth century, and the Protestants shared Roman Catholic ideas about the devil and his demonic assistants. These beliefs were assailed in seventeenth- and eighteenth-century critiques of the anti-witchcraft crusades and in the post-Enlightenment theologies of the nineteenth century. Supernatural explanations of evil gave way to more natural interpretations.

Modern Belief in Satan

Of course, belief in the existence and power of Satan never disappeared, and in the 1960s various forces converged to produce a revival of belief in the devil. In the 1960s conservative Protestantism, which had been pushed out of the power centers of the major denominations in the 1930s, experienced a resurgence. At the same time, Western culture was undergoing a quantum leap in religious pluralism. New religions appeared in significant numbers, among them a new nature-oriented religion that took the name witchcraft.

In 1966 Anton LaVey announced the formation of the Church of Satan. Though he preached a very sanitized and secularized form of Satanism, and he never had more than a few thousand followers, the very existence of public Satanists provided a prominent symbol used by conservative Christians to argue for the existence of supernatural evil.

The 1970s became a decade of popular attention to issues of supernatural evil and the work of the devil. Several movies, including Rosemary's Baby (1968), The Exorcist (1973), and The Omen (1976) helped define an era in which public discourse on Satan and Satanism reached a new peak, and numerous books on Satan, demonic possession, exorcism, and devil worship were published. The fashionable interest in Satan faded, only to breed a pop-culture interest in demonic creatures such as vampires, werewolves, witches, poltergeists, and gremlins. Interest in supernatural forces and beings lasted throughout the remainder of the twentieth century, but during the 1990s angels and positive light forces were vogue in western culture. The devil continues to hold the modern imagination, however, and belief in the existence of Satan continues in the general public. In reality, exorcism is still practiced in both conservative Roman Catholic circles and Pentecostal Protestant churches.

Sources:

Ashton, John. The Devil in Britain and America. London, 1896. Reprint, Detroit: Gale Research, 1974.

Baskin, Wade. Dictionary of Satanism. New York: Philosophical Library, 1972.

Carus, Paul. History of the Devil and the Idea of Evil. LaSalle, Ill.: Open Court Publishing, 1974. Reprint, Bell Publishing, 1974.

Kelly, Henry Ansgar. The Devil, Demonology, and Witchcraft: The Development of Christian Beliefs in Evil Spirits. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1968.

Lyons, Arthur. Satan Wants You: The Cult of Devil Worship. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1970. London: Hart-Davis, 1971.

Michelet, Jules. The Sorceress. London, 1905. Reprinted as Satanism and Witchcraft: A Study in Medieval Superstition. New York: Dell, 1971. Reprint, New York: Citadel Press, 1973.

Morgan, Genevieve and Tom Morgan. The Devil. San Francisco: Chronicle Books, 1996.

Nauman, St. Elmo, Jr., ed. Exorcism Through the Ages. New York: Philosophical Library, 1974.

Olson, Alan M., ed. Disguises of the Demonic: Contemporary Perspectives on the Power of Evil. New York: Association Press, 1975.

Philpott, Kent. Manual of Demonology and the Occult. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Zondervan, 1973.

Remy, Nicolas. Demonolatry. 1595. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1974.

Rhodes, H. T. F. The Satanic Mass. New York: Citadel, 1955. Reprint, London, 1973.

Robbins, Rossell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1959.

Rudwin, Maximilian J. The Devil in Legend and Literature. LaSalle, Ill.: Open Court Publishing, 1973.

Russell, Jeffrey Burton. The Devil: Perceptions of Evil from Antiquity to Primitive Christianity. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1977.

———. Lucifer: The Devil in the Middle Ages. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1984.

———. Satan: The Early Christian Tradition. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1981.

Thompson, Richard Lowe. The History of the Devil. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1929.

Wall, J. Charles. Devils. London, 1904. Reprint, Detroit: Singing Tree Press, 1968.

Woods, William H. History of the Devil. London, 1973, New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1974.

De Villanova, Arnold (or Arnuldus) (d. ca. 1313)

Arnold de Villanova was a physician by profession and is reported to have been a theologian and a skilled alchemist. His place of birth has never been determined, but Catalonia (Spain), Milan, and Montpellier (France) have been suggested; the approximate date was the middle of the thirteenth century.

De Villanova studied medicine for many years at the Sorbonne in Paris, which in medieval times was the principal European school training physicians. Thereafter he traveled extensively in Italy and Spain.

In Spain he heard that a friend was in the hands of the dreaded Inquisition, and, fearing that he might be arrested, de Villanova quickly returned to Italy. He lived in Naples for a long period, enjoying the friendly patronage of the Neapolitan sovereign and spending his time compiling various scientific treatises. Later he was appointed physician in ordinary to Pope Clement V, so presumably the rest of his life was spent in Rome, or possibly in Avignon.

His interest in alchemy became widely known. Many people declared that his skill was derived from communication with the devil, and the physician deserved nothing less than burning at the stake. He also attracted particular enmity from the clergy by sneering openly at the monastic regime and declaring boldly that works of charity are more acceptable to God than the repetition of paternosters.

Thanks to papal favor, de Villanova remained unscathed by his enemies. However, soon after his death, about the year 1313, the Inquisition decided that they had dealt too leniently with him and ordered certain of his writings burned publicly at Tarragona.

De Villanova was acquainted with the preparation of oil of turpentine and oil of rosemary, while the marcasite frequently mentioned by him is said to be identical to the element bismuth. His most important treatises are Thesaurus Thesaurorum, Rosarium Philosophorum, Speculam Alchemiae and Perfectum Magisterum, while two others of some importance are his Testamentum and Scientia Scientiae. A collected edition of his works was issued in 1520, and several of his writings are included in the Bibliotheca Chemica Curiosa of Mangetus, published in 1702.

De Villars, l'Abbe de Montfaucon (1635–1673)

This churchman, author, and mystic was a native of southern France. He was born in Alet, near Toulouse and the seaport town of Bordeaux. At an early age he took holy orders, and in 1667 left the south and moved to Paris, eager to win fame as a preacher. His eloquence in the pulpit won him numerous admirers, but he grew more interested in literature than in clerical affairs, and in 1670 he published his first and most important book, Comte du Gabalis.

Ostensibly a novel, this volume seems largely a veiled satire on the writings of La Calprenède, then very popular both in France and England. The satirical element in de Villars's work, however, is supplemented by a curious blend of history, philosophy, and mysticism. Since much of the mysticism was of a nature distinctly hostile to the dogmas of Rome, the author soon found himself out of favor with his brother clerics. Probably it was for this reason that he renounced the pulpit. De Villars's literary activities were not impaired by persecution; in 1671 he issued De la Délicetesse, a speculative treatise, couched in the form of dialogues, in which the author takes the part of a priest who has been writing in opposition to Port Royal (Jansenist) doctrines.

Like its predecessor this new book made a considerable stir, and de Villars began to write voluminously. At the same time he plunged deeply into the study of various kinds of mysticism, but his activities were terminated suddenly. In 1673 he was murdered on the public high road not far from Lyon, on his way from Paris.

Within the first decade succeeding his death three posthumous works appeared. L'Amour sans Faiblesse, Anne de Bretague et Ailmanzaris, and Critique de la Bérénice de Racine et de Corneille, the latter winning the praise of Mme. de Sévigné, a shrewd judge.

As late as 1715 a further work by de Villars was issued, a sequel to the Comte de Gabalis, bearing the significant title Nouveaux Entretiens sur les Sciences secrètes. This volume elicited wide interest among eighteenth-century thinkers and may be defined as a treatise opposing the philosophical theories of Descartes, or rather, opposing the popular misapprehension and abuse of those theories.

Sources:

De Villars, Abbe. Comte de Gabalis. London: Printed for B. M., Printer to the Cabalistical Society of the Sages, at the Sign of the Rosy-Crucian, 1680. Reprint, New York: Macoy Publishing & Masonic Supply, 1922.

Devils—Afraid of Bells

It was an old superstition that evil spirits were afraid of bells and fled from the sound of them. This seems to arise from the belief that hosts of devils lurked in the atmosphere waiting to seize souls or to create storms.

In The Golden Legend of Jacobus de Voragine, archbishop of Genoa (printed by Caxton about 1483), it states:

". . . the evil spirits that be in the region of the air doubt much when they hear the bells ringing; thus the bells are rung when it thunders, or when great tempest and outrages of weather happen; to the end that the fiends and wicked spirits should be abashed and flee, and cease of the moving of tempests."

The Rationale Divinorum Officiorum of Druandus (1459), a popular work dealing with the origin and meaning of ecclesiastical services, states that the church rings the bells on the approach of a storm, so that the devils, hearing the trumpets of the Eternal King, might flee in fear and cease from raising the storm.

Bells were baptized and blessed to consecrate them. In 1521 it was stated that "suffragans used to baptise bells under pretence of driving away devils and tempests." Many old bells in Britain were inscribed with the sign of the cross and the statement, "By my lively voice I drive away all harm."

As early as ancient Roman times, bronze bells were used to repel demons. The geographer Strabo (64 or 63 B.C.E.–23 C.E.) recorded that Roman herdsmen attached bells to the necks of their flocks to keep away evil spirits and wild beasts. The Roman poet Ovid (43 B.C.E.–17 C.E.) stated that people used to beat bronze vessels during an eclipse and at the death of a friend to scare away demons.

Devil's Bridge

A bridge across the Afon Mynach, near Aberystwyth, Wales. The story goes that an old woman who had lost her cow saw it on the opposite side of the chasm but did not know how to reach it. The Evil One appeared to her in the shape of a monk and promised to throw a bridge across if she would give him the first living thing that passed over it.

The old lady agreed. The bridge was completed and the crafty fiend begged her to try it but the old woman had observed his cloven hoof and his knee bent backward. She took a crust from her pocket and flung it across the ravine, bidding her little dog go fetch it. The devil was outwitted, as he generally is in such tales.

Devil's Cauldron

An abyss at the summit of the peak of Tenerife, Canary Islands. A stone cast into the gulf resounds as though a copper vessel were being struck by a huge hammer; thus the Spaniards gave it its name. The inhabitants of the island believed that the infernal regions were there, where the souls of the wicked dwell forever.

There is another Devil's Cauldron in Perthshire, Scotland, a waterfall on the River Lednock near Loch Earn.

Devil's Chain

There is a tradition in Switzerland that St. Bernard has the devil chained in some mountains in the neighborhood of the Abbey of Clairvaux. From this comes the farmers' custom of striking three blows with a hammer on an anvil every Monday morning before going to work. By this means the devil's chain is strengthened, so that he cannot escape.

Devil's Girdle

Witches in medieval times were often accused of wearing "the devil's girdle," probably as a mark of allegiance to the Evil One. Magic girdles were commonly worn, and it has been suggested that the magnetic belts advertised in modern times had their origin in this practice.

Devil's Jaw

Name given to an area off the coast of California near Point Arguello, supposed to be the scene of numerous mysterious disappearances in the manner of the famous Bermuda Triangle or Devil's Sea. In 1923 seven U.S. Navy destroyers were lost there within little more than five minutes. The name "Devil's Jaw" is a translation of the Spanish Mandibula del Diablo, derived from the appearance of the jagged rocks north of the Santa Barbara Channel. Although many vessels have been wrecked off this treacherous coast over the years, there is no reliable evidence that these disasters were due to anything more mysterious than weather conditions, treacherous rocks, or human error. Writer Richard Winer claimed that many wrecks associated with the area took place on a Saturday.

Sources:

Winer, Richard. From the Devil's Triangle to the Devil's Jaw. New York: Bantam Books, 1977.

Devil's Jelly

A mysterious substance observed falling from the sky, accounts of which were assembled by researcher of anomalous phenomena Charles Fort. It usually appears to be a slime composed of numerous globules and dissolves upon contact with the ground, like the equally mysterious of angel's hair. Devil's jelly has also been associated with UFO phenomena.

Devil's Pillar

There are preserved at Prague three stones of a pillar that the devil is said to have brought from Rome to crush a priest with whom he had made a compact. The devil planned to kill him while he said mass, but, says the legend, St. Peter threw the devil and his pillar into the sea three times in succession, which gave the priest time for repentance. The devil was so chagrined that he broke the pillar and saved himself.

Devil's Triangle

One of several labels applied to an area of the western Atlantic between Bermuda and Florida where ships and planes are said to vanish without trace. It is more popularly known as the Bermuda Triangle.

Sources:

Winer, Richard. The Devil's Triangle. New York: Bantam Books, 1974.

———. The Devil's Triangle 2. New York: Bantam Books, 1975.

Devil Worship

Satanism, or devil worship, refers to two distinct phenomena: (1) the worship of Satan or Lucifer, the Christian antideity, and (2) the worship by non-Christian peoples of deities that to Christian observers have a devil-like character. The worship of Satan has never been a widespread activity, and most reports of Satanism seem to originate in the imagination of Christian believers.

The idea of devil worship emerged in the fifteenth century when for various reasons the powers of the Inquisition were turned upon "witchcraft." The task of the inquisitors was to ferret out heretics, Christians who held unorthodox opinions, and apostates, former Christians who had renounced the faith. Outside the mandate of the Inquisition were those believers in other religions who had never been Christians. Before the year 1484, witchcraft had been defined as paganism, the worship of the old pre-Christian deities. Pagans had never been Christians and were thus immune to the mandate of the Inquisition.

However, in 1484 Pope Innocent VIII issued an encyclical that redefined witchcraft as devil worship, hence apostasy. The encyclical was followed two years later by publication of the Malleus Maleficarum (The Witch's Hammer), a volume that defined devil worship as an elaborate parody of Christian worship. Malleus Maleficarum became the sourcebook for the massive action against people identified as witches/Satanists. Substance was added to the perspective by the numerous confessions extracted under duress from the accused. Although Malleus Maleficarum was published only a generation before the Reformation, Protestants accepted its perspective and were as active as Roman Catholics in the persecution of people believed to be worshiping the devil and practicing malevolent magic.

As devil worship came to be understood, it included gatherings of people, often in groups of 13 (a parody of Christ and the 12 apostles), and the performance of a "black mass" that might include the repetition of the Lord's Prayer backward, the profanation of a eucharistic host, the sacrifice of a baby, or sexual debauchery. While many were accused of participation in devil worship, the first solid evidence of the existence of a devil-worshiping group came in the court of French king Louis XIV (1638–1715). With the assistance of a defrocked priest, Catherine Deshayes, better known as "La Voisin," constructed black masses to help members of the court—including one of the King's mistresses—retain their positions in the royal society. La Voisin was also a purveyor of poisons and assisted women in aborting unwanted babies. The situation came to light at the end of the 1670s but created little impact because of the relatively quiet manner in which the investigation and judicial proceedings were carried out. A star chamber was established that considered evidence and issued verdicts in secret in order to keep the scandal from destroying the government.

In the years since the La Voisin affair, the worship of Satan or diabolism has emerged periodically, only to quickly pass from the scene. In the twentieth century, it became the subject of some successful novels, especially those of Dennis Wheatley, who wrote a series of stories based on the existence of a worldwide satanic conspiratorial organization. There is no evidence that such an organization exists (or ever existed) outside of Wheatley's imagination.

A new era for devil worship began in 1966 with the organization of the Church of Satan. The church redefined Satanism as the epitome of American values of individualism and promoted a philosophy built around hedonism, pragmatism, and ego development. The traditional Black Mass was celebrated, but it too had been transformed into a psychodrama aimed at teaching participants to release inhibitions that kept them from reaching personal fulfillment. Anton LaVey, the church's founder, also operated openly and demanded that church members do nothing to violate the law.

The Church of Satan enjoyed a period of growth and publicity through the early 1970s, but soon fell victim to a series of schisms that cost it many members and led to its adopting a low profile. Among the several divisions, the most substantial and the only one to survive into the 1990s is the Temple of Set. Temple founder Michael Aquino rejected the neo-Satanism of LaVey and developed a more traditional approach built upon identifying the Christian Satan as the Egyptian deity Set (or Seth). Aquino has constructed the most sophisticated form of modern Satanism and has attracted to the temple a small but faithful following. Like the Church of Satan, the Temple of Set and Aquino (an officer in the U.S. Army) renounce all actions that break the law.

Public interest in the Church of Satan had largely died by the end of the 1970s, although a new wave of concern about Satanism emerged. Through the 1980s a number of individuals, primarily women, came forward with stories of, as children and teenagers, having participated in satanic rites at the insistence of their parents. The abuse they received had been forgotten, but several decades later was being remembered. At the same time, a number of accusations were made that various people with control over children—day care workers, divorced spouses, grandparents—were practicing satanic rituals on young children.

By the mid-1980s rumors and accusations of satanic ritual abuse emerged in every part of the United States and by the end of the decade had been transplanted to Europe. They led to several trials, the most important being the lengthy trial of the owners and workers of the McMartin Day School in Manhattan Beach, California. All defendants in the McMartin case were acquitted, and further research on the growing number of accusations found no basis for the widespread allegations of Satanism. The issue was seemingly laid to rest in 1994 when two researchers—Phillip Shaver, a psychologist at the University of California-Davis, and Pamela Freyd of the False Memory Syndrome Foundation—reported after their investigation of more than twelve thousand accusations that no evidence of any satanic cults had been uncovered.

Modern Satanism is largely the product of Christian theology, as Satan is primarily an inhabitant of the Christian religious worldview. For the most part, the documents on Satanism—descriptions of its reported beliefs and practices—were written by professing Christians who never met a Satanist or attended a satanic gathering. Their descriptions of Satanism were an admixture of material drawing from older Christian texts and their own imaginations.

A Satanic Hoax

Much of the literature of diabolism is written from the point of view of the Roman Catholic church, and in fact much satanic practice, especially the so-called Black Mass, parodies Catholic worship. Belief in the existence of Satanists and devil worship as a possibly powerful force opposing the church set the church up for an elaborate hoax in France at the end of the nineteenth century. Through the nineteenth century, the church had made an issue of its opposition to Freemasonry, a movement that had aligned itself against the monarchial governments of western Europe.

In the years before the hoax, the church had witnessed several Satanist-related scandals. In 1894, for example, 100 consecrated hosts (eucharistic bread) were stolen from Nôtre Dame by an old woman under circumstances that clearly proved that the vessels containing them were not the objects of the theft. An extraordinary number of such larcenies occurred in all parts of France around the end of the nineteenth century, with no less than 13 churches in the Diocese of Orleans being thus despoiled. In the Diocese of Lyons, measures were taken to transform the tabernacles into strongboxes, and in 11 of the dioceses similar acts were recorded. In Italy, Rome, Liguria, and Solerus there were similar desecrations, and even on the island of Mauritius an outrage of peculiar atrocity occurred in 1895.

Meanwhile, it had been asserted by many writers, including Archbishop Meurin and "Dr. Bataille," that Freemasonry was merely a mask for Satanism, that is, that an organization had developed of which the ordinary Mason was ignorant and that had diabolism as its special object. Members of this organization, it was asserted, were recruited from the higher branches of Masonry, although it also initiated women. Needless to say, the charge was indignantly denied by Masons.

"Bataille" and "Margiotta" claimed that the order of the Palladium, or Sovereign Council of Wisdom, had been constituted in France in 1737, and this, they inferred, was one and the same as the legendary Palladium of the Templars, better known by the name of Baphomet. In 1801 Isaac Long, a Jew, was said to have carried the "original image" of Baphomet to Charleston, South Carolina, in the United States, and it was alleged that the lodge he founded then became the chief in the Ancient and Accepted Scotch Rite. He was succeeded in due course by Albert Pike, who, it was alleged, extended the Scotch Rite and shared the anti-Catholic Masonic chieftainship with the Italian patriot Giuseppe Mazzini. This new directory was established, it was asserted, as the new Reformed Palladium Rite, or Reformed Palladium. Assisted by Gallatin Mackey and others, Pike built the new rite into an occult fraternity with worldwide powers and practiced the occult arts so well that the head lodge at Charleston was supposed to be in constant communication with Lucifer.

These revelations by "Dr. Bataille" in the wholly ludicrous work Le Diable au XIX Siècle (1896) included the claim that in March 1881 his hero, "Dr. Hacks," in whom his own personality is but thinly disguised, visited Charleston, where he met Pike, Mackey, and other Satanists. Mackey was supposed to have shown him his Arcula Mystica, in appearance like a liqueur stand, but in reality a diabolical telephone, operated like the Urim and Thummim. These revelations were supported by "Miss Diana Vaughan," once a Palladist, grand mistress of the temple and grand inspectress of the Palladium, who later converted to Roman Catholicism. In Memoirs of an ex-Palladist (1895) she gives a colorful and exhaustive account of her dealings with the "Satanists of Charleston." She claimed to be descended from the alchemist Thomas Vaughan, and recounted her adventures with Lucifer.

It was later disclosed that all the revelations of "Dr. Bataille" were an elaborate invention of the French journalist Gabriel Jogand-Pàges. Jogand-Pàges also embroidered his inventions by writing under the pseudonym Léo Taxil and also wrote the detailed "confessions" of the fictional "Diana Vaughan."

This elaborate and mischievous hoax both deceived the Roman Catholic church and embarrassed the Freemasons. It also confused the issue so far as nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century devil worship revivals were concerned. As with other hoaxes of a literary nature, this one came back to life as people in the late twentieth century rediscovered Jogand-Pàges's books and, in their ignorance of the hoax, used them to weave new theories of contemporary diabolism.

Sources:

Bois, Jules. Le Petites Religions de Paris. Paris, 1894.

———. Le Satanisme et la Magie. Paris, 1895.

Gerber, H. Léo Taxil's Palladismus-Roman. Oder Die "Enthüllungen" Dr. Battaille's, Margiotta's and "Miss Vaughan's" Über Freimaureri kritisch beleuchtet. Berlin, 1897.

Huysmans, J. K. Là-Bas. 1891. Translated as Down There: A Study in Satanism. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1958.

LaVey, Anton Szander. The Satanic Bible. New York: Avon, 1964.

Lea, H. C. Léo Taxil and Diana Vaughan. Paris, 1901.

Margiotta, D. Souvenirs d'un Trente-Troisieme. Adriano Lemmi, chef supreme des francsmaçons. Paris, 1896.

Papus [G. Encausse]. Le Diable et l'occultisme. Paris, 1895.

Rhodes, H. T. F. The Satanic Mass. London, 1954.

Vaughan, Diana [Gabriel Jogand-Pages]. Mémoire d'une Ex-Palladiste. Paris, 1895.

Waite, Arthur E. Devil Worship in France. London, 1896.

Devon, Witchcraft in

Belief in witchcraft persisted into relatively modern times in Devonshire, England, as shown in a curious case heard in Crediton County Court during the nineteenth century when a young woman alleged that she was given a potion in a grocer's shop, and that as a result either of the draught or of the incantation delivered while she was in the shop, she was getting thinner every day.

Only those who have lived long in Devon can recall the widespread belief that still existed early in the twentieth century in remote corners of the county of the power of the evil eye and of the credence given to all kinds of weird superstitions. Witches were believed to be able to exercise a malign influence even after death unless they were buried with their toes pointing downward. Also in the twentieth century, a woman suspected of being a witch was buried in this way within 20 miles of Tiverton.

In no part of the country was witchcraft given more credence than in the Culm Valley. There was a local saying that there were enough witches in the valley to roll a hogshead of cider up Beacon Hill, at Culmstock, and old people living in the locality were not ashamed to say that they believed in witchcraft.

The witches were considered to be of two kinds—"black" and "white." The former professed to have the power to condemn to all kinds of misfortunes those on whom they were asked to cast a spell; the latter claimed that they could remove evil spells and bring good fortune. Visits to witches tended to be kept confidential, but every now and again particulars leaked out.

For example, a late nineteenth century report from the Culmstock district concerns a young girl who went with her mother to a witch to get a spell cast over an errant admirer who was suspected of bestowing his affections on another young lady. The witch professed to be able to bring the young man back to his first love or to condemn him to all kinds of torture, but her price was prohibitive, so the young man was left to marry whom he would.

Farmers were the witches' most reliable clients, and it is a noteworthy fact that they generally contrived to visit "the wise woman" when they were away from home, at market. Farmers used to go to Exeter from many miles around to consult a witch whenever they had misfortune, and it was commonly reported that they could get the same sort of advice in the city.

At many farmhouses, Bibles were kept in the dairies to prevent witches from retarding the butter-making operations. "I'm 'witched' " or "I must have been 'witched,' " were expressions often heard in Devon. Generally speaking, it was animals that were supposed to sustain the most harm from being "overlooked." Cattle deaths were attributed to the power of evil spirits; and according to many superstitious people, witches had a peculiar power over pigs. A man who believed his pigs had been bewitched was told to take the heart of a pig, stick it full of pins and needles, and roast it over a fire. He did so, believing it would check the mortality among his swine.

For an account of late nineteenth and early twentieth century traditions of witchcraft in Devonshire, see the chapter "White Witches" in Devonshire Characters and Strange Events, by S. Baring-Gould (1908).

Sources:

Baring-Gould, S. Devonshire Characters and Strange Events. Rev. ed., London: John Lane, 1926.

De Wohl, Louis (1903–1961)

German-born astrologer who escaped to Britain from the Nazis and played a prominent part in the British psychological warfare campaign. Born January 24, 1903, in Berlin, as Ludwig von Wohl, he was a novelist, journalist, and film scriptwriter shortly before Hitler came to power. He learned astrology from Baron Harald Keun von Hoogerwoerd and became a professional astrologer. In 1937, he wrote I Follow My Stars. In his book The Stars of War and Peace (1952), de Wohl states that in 1935 he was invited to advise members of the Nazi party on astrological matters. He escaped to Britain as a refugee in the same year, where he practiced as an astrologer and wrote books on the subject.

Because of his inside knowledge of the German astrological scene and Hitler's astrologer Karl Ernest Krafft, he was recruited by British intelligence and served with the rank of captain, taking part in psychological warfare projects that used astrology to further the Allied cause. One of the special projects on which de Wohl worked was a fake edition of the prophecies of Nostradamus, used to spread subversive rumors in Germany. He died in Lucerne, Switzerland, June 2, 1961.

Sources:

Howe, Ellic. Astrology & Psychological Warfare during World War II. Reprinted as Urania's Children. N.p., n.d.

Diadochus

According to Marbodaeus (1035–1123), this gem resembled the beryl in its properties and was most valuable in divination. It served for the invocation of spirits, and oracular responses could be discovered in it. Albertus Magnus called it "diacodos," and it is possibly to this stone that Braithwaite alludes in English Gentleman: "For as the precious stone Diacletes, though it have many rare and excellent sovereignties in it, yet loseth them all if put in a dead man's mouth."

Leonardus's remarks about the "Diacodas" or "Diacodus" are too curious to omit: "It disturbs devils beyond all other stones, for, if it be thrown in water, with the words of its charm sung, it shows various images of devils, and gives answer to those that question it. Being held in the mouth, a man may call any devil out of hell, and receive satisfaction to such questions as he may ask."

Diakka

A term used by Andrew Jackson Davis to signify wicked, ignorant, or undeveloped spirits. Davis believed that at death no sudden or violent change takes place in the character and disposition of an individual. Those who were mischievous, unprincipled, or lascivious during their lives remained so, for a time at least, after they died. The American Spiritualist Hudson Tuttle stated, "As the spirit enters the spirit world just as it leaves this, there must be an innumerable host of low, undeveloped, uneducated, or in other words, evil spirits." Davis believed there was a special sphere or plane for these diakka where they were put on probation. He said they were responsible for the fraud and trickery often witnessed at séances; they not only deceived the sitters, but the medium as well. Davis believed the way to avoid their influence is to live a pure, refined, and religious life, for these evil spirits are naturally attracted to those whose minds most resemble their own.

Sources:

Davis, Andrew Jackson. The Diakka and Their Earthly Victims. New York, 1873.

———. The Harmonial Philosophy: A Compendium and Digest of the Works of Andrew Jackson Davis. London: Rider, 1917.

Diamond

This gem was believed to possess the most marvelous virtues. It gave victory to whomever carried it on his left arm, whatever the number of his enemies. Panics, pestilences, enchantments were all said to fly before it; hence, it was good for sleepwalkers and for the insane. It deprived the lodestone of its virtue, and one variety, the Arabian diamond, was said to attract iron more powerfully than a magnet.

The diamond is the hardest substance known, a property referring to its resistance to being scratched, rather than its resistance to other forces, such as the strike of a hammer. Ancient peoples believed that neither fire nor blows would overcome its hardness, unless the diamond was macerated with fresh goat's blood. Cyprian, Austin, Isidore, and other church fathers, adopting this notion, used it to illustrate the method by which the blood of the Cross softens the heart of man.

If bound to a magnet, the diamond, according to the belief of the ancients, would deprive it of its magnetic property.

Diancecht

A Danaan magician of Irish medieval legend. He restored to Nuada of the Silver Hand his lost limb and thus his throne.

Dianetics

A system of mental health therapeutics devised in the 1940s by writer L. Ron Hubbard. Announced in 1950, for several years dianetics survived as an independent practice. However, it was soon taken up into the much broader program of the Church of Scientology, founded in 1954, which embodies the more comprehensive spiritual philosophy developed by Hubbard.

Diaphane

The kabalistic term for the imagination. (See also Kabala)

Dickens, Charles (1812–1870)

The great novelist Charles Dickens, born on February 7, 1812, had a keen interest in the supernatural, although he was skeptical of Spiritualism, and wrote several thrilling ghost stories, notably To Be Taken with a Grain of Salt and The Signalman.

His novel The Mystery of Edwin Drood was interrupted in its monthly publication by the death of Dickens on July 8, 1870. Shortly thereafter, T. P. James, an uneducated American mechanic of Brattleboro, Vermont, obtained messages in automatic writing that he claimed emanated from the author.

Between Christmas 1872 and July 1873, scripts came from under his hand that continued Dickens's unfinished novel. The posthumous section was longer than the first and presented a surprising continuity of the manner of thought, style, and peculiarities of Dicken's writing. The two sections were published together in 1874 as The Mystery of Edwin Drood, with Charles Dickens given as the author.

Spiritualists the world over hailed the book as a most convincing proof of spirit return. However, psychologist Theodore Flournoy, in Spiritism and Psychology (1911), undertook to demonstrate that Dickens himself had nothing to do with the affair and that everything was easily explained by processes of latent incubation and subconscious imagination within the medium himself. He quoted the conclusions of Mme. K. Fairbanks, a distinguished member of the Geneva University, who observed that "there are certainly very successful passages such as the scenes between the two women, Billickin and Twinkleton. But there are others which are just the contrary."

Furthermore, John Forster, author of The Life of Charles Dickens (1911), discovered among the papers of the deceased author a whole scene in Edwin Drood, written in advance and destined to figure later in the novel. Flournoy found it incredible that the "spirit" of the author, who remembered so clearly the part of the volume already published that no more than three new persons are introduced in any part of the second section, should have completely forgotten the chapter written and left in manuscript.

Forster averred that as a striking proof of identity Dickens would have made an allusion to it from the spirit world. In the book itself and in the cover blurb, T. P. James does not pretend that he has not read Dickens and his last novel. "Now it is evident," stated Flournoy, "that if he had not read Dickens he would most probably have boasted of his accomplishment, because that would have rendered his performance much more extraordinary. Let us not forget," he finally remarked, "that the medium had two and a half years to imbibe the original work of the author, and in letting this 'simmer'—without counting the six months afterwards employed in automatic writing—three years in all were completed. We must confess that this greatly reduces its marvelous character."

Even Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, in his book The Edge of the Unknown (1930), concludes that "the actual inspiration of Dickens is far from being absolutely established. . . . It reads like Dickens gone flat." In the same book he recorded some personally obtained automatic contributions to the solution of the mystery of Edwin Drood.

Dickens had a special interest in mesmerism or animal magnetism, through his friendship with John Elliotson. In 1838 Dickens witnessed a demonstration by Elliotson of the "mighty curative powers of animal magnetism." During his tour in Italy in 1844, Dickens became acquainted with the family of Emile de la Rue, a Swiss banker residing in Genoa. Dickens actually practiced mesmerism on Madame de la Rue as a treatment for her neurasthenic disorders, even experimenting with treatment at a distance. On one such occasion, while he was concentrating on sending this force over a distance, his wife, Catherine, seated nearby, fell into a "mesmeric trance," her senses numbed and her extremities cold. When Dickens awakened her, she said she had been "magnetized."

Dickens's interest of in such occult subjects was often masked by his popular writings in a jocular vein. In 1848 he practiced mesmerism on the artist John Leech, who had suffered from a severe fall. Afterward, Dickens wrote to John Forster with the jocular comment, "What do you think of my setting up in the magnetic line with a large brass plate? 'Terms twenty-five guineas per nap.'"

Sources:

Fairbanks, K. "Le Cas Spirite de Dickens." Arch. de Psychol. T.I. (June 1892).

Jacobson, Wendy S. The Companion to "The Mystery of Edwin Drood." London: Allen & Unwin, 1986.

Kaplan, Fred. Dickens and Mesmerism: The Hidden Springs of Fiction. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1975.

The Dicker

A group adhering to the teachings of G. I. Gurdjieff and P. D. Ouspensky. Based in Britain, the organization was founded by Beryl Pogson, who had been pupil and secretary to the Jungian psychologist Maurice Nicoll (1884–1953), who was closely involved with Gurdjieff's work and was responsible for the authoritative Psychological Commentaries on the Teaching of G. I. Gurdjieff and P. D. Ouspensky (5 vols., 1952–56).

The group formed a center in the village of Upper Dicker, Sussex, England, at a large house named "The Dicker," with facilities for group activities and arts and crafts. The center is associated with other study groups elsewhere in Britain. Like all the Gurdjieff centers, it was intended only for those who take a serious interest in Gurdjieff's work and are prepared to study Nicoll's Psychological Commentaries. Current address not obtained for this edition.

Dickhoff, Robert Ernest

Tibetan Buddhist and author of several books with Buddhist reflections on UFOs and the hollow earth theory. Dickhoff was an early champion of the idea that UFOs were hostile, a view that has gained ascendancy in UFO circles in the 1990s. He believed them to be winged garudas, a birdlike demon of Buddhist mythology. His book Agharta (1951) is a romance of subterranean races. Dickhoff founded the American Buddhist Society and fellowship in 1947 and headed the small organization for many years.

Sources:

Dickhoff, Robert Ernest. Behold.. the Venus Garuda. New York: The Author, 1968.

———. The Eternal Fountain. Boston: Bruce Humphries, 1947.

Dickinson, Edmund (1624–1707)

Physician to King Charles II, a seeker of the hermetic knowledge, and professed Rosicrucian, who published a text on alchemy entitled Epistola ad T. Mundanum de Quintessentia Philosophorum, which was printed at Oxford in 1686, and a second time in 1705. A third edition was printed in Germany in 1721. He was born on September 26, 1624. He studied medicine, obtaining a M.D. degree in in 1656.

After becoming acquainted with Theodore Mundanus, a French adept, Dickinson turned his attention to chemistry. In correspondence with Mundanus, Dickinson explained that the Brothers of the Rosy Cross had access to the universal medicine, the elixir of life, but that by the time they discovered it, they had ceased to desire it and declined to avail themselves of the promise of life for centuries.

He added that the adepts were obliged to conceal themselves for the sake of safety, because if their gifts seemed more than human they would become abhorrent to the average man. Thus, there were excellent reasons for their conduct; they proceeded with caution instead of making a display of their powers. They lived simply as mere spectators in the world and desired to make no disciples, converts, or confidants. They submitted to the obligations of life and enjoyed the fellowship of none, admired none, followed none but themselves. They obeyed all codes, were excellent citizens, and only preserved silence in regard to their own private beliefs, Dickinson said, giving the world the benefit of their knowledge up to a certain point.

It is believed by some that after laboring many years Dickinson finally succeeded in alchemical transmutations and that the king had a private laboratory where he took pleasure in watching Dickinson at work.

In his later years, Dickinson became ill and retired. He spent the last nineteen years of his life studying and writing books. He died on April 3, 1707.

Didier Brothers, Alexis & Adolph (mid-nineteenth century)

The best-known clairvoyants of the age of animal magnetism. In hypnotic state they apparently could read closed books, recover lost objects, play billiards blindfolded or cards face downward, and achieved feats of traveling clairvoyance.

For Pierre Seguier, president of France, Alexis described his room and mentioned that there was a handbell on the table. The President found the description correct, but was unsure about the bell. On arriving home he found, to his surprise, that during his absence a handbell had been placed on his table.

In 1847, at the request of Marquise de Mirville, Robert Houdin, the famous conjurer, paid two visits to the Didier brothers. He drew a book from his pocket and asked Alexis to read a line eight pages back at a certain height which he marked by sticking in a pin. When Alexis did so correctly Houdin signed a declaration: "I affirm that the above facts are scrupulously accurate."

Lord Adare attended a sitting in the company of a Col. Llewellyn on July 2, 1844. According to his notes, Alexis took from the skeptical colonel a morocco case, placed it on his stomach and said, "The object is a hard substance, not white, enclosed in something more white than itself; it is a bone from a greater body; a human bone; yours. It has been separated and cut so as to leave a flat side." Alexis opened the case, took out a piece of bone wrapped in silver paper and said, "The ball struck here; it was an extraordinary ball in effect; you received three separate injuries at the same moment; the bone was broken in three pieces; you were wounded early in the day whilst engaged in charging the enemy." He also described the dress of the soldiers and was right in all respects.

Alexis Didier was always accompanied by his hypnotist Marcillet. He never claimed assistance from spirits. His views are outlined in Le Sommeil Magnétique expliqué par le somnambule Alexis en état de lucidité (1856). His brother Adolph wrote Animal Magnetism and Somnambulism (1856); Mesmerism and Its Healing Power (1875), and Clairvoyance (1876).

A long series of experiments conducted by Dr. Edwin Lee in 1849 at Brighton and Hastings is recorded in Lee's Animal Magnetism (1866). H. G. Atkinson also subjected the Didier brothers' gift to careful scrutiny. E. W. Cox noted:

"A party of experts was planned to test M. Alexis. We prepared a packet containing a single word of twelve letters and enclosed it in six envelopes of thick brown paper, each of which we carefully sealed. Handing him this packet he placed it, not before his eyes which were bound with handkerchiefs and wool, but upon his forehead, and in three minutes and a half he wrote the contents correctly, imitating the very handwriting. The word was by arrangement placed in the first envelope by a friend in a distant town, who was not informed of the object and who did not inform us what the word was; and none of us knew until the envelopes were opened and the word found to be that which the Somnambule had written."

Frank Podmore reflects on Alexis's work in The Newer Spiritualism (1910): "Many of these feats are so precisely recorded and so well authenticated that it is difficult to doubt their genuineness. They stand on the same evidential level as many of the similar incidents recorded in the Proceedings of the S.P.R." He observed that Alexis was in an abnormal state of consciousness during his performances, a conclusion he reached from reference to the fact that as a rule, he did not speak the answers but preferred to write them. From this he concluded that Alexis was an automatic writer and that his feats of clairvoyance were genuine and that they involved no conscious deception on his part.

Sources:

Cox, E. W. What Am I? A Popular Introduction to Mental Physiology and Psychology. N.p., 1874.

Didot Perceval

So named because the only manuscript of this legend discovered belonged to A. F. Didot, the famous collector. This version of the legend of the Holy Grail greatly emphasizes the illness of the Fisher King. It tells how King Arthur's Round Table was constructed and relates the adventures of Sir Perceval, which are much the same as those told in the Conte del Graal. Included is the Good Friday incident in which Perceval and Brons are instructed in the mystical expressions that Christ was said to have whispered to Joseph of Arimathea on the cross.

Sources:

Lacy, Norris J., ed. The Arthurian Encyclopedia. New York: Garland Publishing, 1986.

Roach, William, ed. The Didot Perceval. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1941.

Diepenbrock, Melchior von (1798–1854)

Author of two treatises on chirothesy or laying on of hands by the Roman Catholic popes. (See also Healing by Touch) He was born on January 6, 1798, in Bocholt, Westphalia. After serving as a militia officer in 1815 against France, Diepenbrock decided to study finance and theology and was ordained in 1823. He was ordained a cardinal in 1850. Many of his sermons and pastoral letters were published.

He died in Johannisberg, Upper Silesia, on January 20, 1854.

Di Liscia, Julio C(esar) (1912–)

Industrialist and parapsychologist. He was born January 10, 1912, at Santa Rosa, Argentina. He became a member of the Argentine Institute of Parapsychology (AIP) founded in 1952, but resigned from the Institute with other members who believed that it lacked scientific interest. He led in the formation of a new organization, the Association of Friends of Parapsychology, which initiated the journal Revista Argentina de Parapsicologia. As a result, the AIP was reorganized and Di Liscia was appointed secretary. He frequently lectured on parapsychology at the institute and conducted research on precognition.

Di Mambro, Joseph (1924–1994)

Joseph Di Mambro, was cofounder of the Solar Temple, an occult order that jumped into the public spotlight after more than 50 members died in an act of mass suicide/murder in 1994. Di Mambro was born in rural southern France. He did not go to college, but learned clockmaking and the jewelry business by which he was employed as a young man. He also was attracted to occultism, and in January of 1956 joined the Ancient and Mystical Order of the Rosae Crucis (AMORC), the American Rosicrucian group which enjoyed great success in France in the decades following World War II (1939–45). In the late 1960s he became the head of the AMORC lodge in Nimes, France. He remained a Rosicrucian member until 1969.

In 1970, Di Mambro gave up his business career to become a full-time lecturer in what would become known as the New Age Movement. In 1973 he founded the Center for the Preparation of the New Age in Annemause, France, and three years later established a communal group, La Pyramide, in Geneva, Switzerland. La Pyramide was superseded by the Golden Way Foundation two years later.

During his years in Geneva, Di Mambro developed as a teacher and began to present himself as a representative of the Great White Brotherhood, that group of evolved beings which many theosophists believe guide the evolution of the human race. He claimed to be an incarnation of several notable ancient figures (including Moses and the Egyptian Pharaoh Akhnaton).

In the early 1980s, Di Mambro invited Luc Jouret, a popular New Age and holistic health speaker, to lecture at the Golden Way. Jouret was a member of another occult group, the Renewed Order of the Temple, and the two discovered their mutual interests and beliefs. Together they founded the Solar Temple in which they married traditional initiatory occultism with a belief in the coming New Age. Di Mambro prepared the rituals used by the group while Jouret continued to travel widely, bringing people into a club he had formed, and from the club members selected people to be invited into the new order.

The members of the Golden Way provided the core from which the Solar Temple grew. In 1982, Di Mambro fathered a child whom he named Emmanuelle. He saw her as a cosmic being who would lead in the coming New Age. As the order progressed, he chose mates for people, looking for them to have special children who would assist Emmanuelle in her New Age task. The rituals, drawn in part from the writings of Alice A. Bailey, called upon the Great White Brotherhood to release the energy through the world that would bring the awaited change.

All seemed to be well through the 1980s, but in the early 1990s, people began to challenge Di Mambro's authority. Trouble seemed to have started when one member who left in 1991 began to complain that the group was a cult and filed a lawsuit against it. Then in 1993, Luc Jouret was arrested when he attempted to purchase some illegal weapons. The resulting publicity not only destroyed his reputation, but called the group to the attention of the authorities. These problems might have been weathered, had not Di Mambro's health failed. Reportedly, he was having problems with his kidneys, had become incontinent, and had developed cancer. His cosmic child was also revolting against her treatment and had become unmanageable.

Di Mambro's problems set the context for the negative turn that developed in his thought by 1993. He felt that the public was not responding to the New Age and that it was best that he and those who were ready drop out and move on to a higher dimension. That occurred on October 3–5, 1994, when Di Mambro and some 50 members of the Solar Temple died in three separate acts in Quebec and Switzerland. At his direction, a couple who had had a child in opposition to his orders were murdered along with their son. The night before he committed suicide, Di Mambro and a small group of his closest confidants has a last feast together. It was determined that the majority who died were given tranquilizers and were subsequently shot. Their bodies were then arranged in a circular pattern.

Sources:

Introvigne, Massimo. "The Magic of Death: The Suicides of the Solar Temple." In Catherine Wessinger, ed. Millennialism, Persecution, and Violence: Historical Cases. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 2000.

Meyer, Jean François. "&43'Our Terrestrial Journey is Coming to an End:" The Late Voyage of the Solar Temple." Nova Religio 2, 2 (April 1999): 172–96.

Palmer, Susan. "Purity and Danger in the Solar Temple." Journal of Contemporary Religion 11, 3 (October 1996): 303–18.

Wessinger, Catherine. How the Millennium Comes Violently. New York: Seven Bridges Press, 2000.

Dimensione Psi

Defunct quarterly journal of Associazione Italiana Studi del Paranormale. Included scientific papers on psi phenomena and psychical research. It was managed in Genova by Count Lellio Galateri de Genola.

Dingle, Edwin John (1881–1972)

Founder of the Institute of Mentalphysics. He was born April 6, 1881, in Cornwall, England. He became a journalist, and in 1900 he moved to Singapore to cover affairs in the Orient. There he met a teacher from whom he learned meditation and yoga. In 1910 Dingle went to Tibet, where he studied for nine months and reportedly learned pranayama (breathing control), the remembrance of past lives, and other advanced spiritual disciplines. He returned to England to write books on his experiences and published the important Dingle's New Atlas and Commercial Gazetteer of China (1914), which was a standard reference for many years.

In 1921 Dingle settled in Oakland, California. He began his career as a teacher after being asked to lead an informal class on what he had learned from his teachers in Singapore and Tibet. He taught informally for more than a decade before incorporating the Institute of Mentalphysics in 1934. Dingle taught his students out of his belief that the Tibetans had preserved the ancient wisdom of the Aryans, the founders of the Indian, Mediterranean, and Anglo-Saxon cultures. He taught them the disciplines he had learned and advised a vegetarian diet.

Dingle developed a center in Los Angeles, the International Church of the Holy Trinity, where he not only taught classes but sent out a correspondence course to students across North America. He was generally known by his students as Ding Le Mei, his religious name. In 1941 he founded a retreat center in Yucca Valley, California, now the headquarters of the institute. Following his death on January 27, 1972, he was succeeded by Donald L. Waldrop.

Sources:

Dingle, Edwin John. Borderlands of Eternity. Los Angeles: Institute of Mentalphysics, 1939.

———. Breathing Your Way to Youth. Los Angeles: Institute of Mentalphysics, n.d.

———. The Voice of the Logos. Los Angeles: Econolith Press, 1951.

Dingwall, E(ric) J(ohn) (1890–1986)

Anthropologist, author, and one of the most experienced psychical investigators of modern times. Born in Ceylon (now Sri Lanka), he was educated at Pembroke College, Cambridge University, England (M.A., 1912), and the University of London (D.Sc., Ph.D.). He joined the staff of the Cambridge University Library. The son of a Scot living in Ceylon in 1890, he was reticent about his personal affairs, and did not publicize his exact birth date. He appears to have had some private wealth in his earlier years, since he was able to travel and follow his intellectual interests.

As a young man, Dingwall became interested in psychical phenomena and in 1921 was named the director of the department of Psychical Phenomena for the American Society for Psychical Research. The following year he became the research officer for the Society for Psychical Research, London, where he served for five years. While there he wrote his first books on psychical research, including (edited with Harry Price) Revelations of a Spirit Medium (1922) and How to Go to a Medium (1927).

Through the 1920s and 1930s Dingwall traveled widely through Europe and to the United States to investigate mediums, among whom were such famous ones as "Eva C.," Rudi and Willi Schneider, Stephan Ossowiecki, and "Margery" (Mina Crandon). He also researched social and religious conditions relating to abnormal mental phenomena in Spain in 1935, and in the West Indies in 1936. These provided additional material for his articles and one additional book, Ghosts and Spirits in the Ancient World (1930).

Besides his work as a psychical investigator, Dingwall continued his academic interest in anthropology, making himself knowledgeable on some of the more bizarre aspects of the human personality. His publications in these areas include Studies in the Sexual Life of Ancient and Medieval Peoples (1925), The Girdle of Chastity (1931), Artificial Cranial Deformation (1931), and, with H. H. Ploss and other colleagues, Woman: An Historical, Gynecological and Anthropological Compendium (1935).

During World War II he worked at the Ministry of Information and British Foreign Office (1941–45), and resumed his writing after the war. Dingwall's numerous titles include Racial Pride and Prejudice (1946); Some Human Oddities (1947); Very Peculiar People (1950); with K. M. Goldney and T. H. Hall, The Haunting of Borley Rectory (1956); with J. Langdon-Davies, The Unknown: Is It Nearer?; The American Woman (1956); and, with T. H. Hall, Four Modern Ghosts (1958).

During the 1960s Dingwall coedited the four-volume set Abnormal Hypnotic Phenomena (1967–68). He died at St. Leonards-on-Sea, East Sussex, England, on August 7, 1986. As one of Britain's oldest psychical researchers, he was widely respected for his careful reports and judgment in the field of the paranormal during some sixty years' investigation of some of the most famous and controversial mediums of the twentieth century. Although tending to skepticism, he did not hesitate to affirm the possibility of the genuineness of psychical phenomena and was scathing about the limitations of fellow researchers. As a body, he claimed, "they are hardly distinguished by the accuracy of their observations, the correctness of their records or the scrupulous care required in the conduct of their experiments."

He also cautioned against prima facie belief in fraud, even though claimed phenomena might seem suspect. In his article "The Hypothesis of Fraud," published in the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), he comments on the controversial phenomena of the famous medium "Eva C." that "it may be thought that the case against the phenomena is so strong that the subject may be at once dismissed. Such a standpoint would in my opinion be entirely mistaken and would show clearly that its supporter had not the smallest appreciation of the difficulties. . . ." For example, he became such an expert on conjuring that he was qualified to be a member of The Magic Circle, of which he became vice-president and founded their committee for investigating the occult.

At other times, he testified to observing such controversial phenomena as the production of ectoplasm by mediums. However, according to Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, he was always reluctant to make public admission of the genuineness of phenomena that he had endorsed in private.

In a tribute by parapsychologist Guy Lyon Playfair (Journal of the Society for Psychical Research, vol. 54, no. 807), Dingwall is quoted as stating (in a letter to Playfair in 1976), "We know practically nothing about the 'real' nature of the material world in which we live. We knew less 500 years ago. 500 years hence we may know a little more, but the more we peer into our surroundings the most indefinite becomes the boundary. The investigation of the relationship between matter and what you call spirit is only just beginning. Hardly any progress at all has been made since Myers laid down the guide rules in 1903. Indeed, things seem to be more mysterious now than they were then. So I think that the best position is not to hurry. The scrap heap of science is high with discarded theories derived from insufficient experimentation."

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Dingwall, Eric J. Ghosts and Spirits of the Ancient World. London: Kegan, Paul, 1930.

Direct Drawing and Painting

A development of automatic drawing and painting in which the hand of the automatist is not made use of, and sometimes even drawing and painting materials are dispensed with, the sketch being precipitated in the darkness in a time that is usually too short for normal execution. It is a fairly well known mediumistic phenomenon but also one that is always open to suspicion of fraud as the transcendental pictures are often found to be feeble copies of existing works of art and since practitioners of direct drawing and painting have often been caught in deception.

Mary Marshall's direct pencil portrait of Goethe was a close copy of an engraving in The Life of Goethe; many illustrations of David Duguid's Hafed were identical with pictures in Cassell's Family Bible; and still-life paintings of Mrs. E. J. French, of New York, were similarly wanting in originality.

Taken to task, the controls of Duguid defended themselves by saying that they often took impressions from the medium's subconscious. His defense drew support from the hypothesis that the mind of the sitter may also contribute the subject. On occasion, for example, visitors to Duguid recognized, in the direct paintings, scenes they were acquainted with in America and Australia, which the medium could not have seen. An art dealer found a direct painting strangely familiar and later discovered its facsimile among some pictures he had bought. Frank Miller writes in the Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research of a well-known artist who could paint scenes he never saw but that she remembered having seen.

Duguid specialized in miniature paintings in oil. They were done under the alleged control of the spirits of Dutch painters Jakob Ruysdael and Jan Steen. The size of the pictures was sometimes as small as a sixpence and the execution, done in the dark, was always very fine. While the medium was tied to his chair, or held by the hands, the noise of the brushes was heard above the table and sometimes half a minute later the brushes or pencils and the picture fell down. Occasionally the drawings were obtained in a few seconds in sealed envelopes on folded sheets of paper.

Mrs. E. J. French excelled in still life paintings done under a small table that was surrounded by a shawl. For eight to fifteen minutes furious scraping and rubbing was heard, then a signal, then the brushes and pencils dropped out and, fresh with paint, a brightly colored picture was produced from under the table.

Samuel Guppy, in his anonymously published Mary Jane, or Spiritualism Chemically Examined (1863), describes drawings of varicolored flowers obtained, often without any drawing or painting material, in the presence of his first wife. Specially bought and marked paper was placed in a box that was itself carefully wrapped in paper and sealed to remove any chance of deception. Yet the picture appeared occasionally in as many as seven colors, covered with a varnish of unknown origin.

In one instance the effect appeared to have been produced at a distance. In a letter to the London Dialectical Society, Countess Panigai described a visit to D. D. Home during which she was promised a distinct sign from her deceased child the following day. The promise was well kept. At her home, which the medium never visited, she heard raps, apparently coming from a drawer where, unknown to all, the last pair of boots her child wore was hidden in a box. "Unlocking the drawer and the box, on the elastic of one boot was imprinted a perfect star, and in the centre of the star an eye," the countess recalled. The substance with which it is drawn is black. It has since faded slightly, but remains still thoroughly distinct. So mathematically perfect is the drawing that great skill and precision is necessary for an accurate copy to be taken." Letters at each point of the star formed the name of the child, "Stella."

The most unusual demonstrations in direct art were given by the Bangs sisters of Chicago. On paper-mounted canvases held against the light near the windows, they produced spirit portraits in plain sight of the sitter, who was usually advised to keep about his person a photograph of the departed friend whose spirit picture he desired to obtain. Admiral Usborne Moore often witnessed the phenomenon and describes it in Glimpses of the Next State (1911):

"We had to wait some time. After a few minutes the canvas assumed various hues, rosy, blue and brown; it would become dark and light independently of the sun being clouded or not.

"Dim outlines of faces occasionally appeared in different parts of the canvas. . . . We had been sitting forty minutes when the right and left edges of the canvas began to darken, and the face and bust suddenly appeared. It was finished in thirty-five minutes—i.e., one hour and fifteen minutes from the time we first sat down. On separating the two canvases it was found that the picture was on the further side of the one nearest to me, and the material was quite damp; the other canvas, which had been pressing against it all the time, was unsoiled. The stuff comes off on the finger, a smutty, oily substance. . . .

"The actual picture therefore, took thirty-five minutes to precipitate. It is richer in tone now than it was when put on a sofa after the sitting, but in other respects just the same. The likeness to the cartes-de visiti in my dollarpocke is not remarkable, but there are points about it which show that the invisible workers had access to these photographs."

Reported pictorial appearances of the Virgin Mary in churches and other places of worship have caused some to hypothesize that the phenomena under this heading also occur in a spontaneous manner. It was reported in the London Press in the summer of 1923 that, on the plaster wall in Christchurch Cathedral, Oxford—under the Burne Jones window that Dean Liddell had caused to be placed there as a memorial of a dearly loved daughter and close to three tablets erected to the memory of the dean and his family—there had gradually emerged, over a period of two years, a remarkable likeness to the late dean, whose life and work were so closely associated with Christchurch.

Relating the Liddell portrait to the phenomenon of psychic photography. Frederick Bligh Bond argues in the October 1923 issue of Psychic Science that ". . . instead of a photographic plate and the chemical changes in salts of silver, there is in the smooth white plaster wall and the mineral salts contained in the plaster, a combination susceptible to slow chemical change; and instead of the presence of a physical medium required in psychic photography, there is the physical atmosphere of a building constantly dedicated to prayer and aspiration, full of spiritual and psychical emanations of countless worshippers tending to provide the conditions necessary for the accomplishment of a process in which the alchemy of thought may succeed in affecting the grosser particles of matter."

This portrait of Dean Liddell remained unaffected by the passing of years. Barbara McKenzie, wife of James Hewat McKenzie, writes in Psychic Science, October 1931, that "the Dean's face is beautifully clear and there certainly seems an emergence of other outlines close by which bear a resemblance to two human heads." One of these was noticed to be forming in 1923; the other is more recent.

Similar appearances have been noticed in other parts of the building. Mrs. McKenzie was shown a gray marble pedestal base. About a foot from the floor a white patch appears on the marble, containing a very clear face of an elderly man with bushy hair and full whiskers and beard. An even clearer face was to be seen on a wall behind the organ and within twenty yards of the choir stall. It was popularly associated with a chorister who for many years sang in the cathedral.

The evidence for the genuineness of direct drawing and painting is far from satisfactory. Both Duguid and the Bangs sisters were exposed in mediumistic frauds, and the amateur conjurer David P. Abbott successfully duplicated the sisters' direct painting phenomena by trickery.

Direct Voice

Theoretically, an isolated paranormal voice in space without visible source of agency. In classical Spiritualist séances, the voice issued primarily from a trumpet that sailed about the séance room in the dark and appeared to serve as a condenser. At other times mediums dispensed with the trumpet, and the voice could be heard from the center of the floor or from any part of the room.

H. Dennis Bradley records an experience in which the communicator began his sentence in the middle of the room; halfway up he dropped the trumpet while his voice traveled upward to the extreme right-hand corner of the ceiling and there ended on the pronouncement of the last syllable of his last word (Towards the Stars, 1924, p. 20).

Physically the phenomenon requires the supposition that some material more solid than air is withdrawn from the medium's or from the sitter's body to produce the necessary vibrations in the surrounding atmosphere. Séance room communications speak of improvisation of a larynx—a strange notion, yet the improvisation of human limbs and entire bodies is even stranger.

The first vague description of a "voice box" is to be found in an out-of-the-body experience of Stainton Moses, who stated, "I did not observe how the sound was made, but I saw in a distant part of the room near the ceiling something like a box round which blue electric light played, and I associate the sound with that."

The "voice box" of "Walter," the control of Margery (i.e., Mina Crandon) has been photographed as a white mass on the medium's shoulder, connected to her left ear and nostril with tubes of the mysterious substance ectoplasm. This psychic microphone seems to be very closely associated with the medium's organism. "John Watt," the control of Mrs. Thomas Everitt, claimed that he used the medium's breath in speaking. If Everitt held her hand over her mouth the volume of the voice diminished, and it ceased entirely if Everitt placed her palm on her mouth. The spirit of Cecil Husk warned Dennis Bradley not to smoke excessively on the days he was sitting in séances, since smoking sometimes affected the vocal organs from which part of the ectoplasmic force was taken.

Thomas Colley described an instance in which Frank W. Monck was wakened from a trance to greet a materialized fellow student. He and the spirit had to speak in turn; there was an impasse if they tried to speak at once. Harry Bastian's direct voice was heard when his mouth was full of water, but it immediately ceased if his nose was temporarily stopped. Everitt could never speak simultaneously with the spirits. Her lips and tongue moved but no sound was made. Other mediums felt no handicap.

Multiple Spirit Voices

Signor Damiani, in his testimony before the London Dialectical Society in 1870, spoke of a séance with D. D. Home in which two voices were heard besides that of the persistently speaking medium.

David Duguid often spoke simultaneously. George Valiantine and Etta Wriedt had no difficulty in joining with the spirit voices. According to Noel Jaquin, the problem consisted not so much in the use of the physical voice, but in the coordination of thought. He experienced an incoherence in thinking while the direct voice was heard and could only master through strong mental effort.

Independent conversation by two or three voices was occasionally carried on in the Wriedt séances. J. A. Findlay reported the same with the medium John C. Sloan. Admiral Usborne Moore was told that the spirits seemed to speak with his voice. During that time he often experienced a slight cough and irritation of the throat. Others observed that the sitters' voices weakened after a prolonged direct voice conversation. An interesting experiment was tried with Wriedt. She was asked to sit with seven deaf mutes from Flint, Michigan. No one in the room could utter an articulate word except for herself. No voices were heard.

Eugene Crowell writes of séances with a Mrs. Andrews in The Identity of Primitive Christianity and Modern Spiritualism (1875–79): "One of the common forms of manifestations at Moravia is singing by spirits. This generally occurs when the persons assembled sing with animation, the spirits seizing the moment when they are 'with one accord' raising their voices, to join in the strain, and generally the spirit voice is heard clearly above all others." He continued later: "When our spirit friends had conversed more freely than usual, the medium afterwards complained of much soreness and tenderness of the throat and lungs, evidently without any definite idea of its cause. It seemed to me that the spirits . . . were compelled to draw directly from the vocal and pulmonary organs of the medium those elements that are liberally supplied by public circles, and which are necessary for the production of spirit voices."

Findlay's On the Edge of the Etheric (1931) states that the communicators often make use of a psychic tube from the mouth of the medium to the trumpet. This might explain why the independent voice resembled that of the medium and also why moisture was sometimes found within the trumpet it but is consistent with the medium's speaking directly into the trumpet. Findlay's spirit communicators also offered a description of how the artificial larynx is made. It read:

"From the medium and those present a chemist in the spirit world withdraws certain ingredients which for want of a better name is called ectoplasm. To this the chemist adds ingredients of his own making. When they are mixed together a substance is formed which enables the chemist to materialize his hands. He then, with his materialized hands, constructs a mask resembling the mouth and tongue. The spirit wishing to speak places his face into this mask and finds it clings to him, it gathers round his mouth, tongue and throat. At first, difficulty is experienced in moving this heavier material, but by practice this becomes easy. The etheric organs have once again become clothed in matter resembling physical matter, and by the passage of air through them your atmosphere can be vibrated and you hear his voice."

Findlay's explanation received confirmation two years later at a séance recorded by the Rev. V. G. Duncan in his book Proof: An Account of Spiritualistic Séances (1933). The mediums in this instance were the Misses Moore. When asked how it was possible to speak to us on earth the communicator stated,

"I can only explain it like this. You know when you have been to the dentist for an extraction and been given an anaesthetic, he puts that queer mask over your face for you to breath the gas into your lungs. I have to use a contrivance like that in order to speak to you. This contrivance is composed of etheric matter, partly provided by the mediums and sitters, and partly supplied from our side. It is a kind of transformer, and it has a double purpose. It helps to retard my vibrations and so allows me to make my voice audible to you and provides a temporary set of vocal organs."

Findlay's views are further enlarged upon in his second book, The Rock of Truth (1933).

The Nature of Direct Voice

The process of direct voice speaking appears to be similar to ordinary speech. After a long sentence the controls would pause for breath, and the indrawing sound became distinctly audible. However, the phenomena differed from medium to medium, and the vocal effects varied from one to the other. The invisible communicator could laugh, whistle, or sing. "Walter," the control of Mina Crandon ("Margery"), could give expression to all sorts of moods—surprise, contentment, joy, anger, and melancholy—by whistling. Once Margery and "Walter" reportedly laughed at the same instant. The two chuckles came from a common point in space and gave the impression of being tangled together, as though conceivably from a common physical organism.

The language spoken may be unknown both to the medium and to the sitters. Yet the nationality of the medium may have a curious influence. English, for instance, is easier spoken when the medium is English than of another tongue. As an explanation it has been suggested that the material to build up the artificial larynx may be drawn from the oral cavity and therefore may be less adaptable to unusual inflections. The experience of Abraham Wallace with the spirit entity "John King," who unexpectedly spoke to him in broad Scotch, suggested to some a participation on the part of the sitter. When interrogated on the subject, King replied, "Why, I got it from you."

The bewildering variety of strange languages spoken through some mediums remain mysteries, though secret knowledge by the medium or collusion with sitters has been hypothesized as a likely explanation. In the séances of George Valiantine (repeatedly caught in fraud), Portuguese, Basque, Welsh, Japanese, Russian, Hindustani, and "ancient pure" Chinese was supposedly spoken. Neville Whymant, a famous orientalist, studied this linguistic phenomenon, and on March 25, 1927, it was recorded on a gramophone in Lord Charles Hope's apartment in London after a special telephone cable was laid to the Columbia Gramophone Company's recording house. A megaphone was connected to the recording machine and two assistants stationed outside the séance room gave the signals at various times. In the presence of Lord Hope and H. Dennis Bradley and his wife, three voices spoke in English, one in an Indian dialect, one in Hindustani, one in Italian, and two in Chinese. Whymant said the latter, which claimed to be the voice of Confucius, was apparently the same one he heard in New York.

Was Confucius actually present? When the question was asked in the Crandon circle in Boston, "Walter" explained the matter this way: "When K'ung-fu-T'zu manifests in our séance room he is not necessarily personally present. However, at the time of Whymant's interview with K'ung-fu-T'zu through Valiantine in trance, the Master was actually present in person."

Further suggestions relating to the problem are found in Mrs. E. Duffey's book Heaven Revised (1889). In answer to her doubts as to the presence of illustrious spirits a vision was given to her, of which she writes: "I beheld, or seemed to behold—for it was not sight, it was a perception as strong as the sense of seeing—a succession of links extending from sphere to sphere and from spirit and spirit, until it had finally found utterance on earth."

Colley heard direct voices in the darkness of the night when sleeping in the same room with Monck, while holding his hand over the mouth of his sleeping companion. During an operation on Eileen Garrett in 1931, while she was unconscious and gagged, the doctors in attendance heard voices in her proximity. One voice spoke in a tongue that none of the doctors understood. According to Reid Clanny's account of the strange case of Mary Jobson, individuals connected with the Jobsons were sometimes accosted in their own homes by a voice that spoke in the presence of the girl and they were told to go and see her.

In the first attempts at communication or when the spiritual power was insufficient, the direct voice was feeble or hoarse, writers said. With an increase of power or practice it became characteristic in tone and distinctive in enunciation. It had a conspicuous selective intelligence, tending to address itself to the right person in the right language.

As soon as the power began to ebb, the trumpet was used increasingly. This waning of power is curiously described in Mrs. G. K. Hack's notes of the July 8, 1928, séance in Millesimo Castle: "The power suddenly failed and consequently the pronunciation of the words he used became confused and the sounds almost inarticulate, until at last they became a sort of prolonged whistle which gradually extinguished itself and formed itself into a mournful sigh."

The general strength of the voice varied individually. Sir Arthur Conan Doyle heard a voice in Chicago that he could only compare to the roar of a lion. Duguid's voices were usually husky. But on one occasion his speaking was so loud and harsh that the sitters became alarmed and asked the spirit to retire. Similarly, in Mrs. Robert Johnson's séances, remonstrations had to be made because of the volume of the voice.

In Elizabeth Blake's case the voices were occasionally heard at a distance of one hundred feet. "Kokum" and "Hawk Chief" (Valiantine) had tremendous, resounding voices. H. Dennis Bradley recorded that their voices were heard by his wife in a bedroom on the upper floor thirty to forty yards away with all the doors closed. "Kokum's" voice carried to a distance of two hundred yards. Mediums such as Blake, Valiantine, Wriedt, Hazel Ridley, and Mrs. Murphy Lydy often produced the phenomenon in full light. The usual demonstration was to shut the light out of the trumpet with the palm of the medium and hold the small end to the sitter's ear. Mrs. Lydy gave several successful platform demonstrations in this manner in May 1931, in London.

J. B. McIndoe of Glasgow constructed a telephonic apparatus for the hearing of the voice in daylight. A sensitive telephone transmitter was placed under a tightly buttoned, high, black oilskin coat, on the larynx of the medium Andrew McCreadie. The sitters were connected with a telephone receiver through which they could hear voices in daylight. The result was the same if a trumpet was placed with the small end under the oilskin coat on the medium's larynx. Through the large end, if one closely listened, voices came through.

Many and varied experiments were conducted to attempt to prove the reality of the phenomenon. Ventriloquism on the medium's part was the first natural explanation. This was, however, rejected by researchers James H. Hyslop and Hereward Carrington in their respective experiments and was also discounted by J. Malcolm Bird as part of his séances with "Margery."

According to Carrington, at a near range it is impossible for a ventriloquist to produce the illusion of distant sounds or voices; he must then depend upon near ventriloquism, and the nearer the listener's ear to the mouth of the performer the less perfect the illusion, until at quite close range the illusion vanishes altogether and the sounds are correctly located as issuing from the ventriloquist's mouth. There is no such thing as "throwing the voice" across the room, or to any distant location in space he said. The voice merely seems to issue from the spot because the performer distracts the attention of his audience to it. Deprived of light to aid the view, the illusion cannot be produced and the investigators who sit quite close to the medium can immediately locate the voice at its point of origin.

The medium was often asked to hold water in her mouth to see whether the voices were independent. With Emily French, of Buffalo, New York, the voices were tested by Hyslop, Dr. Isaac Kauffmann Funk, and others for a full week. Findlay recorded how often he had his ear at the mouth of the medium Sloan when one or more voices were speaking, yet no sound came from the mouth. In other experiments a special solution was used which, under the effect of the saliva, changed color in proportion to the time during which it was held in the mouth. If one of the sitters also took an amount into his mouth and ejected it at the same time as the medium, the color should be identical. It was by this test that Abraham Wallace claimed to have established the good faith of Susannah Harris.

The Voice Control Machine, designed by Mark Richardson, of Boston, for use in the "Margery" séances was a modern control apparatus. It consisted of a U-shaped tube in which small luminous floats were placed on the surface of the water. The medium blew into a flexible tube that had a specially constructed mouthpiece and caused, by the pressure of air, the second column of water to rise. This position was retained as long as the mouthpiece was tightly held by the medium's lips and tongue. The collapse of the column of water could be immediately detected in the dark by means of the luminous floats.

An even more satisfactory control was devised by psychical investigator B. K. Thorogood. This was a cubical box, made of layers of seven different materials, completely sound proof, closed and padlocked, containing a large, very sensitive microphone, connected by two wires emerging from the box to a distant loudspeaker. While sitters in the séance room heard nothing, the voice of "Walter" issued from the loudspeaker in the distant room, suggesting that the voice had its origin through the microphone in the box. Under such conditions the independence of the voices in the "Margery" séances seemed proved.

In direct voice communications there are two elements of the paranormal—the voice in space and the contents of the message. If it turns out that the trumpet was actually used by the medium in the dark the validity of the communication may yet be established by the other criterion. Hereward Carrington, whose book The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism (1907) described many possibilities of fraud, pointed out that many investigators attended trumpet séances quite convinced that the medium did the talking. They contended that the content of the messages was the important thing.

There are many reports of voices heard in daylight with no obvious human source. In The Blue Room (1927), Clive Chapman describes séances with the New Zealand medium Pearl Judd, when direct voices were heard in a well-lighted room. Contemporary researcher D. Scott Rogo also reports similar cases in his book An Experience of Phantoms (1974). Well-researched poltergeist cases occasionally include voices originating in space in daylight.

Direct voice whispers in semidarkness were heard at sittings with Gladys Osborne Leonard. Her control "Feda" claimed to hear communicators talking in front of the medium. She conveyed their messages, which were not heard by sitters. Later confirmation came when sitters also heard the entities talking in whispered words. Robert Blatchford was convinced that his wife is spirit spoke to him in her particular manner of speech. Medium Leslie Flint was tested by C. Drayton Thomas in 1948 and by Robert Chapman of the Sunday Express newspaper and members of the Society for Psychical Research in 1971 and 1972, when use was made of throat microphones and night-sight binoculars.

Historically, the Davenport brothers and Jonathan Koons of Ohio were the first mediums through whom direct voice phenomena were reported. It was "John King" who introduced it, and it was also this control who invented the use of the trumpet in séances.

Voice mediumship is one of the most dramatic forms of supernormal manifestations. In view of the ease with which it was acquired by H. Dennis Bradley, one may understand his enthusiastic forecast in The Wisdom of the Gods (1925): "Communication with the spirits in their actual voices may, within this century, become as simple as the telephone or wireless. In fact, it seems to me that it is a new and phenomenal form of wireless communication." In recent times, the electronic voice phenomenon, popularly known as Raudive voices seems to have partially realized this hoped-for development. It uses a simple diode circuit and records claimed paranormal voices on a tape recorder.

Sources:

Bailey, Wilson, G. No, Not Dead, They Live. Camden, NJ: I. F. Huntzinger, 1923.

Barbanell, Maurice. The Trumpet Shall Sound. London, Psychic Press, 1933.

Bayless, Raymond. Voices from Beyond. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1975.

Bradley, H. Dennis. —And After. London, 1931.

———. Towards the Stars. London, 1924.

Drouet, Bessie C. Station Astral. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1932.

Flint, Leslie. Voices in the Dark: My Life as a Medium. New York: Bobbs-Merrill, 1971.

Hack, Gwendolyn K. Modern Psychic Mysteries: Millesimo Castle, Italy. London, 1929.

Moore, W. Usborne. The Voices. London, 1913.

Pincock, Jenny O'Hara. Trails of Truth. London, 1930.

Randall, Edward E. The Dead Have Never Died. London, 1918.

Sewell, May W. Neither Dead nor Sleeping. London, 1921.

Smith, Susy. She Spoke to the Dead. New York: Award Books, 1972.

Thomas, C. Drayton. "A New Hypothesis Concerning Trance-Communications." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 48 (May 1947).

Direct Writing

The claimed phenomenon in Spiritualism of spirit writing that is produced directly without visible physical contact with the medium and sometimes without writing material. It dispenses with mechanical contrivances such as the planchette and Ouija board and bypasses table tipping or table turning.

Eusapia Palladino is reported to have rubbed the end of her finger with blue chalk, asked Charles Richet to hold it, and, advancing to the table, drew two crosses over the tabletop in the air. The blue marks disappeared from her finger, and the crosses were found on the underside of the table. She also drew scrawls on Richet's jacket with the fingers of F. W. H. Myers, who was present. A blue mark was found on Richet's shirt front under the waistcoat. Then, holding Richet's clean finger as though it were a pencil, she drew a blue line on a piece of white paper in good light. A Professor Schiaparelli bought a block of new writing paper and asked Palladino to write her name. She grasped his finger and moved it over the paper as if it were a pen; the writing was found inside the block.

One of the most well known forms of direct writing was that made popular by the mediums Henry Slade and William Eglinton—slate writing. Slate writing was, of course, one of the easiest of phenomena to fake and Slade and Eglington were caught in their attempts. In any case, the proximity of the medium to the writing on the slate would throw doubt on the reality of the spirit hypothesis. The most convincing direct writing was that which was not solely dependent upon prepared materials but was produced anywhere and under any circumstances.

Thus, during a poltergeist disturbance in Stratford, Connecticut, in 1850 and 1851, direct writing was found on turnips that sprang apparently from nowhere. An unfinished letter left for a few moments would be found completed in a different hand, although of course during the interval it could easily have been accessible to another human.

In 1856 experiments in direct writing were carried out by the noted Spiritualist Baron L. von Guldenstubbe. He locked paper and pencil in a small box and carried the key around with him. At the end of 13 days he found some writing on the paper; he repeated the experiment with similar success. Later he visited galleries, churches, and other public places, leaving writing materials on the pedestals of statues, on tombs, and so on.

In this way he claimed to obtain direct writing in English, French, German, Latin, Greek, and other languages, purporting to come from Plato, Cicero, St. Paul, Juvenal, Spencer, and Mary Stuart. The baron was accompanied on these expeditions by Comte d'Ourches and other friends, and on one occasion a medium was mentioned as being present. Of course, such communications are in no way evidence of spirit agency, since under such circumstances anybody could have written messages for the baron. However, another experiment on November 24, 1856, was at the baron's own apartment. He recorded that while waiting for two other witnesses to join a séance, the furniture began to creak. Then the medium seated herself at the piano, directing the group to place an untouched packet of paper in a particular spot. The medium played for 15 minutes, then stopped. The packet of paper was opened and communications from "Cicero," "Plato," and "Spencer" were revealed. The baron's book La Realité des Esprits et le phénomène merveilleux de leur Écriture directe (1857) created a sensation.

The Rev. Stainton Moses, a medium with experience of direct voice phenomena, published the first study devoted entirely to direct writing, which he named "psychography." In his Direct Spirit Writing (1878), he discusses his own experiences and those of other individuals. It is an uncritical book, but of great interest for its discussion of the circumstances surrounding the phenomenon. Moses notes that in his own experience there were convulsive movements associated with the writing: "I was slightly convulsed, and my hands were moved under the table while the writing was going on beneath."

Moses' investigation of the direct writing of Slade is particularly valuable. Slade's hands were sometimes feverishly hot, and emitted during the writing (which was nearly always in his own hand), crackling and detonating sounds. These detonations occasionally amounted to veritable explosions and even pulverized the slate at times. The pulsations, throbs, and convulsive shudders of Slade's body were frequently communicated to those holding his hands. The claimed "exposure" of Slade by a Professor Lankester was partly based on the observation that the tendons of his wrist were in motion.

Charles E. Watkins of Cleveland, another slate-writing medium, always wrote as if in torture. He claimed he felt a sudden "drawing" from his body and was unable to articulate distinctly. As soon as the writing was finished, with a jerk he was himself again.

This invisible link between medium and direct writing may not be solely physical. Most of the direct scripts of Mrs. Thomas Everitt proved to be quotations from various, sometimes inaccessible books, bearing on the teachings of Swedish seer Emanuel Swedenborg. Because the medium belonged to the Church of the New Jerusalem, her subconscious mind may have had some part in the contents. There is much reason for this supposition—C. C. Massey's experience with Eglinton on April 23, 1884, suggests that even the sitter's subconscious mind may be tapped.

As quoted in John S. Farmer's Twixt Two Worlds (1886), the contents of a very private letter that Massey had written alone in his own room and mailed himself a week before had been rifled, and, taken out of context, passages were woven into a censorious communication. "The postscript was of a peculiarly malicious character, referring to other confidential correspondence of mine of a very delicate and personal nature," Massey complains. "I must own that this particular shot took effect and caused me no small embarrassment and annoyance." Massey at once wrote to his friend in Paris and received the assurance that nobody other than himself saw, read, or heard of the letter.

In Experiences in Spiritualism with D. D. Home (1869), Lord Adare's father is quoted: "A sheet of paper was lying on the edge of the table next to the window, on which a pencil was placed. We presently saw the pencil moving about on the paper. Mr. Home saw the fingers holding it. Adare noticed it also more than once, but of undefined form."

Sir William Crookes recorded his first experience in direct writing with Kate Fox-Jencken: "A luminous hand came down from the upper part of the room, and after hovering near me for a few seconds, took the pencil from my hand, rapidly wrote on a sheet of paper, threw the pencil down, and then rose up over our heads, gradually fading into darkness."

Robert Dale Owen saw, in a sitting with Slade on February 9, 1874, in sufficient gas light, a white, feminine, marblelike hand, detached and shaded off at the wrist, creep up his knees, write on the notepaper placed there on a slate, then slip back with the pencil under the table. Five minutes later the performance was repeated by a smaller hand that resembled the first.

Such experiences are reminiscent of that most dramatic account in the biblical book of Daniel (5:5): "In the same hour came forth fingers of a man's hand, and wrote over against the candlestick upon the plaster of the wall of the king's palace; and the king saw the part of the hand that wrote."

There are many instances on record when apparently fully materialized phantoms have left written messages behind. The spirits of George Spriggs sat down to write letters, "Katie King" left behind farewell messages when she took her leave. "Friedrich," a materialized form different from the medium S. F. Sambor both in stature and gesture, wrote something on the inside of a watch belonging to "Mr. S." in Petersburg.

There is a case so unique that it can only be called an instance of direct automatic writing. "The Mahedi," a materialized phantom associated with the medium Francis W. Monck, wrote in Egyptian characters. The Mahedi was then controlled by Monck's guide, "Samuel," who spoke through him and wrote with his hand in English characters that Thomas Colley, from comparison with pieces of direct writing, found to be in "Samuel's" hand. Colley observed that, while the writing was going on, the medium, standing some seventeen feet away, involuntarily or absentmindedly moved his hand and said afterward that he felt his hand wanting to write, yet he did not know what was being written.

During a séance with D. D. Home, Crookes desired to see the actual production of a written message. Crookes noted:

"Presently, the pencil rose up on its point, and after advancing by hesitating jerks to the paper, fell down. It then rose and again fell. A third time it tried but with no better results. After three unsuccessful attempts, a small wooden lath, which was lying near upon the table, slid towards the pencil and rose a few inches from the table; the pencil rose again, and propping itself against the lath, the two together made an effort to mark the paper. It fell, and then a joint effort was again made. After a third trial the lath gave it up and moved back to its place, the pencil lay as it fell across the paper, and an alphabetic message told us—'We have tried to do as you asked, but our power is exhausted.' "

Led by a similar desire, Moses made the following observations in an out-of-the-body experience from "the other side":

"It was not done, as I had imagined, by guiding my hand or by impressing my mind, but was by directing on to the pen a ray which looked like a blue light. The force so directed caused the pen to move in obedience to the will of the directing spirit. In order to show me that the hand was a mere instrument not essential to the experiment, the pen was removed from the hand, and kept in position by the ray of light which was directed upon it. To my great astonishment it moved over the paper and wrote as before. I cried out with astonishment and was warned to keep still lest I should break the conditions."

Horace Greeley quoted in Putnam's Monthly Magazine the experience of former Senator James F. Simmons of Rhode Island in obtaining direct writing by a pencil dropped through the ring of a pair of scissors. The pencil stood firmly poised and slowly and deliberately traced the words "James D. Simmons." The handwriting was a facsimile of his deceased son's signature. It was obtained in daylight.

In direct-writing séances with Everitt, Crookes noticed that no matter how thin the paper was, the pencil produced no indentation. Nevertheless, it was clear that the pencil had been used, since once, the words appeared double, because the lead had a double edge. Another supernormal phenomenon was the speed with which the scripts were delivered and the success in overcoming the handicaps that had been experimentally set up. The paper had often been placed in a closed book, in a locked box and slates; the sheets were marked and writing was demanded on a given page in a book or on folded sheets in a sealed envelope. In Everitt's case, the writing often covered one side of the marked sheet and when, after examination, the light was again extinguished, it was continued on the back side of the same paper. Everitt's husband, Thomas, declared during meeting of the Marylebone Association of Inquirers into Spiritualism that he had known as many as 936 words to be written in a second.

To test the powers of the medium Sambor, a cone of sheet iron was prepared under the direction of the head of the printing works at Petersburg. A piece of paper and a pencil were placed inside. The engineers had an iron lid fixed on with special rivets. The cone was then left for several days in a room that Sambor never entered. In a later séance Sambor declared that writing would be found in the cone. After much difficulty, the cone, which was found intact, was opened. The paper was inscribed with a few words.

The direct writing produced by Lujza L. Ignath in Oslo (September 30, 1931) on wax tablets in a closed box appeared, under microscopic enlargement, to have been "melted" into the wax by fine rays, swinging together from the direction of the sitters.

The writing may be in the medium's hand or in strange characters. The language of the writing may also vary and the script may contain words or sentences desired by the company.

The Beginning of Direct Writing

The scene of the most ancient instance of direct writing was perhaps Mount Sinai, where Moses obtained the Ten Commandments. The first modern record of experiments is to be found in Baron von Guldenstubbe's book La Réalité des Esprits. The phenomenon was observed during the poltergeist disturbances in the house of a Rev. Phelps at Stratford in 1850. Direct scripts were delivered in the locked spirit room of the Koon log house in Vermont.

Mary Marshall, the first English professional medium, produced direct writing on sheets of glass that were smeared over with a composition of oil and whitening and kept under the table. This was the rudimentary beginning of slate writing, of which the first English account, with Marshall in 1861, was published by Thomas P. Barker.

The explanation often given at to why slate writing came into vogue is that it furnished a comparatively quick message from departed friends without an excessive drain on the medium, since the space between the slates served as a convenient dark chamber. However, the process was abandoned in the early twentieth century. Laura Pruden, of Cincinnati was one of the last mediums claiming to produce the phenomenon. Hereward Carrington perhaps explains its loss of popularity: "Now there are so many different ways by which such writing [slate writing] may be obtained by trickery that it is almost impossible to obtain conclusive evidence by this means. Personally, I have never seen a genuine example, in all the years during which I have been investigating this question." This statement also refers to his experiences with Pierre Keeler, with whom he had two sittings at Lily Dale, the Spiritualist camp, in 1907 (he came to the conclusion that fraud was practiced on both occasions) and the sitting with Laura Pruden, of Cincinnati. In the latter case, Carrington admitted that the evidence was not so conclusive; indeed, his detailed account fails to show anything but a strongly imaginative possibility of fraud.

Henry Slade, Monck, Eglinton, Watkins, and W. H. Powell were the best-known exponents of slate writing. The commotion caused by the Slade trial resulted in some interesting public testimonies. William Barrett, in a letter quoted in the book Psychography by Moses, declares that he noted the same suspicious circumstances to which Lankester alluded and also that Slade always sat with his back to the light and sideways, so that the front of his person was in comparative shade, though generally in full view. Barrett suspected fraud, but instead of forcibly interrupting Slade to discover whether the writing was already on the slate when it was not supposed to be, he took a clean slate, placed a crumb of a slate pencil below, held it firmly down with his elbow and only allowed the tips of Slade's fingers to touch the slates. He observes:

"While closely watching both of Slade's hands which did not move perceptibly, I was much astonished to hear scratching going on apparently on the under side of the table, and when the slate was lifted up I found the side facing the table covered with writing. A similar result was obtained on other days; further, an eminent scientific man obtained writing on a clean slate when it was held entirely in his own hand, both of Slade's being on the table."

In a letter to the Spectator of October 6, 1877, Alfred Russel Wallace describes a remarkable experiment. The sitting was held in a private house with the medium Monck. Two slates were examined, cleaned, and tied together by Wallace and placed on the table, never out of his sight. Monck asked Wallace to name a word he wished to be written on the slate inside. He named the word "God." Monck then asked how it should be written. He replied: "lengthways of the slate and with a Capital G." In a very short time writing was heard on the slate. The medium's hands were convulsively withdrawn, Wallace himself untied the cord, and on opening the slates found on the lower one the word written in the manner he asked.

The general procedure with Slade was to place the slates under the table against the slab or lay his hands over them on top of the table. The process of writing (a scratching sound) was not only heard, but the tremors could be felt if a hand was placed over the locked slate. The finishing of the message was usually indicated by raps. The crumb of slate pencil, worn away, was usually found at the end of the written line.

With other slate-writing mediums the conditions varied. In Mrs. Harman's case, as reported by J. L. O'Sullivan (former American minister in Portugal), a steady stream of rapid little ticks was audible. In the case of Mrs. Francis, of San Francisco, the direct movement of the pencil on the slate was seen by Elliot Cowes and E. Coleman. Charles E. Watkins was offered $50,000 by Hiram Sibley, of Rochester, for the secret of his slate-writing trick. He claimed he did not know it himself. E. Crowell asked how the writing was effected and received the following answer in a séance with Slade: "The smaller the pencil the more easily we can write, the larger the pencil the greater the difficulty. We move the point by our willpower entirely, and that enables us to write. Very few spirits can directly control the pencil. That is the reason why the medium's wife comes so often to show other spirits how to do this."

Precipitated Writing

Fred P. Evans, of San Francisco, obtained slate writing in colored chalk. The phenomenon was witnessed by Wallace in San Francisco in 1887. Two thick lines drawn across the slate with a slate pencil seemed to prove that the colored chalk, not provided by the medium, was precipitated after the slates had been locked. Examples of precipitated writing offer some of the more curious instances of psychic phenomena on record.

There is, for example, the case of Moses' interaction with his several spirit controls. Moses wrote a note beneath the signature of "Imperator" under a communication received on March 3, 1876: "While I was writing the above automatically, the underwritten pencil letters grew under my hand. No pencil was near me. I watched them from time to time, merely covering the page so as to get darkness." On his inquiry he was told by "Prudens" that it was not necessary for the communicators to have the materials for direct writing. As a demonstration, "Magus" wrote in blue when there was no blue pencil in the room and produced a red message in a closed book. When Moses asked for a message in multicolors, the names of various controls were signed in a closed book after a count of five in red, blue, and black pencils.

Henry Steel Olcott also obtained colored slate writing with the medium Cozine without the use of pencil or crayon "Papus" (pseudonym of Gérard Encausse) in a lecture before the Society d'Etudes Psychiques at Nancy in 1907, related:

"In 1889 a well-known magnetiser, named Robert, had succeeded in putting two subjects to sleep, a man and a girl, and he placed them in such a state of hypnosis that these subjects projected characters and lines of writing on blank sheets of paper, without using a pencil or pen. The characters appeared of themselves on the paper. Dr. Gibier and I went to study this phenomenon. During this séance we were able to obtain in full light on a sheet of paper, signed by twenty witnesses, the precipitation of a whole page of written verses signed 'Corneille.' I examined the substance which formed the writing under the microscope and I was led to the conclusion that it consisted of globules of human blood, some altered and as if calcined, others still quite distinct. 'Papus' believed that the blood of the medium and his nervous force exteriorized itself and reconstructed itself at a distance. The medium was preparing for the stage and had studied Corneille during the whole of the preceding day" (Annales des Sciences Psychiques, 1907).

Sometimes direct writing was witnessed in strange forms. Blavatsky's Posthumous Memoirs, published by Joseph M. Wade (1896) in Boston, is claimed to have been produced by the direct spiritual operation of a typewriter. Direct typewriting was also claimed by the Bangs sisters of Chicago.

Sheets of unexposed bromide paper or photographic plates may also be impressed with direct scripts. These messages are called psychographs. They may appear to the medium's eyes like luminous scrolls. The theory is that they are built on ectoplasmic patches. They have been found on the plates of spirit photographers.

In poltergeist cases the phenomenon has also occurred. In The Great Amherst Mystery, Dr. Carritte is standing by Esther Cox's bedside when all present hear the sound of writing on the wall and looking round they see cut deeply into the plaster on the wall the terrible words: "Esther Cox, you are mine to kill." The writing remained visible for years afterward.

Frau Gilbert's control, "Dr. Franciscus Nell," apparently produced direct writing by engraving his name on cigarette cases held under the table.

Writing in fire (i.e., by psychic lights) is another variety of direct writing. In a séance with Ada Bessinet, Admiral Usborne Moore saw names traced in the air in front of the sitter in letters of bright light. The effect was not permanent and the beginning of a letter disappeared before the end was completed. James Hyslop writes in Contact with the Other Worlds (1919) of his experiences with the medium Miss Burton: "The messages were written in letters of fire in the air in pitch darkness and gave cross-references with other psychics. They had to be read sometimes a letter at a time and repeated until I could be certain of them."

Dermography, or skin writing, may also be considered a form of direct writing, related to some aspects of stigmata.

Sources:

Cholmondely-Pennell, H. "Bringing it to Book": Facts of Slate-Writing through Mr. W. Eglinton. London, 1884.

Holms, A. Campbell. The Facts of Psychic Science and Philosophy Collated and Discussed. London, 1925. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1969.

Olcott, Henry Steel. Old Diary Leaves, First Series. Madras, India, 1895.

Owen, J. J. Psychography. San Francisco, 1893.

Disappearances (Paranormal)

History has recorded many instances of mysterious disappearances, sometimes with equally mysterious reappearances. Such incidents are not, however, generally thought of as paranormal, since the evidence is usually anecdotal, reports uncorroborated, and incidents subject to more mundane explanations. In the case of well known or important individuals in the history of politics and religion, kidnapping, secret imprisonment, or assassination may have been responsible for many disappearances. In the case of ordinary folk, many young people throughout history have quarreled with their parents and left home, sometimes dying in foreign wars, or, more likely today, on the streets, victims of crime, prostitution, or drugs. Adults in one kind of difficulty or another have often had good reason for disappearing. There have also been many cases of genuine amnesia, or loss of memory, resulting in the victim's traveling far from home and reappearing without any clear recollection of what happened.

Many such explanations are equally valid for the thousands of disappearances every year in many countries of the world in modern times. However, there are a number of cases that remain intriguing mysteries.

For example, in November 1809 Benjamin Bathurst, a member of the British diplomatic service, vanished while returning from a mission to the court of Emperor Francis at Vienna. Bathurst stopped for a meal at an inn in Perleberg, a small German town, and in the evening checked the horses of his carriage. He was seen by witnesses to walk around to the far side of the horses and then disappear. He was never seen or heard of again, in spite of the most extensive investigations.

In the 1550s, in the French town of Artigues, Martin Guerre left his wife and young son one morning, walking in the direction of his father's farm. He disappeared without a trace. Eight years later, he returned and was welcomed by his wife, his four sisters, and his uncle Peter. His father had died. Martin resumed married life and fathered two more children. Three years later, another Martin Guerre turned up, a soldier with a wooden leg who had served in the Flanders war. The first Martin was arrested for impersonation, and even Uncle Peter changed his mind and said he was an impostor. At the trial, 150 witnesses were examined, and their evidence was conflicting. Martin's brothers took the side of the arrested man, who presented his case convincingly. Eventually Martin's wife changed her mind and said the man with the wooden leg was the real Martin. The other was imprisoned and executed.

In his books Lo! (1931) and Wild Talents (1932), Charles Fort, the chronicler of the anomalous and inexplicable, recorded a number of mysterious disappearances and reappearances, including other cases with a strange resemblance to the story of Martin Guerre. Fort cited the case of a New York woman around 1920 whose husband was in an insane asylum. The woman was visited by a man who greeted her fondly, claiming to be her husband. The woman accepted him and settled down with him. Some time later she learned that her husband was still in the asylum, and thereupon had the other man arrested. How could she have made a mistake in the first place? Fort noted another case where a man came to a woman whose husband was a sailor and claimed that he was the husband. "Go away!" said she, "you are darker than my husband." "Ah!" said he, "I have had yellow fever." So she accepted him, but later changed her mind and this case also ended in a police court.

Although a wife should surely know her own husband, even after a prolonged absence, it is reasonable to suppose that she might still be mistaken, or have preferred an impostor for reasons of her own. Some other cases of disappearance are apparently inexplicable, especially when various people have disappeared in exactly the same mysterious circumstances.

The Vanishing Children

One night in November 1878, at Quincy, Illinois, Charles Ashmore, age 16, was sent to fetch water from a well. When he did not return his father went to look for him with a lantern. The boy's footprints in the snow ended abruptly. A few days later, his mother heard his voice, as did other members of the family and neighbors, but the boy was never seen again.

On Christmas Eve 1889, 11-year-old Oliver Larch of South Bend, Indiana, also went to a well to fetch water. After a short while, his parents heard him crying out, "Help! Help! They've got me! Help!" The cries seemed to be coming from overhead. Oliver's father and others in the house went to look for the boy, carrying a lamp. Halfway to the well, about 75 feet from the house, the boy's footprints in the snow ended abruptly, and there were no other tracks. The boy had vanished forever.

By an astonishing coincidence, another 11-year-old named Oliver, son of a Mr. Thomas, a farmer at Rhayader in Wales, also vanished while going to fetch water from a well on Christmas Eve 20 years later, in 1909. The boy's footsteps also stopped in the snow, and he too was heard to cry out in terror before disappearing forever.

What happened to these children who vanished under such amazingly similar circumstances? They appeared to have been lifted up into the air. But explanations involving kidnapping balloonists or predatory eagles are too far-fetched to consider. An 11-year-old boy weighs some 75 pounds, far beyond the lifting capacity of an eagle. No balloonists were reported in the areas.

Mass Disappearances

It is not unusual for armies to be decimated in combat, particularly in view of the awesome destructive capabilities of modern armaments, but in most military campaigns there are reasonably satisfactory accounts of the fate of regiments, with a tally of corpses or survivors. However, there have been a few instances in both ancient and modern history where whole armies have disappeared without trace.

An early example dates from the Roman conquests of Britain. About the year 119 C.E., the Ninth Roman Legion, known as "Hispana," was sent to subdue one of several revolts in Brigantia, a confederacy of tribes in northern Britain. The Ninth Legion, Composed of some six thousand men, disappeared without a trace.

Some historians do not accept the evidence for this mass disappearance, but there are other cases in more recent history. During the Gallipoli campaign in World War I, the British First-Fifth Norfolk Regiment under Col. Sir Horace Beauchamp pursued the enemy through forest territory and disappeared without a trace. The regiment was composed of 250 soldiers and 16 officers. Their strange story was reported in an eyewitness account by Gen. Sir Ian Hamilton in a dispatch to Secretary-at-War Earl Kitchener. On the fiftieth anniversary of the Gallipoli landings, former sapper Frederick Reichardt (who had been in the New Zealand Engineers) signed a statement in which he recalled the appearance of a strange, huge cloud about 800 feet long and 220 feet high, into which the ill-fated regiment marched. When this cloud lifted soon afterward, the men had disappeared.

During the Spanish War of Succession (1701–14), an army of four thousand fully equipped troops was reported to have marched into the foothills of the Pyrenees Mountains and disappeared without a trace.

As recently as 1939 a Chinese army of nearly three thousand troops disappeared overnight. They were stationed 16 miles south of Nanking and had orders to fight to the finish. One hundred and thirteen men were detailed to guard a strategically important bridge over which the enemy could advance; the other troops, 2,988 men, dug in at their front line. Col. Li Fu Sien gave the troops their orders and returned to headquarters, a couple of miles behind the front line. In the morning he found no response from the army field telephones and went to investigate. The detachment guarding the bridge was in position and assured the colonel that no enemy forces had passed across the bridge, but the 2,988 men in the front line had all disappeared. If they had deserted en masse, it is strange that they were never heard of again.

Disappearance and Reappearance

There are many stories of mysterious disappearances with equally mysterious reappearances at a great distance, and some old and new examples are discussed elsewhere as incidents of teleportation.

In the case of Spiritualist mediums, the claimed phenomenon usually involves theories of dematerialization (rendering physical matter intangible) with rematerialization at a distance. In the case of inanimate objects or small living creatures (such as insects, birds, snakes), the appearance or disappearance over a distance is termed an apport. To date there is neither a satisfactory theory to account for paranormal transportation, nor any verified case illustrative of its occurrence. Reports of such cases must be considered highly questionable, especially in light of the numerous verified cases of fraudulently produced apports.

The books of Charles Fort meticulously list many accounts of objects or groups of objects that have appeared or disappeared suddenly, including insects, fish, blocks of ice, and unusual artifacts, some the subject of mysterious falls from the sky. Many of these have been explored as products of infrequent but natural phenomena.

Ancient accounts of teleportation of human beings are more impressive than modern ones, insofar as limited means of transport would preclude conventional rapid transit as an explanation. They are, of course, countered by the inability to verify what often comes across as a tall tale. According to Philostratus the Elder (ca. 170–245 C.E.), the great mystic Apollonius of Tyana vanished from a crowded courtroom in Rome and reappeared the same afternoon at Puteoli, 100 miles away. Similar stories are told in the Bible. In the Acts of the Apostles, the apostles were delivered from a prison, though the officers testified "the prison house we found shut in all safety, and the keepers standing before the doors; but, when we opened, we found no man within" (Acts 5:23). St. Philip, after baptizing the Ethiopian, was "caught away by the spirit" and "found at Azotus" (Acts 8:39).

In modern times, an astonishing story was reported of Armando Valdes, corporal in the Chilean army. On April 25, 1977, he was said to have disappeared in front of six of his men, reappearing minutes later. But the calendar on his watch was dated five days ahead and he had grown something like a five-day beard! He could remember nothing of what had happened. Had he been taken five days into the future before being returned? This telescoping of time recalls the folklore of supernatural time in the kingdom of fairies and the legend of Rip Van Winkle.

Another case of apparent time anomaly is the strange story of Rudolph Fentz. In the book Vanishings (1981), author Michael Harrison states that Fentz left his home in Florida in 1876 because his wife objected to his smoking in the house. Fentz went for a walk and was missing for 74 years. In June 1950 he appeared in Times Square, New York City, dressed in the formal wear of 1876—shepherd's plaid trousers, button boots, Prince Albert coat, glossy "plug" hat. He stepped off the pavement and was knocked down by a taxi, dying instantly. His pockets contained $70 in outdated bank notes and two gold certificates. His calling cards showed an address on Fifth Avenue. There was a bill from a livery stable in Lexington Avenue for "feeding and stabling one horse and washing one carriage, $3," but the stables had long ceased to exist and the premises were now occupied by a shop.

In his book Lo!, Fort records that in the town of Romford, Essex, in England, no less than six individuals were found wandering in the streets between 1920 and 1923. All of them "were unable to tell how they got there, or anything else about themselves." Even stranger was the report of a man who was walking down Euston Road in west central London one day, but nine months later found himself working on a farm in Australia.

Many stories have been told of ships that vanish at sea, or even crews that disappear, as in the case of the famous "Mary Celeste." Claims have been made that certain ocean areas, like the so-called Bermuda Triangle, have mysteriously snatched ships and aircraft, though most of these claims have now been laid to rest. One of the most time-honored legends of the sea is that of the Flying Dutchman, condemned to sail his ship from age to age until redeemed by the love of a pure maiden.

One of the strangest disappearances of modern history is surely that of the famous writer Ambrose Bierce (1842–1914?). He had written many strange stories himself, including three about mysterious disappearances. One of these was based on the real-life story of David Lang, a farmer in Gallatin, Tennessee, who was said to have vanished in full view of five other people while crossing a field. A year later, his two children were out walking and heard a man's voice calling for help. They shouted "Father, are you there?" and Lang's voice answered. The children fetched Lang's wife and the calls for help persisted, but got fainter and eventually died out. Bierce visited the farm in Gallatin and based his story "The Difficulty of Crossing a Field" on the incident.

Bierce himself disappeared without a trace some time after 1913. One theory is that he died in Mexico during the civil warfare between Villa and Carranza, but no one really knows how, where, or when he died.

Sources:

Begg, Paul. Into Thin Air: People Who Disappear. North Pomfret, VT: David & Charles, 1979.

Berlitz, Charles, and J. M. Valentine. Without a Trace. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1977.

Fort, Charles. The Books of Charles Fort. New York: Henry Holt, 1941. Reprinted as The Complete Books of Charles Fort. New York: Dover Publications, 1974.

O'Donnell, Elliott. Strange Disappearances. London, 1927. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1972.

Phillips, G. Ragland. Brigantia: A Mysteriography. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1976.

Steiger, Brad. Strange Disappearances. New York: Magnum Books, 1972.

Displacement

A term used in parapsychology for a form of extrasensory perception (ESP) in a test series, in which correct information about targets is displaced backward or forward from the actual target. If there is a consistent pattern of scoring one or two places from the target, this might have significance for ESP instead of just being a series of misses.

Dithorba

Brother of Red Hugh and Kimbay of Irish medieval legend. He was killed by his niece Macha, and his five sons were expelled from Ulster. They resolved to force the sovereignty of Ireland from Macha, but she discovered them in the forest, overpowered them by her magical influence, and carried them to her palace on her back. They are said to have built the famous Irish city of Emain Macha under her supervision.

Divination

The method of obtaining knowledge of the unknown or the future by means of omens. Astrology and the utterances of oracles are usually regarded as branches of divination. The derivation of the word supposes a direct message from the gods to the diviner. Divination was practiced in all grades of primitive communities and civilizations. The methods are many and various, and, strangely enough, in their variety are confined to no one portion of the world.

Crystal gazing and such allied methods as shell hearing may be classed as divination that arises from the personal consciousness of the diviner. Of the same class is divination by dreams, automatic writing, and so forth. What might be called divination by "luck" is represented by the use of cards, the casting of lots, the use of knuckle bones as in Africa and elsewhere, or coconuts as in Polynesia. Haruspicy, or the inspection of entrails, divination by footprints in ashes, by the flight of birds, or by meeting with ominous animals, represents still a third class of divination.

The art of divination is usually practiced among primitive races by the shaman caste; among more sophisticated peoples by the professional diviner—as in Rome and ancient Mexico—and even among modern civilized people by persons who claim the faculty of divination, such as the Spiritualist medium or the witch.

The art is undoubtedly of great antiquity. It was employed in ancient Egypt side by side with astrology, and divination by dreams was constantly resorted to, a class of priests being kept apart, whose office it was to interpret dreams and visions. Instances of dreams are recorded in the ancient Egyptian texts; for example those of Thothmes IV, king of Egypt in 1450 B.C.E., and Nut-Amen, king of the Eastern Soudan and Egypt about 670 B.C.E. The Egyptian magician usually set himself to procure dreams for his clients by such devices as the drawing of magic pictures and the reciting of magic words, and some of these are still extant. In Egypt, however, divination was usually effected by astrological methods.

In ancient China the principal method of divination was by means of the oracles, but such forms as the examination of the marks on the shell of a tortoise, are also found; they are similar to the examination of the back of a peccary by the Maya of Central America. Chinese monarchs consulted the fates in this manner in 1146 B.C.E. and found them unfavorable, but as in Egypt, most soothsaying was accomplished by means of astrology. Omens, however, were by no means ignored, and were given great prominence, as many tales in the ancient books testify.

In ancient Rome a distinct caste or college of priests called augurs was set apart to interpret the signs of approval or disapproval sent by the gods in reference to any coming event. This college probably consisted originally of but three members, of whom the king himself was one, and it was not until the time of Cæsar that the members were increased to 16. The college remained in existence as late as the fourth century, and its members held office for life.

A tenet of the Roman augurs was that for signs of the gods one must look toward the sky and glean knowledge of the intentions of the divine beings from such omens as the flash of lightning and the flight of birds.

On a windless night, the augur took up a position on a hill that afforded an extensive view. Marking out a space for himself, he pitched a tent, seated himself and covered his head, asked the gods for a sign, and waited for an answer. He faced southward, thus having the east (lucky) quarter on his left, and the west (unfavorable) portion of the sky on his right. He carefully observed every sign that came within the scope of his vision, such as lightning, the appearance of birds, and so forth. Birdsong was carefully listened to and divided into sounds of good or evil omen. The reading of omens was also effected by feeding the birds and observing the manner in which they ate. The course of animals and the sounds they made were also closely watched, and all unusual phenomena were regarded as omens or warnings. Sortilege, or the casting of lots, was often resorted to by the caste of augurs.

The election of magistrates was nearly always referred to the diviners, as was the dispatching of an army for war and the passing of laws.

In the East divination generally appears to have been effected by crystal gazing, dreams, and similar methods of self-hallucination or self-hypnotism. Divination flourished in Chaldea and Assyria among the Babylonians and Ethiopians, and appears to have been much the same as in Egypt. In the Jewish Talmud witches were said to divine by means of bread crumbs. Among the Arabs, the future was often foretold by means of the shapes seen in sand. The Burmese and Siamese pierced an egg at each end, and having blown the contents onto the ground, traced within them the outline of things to be. Divination by astrology too was common in oriental countries, as were the predictions of prophets.

It is remarkable that among the native races of America the arts of divination known to the peoples of the Old World were, and still are, used. These arts, as a rule, were the preserve of the medicine man and priestly class. In ancient Mexico there was a college of augurs like the auspices of ancient Rome; the members occupied themselves with observing the flight of birds and listening to their songs, from which they drew their conclusions. In Mexico, the Calmecac, or college of priests, had a department where divination was taught in all its branches, but there were many ex officio prophets and augurs.

In Peru, still other classes of diviners predicted by means of the leaves of tobacco, or the grains or juice of coca, the shapes of grains of maize, taken at random, the forms assumed by the smoke rising from burning victims, the viscera of animals, the course taken by spiders, and the direction in which fruits might fall. The professors of these methods were distinguished by different ranks and titles, and their training was long and arduous.

The American tribes as a whole were keen observers of bird life. Strangely enough the bird and serpent are combined in their symbolism and in the names of several of their principal deities. The bird appeared to the American primitive as a spirit, in all probability under the spell of some potent enchanter—a spell that might be broken only by some great sorcerer or medicine man.

As among the ancient Romans, the birds of America were divided into those of good and evil omen, and certain Brazilian tribes apparently thought the souls of dead Indians entered into the bodies of birds. The shamans of certain tribes of Paraguay acted as go-betweens for the members of their tribes and such birds as they imagined enshrined the souls of their departed relatives. This usage would appear to combine the acts of divination and necromancy.

The priesthood of Peru practiced oracular methods by "making idols speak," and this they probably accomplished through ventriloquial arts. The piagés or priests of the Uapés of Brazil had a contrivance known to them as the paxiuba, which consisted of a tree trunk about the height of a man, on which the branches and leaves had been left. Holes were bored in the trunk beneath the foliage, and when the priests spoke through these the leaves trembled and the sound was interpreted as a message from Jurupari, one of their principal deities.

But all over the American continent, from the land of Eskimos to that of the Patagonians, the methods of oracular divination were practically identical. The shaman, or medicine man, raised a tent or hut that he entered, carefully closing the aperture after him. He then proceeded to make his incantations, and in a little while the entire lodge trembled and rocked; the poles bent to a breaking point, as if a dozen strong men were straining at them, and the most violent noise came from within, seeming first to emanate from the depths of the earth, next from the air above, and then from the vicinity of the hut itself.

The reason for this disturbance has never been properly explained, and medicine men who were converted to Christianity assured workers among the Native American tribes that they had not the least idea of what occurred during the time they occupied these enchanted lodges, for they were plunged into a deep sleep. After the supernatural sounds had to some extent faded away, the medicine man proceeded to question the spirit he had evoked. The answers were generally ambiguous, like those of the Pythonesses of ancient Greece.

Divination by hypnosis was well known in America. Jonathan Carver, who traveled among the Sioux about the latter part of the eighteenth century, mentioned it was used among them. The Ghost Dance religion of the Native Americans of Nevada had for one of its tenets the belief in hypnotic communion with the dead.

Divination by means of dreams and visions was extremely common in both subcontinents of the Western Hemisphere, as exemplified by the derivation of the word priest in the native languages. The Algonquians called them"dreamers of the gods;" the Maya, "listeners," and so forth. The ability to see visions was usually quickened by the use of drugs or the swallowing or inhalation of cerebral intoxicants, such as tobacco, maguey, coca, the snake plant, and others. Indeed many Native American tribes, such as the Creeks, possessed numerous plants that they cultivated for this purpose. A large number of instances are on record in which Native American medicine men were said to have divined the future in a most striking manner.

For example, in his autobiography, Black Hawk, a celebrated Sac chief, related that his grandfather had a strong belief that in four years' time "he should see a white man, who would be to him as a father." Supernaturally directed, he traveled eastward to a certain spot, and there, as he had been informed in dreams, met with a Frenchman who concluded an alliance between France and the Sac nation. Coincidence is certainly possible in this case, but not in the circumstances of Jonathan Carver. While was dwelling with the Killistenoes they were threatened with a famine, and their very existence depended on the arrival of certain traders, who brought them food in exchange for skins and other goods. The diviners of the tribe were consequently consulted by the chief, and announced that the next day, at high noon exactly, a canoe would make its appearance with news of the anxiously awaited expedition. The entire population came down to the beach in order to witness its arrival, accompanied by the incredulous Carver, and, to his intense surprise, at the very moment forecast by the shamans a canoe rounded a distant headland, and, paddling speedily shorewards, the navigators brought the patient Killistenoes news of the expedition they expected.

John Mason Brown recorded an equally singular instance of the prophetic gift of an American medicine man (see Atlantic Monthly, July 1866). Difficulties experienced while searching for a band of Native Americans the Mackenzie and Coppermine rivers had forced the majority of Brown's band to return home, until out of ten men who originally set out only three remained. They had almost decided to abandon their search when they stumbled upon a party of braves of the tribe they sought. These men had been sent out by their medicine man to find three white men. The shaman had given them an exhaustive account of the men's horses, equipment, and general appearance before they set out, and this the warriors related to Brown before they saw his companions. Brown asked the medicine man how he had been able to foretell their coming. The shaman, who appeared to be "a frank and simple-minded man," could only explain that "he saw them coming, and heard them talk on their journey."

Crystal gazing was in common use among many Native American tribes. The Aztecs of Mexico used to gaze into small polished pieces of sandstone, and a case is on record in which a Cherokee Indian kept a divining crystal wrapped in buckskin in a cave, occasionally "feeding" it by rubbing over it the blood of a deer. At a village in Guatemala, the traveler John L. Stephens saw a remarkable stone that had been placed on the altar of a temple, but that had previously been used as a divining stone by the Indians of the village.

Divination by arrow was also common. According to Fuentes y Guzmán, the chronicler of Guatemala, the reigning king of Kiche, Kicah Tanub, when informed by the ambassador of Montezuma II that a race of irresistible white men had conquered Mexico and were proceeding to Guatemala, sent for four diviners, whom he commanded foretell the result of the invasion. Taking their bows they discharged some arrows against a rock. They returned to inform their master that, because no impression had been made upon the rock by the arrowheads, they foresaw the worst and predicted the ultimate triumph of the white man—an incident that shows that the class to which they belonged stood in no fear of royalty. Kicah Tanub, dissatisfied, sent for the "priests," obviously a different class of diviners, and requested their opinions. From the omen of an ancient stone (brought from afar by their forefathers) having been broken, they also foretold the fall of the Kiche empire.

Many objects such as small clay birds, boats, or boat-shaped vessels, have been discovered in sepulchral mounds in North America, and it is conjectured that these may have been used for purposes of divination.

Portents, too, were implicitly believed in by the American races. Nezahualpilli, king of Tezcuco, near Mexico, was accomplished in this type of divination. Montezuma consulted him concerning the terrible prodigies that startled his people before the advance of the Spaniards upon his kingdom, and that were supposed to predict the return of Quetzalcoatl, the legendary culture-hero of Anahuac, to his people. These included earthquakes, tempests, floods, and the appearance of comets and strange lights while mysterious voices were heard in the air.

Divination has persisted in modern civilizations. Perhaps one of the most remarkable diviners was Nostradamus (Michael de Nostradame, 1503–66) who published hundreds of prophecies in enigmatic verses. Many believe these prophecies refer to events that have occurred through the centuries and that some will be fulfilled in the near future. The seventeenth-century astrologer William Lilly predicted the Great Plague of London in 1665 and the Great Fire in the following year.

In addition to such gifted individuals who seemed to be able to discern future events through signs and visions, there are also popular techniques by which ordinary people believe they can gain knowledge of the hidden present or future. As well as the popular practice of astrology, there are many fortune-telling systems such as dream interpretation, palmistry, and the tarot cards. Many such systems were successfully revived in the occult boom of the 1960s. Perhaps one of the most interesting revivals was that of the ancient Chinese system of the I Ching, where divination of present and future events is associated with a deeper philosophy of the function of destiny in human affairs.

Psychical researchers have recorded many cases of spontaneous prevision of future events, although there is as yet no satisfactory explanation for such phenomena involving clairvoyance, telepathy, or dreams.

Dowsing, or water-witching, is another form of divination, although it relates mainly to the discovery of hidden water, metals, or other information. The use of a twig or rod by the operator is reminiscent of the magic wand or the tripod of occult magicians in the practice of necromancy. It also seems related to the rationale of table turning, planchette and Ouija board in Spiritualism. Divination proper, however, is a system of interpreting hidden knowledge rather than eliciting information through the intervention of spirits. One development of dowsing of special interest is the art of radiesthesia, where pendulums are used instead of a dowsing rod, for the purpose of eliciting a wider range of information, such as ascertaining states of health or disease, prescribing remedies, tracing missing persons, or even divining distant events.

Some of the seventy or so most well defined systems of divination such as axinomancy, belomancy, and capnomancy are the subject of separate entries in this encyclopedia, as are such specialized related studies as astrology, crystal gazing, and palmistry.

Popular interest in divination continues to flourish in modern times and even to increase with the uncertainties and anxieties of economic and political life. Gypsies are still reputed to have hereditary talents for fortune-telling.

National newspapers carry daily astrological indications, and the use of tarot cards is widespread, but the art of divination still seems to require some basic or developed talent that no mechanistic system can entirely dispense with. A pertinent statement is that of the psychical researcher Count Cesar de Vesme: "Any system . . . is good for the man gifted with supernormal powers, and any system is bad for the man not so gifted."

Sources:

Aylesworth, Thomas. Astrology and Foretelling the Future; A Concise Guide. Danbury, CT: Watts, 1973.

Barrett, Sir William, and Theodore Besterman. The Divining Rod: An Experimental and Psychological Investigation. London, 1926. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1926.

Besterman, Theodore. Crystal Gazing. London, 1924. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1965.

Black Hawk. Autobiography. St. Louis, Mo., 1882.

Bouche-Leclerq, Auguste. Histoire de la Divination dans l'Antiquite. 4 vols. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Collins, Rodney. The Theory of Celestial Influence. London: Stuart & Watkins, 1955.

Connor, W. R. Roman Augury and Etruscan Divination. New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Deutch, Yvonne, ed., and F. Strachan, comp. Fortune Tellers. London, 1976. Reprint, New York: Black Watch, 1974.
Ebon, Martin. Prophecy in Our Time. New York: New American Library, 1969. Reprint, London: Alhambra, 1971.
Freedland, Nat. The Occult Explosion. New York: G. Putnam's Sons, 1972.
Gibson, W. B., and L. K. Gibson. The Complete Illustrated Book of Divination and Prophecy. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1973. Reprint, London: Souvenir Press, 1974.
Grand Orient [A. E. Waite]. Complete Manual of Occult Divination. 2 vols. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1972.
Halliday, W. R. Greek Divination: A Study of Methods and Principles. London: Macmillan, 1913.
Hill, Douglas. Fortune Telling. London: Hamlyn, 1972.
Jahoda, G. The Psychology of Superstition. London, 1969. Reprint, Baltimore, Md: Penguin, 1971.
Kao, James. Chinese Divination. Smithtown, N.Y.: Exposition Press, 1980.
Legge, James, trans. I Ching; Book of Changes. 1899. Reprint, New York: Dover Publications, 1963.
Manas, John H. Divination: Ancient and Modern. New York: Pythagoran Society, 1947.
McIntosh, Christopher. The Astrologers and Their Creed. London: Hutchinson, 1969. Reprint, New York: Praeger, 1970.
Miall, A. M. Complete Fortune Telling. Greenberg, 1950. Reprint, Hackensack, N.J.: Wehman, 1962.
Rakoczi, Basil Ivan. Foreseeing the Future. New York: Harper & Row, 1973.
Saltmarsh, H. F. Foreknowledge. London: G. Bell, 1938.
Schoenholtz, Larry. New Directions in the I Ching. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1975.
Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

Divine, Father Major Jealous (ca. 1889–1965)

The man known as Father Divine, the leader of a metaphysical communal group, the Peace Mission Movement, has an obscure origin. The most reliable of several stories that have circulated about his early life is that he was born George Baker in the 1880s on a rice plantation on Hutchinson Island in the Savannah River in Georgia, the son of sharecroppers. Around the turn of the century he appeared in Baltimore, Maryland, where he became the assistant to Samuel Morris, an itinerant preacher who called himself Father Jehovia.

He emerged on his own in 1914 in Brooklyn, New York, as the leader of a small group. Divine had absorbed teachings from Christian Science and New Thought and emphasized healing in his preaching. Around 1919 he moved to Sayville, New York, and in the early 1920s had fewer than 50 followers. However, by this time he had been accepted by his followers as God, a much easier affirmation from a New Thought perspective, which emphasized an impersonal imminent divine reality rather than the personal deity of traditional Christianity. Through the late 1920s and into the early 1930s, his following grew steadily, made up primarily of black people but with a measurable number of whites.

In 1931 an incident occurred that lifted him from obscurity. In response to complaints from Divine's neighbors, the police arrested him for disturbing the peace. He complained of racial discrimination, but was tried and convicted. Overriding the jury's request for leniency, the judge sentenced him to a year in jail. Two days later the judge died of a heart attack. When told of the judge's death, Divine was reported to have remarked, "I hated to do it!" The widely reported remark made him a nationally known figure, especially in the African American community. (To this day the Peace Mission publishes accounts of disasters suffered by people whose behavior does not conform to the mission's teachings.) His conviction was reversed a few days later and Divine moved with his followers to Harlem. The country was then in the midst of the Great Depression, and the movement spread and prospered. He offered people very inexpensive food and shelter, opened an employment service, and most importantly, daily demonstrated God's abundance by throwing lavish banquets at which good food was served in generous portions. When people adhered to the movement, they were expected to conform their life to its economic teachings. They had to get a job, pay off their debts, and give their employer a good day's labor for their pay. They had to cancel all insurance, return any stolen money, and for the future pay their own way. They also moved into one of Divine's communal centers, called heavens, and live a celibate communal life. To further assist members, the group formed a variety of businesses in which many members were employed.

In 1946 Divine married Canadian Edna Rose Ritchings, now known as Mother Divine, and their wedding day remains an important holiday for the movement. Around this time he relocated his headquarters to Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and in 1954 moved to Woodmont, an estate in suburban Philadelphia, which was named the Mount of the House of the Lord. Following his death on September 10, 1965, he was enshrined at the estate. Mother Divine succeeded him as head of the movement.

The Peace Mission Movement was one of the most controversial movements of the 1930s and became one of the first groups labeled as a "cult." Its metaphysical teachings were little understood by most observers, and white writers had little sympathy for Divine and his interracial ideals. Only in recent years has he been studied in the context of his metaphysical perspective, his role as an African American leader, and as a human rights activist. The Peace Mission Movement may be contacted c/o Palace Mission Inc., 1622 Spring Mill Rd., Gladwyne, PA 19035-1021. Members can be found in Canada, Germany, Switzerland, Australia, and Nigeria.

Sources:

Burnham, Kenneth E. God Comes to America. Boston: Lambeth Press, 1979.
Divine, Mother. The Peace Mission Movement. Philadelphia: Imperial Press, 1982.
Weisbrot, Robert. Father Divine and the Struggle for Racial Equality. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1983.

Divine Life Society

Founded in March 1933 by the late Swami Sivananda in Rishikesh, India, as an ashram or spiritual retreat for the teaching of traditional Hindu yoga and Vedanta. Situated on the banks of the sacred river Ganges in the foothills of the Himalayas, the ashram is on the main pilgrim route to holy places high in the mountains. Originally, a small group of huts surrounded by jungle, the ashram rapidly grew into a self-contained community with temple, hospitals, pharmacy, printing press, and post office. A Yoga Vedanta Forest Academy was established in 1948, and instruction was also given in the study and practice of spiritual music.

Although not the first ashram of this kind (the settlement of Sir Aurobindo at Pondicherry dates from 1910), the society played a prominent part in reviving the Hindu tradition of forest academies in a modern context, long before the contemporary Western wave of interest in Eastern teachings and mass-media gurus.

In addition to resident monks, the ashram has continued to receive a stream of visitors from abroad as well as devotees from all over India. Some are members of the society, spending a short period of time in sadhana, or spiritual disciplines, others are pilgrims and casual visitors. As a highly concentrated microcosm, the ashram has provided intense spiritual experience for many individuals. Some of the resident swamis later established ashrams in other parts of the world. One of the most famous of these swamis is Vishnudevananda, an exponent of hatha yoga, who established the Sivananda Yoga Vedanta Centers in communities across North America, with headquarters in Quebec.

Upon the death of Swami Sivananda on July 14, 1963, Swami Chidananda succeeded him; the secretarial work of the ashram continued in the hands of Swami Krishnananda, author of several books.

Little known outside India are two ashram music professors. Swami Nadabrahmananda Saraswati, who demonstrated extraordinary applications of kundalini energy to spiritual music, recorded a cassette, Science of Thaan, issued by Ashram Records (Box 9, Kootenay Bay, B.C., Canada VOB 1XO). Another important Hindu musician staying at the ashram seasonally is Swami Parvatikar, an exponent of nada, the yoga of music. He has made a number of recordings, and is included on the record album, Religious Music of India, recorded by Alain Danielou on Folkways Records.

There are also sound recordings of life at the Sivananda Ashram, including The Sounds of Yoga-Vedanta: A Documentary of Life in an Indian Ashram (Folkways Records) and Sounds of Sivananda Ashram, issued by Ashram Records, Canada.

There are now Divine Life Society branches or related organizations on every continent. The Sivananda Ashram may be reached c/o the Divine Life Society, P.O. Sivanandanagar, Dt. Tehri-Garhwal, U.P., Himalayas, India. Related organizations within the Sivananda heritage headquartered in North America include the Yasodhara Ashram, established by Swami Sivananda Radha; Integral Yoga International, headed by Swami Satchidananda; the Holy Shankaracharya Order, founded by Swami Lalshmy Devyashram; the IndoAmerican Yoga-Vedanta Society, headed by Swami Satchidananda Bua Ji; the prana Yoga Ashram, headed by Swami Sivalingam; the Raj-Yofa Math and retreat, headed by Fr. Satchakrananda Bodhisattvaguru; and the Yoga Research Foundation, headed by Swami Jyotirmayananda.

Sources:

Chidananda, Swami. Forest Academy Lectures on Yoga. Rishikish, India: The Author, 1960.

Krishnananda, Swami. Swami Sivananda and the Spiritual Renaissance. Rishikish, India: Sivananda Literature Research Institute, 1959.

Melton, J. Gordon. Encyclopedia of American Religion. Detroit: Gale Research, 1992.

Sivananda, Swami. Autobiography of Swami Sivananda. Shivanandanagar, India: Divine Life Society, 1983.

The Divine Name

In Jewish mysticism great emphasis is placed upon the importance of the Divine Name. It is said to consist of 42 letters; not, as Moses Maimonides pointed out, comprised in one word, but in a phrase of several words that convey an exact notion of the essence of God. With the priestly decadence in the last days of the Temple, a name of 12 letters was substituted for the Divine Name, and as time went on even this secondary name was not divulged to every priest, only to a few. The longer name was sometimes said to contain 45 or 72 letters. The ten Sefiroth are also supposed, in a mystical sense, to be the names of the Deity (see Kabala). The Divine Name Yahveh is greater than "I am that I am," since the latter signifies God as he was before the creation, the Absolute, the Unknowable, the Hidden One, while but the former denotes the Supreme Manifestation, the immanence of God in the Cosmos.

In the course of time, the Divine Name was preserved as a tradition but only whispered aloud once a year by the high priest when he entered the Holy of Holies in the temple on the Day of Atonement. In general usage, the Name was indicated by secondary terms such as Elohim (the god), Adonai (the Lord), or Sabaoth (Lord of Hosts) to avoid the true name's being profaned.

The Shemhamforash (Name That Rusheth Through the Universe) was the greatest of mysteries of kabalistic folklore, which contains many stories of its power, telling how correct utterance of this supreme sound could hasten the redemption of a sick and sinful world. The creative power of divine utterance is indicated in Genesis in the phrase "and God said," which precedes creation; this is repeated in the Christian fourth gospel: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God and the Word was God" (John 1:1).

The concept of the Logos as the Word of God, immanent and creative, derived from Philo Judaeus of Alexandria in the first half-century of the Christian era. Philo fused together traditional Jewish teachings from the Talmud and the Hellenistic philosophy of Greece (influenced by Hindu mysticism). The 72-syllable name became the Tetragrammaton of four-syllable form. A Christian Kabalist of the sixteenth century developed a Pentagrammaton said to increase the power of the Tetragrammaton by adding the letter S to express the name of Jesus.

According to Hindu mysticism, the universe was created through divine utterance, symbolized by a Trigrammaton of three letters: A-U-M. This sacred sound prefixes and concludes reading of Hindu scriptures, and a whole scripture (Mandukya Upanishad) is devoted to its symbolism. AUM is often rendered as OM, the middle syllable being implicit in correct pronunciation, and its repetition constitutes one of the more popular Indian mantras.

Sources:

Schaya, Leo. The Universal Meaning of the Kabbalah. Baltimore, MD: Penguin Books, 1973.

Wood, Thomas E. The Mandukya Upanishad and the Agama Shastra: An Investigation into the Meaning of the Vedanta. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1990.

Divine World

Formerly known as the Adi Plane—is in theosophic belief, the first or highest world, that first formed by the divine impulse in the creative process. It is unattainable by man in his present state according to Theosophy. (See also Solar System; Theosophy)

Divining Rod

A forked rod, or branch of tree, that in the hands of certain people is said to indicate, by means of spasmodic movements of varying intensity, the presence of water and minerals underground. Traditionally the rod is of hazel wood and V-shaped. The ends are held by the operator. Other materials such as right-angle wire rods are claimed to be equally effective. Diviners claim that under the effect of "rhabdic force," the rod twists or revolves when the operator passes over underground water or minerals. The term rhabdic derives from the Greek for rod.

Mention of the rod used for purposes of divination are to be found in the records of ancient Egypt. Cicero and Tacitus both wrote of the rod "virgula divina." This ancient divining rod was a form of rhabdomancy or divination by means of little pieces of stick.

In Germany it was known as the wünschelrute or "wishing-rod" and was used just as fortune-tellers use cards, coffee, or tea grounds today. Agricola's De Re Metallica, published at Basle at the beginning of the sixteenth century, makes reference to another rod, that he calls the "virgula furcata," the forked rod, to distinguish it from the "virgula divina." This rod, he says, was used by miners to discover mineral lodes.

Sixteenth-century Lutheran theologian Phillip Melancthon mentioned this use of the rod and ascribed the behavior of the "instrument" in the discovery of metallic ores to the law of sympathy—the belief that metals, trees, and other natural objects had certain subtle relationships with each other. Believers in this theory pointed to the fact that trees that grew above mineral lodes drooped as though attracted downwards; the scientific explanation attributes this natural phenomenon to the poverty of the soil.

In Sebastian Münster's Cosmography, also written during the sixteenth century, may be found engravings of "mineral diviners" at work. The priests of that time persecuted them as demons in disguise; they were also included in the witchcraft persecutions, suffering tortures and being burned to death.

Among miners on the continent the use of the "virgula furcata" became universal, especially in the Harz Mountains and throughout Saxony. In Germany it was called the Schlagruthe, "striking-rod," because it appeared to strike when held over mineral ores.

Robert Boyle (1627–91), called the "father of chemistry," was one of the first to mention the divining rod in England, in an essay published in 1663. He writes:

"A forked hazel twig is held by its horns, one in each hand, the holder walking with it over places where mineral lodes may be suspected, and it is said that the fork by dipping down will discover the place where the ore is to be found. Many eminent authors, amongst others our distinguished countryman Gabriel Plat, ascribe much to this detecting wand, and others, far from credulous or ignorant, have as eye-witnesses spoken of its value. When visiting the lead-mines of Somersetshire I saw its use, and one gentleman who employed it declared that it moved without his will, and I saw it bend so strongly as to break in his hand. It will only succeed in some men's hands, and those who have seen it may much more readily believe than those who have not."

Some authorities on the subject state that it was first brought to England during the time of Queen Elizabeth. Commissioners were sent to Germany to study the best methods of mining and brought back with them German miners from the Harz Mountains; these foreigners probably introduced the divining rod into England. It was first used to find water in Southern France, but not until a century later was it used in England for that purpose.

It became the "dowsing rod" in England, and Somersetshire might be called the home of the "dowser." The philosopher John Locke, a Somersetshire native, referred in 1691 to the dowsing rod and De Quincey, also from Somersetshire, told of singular cases of "jousers" as he called them. Today this means of finding water is used by farmers and owners of large estates. Dowsers are not geologists who might have a scientific knowledge of the locality—they may be from all walks of life. Among amateur dowsers were Lord Farrer and Andrew Lang.

The rods are mostly cut from hazel, but all kinds of nut and fruit trees have been used; white and black thorn and privet are also favorites. Pieces of watch spring and copper wire are also used, and in some cases the forked rod is dispensed with, the peculiar sensation felt in the arms, hands, and body being enough to indicate the water.

Dowsers wander over the ground with the ends of the fork grasped in the palms of the hands and the rod downward, and when it moves—turning suddenly upward in the hand for water or downward for minerals—at that spot will be found the desired object.

Attempts were often made to investigate the phenomenon scientifically. The electrical or magnetic theory was exploded by Father Kircher in 1654, who balanced the rod on a frictionless support like a delicate pair of scales and found that in this position nothing would induce it to move over hidden water or metal—it must be held by a human being before the movements can occur. In 1854 the French savant Michel Chevreul proposed the theory of involuntary muscular action.

Toward a Theory of Dowsing

Since then there have been many contradictory theories about the agent behind water divining, and there is still no general consensus. Many dowsers claim that they respond to earth "rays" or magnetism. Some believe that a kind of clairvoyant faculty is involved. It is possible that various factors are involved, varying with the talent and skill of the diviner.

It is widely believed that some force acts on the muscles through the nervous system, and that it is stopped by certain materials, such as a silken or woolen glove, rubber shoes, or tight bandages on the arms or legs. The effect has some resemblance to the sensations experienced by sitters in Spiritualist séances.

The diviner is warned that the rod is about to move by a sensation of tingling in the arm and legs, muscular contractions, giddiness, or profuse perspiration. If a particular spot of ground is passed these phenomena immediately cease, leaving a feeling of exhaustion. During the nineteenth century, the Spiritualist investigator Edward W. Cox pointed to the curious analogy that trance subjects are sometimes very sensitive to the touch of steel; they drop it instantly and declare that it feels red hot. Copper affects them similarly, while silver feels cool and gold positively cold.

That some kind of psychic perception is primarily involved, with the movement of the rod only an indicator of that perception, is suggested by the fact that many dowsers do not need to use a rod but rely upon an analysis of their sensations. In her book Essays in Psychical Research (1899), A. Goodrich-Freer reports that the dowser Leicester Gataker relied solely on the sensations experienced in his arm: "His hands, hung down, extended a little outwards, and on observing closely, we could see, from time to time a vibration in the middle fingers which appeared to be drawn downwards, just as in the case of the apex of the twig. His movements throughout were brisk and energetic and his statements were equally definite and decided." Abbé Bouly stated in a lecture in 1928, "I no longer require a rod, I can see the stream with my eyes; I attune my mind; I am looking for lead, I fix my eyes; I feel a wavy sensation like hot air over a radiator; I see it."

There have also been dowsers who react to the presence of underground oil, sometimes reporting sensations of fainting, and their operations have not required the use of a rod.

In the case of John Timms, studied by Oxford scientists in 1924, the demonstration was further complicated by a foreknowledge of where the hidden streams would be found. The attraction of hidden metals on his rod varied in this order: nickel, gold, silver, copper, bronze. Researchers Henri Mager and Lemoine found, independently of each other, that to produce as much action on the divining rod as one gram of gold does, one had to bury 1.2 grams of silver, 6 grams of nickel, 15 of aluminum, 40 of zinc, 75 of lead, and 125 grams of copper.

Depending on what the dowser desires to find he may hold a bottle of water, a piece of metal, an empty tube (in searching for caverns), or a personal object (for a corpse in water) in his hand. Once a stream has been found it is possible, by varying the mineral substances or by holding tubes of bacterial cultures, to determine its alkaline content or infectious state. From the latter discovery the idea was developed in France (by Mlle. Chantereine, a follower of Mager) of using the divining rod for medical diagnosis. Promising results have been recorded in noting human reactions to disease germs, to remedies and foods, and also in noting the difference between radiation produced by a healthy organ as compared with that of an unsound one.

The following physiological explanation was advanced by Dudley Wright:

"All living beings have in their nervous systems cells with retractile branching processes which correspond to the movable condensers in wireless sets and, in addition, the cells of the body are capable of self-induction (on the same principle as wireless) through coiled structures in the nucleus. It is through these that the bodies of men and animals are capable of tuning into the various wavelengths emitted by other people, by other living things, and even by water, minerals and oil. The muscles are supplied by two sets of nerves, viz., (1.) from the cerebro spinal system which controls the voluntary movement of the muscles; (2.) the sympathetic nervous system which controls tension of the muscles both voluntary and involuntary. The rod moves because a change in the tension of our muscles of the hand holding the rod is brought about reflexly through the nervous system by the radiations received."

Mager claimed to have demonstrated two currents traversing the rod, opposite in direction, repelling one another: a discharge current passing from the body of the dowser into the earth on one side, and a return current passing from the earth to the other side of the dowser's body, to his other arm and to the other branch of the rod. He formed the conclusion that the movements of the rod are governed by the laws of electro dynamics as formulated by Ampère in 1820.

Dowsing in France

There has been active interest in dowsing in France for several centuries. In 1635 the Baron and Baroness Beausoleil discovered 150 mineral veins in this manner. They may have been the first to apply the diving rod to finding water as Chevreul in Les Baguettes Divinatoires fixes 1630 as "the most remote date which may be cited for the application of the rod to the discovery of springs, at least in France." The Beausoleils published a book in 1640 (La Restitution de Pluton) and dedicated it to Richelieu. A few years later both the baron and his wife were put into prison on charges of sorcery.

One of the strangest stories of dowsing is that of the French diviner Jacques Aymar, who in 1692 apparently traced murderers through a divining rod and discovered other criminals in the same way.

On July 25, 1692 (the story goes), a wine seller and his wife were murdered. Aymar was asked to help with the investigation. His divining rod became violently agitated at the scene of the crime and led him, like the scent leads a hound, for several days on the track of the murderers. One of them was discovered in a prison and confessed; two others escaped from France.

The procurator general subjected Aymar to other severe tests. He secretly buried the blood-stained hedging bill with which the murder was committed, in different places in the garden. The divining rod indicated the place of burial every time. Despite these successes, Aymar's faculty was a complete failure when subjected to tests in Paris. However, even in modern times, psychic faculties have often failed in an atmosphere of skepticism or hostility.

In 1853 the French Academy of Sciences delegated a commission of inquiry into the divining rod. The immediate reason for the inquiry was D'Hyères Riondet's Memoire sur la Baguette Divinatoire. The report, prepared by Michel Chevreul and published in book form under the title Les Baguettes Divinatoires (1854), is a classical study. It attributes the movement of the rod to the muscular force of the dowser.

Dowsing Researched

Psychical researchers neglected dowsing for some time. Sir William Barrett was its first modern investigator. He experimented with a dowser who successfully found coins placed under inverted saucers on the table. He published two lengthy reports in the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research. Published posthumously was Barrett's book The Divining Rod: An Experimental and Psychological Study (1926). Written in cooperation with Theodore Besterman, it became a standard work on the subject. Like Chevreul, Barrett attributed the twisting of the rod to motor automatism and considered it a phenomenon allied to automatic writing. Since then considerable progress has been made in validating the phenomena of dowsing.

The Honorable M. E. G. Finch Hatton gives a remarkable account in the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vols. 2, 13, 15) of his experiments with J. Mullins, in which his brother, the Hon. Harold Finch Hatton, participated:

"1. I took him on the grass in front of the house, across which the water-supply pipe passed. There was no indication of its presence on the surface, nor did I previously mention its existence to Mullins. On crossing it the twig moved in the manner described and he could trace the water to right and left by its means along the path actually taken by the pipe.

"2. On our way to the kitchen garden, Mullins discovered a spring on the open lawn, whose existence was unknown to me—it had been closed in so long—but was subsequently attested by an old laborer on the place who remembered it as a well, and had seen it bricked in many years before.

"3. On reaching the kitchen garden I knew that a lead pipe, leading water to a tap outside the wall, crossed the gravel path at a certain spot. On crossing it the twig made no sign. I was astonished at first, until I remembered what Mullins had said about stagnant water and that the tap was not running. I sent to have it turned on, re-conducted Mullins over the ground, when the twig immediately indicated the spot. When Mullins had passed on I carefully marked the exact spot indicated by the twig. When he had left the garden, I said: 'Now, Mullins, may we blindfold you and let you try?' He said 'Oh yes, if you don't lead me into a pond or anything of that sort.' We promised. I then reconducted him blindfolded to the marked spot by a different route, leaving the tap running, with the result that the stick indicated with mathematic exactness the same spot. At first he slightly overran it a foot or so and then felt round, as it were, and seemed to be led back to the exact centre of influence by the twig."

Radiesthesia

In 1913, before the International Congress of Experimental Psychology in Paris, Joseph Mathieu asked to be tested for a strange ability divining water from maps alone. The claim was proved later. E. M. Penrose, official water diviner to the government of British Columbia (Occult Review, March 1933), was also successful in duplicating the feat. Since then many modern dowsers use a pendulum instead of a rod, and their practice is named radiesthesia. French dowsers were pioneers in this field.

In Gallipoli, during World War I, the British Expeditionary Force was nearing exhaustion because of the intense heat and lack of water. Sapper S. Kelley, the former head of Kelley & Bassett, civil engineers from Melbourne, attempted to find water by a piece of bent copper band. Within 100 yards of the divisional headquarters he found a spring that gave 2,000 gallons of pure, cold water per hour. In a week he discovered 32 wells giving sufficient water to supply 100,000 men with a gallon of water daily.

The Abbé Bouly restored large areas of war-devastated land in France to cultivation by localizing buried shells. He was able to discriminate between German and Allied ammunition. Another man claimed success in determining the sex of eggs by the use of the divining rod. Maria Mattaloni, a 24-year-old Italian peasant girl, located many old Etruscan tombs at Capena, near Rome.

The Abbé Gabriel Lambert, the well-known French water diviner, was the subject of some interesting experiments in London. As narrated by Harry Price in Psychic Research (October 1930) the Abbot used a bobbin (like a fisherman's cork float, cone-shaped and painted in stripes of bright colors) suspended from a thread in his right hand. Over hidden springs in Hyde Park, the bobbin which Lambert was purposely swinging laterally "would make a spasmodic movement, change its course, and commence spinning furiously, describing a larger and larger circle the longer we stood over the source of activity. When we reached the bank of the subterranean river the bobbin would stop dead—just as if it had been hit by a stone. The cessation of the spinning was even more spectacular than the commencement. . . . When we came to a nappe (a pool of still water) the bobbin would make quite a different movement. The Abbé could tell the depth of the hidden supplies, their approximate volume and directional characteristics. . . . The Abbé considers that his gift is partly physical and partly psychic. For instance, if he is looking for a nappe, he will pass over a dozen running springs without becoming aware of the fact. And the reverse is the case. He will be likewise unconscious of a flowing river (or water of any description) if he is looking for minerals of a metallic lode. . . . To provide the other 'pole' when using his bobbin, he carries in his free hand a small bottle of pure water (if looking for drinking water), a bottle of mineral water if seeking a chalybeate spring or a piece of ore similar to the metallic lode he is trying to find."

On March 22, 1931, a congress of water diviners was held in Verona by the National Society of Rhabdomancy of Italy. Nearly two hundred members assembled. It was stated by one of them that the king of Italy had water divining powers.

Since then associations of dowsers have been formed in many countries, using either name—"dowsing" or "radiesthesia." The French society L'Association des Amis de la Radiesthé was founded in 1930, followed by the British Society of Dowsers in 1933. Similar associations have been founded in Germany, Italy and other European countries, and in the United States the American Society of Dowsers was formed in 1961. A number of journals have been published, including Journal of the British Society of Dowsers, The American Dowser, La Chronique des Souciers, Radiesthesie Magazine, Les Amis de la Radiesthesie, Zeitschrift für Radiästhesie, and Radiästhesie—Geopathie—Strahlenbiologie.

A specialized branch of dowsing is radionics, in which an apparatus is used to detect or treat illnesses, involving theories of wavelengths and vibrations, and using coils, condensers, and other devices associated with electronics but without conventional electronic construction.

Although many earlier theories about "earth rays" have not been satisfactorily resolved from a scientific point of view, they persist in one form or another, and the divining faculty has been associated with the earth and stone energies claimed in the study of leys.

The subject is a vast one, and so far the only comprehensive survey of the scientific factors involved is the monumental study by Prof. S. W. Tromp entitled Psychical Physics; A Scientific Analysis of Dowsing, Radiesthesia and Kindred Divining Phenomena (1949). The book contains a bibliography of nearly fifteen hundred references. The Barrett and Besterman study, The Divining Rod (1926), remains a basic reference in the field of water divining itself, supplemented by Besterman's later book, Water Divining: New Facts and Theories (1938). A valuable work published by the U.S. Geological Survey, Department of the Interior, is The Divining Rod: A History of Water Witching (1917; 1938), which contains a chronological bibliography up to the year 1916. For an uncritical skeptical view of dowsing, see the chapter "Dowsing Rods and Doodlebugs" in Fads and Fallacies in the Name of Science (1957), by Martin Gardner. For a skeptical survey of dowsing see Water Witching, U.S.A. (1959), by Evon Z. Vogt and Ray Hyman.

Sources:

Benedikt, M. Ruten- und Pendel-lehre. Vienna; Leipzig, 1917.

Besterman, Theodore. Water Divining; New Facts and Theories. London: Metheun, 1938.

Bird, Christopher. The Divining Hand. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1979.

Cameron, Verne L. Aquavideo: Locating Underground Water. Santa Barbara, Calif.: El Cariso, 1970.

———. Map Dowsing. Santa Barbara, Calif.: El Cariso, 1971.

———. Oil Locating. Santa Barbara, Calif.: El Cariso, 1971.

Carrié, Abbé. L'hydroscopographie et métalloscopogragie, ou l'art de découvrir les sources et les gisement metallifers au moyen de l'électromagnétisme. Saintes, France, 1863.

Chambers, Howard V. Dowsing, Water Witches and Divining Rods for the Millions. Los Angeles: Sherbourne Press, 1969.

Chevreul, M. E. De la Baguette divinatoire, du pendule dit explorateur, et des tables tournantes. Paris, 1854.

De France, Henry. The Elements of Dowsing. London, 1948.

De Morogues, Baron. Observations sur le fluide organo-électrique. Paris, 1854.

De Vallemont, Abbe. La physique occulte, ou Traité de la baguette divinatoire. Paris, 1693.

Ellis, Arthur J. The Divining Rod: A History of Water Witching, with a Bibliography. Washington, 1917; 1938.

Klinckowstroem, Graf von. Virgula divina. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Wünschelrute. Berlin, 1910.

Maby, J. Cecil, and T. B. Franklin. The Physics of the Divining Rod. London, 1939.

Mager, Henri. Water Diviners and Their Methods. London, 1931.

Maury, Marguerite. How to Dowse: Experimental and Practical Radiasthesia. London: G. Bell and Sons, 1953.

Mermet, Abbe. Principles and Practice of Radiesthesie. London, 1967.

Nicolas, Jean. La verge de Jacob, ou l'art de trouver les trésors les sources, les limites, les métaux, les mines, les minéraux et autres cachées, par l'usage du baton fourché. Lyons, France, 1693. Translated as Jacob's Rod. London: Thomas Welton, 1875.

Nielsen, Greg, and J. Polansky. Pendulum Power. New York: Warner, 1977.

Roberts, Kenneth. Henry Gross and His Dowsing Rod. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1952.

Stark, Erwin E. A History of Dowsing and Energy Relationships. North Hollywood, Calif.: BAC, 1978.

Underwood, Peter. The Complete Book of Dowsing and Divining. London, 1980.

Wayland, Bruce, and Shirley Wayland. Steps to Dowsing Power. Howell, MI: Life Force Press, 1976.

Weaver, Herbert. Divining, the Primary Sense: Unfamiliar Radiation in Nature, Art, and Science. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1978.

Willey, Raymond C. Modern Dowsing. Cottonwood, AZ: Esoteric Publications, 1976.

Wyman, Walker D. Witching for Water, Oil, Pipes, and Precious Minerals. River Falls: University of Wisconsin Press, 1977.

Division of Personality Studies, University of Virginia

In 1968 the Department of Psychiatry at the University of Virginia established a new Division of Parapsychology to develop a broad program of investigation into various aspects of the paranormal. It was given its initial impetus by the longstanding interest in survival of death, specifically in the form of reincarnation, by Ian Stevenson, a member of the faculty, who was placed in charge of the new structure. Stevenson, noted for his scientific approach to the evidence for reincarnation, had previously won recognition for his essay "The Evidence for Survival from Claimed Memories of Former Incarnations"(1961), and had previously pursued the research leading to his monumental book, Twenty Cases Suggestive of Reincarnation (1966). As head of the division he continued his investigations of reincarnation cases and also conducted studies in telepathy.

More recently, following Stevenson's retirement, the division has been absorbed into the Division of Personality Studies, and research on the paranormal deemphasized. Address: Division of Personality Studies, Department of Behavioral Medicine & Psychiatry, Box 152, Medical Center, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, VA 22908.

Sources:

Stevenson, Ian. Cases of the Reincarnation Type. 4 vols. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1975, 1977, 1980, 1983.

Divs

The div of ancient Persia, pronounced "deo, deu," or "dive," is thought to be equivalent to the European devil of the Middle Ages. In the romances of Persia divs are represented as male and female, but the male divs are considered the more dangerous. It is from their character, personified in a supposed chief, that the devil is portrayed with his well-known attributes.

The male divs, according to the legends of Persia, were entrusted with the government of the world for 7,000 years anterior to the creation of Adam, and they were succeeded by the female divs or peris, who under their chief, Gian ben Gian, ruled another 2,000 years. The dominion of the peris was terminated by Eblis (the devil of the Koran) who had been created from the elements of fire, and whose abode was previously with the angels.

Eblis or "Haris," as he was also called, became the leader of the rebellious angels when they were commanded to pay homage to the first created man. Joined by the whole race of genii, the male and female divs, that he had formerly subjugated, he was, like them, deprived of grace. Eblis and his immediate followers were condemned to suffer for a long period in the infernal regions, but the remainder were allowed to wander over the earth, a constant source of misery to themselves and to the human race.

Divs were supposed to assume various forms, especially that of the serpent, and in the drawings annexed to the Persian romances they are represented much as our own devils, ogres, and giants, in the tales of the Middle Ages. The writers of later times, both Arabian and Persian, localized the abode of these evil genii in the mountain Kaf. Their capital was Ahermanabad, the abode of Aherman their chief, who is identified with the Ahremanes of the Manicheans, that remarkable sect said to have borrowed their doctrines from Zoroaster.

The distinction of sex is a remarkable characteristic of the divs, and its evil results in a system of diabolic superstition may be read in the stories of the Ephialtae and Hyphialtae, or nightmare.

Possibly the same in origin as the Persian divs, are the devas or daivres of the Hindus, who are said to inhabit a world called, after them, Deva-Loka. There is a brief account of them in N. E. Kindersley's Specimens of Hindoo Literature (1794):

"The daivers perpetually recur in their romances, and other literary works, and are represented as possessing not only material bodies, but as being subject to human frailties. Those saints and heroes who may not as yet be considered worthy of the paradises of Shivven or of Veeshnoo, are represented as inhabiting the Daiver-Logum (or Sorgum). These daivers are in number no less than three hundred and thirty million. The principal are—I. 'Daivuntren' or 'Indiren' their king; to whom report is made of all that happens among them. His court of audience is so capacious as to contain not only the numerous daivers, but also the prophets, attendants, etc. They are represented in the mythological romances of the Hindoos, as having been engaged in bloody wars, and with various success against the giants (Assoores). The family of Daivuntren consists of his wife 'Inderaunee,' and his son 'Seedera-budderen' (born from a cow), who records the actions of men, by which they are finally to be judged. II. The attendants or companions of these daivers are—1. The 'Kinnarer,' who sing and play on musical instruments. 2. 'Dumbarim Nardir,' who also perform on a species of drum. 3. 'Kimprusher,' who wait on the daivers are represented with the wings and fair countenances of angels. 4. 'Kunda-gaindoorer,' similar winged beings who execute the mandates of Veeshnoo. 5. 'Paunner,' a species of jugglers, who amuse the daivers with snake dancing, etc. 6. 'Viddiaser,' their bards, who are acquainted with all arts and sciences, and entertain them with their histories and discourses. 7. 'Tsettee,' who attend them in their aerial journeys. 8. 'Kanuanader,' or 'Dovdanks,' messengers, who conduct the votaries of Veeshnoo and Shivven to their respective paradises, and the wicked to hell (Narekah), of which 'Eemen' is sovereign. III. The third class of daivergoel, daivers, or genii, are the eight keepers of the eight sides of the world, literally signified by their general name of 'Aushtatikcu-Pauligaur;' they are—1. 'Indiren,' who is no other than Daivuntren, named above. 2. 'Augne-Baugauven,' the god of fire. 3. 'Eemen,' king of death and the infernal regions. 4. 'Nerudee,' the element of earth represented under the figure of a giant. 5. 'Vaivoo,' god of air and winds. 6. 'Varoonen,' god of clouds and rain. 7. 'Gooberen,' god of riches. 8. 'Essaunien,' or Shivven himself, in one of his 1,008 appearances on earth."

To these principal daivers, Kindersley adds without sufficient reason the "Reeshees" of the Hindoos, and their tutelary god of virtue, "Derma-Daive."

For the true oriental doctrine of these evil genii the Zend-Avesta may be consulted; it associates the idea of evil more especially with the peris or female divs, contrary to the later romances of the Arab world. This anomaly reappears in our own fairy tales, the same characters that at times are invested with the most malignant attributes, being often described as having sylphlike grace and beauty.

Dixon, Jeane (1918–1997)

American sensitive and prophesier. Dixon's rise to prominence began when she predicted the assassination of President John F. Kennedy in 1963. She also predicted the Communist takeover of China, the partition of India, the deaths of Carole Lombard, Dag Hammarskjöld, and Mahatma Ghandhi, and the suicide of Marilyn Monroe.

Dixon was born January 5, 1918, to Frank and Emma Pickert in Medford, Wisconsin; she moved with her family to California at an early age. A gypsy told the eight-year-old Dixon that she had a sensitivity to events around her and presented her with a crystal ball, in which she saw visionary pictures. Dixon's family moved again and she attended high school in Los Angeles, later training to become a singer and actress. At age 21, she married James L. Dixon, who was then in partnership with the film producer Hal Roach in an automobile agency. During World War II, Dixon entertained servicemen with her predictions through the Home Hospitality Committee, which was organized by Washington socialites.

Being a devout Roman Catholic, Dixon believed that she had a God-given gift that must be used for the good of humankind. She was also the founder of the charity known as Children to Children Inc.

Her astrological forecasts were syndicated by the Chicago Tribune–New York News Syndicate, Inc. Her books include Jeane Dixon, My Life and Prophecies: Her Own Story as Told to Rene Noorbergen (1969), Reincarnation and Prayers to Live By (1970), Jeane Dixon's Astrological Cookbook (1976), Horoscopes for Dogs (1979), and The Riddle of Powderworks Road (1980). Newspaper reporter Ruth Montgomery published Dixon's biography, A Gift of Prophecy, in 1965. It sold nearly three million copies in hardback and became a number one best-seller in paperback.

Some critics belittled Dixon for her inaccuracy in predicting events. Most prophesiers, however, have a certain failure rate, often based on the faulty interpretation of symbols, visions, and psychic reactions; Dixon freely admited to these errors. It is said that extrasensory perception is too unpredictable for prophecy to be an exact science.

Dixon died on January 26, 1997 in Washington D.C.

Djemscheed, The Cup of

A divination cup that has been the subject of many of the poems and myths of ancient Persia. It was believed to have been found while digging the foundations of Persepolis and was filled with the elixir of immortality. In this magical cup was mirrored the whole world, and everything, good and evil, was revealed therein. The Persians had great faith in these revelations and attributed the prosperity of their empire to the possession of this famous cup.

Djual Khul, Master

One of the masters originally contacted by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, cofounder of the Theosophical Society. According to theosophical teachings there exists a spiritual hierarchy composed of individuals who have finished their round of earthly reincarnations and have evolved to the spiritual planes, from which they guide the affairs of humanity. Those members of the hierarchy closest to humanity are the "lords of the seven rays" (of the light spectrum). Each ray represents a particular virtue, which the lord of that ray exemplifies.

Djual Khul, generally known simply by his initials, DK, is a master of the second ray along with the master Koot Hoomi, who, in the theosophical perspective, was DK's direct teacher. Theosophists believe DK currently inhabits a Tibetan body and resides in Tibet near Koot Hoomi. In his previous incarnations he was Dharmajyoyi, a follower of Gautama the Buddha; Kleinias, a follower of Pythagoras; and Aryasanga, a seventh-century Buddhist who founded a monastery in the Himalayas once visited by Blavatsky. Charles W. Leadbeater claims to have met him in Cairo when DK traveled there to meet with Blavatsky and also to have worked with DK at Adyar, India, at the international headquarters of the Theosophical Society. DK was one of the three main communicators (the others being the masters Morya and Koot Hoomi) of what were compiled as The Mahatma Letters, the ultimate source for many theosophical ideas.

DK, already one of the more important of the theosophical masters, was given new life early in the twentieth century when Alice A. Bailey claimed regular contact with him. Her channeled material eventually contributed to her separating from the Theosophical Society and founding the Arcane School. Through the 1920 and 1930s she channeled a number of books from DK, whom she generally called "The Tibetan." Bailey's books are used by a number of groups that have emerged since her death in 1949.

Among others who have claimed contact with Djual Khul is Hope Troxell, founder of the Church of Cosmic Origin and School of Thought; Muriel R. Tepper (also known as Muriel Isis), founder of the Lighted Way; Zelrun Karsleigh, founder of the Universariun Foundation; and Pauline Sharpe, the primary channel for Mark-Age, a flying saucer contactee group.

Sources:

Barker, A. Trevor, ed. The Mahatma Letters to A. P. Sennett from the Mahatams M. & K.H. London: T. Fisher Unwin, 1923. 3rd rev. ed. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1962.

DK [through Alice A. Bailey]. Serving Humanity. New York: Lucis Trust, 1972.

———. The Soul, The Quality of Life: From the Writings of the Tibetan Teacher (Djwhal Khul). New York: Lucis Trust, 1972.

Melton, J. Gordon. Encyclopedia of American Religions. Detroit: Gale Research, 1992.

Nada-Yolanda [Pauline Sharper]. Mark-Age Period and Program. Miami: Mark-Age Metacenter, 1970.

Ransom, Josephine. A Short History of the Theosophical Society. Adyar, Madra, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1938.

Thirty Years Work: The Books of Alice Bailey and the Tibetan Master Djwhal Khul. New York: Lucis Publishing, n.d.

Doane, Doris Chase (1913–)

Doris Chase Doane, one of America's outstanding astrologers, was born April 4, 1913, at Mansfield, Massachusetts. After high school she left New England for California to attend the University of California, Los Angeles, from which she received her B.S. in psychology in 1944. She had previously become interested in astrology and associated herself with Elbert Benjamine and the Church of Light. She taught astrology while going through the complete Church of Light curriculum, which she completed the same year as her work at UCLA.

She emerged as one of the organization's leading figures. She began writing in astrology and the next year was ordained by the church and married to one of the church's ministers, Edward Doane, who succeeded Benjamine as its head in 1951. Besides her works in astrology, at a time when the selection of even basic books was extremely limited, Doane gave a considerable amount of time to changing laws that prevented astrologers from operating in some states and cites by equating astrology with fortunetelling. In that endeavor she became a strong advocate for training, professionalism, and certification of astrologers. In her mature years Chase has received many honors from astrological organizations. She was elected president of the American Federation of Astrologers in 1979.

Sources:

Doane, Doris Chase. Astrological Rulerships. Redondo Beach, Calif.: Foundation for Scientific Spiritual Understanding, 1970.

———. Astrology: Thirty Years of Research. Los Angeles: Church of Light, 1956.

———. Astrology as a Business. Tempe, AZ: American Federation of Astrologers, 1986.

———. Horoscopes of the Presidents. Hollywood, Calif.: Professional Astrologers, 1971.

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, AZ: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

Dobyns, Zipporah (1921–)

Zipporah Dobyns, Religious Science minister and astrologer, was born Zipporah Pottenger in Chicago, Illinois, on August 26, 1921. Set on a rather mundane trajectory, she attended the University of Chicago and received her B.A. in anthropology in 1944. She pursued graduate work in her field at both the University of Chicago and the University of Arizona. However, rather than launching a career as an anthropologist, she married Henry F. Dobyns in 1948 and during the next eight years became the mother of four children. She and her husband separated in 1956, the same year she began the study of astrology with a teacher in the Church of Light using the material written by Elbert Benjamine (1882–1951).

A diligent student, she quickly mastered the material and established herself as a practicing astrologer. In 1960, the first time that professional exams were administered by the American Federation of Astrologers, she completed them successfully. She also changed her academic field and returned to the University of Arizona to complete both a master's (1966) and doctoral degree (1969) in clinical psychology. Along the way she had joined the United Church of Religious Science and was ordained as a minister in the church in 1968. In 1969 she moved to California to join the staff of the Los Angeles Community Church of Religious Science.

Dobyns wrote her first astrology text, Evolution through the Zodiac, in 1964. However, it was in the 1970s that her work began to attract the attention of her colleagues. She became one of the principal voices urging the integration of astrology with psychology, a cause initially championed by Dane Rudhyar that began to bear fruit as psychologically trained astrologers such as Dobyns came on the scene. Dobyns' first major text in this area, Finding the Person in the Horoscope, appeared in 1973.

Dobyns also was among the first astrologers to make use of the wealth of new information coming out of the astrological community concerning asteroids, the majority of which are smaller planetoid bodies that swing in an orbit between Mars and Jupiter. Only discovered in the nineteenth century, the asteroid belt was not mentioned in traditional astrology, and only in the mid-twentieth century did astronomers begin to distinguish and name the large asteroids. In the early 1970s an initial ephemeris of the four major (and first discovered) asteroids (Ceres, Pallas, Juno, and Vesta) was published. Dobyns published a similar work in 1977. These books aroused interest in the four larger asteroids while raising the question of the significance of asteroids for the entire community. Dobyns attempted to answer the host of questions attendant upon the introduction of asteroids into the horoscope in her later book, Expanding Astrology's Universe (1983).

One of Dobyns' children, Martha Pottenger, continues Dobyns' work. Pottenger also obtained degrees in psychology and has authored a number of books built around a theme already present in her mother's writing, the use of astrology to map the psyche and thus illuminate the choices and options open to the client.

Sources:

Dobyns, Zipporah. Evolution Through the Zodiac. LA: TIA Publications, 1964, 1972.

———. Expanding Astrology's Universe. San Diego: Astro Computing, 1988.

———. Finding the Person in the Horoscope. LA: TIA Publications, 1976.

———, and Nancy Roof. The Astrologer's Casebook. LA: TIA Publications, 1973.

"Doctor"

One of the spirit controls of the medium Stainton Moses (1839–1882). "Doctor" was said to have been the stoic philosopher Athenodorus, who instructed Emperor Tiberius in his youth. He was the supervisor of the philosophic teachings delivered through Moses and claimed to have invisibly attended him for 21 years. He was the alleged author of some of the Spirit Teachings published by Moses.

Dodds, Eric Robertson (1893–1979)

Professor of Greek who was closely associated with psychical research. He was born July 26, 1893, in Northern Ireland, studied at Belfast, and did postgraduate work at University College, Oxford. He began his teaching career in 1924 as a professor of Greek at the University of Birmingham. He then became a regius professor of Greek at Oxford University in 1936, a post he retained until his retirement in 1960. Dodds then served as president of the Society for Psychical Research, London, from 1961 to 1963.

In his presidential address in 1962, Dodds stated that his first introduction to psychical research was through the book Human Personality & Its Survival of Bodily Death, by F. W. H. Myers. Although impressed by the evidence in this work, he said he saw no prospect of making "even a modest livelihood by psychical research" and so became a professional Greek scholar "with psychical research as a spare time occupation." He contributed a number of articles to the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research as well as to other publications. He discussed the problem of psi phenomena in his autobiography Missing Persons (1977).

Dodds is remembered as one of the more rigorous thinkers in psychical research. His most famous paper concerned survival and his disbelief in the acceptability of the reported evidence for it. He concluded that all of the paranormal data collected in the search for evidence of survival could be explained by super extrasensory perception.

He died April 8, 1979, in England.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Dodds, Eric R. The Greeks and the Irrational. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1951.

———. Missing Persons: An Autobiography. Oxford: Clearendon Press, 1977.

———. "Supernormal Phenomena in Classical Antiquity." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 55 (1971): 189.

———. "Why I Do Not Believe in Survival." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 42 (1934): 147.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Dogen (1200–1253)

Dogen, the founder of the Soto branch of Zen, was born to an aristocratic family in medieval Japan. His father died when he was two and his mother, five years later. He grew up with a deep awareness of the ephemeral nature of life and the inevitability of death. He turned from the successful life that his birth granted him to study Buddhism at the Tendai temple on Mt. Hiei. Tendai belief centered upon the potential already possessed by each person for attaining universal enlightenment. To Dogen, that belief seemed to contradict the Buddha's admonitions to engage in lengthy meditative practice.

Unable to find anyone who could help him with his dilemma, he traveled to China where Zen Buddhism had risen to prominence. He was initially discouraged by the lack of intensity that seemed to characterize the Zen monks he first encountered, but finally located a teacher, Rujing, who advocated the ideal of sustained meditative practice. Sitting with him, Dogen had an initial awakening, termed "shinjin datsuraku," or the casting off of body-mind, a liberation from intellectual and volitional attachments. Many doubts about the value of continuous practice were set aside. He returned to Japan and established what would be known as the Soto sect in Kyoto, but found that the other Zen practitioners and his former Tendai cohorts considered him a disruptive influence, and he withdrew to the mountainous area of what is now Fukui Province and founded the Eiheiji temple, the center of Soto Zen to this day.

Dogen is generally associated with two major ideas. First, his experience of shinjin datsuraku gave him a new mystical understanding of the time/eternity dichotomy. He understood that enlightenment was not something to be sought in the future, a goal to be reached as a result of meditative practice. Rather, he came to understand the unity of practice and enlightenment in the moment.

Second, toward the end of his life, he devoted time to a discussion of ethics and an understanding of karma or consequences. Every action yields a consequence. Bad karma must be handled with repentance and the acknowledgment of guilt. This process of canceling bad karma is to be dealt with in the context of practice and the realizations that accompany it.

Dogen committed his ideas to writing primarily in Shobogenzo (Treasury of the true Dharma-Eye), a classic of Zen literature, but there are also collections of his talks and sayings. A two-volume collection of his writings in English was published in 1971.

Sources:

Abe, Masao. A Study of Dogen: His Philosophy and Religion. Edited by Steven Heine. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1992.

Bielefeldt, Carl. Dogen's Manuals of Zen Meditation. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988.

Dogen. Edited by Toru Tarada and Mizumo Yaoko. 2 vols. Tokyo: Iwanami, 1971.

Dumoulin, Heinrich. Zen Buddhism: A History. New York: Macmillan, 1990.

Dogon People

The Dogon People reside in one of the more difficult-to-reach locations in the African nation of Mali in and around the Bandigara Cliff. They have resisted the efforts of both Christian and Muslim missionaries and continue to practice their magical traditional religions. The religion is built around a belief in the supreme creator Amma. Amma created the Sun and Moon and humankind. This creation is recalled in the layout of the villages in an oval shape representing the unity of male and female in Amma.

The Dogon are organized around four groupings, each thought to descend from one of the four original male ancestors. Each group or clan is headed by a priest and each of the four priests is assigned a distinct function. One serves as a contact with Amma, one is a prophet, one is the judge, and one is responsible for funerals. The dead are buried in the highest caves in the cliff. The caves are repositories of great magic and none are allowed to go there except when burying their loved ones. Reverence for the ancestors is a primary focus of Dogon culture and funerals are important events in communal life.

Divination is a common part of life. One method used is to place food on a patch of sand in the evenings and the next morning to read the marks left by the foxes (which are sacred to the Dogon).

The Dogon were just another obscure African group until 1972 when Robert K. G. Temple published a book that related one major practice, the dance ceremony known as the sigi. Operating among the Dogon is a mask society. After he is recognized as an adult, each male carves himself a mask that is worn during the funeral services, and for an elaborate dance, the dama, during which the men are on 12-foot stilts. The sigi happens only once every 60 years and marks the renewal of the generations. It also marks the rebirth of the white dwarf star near the star Sirius.

This dance goes back many centuries. However, Western astronomers had only discovered the star in 1928 and photographed it in 1970. The Dogon taught that the sacred star orbited Sirius every 60 years. The astronomers discovered that they were correct. The announcement of the Dogon belief by Temple in The Sirius Mystery had the initial effect of giving a small boost to the ancient astronaut theories of prehistoric visitation of Earth by visitors from space, specifically from Sirius. In the long run, however, the idea was taken up by the new generation of contactees who began channeling from entities believed to come from Sirius. In the post New Age, Sirius has joined the Pleiades as the primary source for channeled entities.

Sources:

Arts & Life in Africa Online. http://www.uiowa.edu/~africaart/toc/people/Dogon.html. May 24, 2000.

Roberts, David. "Mali's Dogon People." National Geographic 174, no. 4 (October 1990): 100–127.

Temple, Robert K. G. The Sirius Mystery. Folkstone, Kent, UK: Bailey Brothers and Swiften, 1972.

Doinel, Jules-Benoit (1842–1894)

Jules-Benoit Doinel du Val-Michel, the patriarch of the Nouvelle Église Gnostique Universelle (New Universal Gnostic Church), was born in France on December 8, 1842. As a teenager he was confirmed in the Roman Catholic Church by the bishop of Moulins. He was 26 when he married Stephanie-Francoise le Clerc.

In 1867, the year before his marriage, he claimed that he had had an apparition of the Virgin Mary and that Jesus had appeared to him and consecrated him as a bishop. Through the next years, he read in metaphysical and theosophical literature and then around 1890, during a Spiritualist séance, he accepted a second consecration out of which he founded the Nouvelle Église Gnostique Universelle. The new church had as its goal the reviving of the mystical doctrines attributed to the second-century theologian Origen, especially the preexistence of the soul and metempsychosis (reincarnation).

Doinel assumed the religious name of Tau Valentin II, and as a bishop with direct contact with Christ, initiated a new line of apostolic succession. He consecrated several bishops into his new Gnostic church, including Gerard Encausse, better known as Papus, and the man who eventually succeeded him as patriarch, Leonce Eugene Joseph Fabre Des Essarts. Doinel died in 1894.

The Nouvelle Église Gnostique Universelle has continued to the present, though it fractured over the twentieth century and now exists as a number of small Gnostic churches. Among its more important derivatives is the Gnostic Catholic Church associated with the Ordo Templis Orientis (OTO). Some claim that both Theodor Reuss and Aleister Crowley were consecrated by Papus, but the documentary evidence is lacking. Herman Joseph Metzger (1919–1990), who eventually became head of the largest German-speaking branch of the OTO, accepted consecration as a Gnostic bishop through a separate lineage from Doinel.

Sources:

Anson, Peter. Bishops at Large. London: Faber and Faber, 1964.

Ward, Gary L., Bertil Persson, and Alan Bain, eds. Independent Bishops: An International Directory. Detroit: Apogee Press, 1990.

Dommeyer, Frederick C(harles) (1909–1988)

Professor of philosophy and writer on parapsychology and philosophy. Dommeyer was born January 12, 1909, in Warrington, Florida. He studied at Union College, Schenectady, New York (B.A., 1932), and Brown University (M.A., 1935; Ph.D., 1937) and did postgraduate study at Oxford and Hamburg Universities. His professional career began as an instructor at Brown (1937–38) followed by 20 years at Syracuse University (1938–58), during which time he served as head of the philosophy department for 14 years (1944–58). He then moved to San Jose State College as head of the department of philosophy.

During his career, Dommeyer wrote several books and a number of articles for professional journals on philosophy. He also wrote articles on parapsychology, primarily for the Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research. He was a member of the board of review of Psychic, and the California Parapsychology Research Group.

Dommeyer died on July 24, 1988, in California.

Sources:

Dommeyer, Frederick C. Body, Mind and Death. N.p., 1965.

Dommeyer, Frederick C., ed. Current Philosophical Issues: Essays in Honor of Curt John Ducasse. N.p., 1966.

———. "Some Ostensibly Precognitive Dreams." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (July 1955).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Don Juan

The mysterious, probably fictional Yaqui Indian sorcerer whose metaphysical doctrines were recorded by Carlos Castaneda in his best-selling book The Teachings of Don Juan: A Yaqui Way of Knowledge (1968) and in numerous subsequent writings. No evidence has been produced for the actual existence of Don Juan outside the pages of Castaneda's books.

Sources:

Castaneda, Carlos. Journey to Ixtlan. N.p., 1972.

———. A Separate Reality. N.p., 1971.
———. The Teachings of Don Juan: A Yaqui Way of Knowledge. N.p., 1968.

Donn

An Irish hero of medieval legend, son of Midir the Proud. The Colloquy of the Ancients, a thirteenth- to fourteenth-century collection of Ossianic stories, tells how Finn and Kelta and five other champions were out hunting one day and followed a beautiful fawn until it vanished under ground. Seeking shelter in a noble's mansion, they were entertained by Donn mac Midir and his brother, and their aid was requested against the rest of the Danaans.

Three times that year they had to fight their fairy foes, and all their followers were killed except the 28 warriors. The fawn they had followed had been an enchanted maiden sent to entice them. After a year of successful fighting, the Danaans were obliged to make peace.

Donnars, Jacques (1919–)

French physician who studied parapsychological phenomena. He was born September 8, 1919, in St. Mandé (Seine), France. In 1944 he married Geneviève Herdud. He was a member of the French Homeopathic Society, Acupuncture Society, and the French Society of Osteopathy. His book Inhibition: Facteur de vie deals with possible connections between parapsychology and inhibition processes.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Donnelly, Ignatius (1831–1901)

Popular writer of books offering an alternative view of human history. Donnelly was born in Philadelphia, November 3, 1831. A farmer-politician, he became lieutenant governor of Minnesota and then a state senator. At one point he was nominated for the vice president of the United States.

Donnelly wrote several novels but is best remembered for reviving interest in the lost continent of Atlantis in his book Atlantis, the Antediluvian World (1882). Using nineteenth-century ethnological and archeological data, Donnelly argued that the likenesses noted in the ancient cultures on either side of the Atlantic pointed to a common origin, a sunken continent whose survivors populated lands to the east and west.

In his next book, Ragnarök: The Age of Fire and Gravel (1883), he claimed that the Pleistocene Ice Age resulted from a collision between the earth and a comet. This was the first statement of a theme to be developed many decades later by Immanuel Velikovsky. Donnelly's two books have become classics of occultism and have been reprinted in modern times. Atlantis has been especially favored by followers of Edgar Cayce, who had much to say about Atlantis.

Continuing his foray into alternative histories, Donnelly also wrote The Great Cryptogram (1888) designed to show that the plays of Shakespeare were written by Bacon. Donnelly died January 2, 1901.

Sources:

Donnelly, Ignatius. Atlantis: The Antediluvian World. 1882. Rev. ed., edited by Egerton Sykes. New York: Gramercy, 1949.
———. The Great Cryptogram: Francis Bacon's Cipher in the So-called Shakespeare Plays. Chicago: R. S. Peale, 1888.
———. Ragnarök: the Age of Fire and Gravel. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1970. Reprinted as The Destruction of Atlantis; Ragnarök. Blauvelt, N.Y.: Rudolf Steiner Publications, 1971.
Ridge, Martin. Ignatius Donnelly: The Portrait of a Politician. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1962.

DOP See Dermo-Optical Perception

Doreal, Maurice (d. 1963)

Maurice Doreal was the name adopted by Claude Doggins as head of the Brotherhood of the White Temple, an occult fraternity headquartered in Sedalia, Colorado. Doreal was born in Sulfur Springs, Oklahoma. As a youth he became interested in Tarzan, which quickly broadened into a general interest in fantasy and science fiction literature, and by 1950 his library included some 5,000 titles. His interests also expanded to the occult. He served in World War I, after which, he claimed, he spent eight years in Tibet. He also claimed to have visited the occult center in the middle of Mt. Shasta in northern California.

Doreal founded the Brotherhood of the White Temple in 1930, and spent much of his life writing the brotherhood lessons and a series of pamphlets, called the Little Temple Library, on a wide variety of occult-related topics from Atlantis to UFOs. He claimed to have gained his knowledge from his contact with the Great White Lodge of Masters, those who have passed beyond their earthly experience and now seek to guide humanity in its evolution.

Doreal began work on new headquarters for the brotherhood in Sedalia in 1946, during the height of anxieties over possible atomic war. The location, a valley enclosed by 1,500-foot mountain walls, was believed to be a protected site. Headquarters moved in 1951. Two years later Doreal predicted that the biblical Battle of Armageddon would begin very soon, and residents stored foods against the coming hard times.

Doreal died in 1963, and the brotherhood has continued to the present using his many writings as their authoritative literature.

Sources:

Kossy, Donna. Kooks: A Guide to the Outer Limits of Human Belief. Portland, Ore.: Feral House, 1994.

Doten, Elizabeth (1829–1913)

American inspirational speaker considered the greatest female improvisator of the nineteenth century. She was born in Plymouth, Massachusetts, April 1, 1829. For many years she spoke from the platform under what she claimed to be the influence of spirits. From the poems she recited on these occasions, two compilations were published: Poems from the Inner Life and Poems of Progress (1871). On one occasion she claimed to be under the direct influence of Edgar Allan Poe and rendered "Resurrexi," a poem noted for its resemblance to Poe's style and manifesting the same intensity of feeling. Some of her poems were also printed in the gift book The Lily of the Valley for 1855 (Boston, 1855), which she edited.

During the last 28 years of her life Doten withdrew from the lecture field and mediumistic work because she had become unable to determine the point at which she ceased to act and the spirit influence began.

Sources:

Doten, Elizabeth. Poems of Progress. Boston: White & Co., 1871.

Double

The etheric counterpart of the physical body which, when out of coincidence, may temporarily move about in space in comparative freedom and appear in various degrees of density to others. The belief in the existence of the double, or astral body, is ancient, and its modern use as a "working hypothesis" solves many puzzling problems in psychical research.

The Roman Catholic Church gave tacit approval to such an idea in its consideration of the bilocation of several saints. St. Anthony of Padua, for example, preaching in the Church of St. Pierre du Queyroix at Limoges on Holy Thursday in 1226, suddenly remembered that he was due at that hour at a service in a monastery at the other end of the town. He drew his hood over his head and knelt down for some minutes while the congregation reverently waited. At that moment the saint was seen by the assembled monks across town to step forth from his stall in the monastery chapel, read the appointed passage in the office, and immediately disappear. Similar stories are recorded of St. Severus of Ravenna and St. Ambrose and St. Clement of Rome. The best-known case is dated September 17, 1774. Alphonse de Liguori, imprisoned at Arezzo, remained quiet in his cell and took no nourishment. Five days later he awoke in the morning and said that he had been at the deathbed of the pope.

Experimental Findings

Though testimonies of seeing doubles and of out-of-the-body travel experiences are numerous, rigid experimental proof is scarce. Colonel Eugerne August-Albert D'Aiglun Rochas was one of the first to attempt to furnish some. During his experiments in the exteriorization of sensitivity he noticed that in subjects in a state of deep hypnosis, the concentric strata around the body—which he induced by suggestion—condensed, right and left, into poles of sensitivity that finally united in a phantasmal enlargement of the body.

This phantom form, which could be lengthened under the order of the magnetizer and could pass through material objects, became the seat of sensation. It could be modeled like wax in the sculptor's hands and when Rochas suggested that a female subject give it her mother's form, the suggestion was successfully carried out. One of these experiments was made in Paris in the presence of A. N. Aksakof with Elizabeth d'Esperance as the seeing subject and a Ms. Lambert as the exteriorizing subject.

Henri Durville was the next experimenter. By means of passes he built up a double around his subjects Ninette and Martha and observed that the double was capable of motor effects at a distance of several rooms. Finally, from an effluvium from the forehead, the bregma, the throat, the epigastrium, and even the spleen, he saw a true phantom take shape at a distance of 20 to 24 inches from the medium. It had the appearance of the medium, became more or less luminous, and was united with the medium's body by a little cord at the navel, the bregma, or the epigastrium.

The phantom could see through opaque bodies in the distance and its objectivity was demonstrated by the increasing brilliance of a calcium sulphide screen when it was asked to approach it. The sensory organs of the medium were seated in the phantom. When approached it produced a sensation of cold, was humid to the touch, and made the fingers luminous in the dark.

The experiments of Dr. Duncan McDougall of Haverhill, Massachusetts, in weighing dying patients appeared to furnish some confirmation. He found that at the moment of death the beam of his scale would suddenly go up. Out of six cases the weight lost at death averaged between 2 and 2.5 ounces, but this might also be accounted for by changes in body fluids or evaporation.

On the basis of some experiments in regression of memory, Rochas believed that the double is only complete at seven years of age and that the astral shape enters the body a little while before birth and then only partially. Dr. Joseph Maxwell studied a very sensitive young woman who was entrusted with bringing up a child from birth. She saw at its side a luminous shadow with features larger and more formed than those of the child. This shadow was further away from the child at its birth. It seemed to penetrate gradually into the body. At 14 months of age the penetration was about two-thirds complete.

Photographic evidence for the double was presented in the works of Gabriel Delanne, Rochas, Durville, Commandant Darget, and Aksakof. The first such pictures were obtained by William H. Mumler, the American practitioner of spirit photography. He was promptly accused of fraud because it was the photograph of someone dead that was expected to appear on his plate. The double of Stainton Moses was photographed in 1875 in Paris by another spirit photographer, Édouard Buguet, while the medium lay in trance in London. This picture, however, was discredited by subsequent disclosures about Buguet.

The experiments of Julien Ochorowicz on the radiography of the etheric body stand in a class of their own. On September 11, 1911, he obtained the photograph of a spirit hand on a sensitive film rolled up and enclosed in a bottle. The film, as it lay rolled in the bottle, measured about three-quarters of an inch in diameter. The bottle had an orifice of about two-thirds of an inch. It was closed with the palm of Ochorowicz's right hand. With his left he laid it on his knee and held it there firmly. The medium, Stanislawa Tomczyk, then placed her two hands on the bottle between his. She seemed excited and exclaimed that she wished that a small hand would appear. Then she said, "It is strange! The bottle seems to enlarge under my fingers; but perhaps this is an illusion. My hands swell, I cease to feel them." An attack of cramping ensued. The medium screamed; a moment or two later Ochorowicz broke the bottle, developed the film, and found on it the imprint of a large hand with the thumb posed in line with the index finger, so that it had room to appear on the film, which was 13 cm wide. The hand looked like that of the medium.

In automatic writing the following explanation came through: "I crept in by a chink between your hand and the orifice of the bottle. Then I slipped my hand flat between the folds of the roll, and the light caused itself, I do not know how, I merely took care to make the film opaque." This communication came from "Little Stasia," Tomzyck's control, whom Ochorowicz suspected for a long time to be the medium's double.

Continuing his experiments, Ochorowicz tried to discover the thickness of the etheric hand. He found that, when materialized, the hand was less than a millimeter thick, and that it was at least very probable that it was flat, and could therefore find room in a space too narrow for a normal hand. The same experiments also assured him that the double could, by autosuggestion, diminish the size of its hand if it met with obstacles (see thoughtforms).

Projection of the Double

Supposed proof of the double is its experimental projection, often described as "astral" projection, but now classified as "out-of-the-body" travel. Reportedly the usual method of such experiments is to decide before going to sleep to visit someone during the night.

One case, reported in Phantasms of the Living by Edmund Gurney, F. W. H. Myers, and Frank Podmore (1886) is corroborated by the testimony of Stainton Moses, the "Z" of the account:

"One evening early last year, I resolved to try to appear to Z, at some miles distance. I did not inform him beforehand of the intended experiment; but retired to rest shortly before midnight with thoughts intently fixed on Z, with whose room and surroundings, however, I was quite unacquainted. I soon fell asleep, and awoke next morning unconscious of anything having taken place. On seeing Z a few days afterwards, I inquired: 'Did anything happen at your rooms on Saturday night?' 'Yes,' replied he, 'a great deal happened. I had been sitting over the fire with M. smoking and chatting. About 12:30 he rose to leave, and I let him out myself. I returned to the fire to finish my pipe, when I saw you sitting in the chair just vacated by him. I looked intently at you, and then took up a newspaper to assure myself that I was not dreaming, but on laying it down I saw you still there. While I gazed, without speaking, you faded away.' "

The Rev. P. H. Newnham, also quoted in Phantasms of the Living, had a singularly vivid dream. He saw the family of his fiancée, chatted with the father and mother in his dream, bade them goodnight, took a candle, and went off to bed. The he says:

"On arriving in the hall, I perceived that my fiancée had been detained downstairs, and was only then near the top of the staircase. I rushed upstairs, overtook her on the top step, and passed my two arms round her waist, under her arms, from behind. Although I was carrying my candle in my left hand, when I ran upstairs, this did not, in my dream, interfere with this gesture. On this I woke, and a clock in the house struck 10 almost immediately afterwards. So strong was the impression of the dream that I wrote a detailed account of it the next morning to my fiancée. Crossing my letter, not in answer to it, I received a letter from the lady in question: 'Were you thinking about me, very specially, last night just about 10 o'clock? For, as I was going upstairs to bed, I distinctly heard your footsteps on the stairs, and felt you put your arms around my waist.' "

The methods of experimental projection are discussed in Hector Durville's Le Phantôme des vivants (1909) and in Charles Lancelin's Méthode de dédoublement personel (1913). Another contribution to the subject is in The Projection of the Astral Body, (1929) by Sylvan J. Muldoon and Hereward Carrington. According to this book special exercises are necessary to retain consciousness during projection. Reportedly projection nearly always occurs in the dream state. Muldoon claims that "what is thought to be an 'aura,' resting above sleepers and seen by seers, is in reality the etheric body, out of coincidence a few inches. As a rule, in normal persons, consciousness is lost before this phenomenon begins."

The astral and physical bodies are joined by a cord that may be the "silver cord" in Ecclesiastes (12:16). According to Muldoon and others who claim to have seen it, this cord or cable, which is similar to a newborn's umbilical cord, is attached at various parts of the head or, according to some claims, at the solar plexus; it is a whitish gray color, elastic, and similar to a single strand of cobweb when extended.

Supposedly when slightly out of coincidence, the cord is the diameter of a silver dollar, yet the aura surrounding it gives the impression that it is about six inches thick. It is the conductor of cosmic energy into the physical body, for which the astral body acts as condenser. It delivers "the breath of life" while the finer body is projected.

The awakening of consciousness during any unconscious projection thrusts the astral body back into the physical. Adolphe d'Assier's Posthumous Humanity (1887) contains material about repercussions in general and those claimed to have occurred in witchcraft.

Spontaneous Projection

Supposedly in the majority of cases, the projection of the double is involuntary and due to emotional stress. "Examples have come to my knowledge," wrote Jung Stilling, at an early age, "in which sick persons, overcome with an unspeakable longing to see some absent friend, have fallen into a swoon and during that swoon have appeared to the distant object of their affection."

Believers claim danger, anxiety, and mental agony are causes of projection. In Phantasms of the Living more than 40 cases of apparitions of the drowned or nearly drowned are cited. Sometimes they remembered seeing near relations who experienced a visual or auditive sensation or felt sudden fear coupled with the idea of their relative's danger.

Mental preoccupation may also be sufficient to result in such an apparition. According to J. G. Swift M'Neill, M.P., the double of T. P. O'Connor was seen in 1897 in the British House of Commons in his accustomed place, while he was on his way to Ireland to visit a dying parent. There are other cases recorded of members of Parliament being seen in the House of Commons when actually elsewhere.

The so-called premonitions of approach belong to this group. In a letter written from St. Petersburg in 1865 (published in Mrs. Home's biography, p. 240) the famous medium D. D. Home told the story of how his own double was seen by Count Alexis Tolstoy at the railroad station three hours before his actual arrival. In the hotel he found a note waiting from Count Tolstoy expressing joy at his return, and he was mildly reproached by the countess, who also saw him, for not seeming to know her at the station.

The following experience of the poet Goethe is narrated in Phantasms of the Living:

"Wolfgang Goethe was walking one rainy summer evening with his friend K., returning from the Belvedere at Weimar. Suddenly the poet paused as if he saw someone and was about to speak to him. K. noticed nothing. Suddenly Goethe exclaimed: 'My God! If I were not sure that my friend Frederick is at this next moment at Frankfort I should swear that it is he!' The next moment he burst out laughing. 'But it is he—my friend Frederick. You here at Weimar? But why are you dressed so—in your dressing gown, with your nightcap and my slippers here on the public road?' K., as I have just said, saw absolutely nothing and was alarmed, thinking that the poet had lost his wits. But Goethe, thinking only of what he say, cried out again: 'Frederick, what has become of you? My dear K., did you notice where that person went who came to meet us just now?' K., stupefied, did not answer. Then the poet, looking all round, said in a dreamy tone: 'Yes, I understand . . . it is a vision. What can it mean though? Has my friend suddenly died? Was it his spirit?' Thereupon Goethe returned to the house and found Frederick there already. His hair stood on end. 'Avaunt, you phantom!' he exclaimed, pale as death. 'But my friend,' remonstrated Frederick, 'is this the welcome that you give to your best friend?' 'Ah, this time,' exclaimed the poet, with such emotion, 'it is not the spirit, it is a being of flesh and blood.' The friends embraced warmly. Frederick explained that he had arrived at Goethe's lodging soaked by the rain, had dressed himself in the poet's dry clothing and having fallen asleep in his chair, had dreamed that he had gone out to meet him and that Goethe had greeted him with the words: 'You here! At Weimar? What! With your dressing gown, your nightcap and my slippers here on the public road?' From this time the great poet believed in a future life."

Supposedly sometimes the appearance serves a purpose. James Coates quoted a story from T. P.'s Weekly, for which the editor vouched, of a woman who was on her way to Cambridge to meet her fiancé. At every station where the train stopped she saw the apparition of her fiancé, beckoning her to get out. Finally she told her traveling companion, a gentleman, what she saw. He advised her to get out at the next station if she saw the apparition again. The woman saw the apparition again. She got out at once. So did the gentleman. Shortly afterward the train wrecked and the car in which they had been sitting was demolished. During the time her fiancé was sound asleep in the waiting room at Cambridge, and did not remember having dreamed anything unusual.

Sometimes it is a state of illness that facilitates projection. Andrew Lang saw his friend Q. opening his garden gate and coming up the path, which led toward the window where he was writing, but when he got up to let him in there was nobody there. The same day he learned that Q. was ill in bed at the time his double was seen.

There are instances that indicate that projection may be the result of an accident or a violent impact. William Denton quoted the statement of a man who fell from the scaffolding of a building: "As I struck the ground I suddenly bounded up, seeming to have a new body, and to be standing among the spectators looking at my old one. I saw them trying to bring it to. I made several fruitless efforts to re-enter my body, and finally succeeded."

Quite often there seems to be no known reason for the temporary separation. A. N. Aksakof told of the story of Emilie Sagée, a French schoolmistress in Livonia. For a period of 18 months her double was seen, sometimes at her side, making the same gestures, sometimes out in the garden while Sagée was in the room. The double did not always imitate her movements; sometimes it remained seated while she rose from her chair. As the double became clearer and more consistent, Sagée became more rigid and feeble. She was always unconscious of what happened.

Seeing One's Own Double

Dr. Paul Sollier in his Les Phénomènes d'autoscope (1903) gave a summary of the cases of "vision de soi" of Goethe, Alfred de Musset, Shelley, de Maupassant; of the experiences of Drs. Lassegue, Féré, Rouginovitch, and Lemaitre; and of 12 of his own cases.

Goethe's experience was described in Aus meinem Leben, Dichtung und Wahrheit (1811–22):

"I rode now on the footpath toward Drusenheim, and there one of the strangest presentiments surprised me. I saw myself coming to meet myself, on the same way, on horseback, but in a garment such as I had never worn. It was of light grey mingled with gold. As soon as I had aroused myself from this dream, the vision entirely disappeared. Remarkable, nevertheless, it is that eight years afterward I found myself on the same road, intending to visit Frederika once more, and in the same garment which I had dreamed about and which I now wore, not out of choice but by accident. This wonderful hallucination had a quieting effect on me."

Comparing a large number of cases, Sollier found that the apparition had many degrees—from the simple impression of being in one's own presence to a vision as if seen in a mirror. Any disturbance would make it disappear. When the phantom had different attributes—was smaller in stature, wore different clothes—it might persist for hours in varying intensity. The apparition appeared usually during the evening hours, in states of deep meditation, self-concentration, or under anesthesia. The distance at which it was seen varied from a few yards to close proximity. Sometimes it walked before the subject and vanished all at once; sometimes it turned about or moved to the side and imitated his movements. In most cases it was silent. Occasionally there was a dialogue and difference of opinion between phantom and self.

Exchange of Consciousness

Sollier explained these experiences as hallucinations resulting from a loss of sensibility. In discussing the question in the Revue métapsychique (May–June 1930), Eugèn Osty states that in some cases there is an exchange of consciousness, the double becoming the thinking self.

Tradition says that a vision of self is a sign of approaching death. Queen Elizabeth I of England was said to have been warned of her death by the apparition of her own double. It has been suggested that such cases, by a invention of time, may be phantasmal appearances after death.

In a few instances on record, the double was apparently solid; it could hold a hymn book in the church and could speak. The double of Ophelia Corralès of San Jose, Costa Rica, was heard to sing while the girl was somewhere far away and had no knowledge of her appearance. However, this medium was accused of fraud.

Memories of out-of-the-body travel experiences were reported by many mediums. Emanuel Swedenborg, Andrew Jackson Davis, D. D. Home, Stainton Moses, Elizabeth d'Esperance, Gladys Osborne Leonard, and many others have published descriptions. Cora L. Richmond was said to have remained projected for many days. Supposedly she could perceive and receive the answer to every question—even before its complete formation in thought.

Materialization and the Double

The phantom hands and limbs seen in séances are often believed to be the duplication of the medium. Paraffin molds matched a materialized leg of William Eglinton and impressions of a face and fingers in putty matched Eusapia Palladino (see plastics).

According to occult philosophy, the double is to be distinguished from the spirit or soul. The double is a vehicle of the spirit and, like the physical body, will later be cast off and deteriorate.

Do animals have doubles? Elliott O'Donnell in his Animal Ghosts (1913) asserts that they do. He states that some friends of his had a cat that was frequently seen in two places at the same time; further, he affirms that there are phantasms of both living and dead dogs in just the same proportion as there are phantasms of both living and dead human beings. He claims of a Virginia lady who had a horse that frequently appeared simultaneously in two places.

Since the mid-twentieth century, the subject of the human double and astral (or etheric) projection has been considered under the designation "out-of-body experience" (OBE). The British scientist Robert Crookall collated and classified hundreds of cases of OBEs and various parapsychologists have conducted experiments in the field, including Charles T. Tart and Karlis Osis. In 1956 Hornell Hart made a survey of reported apparitions of the dead, which he compared with apparitions of living persons when having OBEs.

In 1932 Eileen J. Garrett, who established the Parapsychology Foundation in New York, took part in a successful scientific experiment that involved projecting her double from New York to Iceland under test conditions. This case is described in Garrett's book My Life as a Search for the Meaning of Mediumship (1938).

In the 1970s psychic Ingo Swann worked with Karlis Osis at the American Society for Psychical Research on a series of experiments aimed at demonstrating the existence of the double. Swann, seated in a chair and attached by electrodes to a monitoring device, attempted to project his double to a hidden target. The vision of the double, as opposed to simple clairvoyance, was determined by the angle of vision at which the target objects were viewed. These tests proved most successful and provide some of the best data available on the existence of a human double. Robert A. Monroe, also known for his OBEs, has allowed himself to be tested on various occasions.

Sources:

Battersby, H. F. Prevost. Man Outside Himself. London, 1942. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1969.

Black, David. Ekstasy: Out-of-the-body Experiences. New York: Bobbs-Merrill, 1976.

Crookall, Robert. The Study & Practice of Astral Projection. London, 1961. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1966.

Fox, Oliver [Hugh G. Callaway]. Astral Projection. London, 1939. Reprint, New York: University Books, 1962.

Garrett, Eileen J. My Life as a Search for the Meaning of Mediumship. New York: Oquaga Press, 1938. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Green, Celia E. Out-of-the-Body Experiences. Oxford: Institute of Psychophysical Research, 1968. Reprint, New York: Ballantine Books, 1973.

Greenhouse, Herbert B. Astral Journey: Evidence for Out-of-the-Body Experiences from Socrates to the ESP Laboratory. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1975.

Monroe, Robert A. Journeys Out of the Body. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1971.

Muldoon, Sylvan J., and Hereward Carrington. The Projection of the Astral Body. London: Rider & Co., 1929.

Rogo, D. Scott. Welcoming Silence; A Study of Psychical Phenomena and Survival of Death. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1973.

Shirley, Ralph. The Mystery of the Human Double. London, 1938. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1965.

Smith, Susy. The Enigma of Out-of-Body Travel. Garrell Publications, 1965. Reprint, New York: New English Library, 1968.

———. Out-of-Body Experiences for the Millions. New York: Dell, 1968.

Walker, George B. Beyond the Body: The Human Double and the Astral Planes. London: Boston, 1974.

Double Blind

Term used in parapsychology for a situation where all the participants in a test are unaware of any information or cues relating to the target of the test or psi responses to it.

Doubt (Magazine)

The journal of the Fortean Society, devoted to highlighting and discussing "Fortean data,"—strange and anomalistic scientific phenomena collected by Charles Fort. It was first published as the Fortean Society Journal in September 1937. The name was changed to Doubt with the eleventh issue (Winter 1944–45). It ceased publication with issue no. 61 after the death of editor Tiffany Thayer. The Fortean community is now served by a number of succeeding publications, including the Fortean Times, Chaos: The Review of the Damned, and INFO.

Doupe, Joseph (1910–)

Pioneer researcher on psychic healing. Doupe was born March 10, 1910, in Winnipeg, Manitoba. He attended the University of Manitoba (M.D., 1934) and the Royal College of Physicians, London, (M.R.C.P., 1938). During World War II he served as a major in the R.A.M.C. (1940–46). Then in 1946 he became a professor of physiology with interests in parapsychology and head of the Department of Physiology at the University of Mannitoba, Winnipeg, Canada. He is most remembered for his supervision in 1960 of experiments concerned with unorthodox methods of treating wound-healing in mice, which would later form a basis for similar experiments by Bernard Grad.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

D'Ourches, Comte (ca. 1856)

Nineteenth-century French occultist who experimented with mesmerism and animal magnetism. During the 1850s he and his friend the Baron L. von Guldenstubbe pioneered the formation of Spiritualist circles in France similar to those being formed in America. The baron describes such séances in his book La Réalité des Espirits et le Phénomène merveilleux de leur écriture directe (1857), stating that the Comte D'Ourches succeeded in making tables rise without contact, in addition to the phenomena of table-turning, raps, and vibration of piano chords. D'Ourches was also associated with the baron's experiments in obtaining direct writing.

Dowden, Hester (Mrs. Travers-Smith) (1868–1949)

Professional medium whose psychic development was marked by the successive appearance of five spirit personalities: "Peter," "Eyen," "Astor," "Shamar," and "Johannes." She was later known for her experiments in automatic writing. She was the daughter of Prof. Edward Dowden. Her first circle was formed during the winter of 1914. At the second or third sitting an entity calling himself "Peter Rooney" made his appearance. He claimed to be an Irish American who had spent most of his life in jail. Rooney committed suicide by throwning himself under a tramcar in Boston.

Reportedly Sir William Barrett made inquiries and found inconsistencies in the tale. Rooney was questioned at a subsequent séance and admitted that he had lied because he had no desire to communicate his real name. He claimed to have been interested in psychical research during his life and wished to assist investigations now. He introduced many features to the séance, initiated blindfold sittings on the Ouija board, and tried experiments in telepathy.

Eyen claimed to have been an Egyptian priest in the temple of Isis in the reign of Rameses II. He was attracted to the medium by a piece of cerecloth in which his mummy was wrapped. Astor, the third control, professed to be the guide of Geraldine Cummins, with whom Dowden often sat. She was chiefly interested in the activities of Cummins and clairvoyance and prophecies.

Shamar, the fourth control was a Hindu. She claimed to be the medium's spirit guide, Eyen being "the guide of her astral." She sent communications from living persons who were asleep or drowsy.

Johannes was the latest development as a spirit guide. He claimed to have lived 200 years before Christ and studied in the Alexandrian Library. He gave philosophical teachings that were similar to the Neoplatonic philosophy of Plotinus (205–270 C.E.). H. Dennis Bradley became convinced of the reality of Johannes as an independent personality as a result of a direct voice sitting with the medium George Valiantine in February 1924.

Reportedly Bradley had many sittings with Dowden and later developed automatic writing himself. He could not keep pace with the terrific speed of the communications from Johannes, although he wrote in shorthand. Leaving his hand limp, he discovered that he could write at an infinitely quicker pace and without exhaustion.

Of the existence of the first four controls, Barrett, in his introduction to Mrs. H. Travers-Smith's book Voices from the Void (1919), states, "I am strongly disposed to consider many of them as distant psychic entities and not in all cases mere phases of the personality of the automatist."

The author Lennox Robinson and Rev. Savell Hicks were sitting with Dowden when this message came through: "Pray for Hugh Lane." Then, on being asked who was speaking: "I am Hugh Lane; all is dark" came through. Shortly after, it continued: "It is Sir Hugh Lane, drowned. Was on board the Lusitania." At that moment boys were selling the evening newspapers in the street. Robinson ran out. When he came back he pointed to the name of Sir Hugh Lane in the story of the disaster, reported for the first time. The communications from Sir Hugh Lane described the scene on the Lusitania: "Panic. Boats lowered. Women went first. Lost in an overcrowded boat, fell over. Lost all memory until I saw a light at the sitting."

The medium knew Sir Hugh Lane personally but had heard that he had gone to America before the sinking of the Lusitania. On her way home that day Dowden saw posters: "Lusitania reported sinking" but had no personal interest in the news as she knew no one on board. Lane continued to come through in séances afterward and wanted several of his wishes communicated to his executors.

In a similar instance, the following message was spelled out rapidly: "Ship sinking; all hands lost. William East overboard. Women and children weeping and wailing—sorrow, sorrow, sorrow." The newspaper stop press was heard being called out in the street. The medium bought a paper. It contained the news that the Titanic had gone down. She believed that the name William East was incorrect and that it must have been

William Stead. Dowden later served as the amanuensis for The Life Eternal, supposedly written by Stead from the spirit world in 1933.

Reportedly Dowden channeled several romantic scripts: descriptions of King Arthur's Round Table and of the missionary journeys of St. Philip the Evangelist. When she sat with Frederick Bligh Bond, a group of Glastonbury monks came through and recited details of the burial of abbey relics in 1080. Cummins's writing mediumship developed in her sittings. The communications often referred to the future. Events in her life were sometimes foretold years ahead. Her first book, Voices from the Void (1919), contains an account of her own experiences. Her second volume, Psychic Messages from Oscar Wilde (1923), was featured in the Daily News, on July 27, 1923. The article claimed he gave criticisms of many writers. Of George Bernard Shaw, he writes:

"I had a kindly feeling for poor Shaw. He had such a keen desire to be original that it moved my pity. He was without any sense of beauty or even a sense of the dramatic side of life. And yet there was the passionate yearning to be a personage, to force his person on the world, to press in, in spite of the better taste of those who went before him. I have a very great respect for his work. After all, he is my fellow-countryman. We share the same misfortune in that matter. I think Shaw may be called the true type of pleb. He is so anxious to prove himself honest and outspoken that he utters a great deal more than he is able to think. He is ever ready to call upon his audience to admire his work, and his audience admires it from sheer sympathy with his delight."

The Oscar Wilde script was produced in cooperation with psychical researcher S. G. Soal (also an automatist), who held the pencil. He later wrote a critical reflection upon his experience.

Sources:

Bentley, Edmund. Far Horizon: A Biography of Hester Dowden, Medium and Psychic Investigator. London: Rider & Co., 1951.

Dowden, Hester. Psychic Messages from Oscar Wilde. London: T. Werner Laurie, 1923.

———. Voices from the Void. London: Rider & Co., 1919.

Soal, S. G. "Note on the 'Oscar Wilde' Script." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (July 1926).

Dowding, Hugh Caswall Tremenheere (1882–1970)

First Baron Dowding, air chief marshal in charge of Fighter Command in Britain during World War II and author of several books on psychic phenomena and survival of death. Lord Dowding was born April 24, 1882. He was educated at Winchester and the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, London, and joined the Royal Artillery in 1900. In 1914, as World War I began, he joined the Royal Flying Corp (after 1918 the Royal Air Force). He commanded Fighting Area, Air Defense of Great Britain (1923–30), during which time he also was director of training at the Air Ministry, London (1926–29). He subsequently served as the air member for research and development of Air Council (1930–36), air officer commander-in-chief of Fighter Command (1936–40), and principal A.D.C. to the king (1937–43). He retired in 1943.

Soon after his retirement, Dowding wrote a series of books on psychic phenomena, including Many Mansions (1943), Lychgate: The Entrance to the Path (1945), and The Dark Star (1951). He was also a member of the Fairy Investigation Society. He died February 15, 1970.

Many people believed that Dowding's major contribution to the defense of Britain in World War II was not sufficiently honored. A statue of him was eventually erected in 1988 at St. Clements Dane, the Royal Air Church in the Strand, west central London. It was unveiled by the Queen Mother on Sunday, October 30, 1988.

Sources:

Dowling, Lady. Beauty—Not the Beast. St. Helier, Spearman, 1980. Reprinted as The Psychic Life of Muriel, the Lady Dowling: An Autobiography. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1981.

Dowling, Lord. The Dark Star. London: Museum Press, 1951.

———. Lychgate: The Entrance to the Path. N.p., 1945.

———. Many Mansions. London: Rider, 1943.

Dowding, Lady Muriel (1908–1993)

Born in London on March 22, 1908, Muriel Albino became a Spiritualist at age 15. She had a psychic gift, and during her childhood in World War I she often saw a vision of "a tall soldier in khaki," whom she consulted about her problems and assumed she would one day meet and marry. In 1935 she married Max Whiting, who became a pilot during World War II and died when his plane was shot down.

Meanwhile Lord Hugh C. T. Dowding, who was convinced of the reality of human survival after death, received remarkable evidence of survival through the mediumship of Estelle Roberts. When Muriel Whiting became aware of Dowding's interest in Spiritualism she wrote to him, and as a result Dowding invited her to lunch. When they met she recognized him as the soldier of her childhood visions, and although he was 26 years older than she was, they were married in 1951.

Lady Dowding became a strong supporter of animal welfare and in 1959 launched a campaign called "Beauty Without Cruelty," dedicated to persuading women to renounce cosmetics produced from mistreated animals and to stop wearing animal furs. She published a magazine, Compassion, and opened a shop in Baywater, London, specializing in cosmetics obtained without mistreating animals. In 1964 she started an animal sanctuary at Nettlestead, Kent, and became president of the National Anti-Vivisection Society.

Lord Dowding died in 1970 at age 87. During her last two years, Lady Dowdling resided at a nursing home in Hove, Sussex. She died in November 1993.

Sources:

Dowding, Lady Muriel. Beauty—not the Beast. St. Helier, Jersey: Neville Spearman, 1980. Reprinted as The Psychic Life of Muriel, The Lady Dowding: An Autobiography. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1981.

Dowling, Levi H. (1844–1911)

Levi H. Dowling, the channel who received the classic Spiritualist text The Aquarian Gospel of Jesus the Christ, was the son of a minister in the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), a conservative Christian church founded in the early nineteenth century on the American frontier. As a teenager, Dowling began preaching and at the age of 18 was pastoring a small congregation and serving as a chaplain for the Union Army during the Civil War (1861–65). After the war, he became involved in the publishing of Sunday school literature. He reportedly attended two colleges prior to switching professions from the ministry to medicine, but the nature of his education is unknown. He possibly attended one of the eclectic or homeopathic schools that thrived during the period but have since disappeared.

The next years of Dowling's life are largely undocumented. He only noted that he spent much time in meditation, attempting to make contact with the akashic records—according to Theosophy, the comprehensive records of all of human history that exist upon an etheric plain. The idea derives from the Hindu concept of akasha, the primal substance out of which the universe has been created. In theosophical thought, the akashic records can be accessed while in certain altered states of consciousness, especially by some psychics who have prepared themselves. Dowling claimed to have spent four decades preparing himself.

Toward the end of his life, messages began to flow to Dowling. He rose early in the morning (between 2 and 6 A.M.) and wrote down the words as they were received. The result was the volume known as the Aquarian Gospel, published in 1911, the year of Dowling's death. It has been periodically republished over the years since and has circulated quite freely through theosophical and Spiritualist groups where many have accepted it as a truer record of Jesus' life, work, and teachings than that recorded in the Bible. Among a few small groups, it has attained the status of scripture. It was written in chapters and verses like the modern translations of the Bible (which was divided into chapters and verses only many centuries after the various books were written). The Aquarian Gospel covers the life of Christ and describes a number of incidents unknown in the older records, such as a trip to India. The overall purpose of the work, as the name implies, is to announce the coming of a new age, the Aquarian Age.

Sources:

Beskow, Per. Strange Tales about Jesus. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1983.

Dowling, Levi H. The Aquarian Gospel of Jesus the Christ. Los Angeles: The Author, 1911.

Goodspeed, Edgar. Strange New Gospels. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1931. Rev. ed. as: Modern Apocrypha. Boston: Beacon Press, 1956.

Dowsing

The study and detection of human response to water, minerals, and other underground materials. Dowsing, or "water witching," is usually distinguished from the related subject of radiesthesia by its focus on nonliving materials such as water, metals, minerals, or buried objects. Both dowsing and radiesthesia operators employ a divining-rod, pendulum, or similar device as an indicator of unconscious human sensitivity to hidden materials. Radiesthesia extends such detection to medical diagnosis and treatment, discovery of missing persons, telepathy, clairvoyance, and related paranormal phenomena. In Europe (particularly in France), however, the two terms are used synonymously.

The traditional form of dowsing is with a Y-shaped hazel branch. The operator holds the two ends in his hands and walks over an area thought to contain underground water. When crossing water, the branch turns over, often with considerable force, and the dowser is able to map the course of the underground water.

For some years it was hypothesized that some underground emanation or occult force moved the branch, but modern researchers tend to favor the idea that the operator responds to the hidden water in such a way that his own nervous energy moves the branch. Some theorists have compared this effect with table-turning or the raps often reported within Spiritualism. This does not preclude the possibility that some electromagnetic impulse stimulates the dowser's muscles through the nervous system, although there is no evidence of such an impulse.

Modern dowsers have developed considerable sensitivity and skill and will venture to estimate both the depth and possible yield of underground water. In addition to branches, dowsers employ many other forms of indicators—rods made of whalebone or wire, twisted coathangers, rods with cavities for a "sample" of the material sought for, and especially small pendulums. Since international agreements now outlaw whale hunting, plastic indicators are being substituted for whalebone.

Some dowsers even search for hidden materials over a scale map of a district, using a small suspended pendulum instead of a rod, and "map dowsing" has become synonymous with teleradiesthesia; (i.e., the tracing of materials or persons using a representation of an area instead of visiting the actual area). Some kind of psychic or other paranormal link is suggested between a district and its representation on a map.

Although dowsing and radiesthesia remain controversial, there seems to be considerable successes in water witching and the discovery of buried minerals. Water diviners have been widely employed by governments and businesses. One skilled dowser, Major C. A. Pogson, was official water diviner to the government of India between October 1925 and February 1930. During this period Pogson traveled thousands of miles locating sites for wells and bores and was a consultant on all matters relating to underground water.

The oldest organization in the field is the British Society of Dowsers, founded in the 1930s. There is also an American Society of Dowsers, which can be contacted at P.O. Box 24, Brained St., Danville, Vermont.

Sources:

Barrett, William, and Theodore Besterman. The Divining Rod: An Experimental and Psychological Investigation. London, 1926. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1968.

Benedikt, M. Ruten- und Pendel-lehre. Vienna; Leipzig, 1917.

Besterman, Theodore. Water Divining: New Facts & Theories. London: Methuen, 1938.

Bird, Christopher. The Diving Hand. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1979.

Cameron, Verne L. Aquavideo; Locating Underground Water. Santa Barbara, Calif.: El Cariso, 1970.

———. Map Dowsing. Santa Barbara, Calif.: El Cariso, 1971.

———. Oil Locating. Santa Barbara, Calif.: El Cariso, 1971.

Carrié, Abbé. L'hydroscopographie et métalloscopographie, ou l'art de découvrir les sources et les gisement metallifers au moyen de l'électro-magnétisme. Saintes, France, 1863.

Chambers, Howard V. Dowsing, Water Witches & Divining Rods for the Millions. Los Angeles: Sherbourne Press, 1969.

Chevreul, M. E. De la Baguette divinatoire, du pendule dit explorateur, et des tables tournantes. Paris, 1854.

De France, Henry. The Elements of Dowsing. London, 1948.

De Morogues, Baron. Observations sur le fluide organo-électrique. Paris, 1854.

De Vallemont, Abbe. La physique occulte, ou Traité de la baguette divinatoire. Paris, 1693.

Ellis, Arthur J. The Divining Rod: A History of Water Witching, with a Bibliography. Washington, 1917.

Klinckowstroem, Graf von. Virgula divina. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Wünschelrute. Berlin, 1910.

Maby, J. Cecil, and T. B. Franklin. The Physics of the Divining Rod. London, 1939.

Mager, Henri. Water Diviners and Their Methods. London, 1931.

Maury, Marguerite. How to Dowse: Experimental and Practical Radiasthesia. London: G. Bell and Sons, 1953.

Mermet, Abbe. Principles & Practice of Radiesthesie. London, 1967.

Nicolas, Jean. La verge de Jacob, ou l'art de trouver les trésors les sources, les limites, les métaux, les mines, les minéraux et autres cachées, par l'usage du baton fourché. Lyons, France, 1693. Translated as Jacob's Rod. London: Thomas Welton, 1875.

Nielsen, Greg, and J. Polansky. Pendulum Power. New York: Warner, 1977.

Roberts, Kenneth. Henry Gross and His Dowsing Rod. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1952.

Stark, Erwin E. A History of Dowsing and Energy Relationships. North Hollywood, Calif.: BAC, 1978.

Tromp, S. W. Psychical Physics: A Scientific Analysis of Dowsing, Radiesthesia & Kindred Divining Phenomena. New York: Elsevier, 1949.

Underwood, Peter. The Complete Book of Dowsing & Divining. London, 1980.

Vogt, Evon Z., and Ray Hyman. Water Witching, U.S.A. 2nd ed. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979.

Wayland, Bruce and Shirley Wayland. Steps to Dowsing Power. Life Force Press, 1976.
Weaver, Herbert. Diving, the Primary Sense: Unfamiliar Radiation in Nature, Art and Science. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1978.
Willey, Raymond C. Modern Dowsing. Cottonwood, AZ: Esoteric Publications, 1976.
Wyman, Walker D. Witching for Water, Oil, Pipes, and Precious Minerals. River Falls: University of Wisconsin Press, 1977.

Doyle, Arthur Conan (1859–1930)

Arthur Conan Doyle was born on May 22, 1859, in Edinburgh, Scotland, into a very strict Roman Catholic family. He was educated in Jesuit schools in the United Kingdom (Stoneyhurst) and in Austria (Stella Matutina) until he was 17. Although he was apparently attracted by the mystical, sacramental, and eucharistic aspects of Catholicism, he began to doubt his faith during his years at the Jesuit schools.

When Doyle entered the University of Edinburgh at age 17, he was, by his own account, a nonbeliever. "I found that the foundations not only of Roman Catholicism but of the whole Christian faith, as presented to me in nineteenth century theology, were so weak that my mind could not build upon them." These conditions had, according to Doyle, "driven me to agnosticism." It was during his university years that he came under the influence of materialists such as Joseph Bell, his self-proclaimed prototype for Sherlock Holmes, who taught his students the process of deductive reasoning through the observation of material phenomena.

As a result of this training, Doyle became convinced that every mystery of life could be solved through observation and deductive reasoning. Yet despite this training, his previous rejection of Catholicism, and his self-professed agnosticism, he continued to investigate religions, because without a religious foundation he felt a void in his life.

In 1881 Doyle received his medical degree and in 1882 set up a medical practice in Southsea (a suburb of Portsmouth), where he remained until 1890. Even while attending medical school, Doyle had actively investigated "new religions" in an effort to fill the void created when he left the Roman Catholic Church. He attended his first séance in 1880, and many of his short stories published in the 1880s reflect his interest in Spiritualism and his growing acceptance of it. Before the turn of the century Doyle had become interested in Theosophy, the Rosicrucians, the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, and Mormonism.

In 1887 Doyle published A Study in Scarlet, which was the first of 60 Sherlock Holmes stories he eventually wrote. Holmes proved to be his most popular fictional character. That same year he wrote two letters to the weekly Spiritualist periodical Light, in which he recounted his conversion to Spiritualism. In these letters Doyle wrote that he became convinced that Spiritualism was true after reading books on the subject by John W. Edmonds, Alfred Russel Wallace, and Alfred Drayson.

To put their writings to a test, he formed a circle of six that met at a Southsea residence on nine or ten occasions. This group received messages through table turning and automatic writing, but the significance of these events was inconclusive until an experienced medium with "considerable mediumistic power" was invited to sit with the circle. This medium, writing under control, told Doyle not to read a book by Leigh Hunt that he found convincing because neither the medium nor any of his group knew he was debating whether he should read the book.

Because of this experience, Doyle became convinced that Spiritualism taught the truth:

"[T]he incident which, after many months of inquiry, showed me at last that it was absolutely certain that intelligence could exist apart from the body. . . . After weighing the evidence, I could no more doubt the existence of the phenomena than I could doubt the existence of lions in Africa, though I have been to that continent and have never chanced to see one. . . . Let me conclude by exhorting any other searcher never to despair of receiving personal testimony but to persevere through any number of failures until at last conviction comes to him, as, it will."

Several weeks later he wrote another letter to Light, which he wrote "[a]s a Spiritualist" and in which he opined that "Spiritualism in the abstract has no 'weak points' " but admitted that "respectable Spiritualists persist in supporting and employing men who have been proved, as far as anything mundane is capable of proof, to be swindlers of the lowest order." Although he was ready to accept that "they have real but intermittent psychical powers," he was also convinced that such charlatans were "noxious parasites" who were the "greatest bane" of Spiritualism. Doyle had received his "definite demonstration," which he believed was necessary before he could embrace any new religion. Spiritualism provided the evidence that life continues after death and that a form of religion exists that is consistent with primitive Christianity and all its attendant miracles.

From 1887 to 1916 Doyle continued to participate in the Spiritualist movement. He wrote letters concerning religious issues, joined the Society for Psychical Research, and contributed thousands of pounds to the Spiritualist periodical Light. Although he did not proselytize the cause of Spiritualism, as he later would, Doyle did attend séances and studied psychic phenomena as part of his continuing search for truth. Many of his short stories published before 1916 also portray Spiritualist ideas and concepts in a favorable light.

Doyle also wrote three books during this period that his biographers have described as autobiographical: Beyond the City (1893), The Stark Munro Letters (1895), and A Duet With an Occasional Chorus (1899). In the most important of these works, The Stark Munro Letters, Doyle's hero, Stark Munro, reveals that he has only the "vaguest idea as to whence I have come from, whither I am going, or what I am here for. It is not for want of inquiry, or from indifference. I have mastered the principles of several religions. They have all shocked me by the violence which I should have to do to my reason to accept the dogmas of any one of them. . . . I see so clearly that faith is not a virtue, but a vice. It is a goat which has been headed with the sheep." And yet Doyle, through Munro, also admits that his loss of faith was traumatic: "When first I came out of the faith in which I had been reared, I certainly did feel for a time as if my life-belt had burst. I won't exaggerate and say that I was miserable and plunged in utter spiritual darkness." Munro also reflects Doyle's optimism for the future of religions: "The forms of religion will be abandoned, but the essence will be maintained; so that one universal creed will embrace the whole civilized earth. . . ."

Doyle's most productive period for writing fiction occurred after his conversion to Spiritualism. His best-known Sherlock Holmes stories were The Sign of Four (1890); The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes (1892); The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes (1894); and The Hound of the Baskervilles (1902). Doyle also "killed off" Sherlock Holmes—to concentrate on more serious literary efforts and his studies of Spiritualism—by drowning him in Reichenbach Falls in Switzerland. Ironically, Holmes was resurrected, or at least "born again," from the waters of Reichenbach in 1905 in The Return of Sherlock Holmes to help supplement Doyle's income. Later books on Holmes—The Valley of Fear (1915), His Last Bow (1917), and The Case-Book of Sherlock Holmes (1927)—helped enable Doyle to actively pursue his missionary efforts on behalf of Spiritualism.

Even though Doyle was a believer in Spiritualism beginning in the late 1880s, in 1916 he wrote an article in Light in which he enthusiastically proclaimed a new dedication to it. Subsequently he began to actively proselytize for the Spiritualist cause. World War I had finally convinced him to more fully embrace the movement: "I might have drifted on for my whole life as a psychical Researcher . . . [b]ut the War came, and . . . it brought earnestness into all our souls and made us look more closely at our own beliefs and reassess our values."

As a result of this "earnestness," he finally recognized that "this subject with which I had so long dallied was not merely a study of a force outside the rules of science, but that it was really something tremendous, a breaking down of the walls between two worlds, a direct undeniable message from beyond, a call of hope and of guidance to the human race at the time of its deepest affliction." Doyle also realized, apparently for the first time, that "the physical phenomena . . . are really of no account, and that their real value consists in the fact that they . . . make religion a very real thing, no longer a matter of faith, but a matter of actual experience and fact." As such, he turned with great zeal from the objective study of Spiritualism to proselytism.

Shortly after his second "conversion" he wrote two books, The New Revelation and The Vital Message, in which he proclaimed his personal belief in the movement. In addition, he wrote numerous letters to the press on the subject of Spiritualism in which he summarized the beliefs and practices of Spiritualists and claimed that he could not "recall any miracle in the New Testament which has not been claimed, upon good authority, as having occurred in the experience of spiritualists"; that Spiritualism is nothing more than what one would find "if he goes back nineteen hundred years and studies the Christianity of Christ"; that the date Spiritualism was organized in upstate New York in 1848 "is in truth the greatest date in human history since the great revelation of two thousand years ago;" and that no faith is necessary to realize that Spiritualism is true.

During the last decade of his life Doyle began spending great sums of money and traveled many thousands of miles to proselytize for the Spiritualist cause in Australia and New Zealand (1920–21), the United States and Canada (1922–23), France (1925), South Africa, Rhodesia, Uganda, Tanganyika and Kenya (1928–29), Scandinavia and Holland (1929), and, of course, England (1916–30). He also recorded a famous Movietone interview in 1927 that has never before been published in its entirety.

In 1924 Doyle also translated a book, Jeanne D'Arc Medium (Paris: Librairie des Sciences Psychiques, 1910), written by Leon Denis. Denis, like Doyle, was an adherent of Spiritualism. In his introduction to the translation Doyle extols Joan of Arc's virtues:

"[M]y personal conviction [is] that, next to the Christ, the highest spiritual being of whom we have an exact record upon the earth is the girl Joan. . . . Apart from the question of Christ's divinity, and comparing the two characters upon a purely human plane, there was much analogy between them. Each was sprung from the laboring class. Each proclaimed an inspired commission. Each was martyred while still young. Each was acclaimed by the common people and betrayed or disregarded by the great. Each excited the bitter hatred of the church of their time, the high priests of which in each case conspired for their death."

But Doyle does not stop there. He notes that Denis was a student of psychic matters and that his work is valuable since it gives us "some intelligible reason for the obvious miracle that a girl of nineteen, who could neither read nor write, and knew nothing of military affairs, was able in a few months to turn the tide of a hundred years' war and to save France from becoming a vassal of England."

In 1926, two years after publishing Jeanne D'Arc, Doyle published a two-volume work on the history of Spiritualism in which he attempted to present Spiritualism in a historical and topical perspective. Perhaps the most ironic development in Doyle's quest for a new religion occurred when he began to see himself increasingly as "a prophet of the future of the whole world. . . ." The Doyles were now put in personal contact with the guide to this uncertain future, an Arabian spirit called Pheneas, who communicated through Jean Doyle's [Arthur's wife] automatic writing.

Doyle's belief in the hereafter became increasingly premised on very specific communications from Pheneas through his wife, Jean. Receiving such messages caused him to state his absolute belief in the hereafter: "I have not only received . . . prophecies [concerning the end of the world] in a very consistent and detailed form, but also so large a number of independent corroborations that it is difficult for me to doubt that there lies some solid truth at the back of these."

Although Doyle remained committed to Spiritualism, he apparently became discouraged when the prophecies and revelations concerning the end of the world that had been communicated through Pheneas were not fulfilled, and he speculated that he and his wife may have become "victims of some extraordinary prank played upon the human race from the other side."

Doyle was still a dedicated Spiritualist at the time of his death in 1930. Until his death Doyle remained convinced that life continued after death, because of ongoing communications from deceased family members who assured him that they lived in the spirit world. These communications remained the "definite demonstration" that he had sought since his days at the University of Edinburgh. He believed that these apparitions and other evidence of Spiritualism provided a factual basis from which he could deduce, in the same manner that Sherlock Holmes would have deduced, that life continues after death. Given his acceptance of these apparitions, it is hardly surprising that Doyle was also convinced that his acceptance of Spiritualism was completely consistent with the deductive reasoning of Sherlock Holmes and Holmes's observation that "there is nothing in which deduction is so necessary as in religion. . . . It can be built up as an exact science by the reasoner."

Doyle died in 1930 in Crowborough, Sussex, England.

Sources:

Carr, John Dickson. The Life of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. London: John Murray, 1949.

Doyle, Arthur Conan. Letters to the Press. Edited by John M. Gibson and Richard L. Green. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1986.

Edwards, Owen Dudley. The Quest for Sherlock Holmes, A Biographical Study of Arthur Conan Doyle. Edinburgh: Mainstream Publishing, 1983.

Jones, Kelvin I. Conan Doyle and the Spirits: The Spiritualist Career of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1989.

Lellenberg, Jon L. The Quest for Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1987.

McCearney, James. Arthur Conan Doyle. Paris: La Table Ronde, 1988.

Nordon, Pierre. Conan Doyle. London: John Murray, 1966.

Pearson, Hesketh. Conan Doyle, His Life and Art. London: Methuen, 1943.

Stavert, Geoffrey. A Study in Southsea. Portsmouth, England: Milestone Publications, 1987.

Draconites

Stones also known as dentrites, draconius, or obsianus. According to Albertus Magnus a draconite is a shining black stone of pyramidal shape that is obtained from the head of a dragon, cut off while the animal is still panting. It subdues poison and endows its possessor with invincible courage. The kings of the East were said to have esteemed it a great treasure.

Dracula

Fictional vampire in a book of that name by Irish author Bram Stoker (1847–1912). The Count Dracula character has become an archetype for scores of books, films, and plays on the vampire theme since first appearing in Stoker's version of May 1897.

Stoker's character was supposedly based in part on the real-life Prince Dracula (Vlad V) in fifteenth-century Wallachia, but the historical original was reportedly a sadist rather than a vampire. According to legend, during his rule one of his punishments was to impale his victims on stakes and gloat over their sufferings. Stoker wedded the image of the literary vampire developed in the stories of John Polidori and Sheridan Le Fanu with information about the medieval Romanian ruler.

Stoker possibly became aware of the real Dracula through conversations with the Hungarian scholar Arminius Vambéry and supplemented his stories with research in Whitby, Yorkshire, and at the British Museum Library, London. There is thus considerable authenticity in much of the background detail of Stoker's book, including vampire folklore and actual locations in Transylvania (now Romania).

Dracula was first performed as a play on May 18, 1897, at the Lyceum Theatre, London (where Stoker was manager to the actor Henry Irving), but this first production was an adapted reading for copyright purposes, lasting four hours.

In 1923 permission for a dramatization of Dracula was given by Stoker's widow to Irish actor Hamilton Deane, and this version was first produced in June 1924 at the Grand Theatre, Derby, opening in London at the Little Theatre, John Street, Adelphi, February 14, 1924.

It is believed that the first screen versions were a Russian and then a Hungarian silent film, but copies of neither have survived. However, the 1922 German film, Nosferatu, oder Eine Symphonie des Grauens (a slightly disguised Dracula made by the famous silent film director F. W. Murnau), did survive in spite of Florence Stoker's attempt to squelch it. The role of the vampire was played by Max Schreck and the film achieved a doom-laden atmosphere, chiefly through the photography of cameraman Fritz Arno Wagner. After Florence Stoker's successful prosecution for infringement of copyright, the production company went into bankruptcy, but some prints survived and have been made available for public showings.

The Movies

The first official Dracula movie was made in Hollywood in 1930, directed by Tod Browning and starring Bela Lugosi in the title role. Lugosi became the most famous Dracula, appearing in many plays and films in this role. In 1972 a California court upheld the copyright of the heirs of Bela Lugosi in his own characterization of the part of Dracula. Over the years, the Dracula vampire theme has proliferated in movies all over the world, Christopher Lee and John Carradine playing the part most often. Dracula, the novel, has been brought to the screen more than a dozen times, and several hundred movies have featured the main character. In 1992, film director Francis Ford Coppola released his version of the classic entitled Bram Stroker's Dracula, with Gary Oldman in the title role supported by Anthony Hopkins and Winona Ryder. The film won Academy Awards for best costume design, makeup, sound effects, and editing.

In March 1968 the magazine Fate published an interview with Count Alexander Cepesi, who claimed to be a descendant of Vlad Dracula. Cepesi was a Romanian, living in Istanbul since 1947. He operated a blood bank and collected plasma for Turkish hospitals.

The traditional tomb of Dracula is in a monastery at Snagov, Romania. It was opened in 1931 but was found to contain only animal bones. A second grave in the same church contained a casket with a skeleton in a purple shroud embroidered with gold. However, the Weird Museum in Hollywood, California, exhibited what is claimed to be the authentic skeleton of Vlad Dracula, believed to have been removed from Bucharest.

In Britain, the Dracula Society exists to promote the study and appreciation of the work of Bram Stoker and Gothic themes in literature, theater, and film. In the Republic of Ireland, a Bram Stoker Society was formed with similar aims and fraternal association with the British Dracula Society. In the United States both the Count Dracula Fan Club and the Count Dracula Society carry on the appreciation of Dracula and his vampire cousins. Most recently, the Transylvanian Society of Dracula, headquartered in Bucharest, has brought together a worldwide network of Dracula enthusiasts.

The modern revival of interest in the undead vampire of Bram Stoker's famous novel has continued to grow through the twentieth century but has increased since the 1972 publication of a biography of the real Dracula by historians Raymond T. McNally and Radu Florescu. In May 1977, during ceremonies held in Bucharest to celebrate the 100th anniversary of Romanian independence, President Nicolae Ceausescu solemnly honored fifteenth-century warrior-prince Vlad Dracula (prototype of Stoker's thriller) by inclusion in the nation's Hall of Fame. Prince Vlad is a tourist attraction in Romania for hundreds of foreign visitors who join the tours of sites related to both Prince Vlad and the novel's Transylvanian count. The real Dracula, Vlad Tepes or "Vlad the Impaler," killed his enemies by impaling them on sharply pointed wooden stakes. This is an inversion of the traditional method of setting a vampire to rest, as told in Dracula.

Vlad the Impaler was captured by Turks in 1476, and after decapitation his head was exhibited in Constantinople, on a stake. His status as a national hero stems from his opposition to the Turks and "love for the fatherland" as an authoritarian.

The centennial of the novel Dracula was celebrated in 1997 and Vlad Tepes is still a well-known historical figure to contemporary audiences, while the literary Dracula has become an immediately recognizable figure in popular culture. The image of Dracula regularly appears on products from greeting cards to mass media advertisements. Dracula books, comic books, movies, jewelry, dramas, candy, and toys appeal to an ever increasing audience.

Sources:

Bisang, Robert Eighteen-Bisang. Dracula: A Century of Editions, Adaptations and Translations. Part One: English Language Edition. Santa Barbara: Transylvanian Society of Dracula, 1978.

Florescu, Radu & Raymond T. McNally. Dracula: A Biography of Vlad the Impaler 1391–1476. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1973.

Glut, Donald. The Dracula Book. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1975.

McNally, Raymond T. & Radu Florescu. In Search of Dracula: A True History of Dracula and Vampire Legends. New York: New York Graphic Society, 1972.

Melton, J. Gordon. The Vampire Book: The Encyclopedia of the Undead. Detroit: Gale Research, 1994.

Miller, Elizabeth. Dracula: Sense and Nonsense. Westcliff-on-Sea, UK: Desert Island Books, 1998.

———. Reflection on Dracula: Ten Essays, White Rock, BC: Transylvanian Press, 1997.

Shepard, Leslie, and Albert Powers, eds. Dracula: Celebrating 100 Years. Dublin, Ireland: Mentor Press, 1997.

Summers, Montague. The Vampire: His Kith and Kin. Reprint, London: Routledge, Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner, 1928. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1960.

———. The Vampire in Europe. London: Routledge, Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner, 1929. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1966.

Wolf, Leonard. The Annotated Dracula. New York: Clarkson N. Potter, 1975.

The Dracula Society

Founded in Britain October 23, 1973, by Bernard Davies and Bruce Wightman to promote the study and appreciation of the life and works of Bram Stoker; vampire, werewolf, and monster themes in fiction; stage and movie adaptations of Dracula, Frankenstein, and their derivatives; the sources of Stoker and similar writers; and possible links between fictional and historical persons and places concerned with Gothic literature. Honorary life members of the society include Christopher Lee and the late Vincent Price, famous for their roles in horror movies.

The society holds meetings, lectures, and film showings and has organized tours to Transylvania by arrangement with the Romanian Tourist Ministry. These tours have traced the route of Jonathan Harker in Stoker's novel Dracula and visited localities associated with the book. During the latter part of 1976, the society's newsletter, Voices from the Vaults, was amplified by publication of the magazine The Dracula Journals (now discontinued). Address: The Hon. Secretary, The Dracula Society, 36 Elliston House, 100 Wellington St., London, SE18 GQF, England.

Sources

Davies, Bernard. Whitby Dracula Trail. Scarborough, Yorkshire, UK: Department of Tourism and Amenities, Scarborough Borough Council, n.d.

Guiley, Rosemary. Vampires Among Us. New York, Pocket Books. 1991.

Dragon

A monster of enormous size, common to almost all countries. Descriptions of its appearance vary, but it is of reptilian nature, often red or green in color, sometimes with several heads that spew fire and vapors, and a large tail, not unlike some dinosaurs.

It is of enormous strength, but the ancients believed that it could be charmed by music, and the dragon that guarded the Golden Fleece of Greek legend was soothed by the voice of Medea. In India at the time of Alexander the Great, a dragon was worshiped as a god, while in occult history it is the manifestation of hell.

The dragon, however, is best known in legendary history as the monster whose duty it is to provide the hero with opportunities of valor. There is a legend of St. George and the Dragon and also the dragon that was slain by Sir Lancelot, one of the knights of King Arthur's Round Table.

In the Hebrew Bible (the Christian Old Testament) the word tannin, commonly rendered "dragon" in older English translations, generally refers to a variety of animals such as crocodiles, jackals, and serpents, but occasionally to the dragon (Ezek. 29:3; 32:3). In Chapter 12 of the biblical book of Revelation, the dragon, a representation of the Evil One, is overcome by the archangel Michael.

The dragon became a symbol of great strength in the European Middle Ages. In the fifteenth century, the emperor of the Holy Roman Empire founded the Order of the Dragon to unite Christian rulers against the incursions of the Turkish Muslims into the Balkans. Among those invested with the order was Prince Vlad of Wallachia (Romania). He assumed the name Vlad Dracul, dracul being the Romanian word for dragon. His son took the diminutive form of the name as Prince Vlad Dracula.

During the time of Henry VII (1457–1509), a coin was given to those who were cured of possession with one side featuring an angel standing with both feet on a dragon.

The idea of the dragon is perhaps evolved from the concept of the earth as a living being, a notion that gained currency from earthquakes and related phenomena.

"Draumkvaede"

The "Dream Song" of medieval Norway, which describes the mystical visions of Olav Asteson in the 13 holy nights from Christmas to Epiphany. In a trance, Asteson travels through earth, water, air, and fire; crosses the perilous Gjaller Bridge, guarded by a serpent, a hound, and a bull; and sees heaven and hell and the judgment of souls. He returns to tell his visions to the congregation at church.

This folk ballad with pagan and Christian symbols was first known in the Telemark region about 1200 C.E. and remained in oral tradition until modern times. It has always been a source of inspiration in Norwegian poetry, painting, and music. Reportedly a traditional rendering of Draumkvaede has a mystical power in its tones and melody. In 1955 a limited edition recording of the singing of Gudrun Grave Norland was issued by the Norsk Folksmuseum. An English language version of Draumkvaede was made in 1961 by anthroposophist Eleanor C. Merry, with color illustrations from her own paintings.

Sources:

Barnes, Michael. Draumkvaede. Oslo, 1974.

Merry, Eleanor. The Dream Song of Olaf Asteson. England: New Knowledge Books, 1961.

Dream Body

A hypothetical duplicate of the physical body similar to the double or astral body. Reportedly the experience of the astral body is most commonly accessed during sleep and its reality often experienced as a dream.

Dr. F. van Eeden of Holland attempted to transfer his consciousness to his dream body so that he could remember everything that transpired during sleep and also attempted to control this body to manipulate physical objects. Hereward Carrington states in Higher Psychical Development (1920):

"He did not succeed in doing so, but came very near it—and succeeded to the extent that he induced a complete dual consciousness. He remembered clearly that he was asleep in bed, with his arms folded across his breast; and at the same time he remembered clearly that he was looking out of the window and saw a dog run up and look at him through the glass, and run away again—and details of that character. He then remembered gliding towards the couch on which his physical body was lying, lying down beside it—and a moment later woke up and was again, of course, in the physical body. But he had the extreme sense of duality of consciousness of the two bodies."

In the book The Projection of the Astral Body (1929) Sylvan Muldoon claims that he met with similar experiences and at first he, too, believed that his consciousness was in both bodies simultaneously. Further experiments, however, convinced him that a double functioning of vision through the cord connecting the astral body with the physical sufficiently explained the experience.

Muldoon claims that during a conscious projection, within cord activity range, the sense of sight can function in three ways: from the eyes of the phantom, from the spot occupied by the physical eyes, and from both simultaneously. As regards moving physical objects in dreams, Muldoon states: "I know it to be the truth, viz., one can move an object in his dream, but that the object does not move until about two seconds later in reality."

Supposedly Muldoon started a metronome in his dream. The metronome was in another room on the piano. After his return to consciousness a little time elapsed before the metronome began to tick. He points out the connection to the synchronization of movement, observed between the medium Eusapia Palladino's limbs and the objects moved as observed by Sir Oliver Lodge:

"When six or seven feet away the time interval (between the push and the movement of the object) was something like two seconds. When the accordion is being played, the fingers of the medium are moving in a thoroughly appropriate manner, and the process reminds one of the twitching of a dog's legs when he is supposed to be dreaming that he is chasing a hare. It is as if Eusapia were dreaming that she was fingering the instrument, and dreaming it so vividly that the instrument was actually played. It is as if a dog dreamt of the chase with such energy that a distant hare was really captured and killed, as by a phantom dog; and, fanciful as for the moment it may seem, and valueless as I suppose such speculations are, I am, I confess, at present more than half disposed to look in some such direction for a clue to these effects. In an idealistic conception of nature it has by many philosophers been considered that thought is the reality, and that material substratum is but a consequence of thought. So in a minor degree it appears here; it is as if, let us say, the dream of the entranced person were vivid enough physically to effect surrounding objects and actually produce objective results; to cause not only real and permanent movements of ordinary objects, but also temporary fresh aggregations of material particles into extraordinary objects—these aggregations being objective enough to be felt, heard, seen and probably even photographed while they last."

A number of experiments have been carried out by parapsychologists in modern times to attempt to establish whether there is a measurable objective reality to the "astral body," but without decisive evidence. Various techniques have been used, including magnetometers, ultraviolet and infrared detectors, strain gauges, thermistors, and other electronic devices; animals have also been used as detectors.

Use of the terms astral body, double, etheric body, and dream body as more or less synonymous is somewhat confusing. For general purposes, the term astral body is more widespread, although astral projection is now being superseded by out-of-the-body travel because parapsychologists have begun taking increased interest in the phenomenon. (See also lucid dreaming.)

Sources:

Morris, R. L., S. B. Harry, J. Janis, J. Hartwell, and William G. Roll. "Studies of Communication during Out-of-body Experiences." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 72 (1978).

Muldoon, Sylvan J., and Hereward Carrington. The Projection of the Astral Body. London: Rider, 1929.

Dreaming True

The ability to have control and consciousness in the dream state, also known as lucid dreaming. According to Hereward Carrington (in his book Higher Psychical Development, 1924) dreamers can keep conscious control up to the moment of falling asleep. He advises:

"When you have learned to do that, then construct before yourself, mentally, a definite scene, which you must hold firmly in mind. Then, as you are falling to sleep hold this scene before you, and at the very last moment, before you fall asleep, consciously transfer yourself into the scene—in other words, step into the picture; and if you have developed yourself to the requisite point, you will be enabled to carry over an unbroken consciousness into the dream state; and in this way you have a perfect continuity of thought; there is no break in the consciousness; you step into the dream picture and go on dreaming consciously. That is the process of dreaming true, and after this dream is fully enacted, then you should remember perfectly all that has transpired during the sleep period."

In the book The Projection of the Astral Body by Sylvan J. Muldoon and Carrington (1929), Muldoon remarks that these instructions are in harmony with the method of dream control used to induce the astral body to move out into space. An article in the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 26, July 1913) records van Eeden's experiments in dreaming true. The British psychical researcher J. Arthur Hill vouches for the truthfulness of the experiences in The Dreams of Orlow (1916), by A. M. Irvine.

Sources:

Muldoon, Sylvan J., and Hereward Carrington. The Projection of the Astral Body. London: Rider, 1929.

Dream Laboratory

Established by Montague Ullman in 1962 "to explore the problem of telepathy and dreams by means of the newly discovered Rapid Eye Movement monitoring technique." The laboratory's principal function is research, but it also brings together scholars concerned with parapsychology and organizes lectures to outside groups. It has conducted a number of experiments on altered states of consciousness and psi faculty during sleep that have been reported in various professional journals. It was directed for ten years by Stanley Krippner. Address: Department of Psychiatry, Maimonides Medical Center, 4802 10th Ave., Brooklyn, NY 12219.

Sources:

Ullman, Montague. Dream Telepathy. Rev. ed. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1989.

———. The Varieties of Dream Experience: Expanding Our Ways of Working with Dreams. New York: Continuum, 1987.

Ullman, Montague, and Stanley Krippner. Dream Studies and Telepathy: An Experimental Approach. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1970.

Dreams

The occult significance of dreams was a matter of speculation among the wise at an early period in the history of civilization. The entries on Babylonia and Egypt to some extent outline the methods by which the wise men of those countries divined the future from visions seen in sleep, and articles dealing with other countries include data relating to dreams and dreamlore. This entry addresses some of the more outstanding theories of antiquity regarding the nature and causes of dreams and the manner in which the ancient diviners generally interpreted them.

Historical Views of Dreaming

Dreams were regarded as of two kinds—false and true, in either case emanating from a supernatural intelligence, evil or good. Sleep was regarded as a second life by the ancients, a life in which the soul was freed from the body and was therefore much more active than during the waking state. The acts it observed and the scenes through which it passed were thought to have a bearing on the future life of the dreamer, but it is also believed that the dream life was regarded as supernatural and "inverted," and that the events that the bodiless spirit beheld were the opposites of those that would later occur on the earthly plane. The idea thus originated that "dreams go by contraries," as both popular belief and many treatises upon the subject of nightly visions assure us is the case.

A belief in the divinatory character of dreams arose, and their causes and nature occupied some of the greatest minds of antiquity. Aristotle, for example, believed them to arise solely from natural causes. Posidonius the Stoic was of the opinion that there were three kinds: the first was automatic and came from the clear sight of the soul, the second from spirits, and the third from God. Cratippus, Democritus, and Pythagoras held doctrines almost identical to this or differing only in detail.

Later, Macrobius divided dreams into five kinds: the dream, the vision, the ocular dream, the insomnium, and the phantasm. The first was a figurative and mysterious representation that required an interpretation; the second was an exact representation of a future event in sleep; the third was a dream representing some priest or divinity who declared to the sleeper things to come; the fourth was an ordinary dream not deserving of attention; and the fifth was a disturbing half-awake dream, a species of nightmare.

Other writers divided dreams into accidental dreams and those induced for the purposes of divination. Herodotus wrote that in the temple of Bel in Babylon, a priestess lay on a bed of ram skin ready to dream for divination. The ancient Hebrews obtained such dreams by sleeping among tombs. Dreams are believed to be as successful as hypnosis and other methods of reaching the supernatural world and hearing its pronouncements.

Sleep was, of course, often induced by drugs, whether the soma of the Hindus, the peyotl of the ancient Mexicans, the hashish of the Arabs, or the opium of the Malays or Chinese. These narcotics, which have the property of inducing speedy sleep and of heightening inward visions, were and are still prized by professional dreamers all over the world, especially as they render dreaming almost immediately possible.

Ancient Methods of Dream Interpretation

As stated, interpretation of dreams was generally undertaken by a special class of diviners, who in ancient Greece were known as oneiocritikoi, or "interpreters of dreams." The first treatise on the subject was that of Artemidorus (ca. 100 C.E.). He differentiated between the dreams of kings and those of commoners, since he believed that the visions of royalty referred to the commonwealth and not to the individual. Dreams that represented something happening to the dreamer revealed a personal significance, whereas a dream relating to another concerned him alone. He detailed the numerous species of dreams throughout five books, giving numerous examples. The rules of Artemidorus are far from clear, and according to them, any dream might signify any event, and any interpretation might be considered justifiable.

The method of testing dreams according to Moses Amyraldus in his Discours sur les songes divins (1625) was to determine whether the instructions and advice they contained made for good or ill—a test impossible to apply until after the result is known. But Amyraldus addressed this difficulty by proposing to test dreams by the evidence of divine knowledge they showed—by asking whether the dream gave any evidence of things such as God alone could know.

It seems from an examination of dreams submitted to the ancient diviners that the exhibited symbolism could only be interpreted through divine aid, as in the cases of Moses and Daniel in the Bible. Many improbable interpretations were given to most epochal dreams of antiquity. There are some students of the occult who doubt the occult significance of dreams and do not classify dreams generally with vision, second sight, or ecstasy.

Dreams and Psychical Phenomena

Dreams of a supernormal character fall within the purview of psychical research. The dividing line between normal and supernormal dreams is not easy to draw. It is believed that subconscious elaboration often presents supernormal effects.

Reportedly Goethe solved scientific problems and composed poetry in his dreams. Jean de La Fontaine composed The Fable of Pleasures and Samuel Taylor Coleridge wrote "Kubla Khan" (1816) as a result of dreams. Bernhard Palissy made a piece on dream inspiration. Matthew Maury confessed, "I have had in dream ideas and inspiration that could never have entered my consciousness when awake." Giuseppe Tartini heard his "Sonate del Diavolo" played by Beelzebub in a dream, Holden composed La Phantasie in his sleep; and Charles Nodier's Lydia was similarly born. Robert Louis Stevenson's most ingenious plots were evolved in the dream state. Reportedly Kruger, Corda, and Maignan solved mathematical problems in dreams and Condillac finished an interrupted lecture. For many of the Romantic writers, such as Coleridge and Nodier, these creative dreams were induced by the ingestion of opium.

A dream of Louis Agassiz is frequently quoted. He tried for two weeks to decipher the obscure impression of a fish fossil on the stone slab in which it was preserved. In a dream he saw the fish with all the missing features restored. The image escaped him on awakening. He went to the Jardin des Plantes in the hope that an association with the fossil would recapture it. It did not. The next night he again dreamed of the fish, but in the morning the features of the fish were as elusive as ever. On the third night he placed paper and pencil near his bed. Toward morning the fish again appeared in a dream. Half dreaming, half awake, he traced the outlines in the darkness. On awakening he was surprised to see details in his nocturnal sketch that he thought impossible. He returned to the Jardin des Plantes and began to chisel on the surface of the stone using the sketch as a guide. Reportedly Agassiz found the hidden portions of the fish as indicated in the drawing.

The dream of a Professor Hilprecht, a Babylonian scholar who tried to decipher writing on two small pieces of agate, is more complicated and belongs to the clairvoyant order. As reported in the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (August 1900), he went to sleep and dreamt of a tall, thin priest of the old pre-Christian Nippur who led him to the treasure chamber of the temple and went with him into a small, low-ceilinged room without windows in which there was a large wooden chest; scraps of agate and lapis lazuli lay scattered on the floor. Here the priest addressed Hilprecht as follows:

"The two fragments which you have published separately belong together, and their history is as follows: King Kruigalzu [c. 1300 B.C.E.] once sent to the temple of Bel, among other articles of agate and lapis-lazuli, an inscribed votive cylinder of agate. Then we priests suddenly received the command to make for the statue of the god Nidib a pair of ear rings of agate. We were in great dismay, since there was no agate as raw material at hand. In order for us to execute the command there was nothing for us to do but cut the votive cylinder into three parts, thus making three rings, each of which contained a portion of the original inscription. The first two served as ear rings for the statue of the god; the two fragments which have given you so much trouble are portions of them. If you will put the two together you will have a confirmation of my words." The continuation of the story is given by Mrs. Hilprecht, who testified to having seen her husband jump out of bed, rush into the study and cry out, "It is so, it is so."

The scientist Nikola Tesla had waking visions in which a complex electrical engineering apparatus was perceived in total details of design and construction.

There are many cases of bits of information obtained in dreams. William James was impressed by the Enfield case, in which the discovery of the body of a drowned woman was effected through a dream of a Mrs. Titus of Lebanon, a stranger to the scene. Charles Richet recounts the following instance of dream cognition:

"I saw Stella on the 2nd of December during the day, and on leaving I said 'I am going to give a lecture on snake poison.' She at once replied: 'I dreamt last night of snakes, or rather of eels.' Then, without of course giving any reason, I asked her to tell me her dream, and her exact words were: 'It was about eels more than snakes, two eels, for I could see their white shining bellies and their sticky skin; and I said to myself I do not like these creatures, but it pains me when they are hurt.' This dream was strangely conformable to what I had done the day before, December 1. On that day I had, for the first time in twenty years, experimented with eels. Desiring to draw from them a little blood, I had put two eels on the table and their white, shining, irridescent, viscous bellies had particularly struck me."

A case of dream clairvoyance, possibly under spirit influence, is that of a Miss Loganson, 19, of Chicago. She saw in a dream the murder of her brother, Oscar, who was a farmer of Marengo, about 50 miles northwest of Chicago. She accused a farmer neighbor named Bedford for days, but no one paid attention to her. At length she was permitted to send a telegram; the reply was, "Oscar has disappeared." Starting for Oscar's farm, accompanied by another brother and by the police, she went directly to Bedford's house. Traces of blood were found in the kitchen. Proceeding to the hen house, the yard of which was paved, the girl said, "My brother is buried here." Because of the girl's insistence and her agitation, consent was given to dig. Under the pavement they first found the brother's overcoat; five feet down they came upon the body. Bedford was arrested at Ellos, Nebraska, and hanged in due course. Miss Loganson, in explanation, said that the spirit of her brother haunted her for seven days in dreams.

Lost objects are frequently found in dreams. In most cases subconscious memory sufficiently explains the mystery. There are, however, more complicated cases. According to legend Hercules appeared in a dream to Sophocles and indicated where a golden crown would be found. Sophocles got the reward promised to the finder.

Supposedly the paranormal character of dreams is clearest in telepathic and prophetic dreams. They often produce an impression lasting for days. Sweating and trembling are occasionally experienced on waking from a dream of this character. The dreams tend to be repeated. One case of prophetic dreams announced the murder of a Chancellor Perceval. It is thus narrated by one Abercrombie: "Many years ago there was mentioned in several of the newspapers a dream which gave notice of the murder of Mr. Perceval. Through the kindness of an eminent medical friend in England I have received the authentic particulars of this remarkable case, from the gentleman to whom the dream occurred. He resides in Cornwall, and eight days before the murder was committed, dreamt that he was in the lobby of the House of Commons, and saw a small man enter, dressed in a blue coat and white waistcoat. Immediately after, he saw a man dressed in a brown coat with yellow basket metal buttons draw a pistol from under his coat, and discharge it at the former, who instantly fell; the blood issued from the wound a little below the left breast. He saw the murderer seized by some gentlemen who were present, and observed his countenance; and on asking who the gentleman was that had been shot, he was told that it was the Chancellor. He then awoke, and mentioned the dream to his wife, who made light of it; but in the course of the night the dream occurred three times without the least variation in any of the circumstances. He was now so much impressed by it, that he felt much inclined to give notice to Mr. Perceval, but was dissuaded by some friends whom he consulted, who assured him that he would only get himself treated as a fanatic. On the evening of the eighth day after, he received the account of the murder. Being in London a short time after, he found in the print-shops a representation of the scene, and recognised in it the countenance and dresses of the parties, the blood on Mr. Perceval's waistcoat, and the yellow basket buttons on Bellingham's coat, precisely as he had seen them in his dreams."

J. W. Dunne's An Experiment with Time (1927) is a study of how future events are foreshadowed in our dreams. By keeping a record of his dreams, putting them down immediately on awakening, he found that a considerable part of his dreams anticipated future experiences, and this was corroborated by fellow experimenters.

Many other dreams, difficult to classify, bear the stamp of paranormal. Camille Flammarion in his Death and its Mystery (1922–23) quoted the curious dream of a Mrs. Marechal, who between sleeping and waking, saw a specter taking her arm and saying, "Either your husband or your daughter must die. Choose!" After great mental sufferings she decided for her child. Five days later her husband, who was in good health, suddenly died.

The experience of déjà vu to which advocates of reincarnation often refer, may be explained by traveling clairvoyance in dreams. Another explanation, a theory of ancestral dreams, is offered in the Bulletins et Mémoires de la Societé d'Anthropologie de Paris by Letourneau, as follows:

"Certain events, external or psychic, which have made a deep impression on a person, may be so deeply engraved upon his brain as to result in a molecular orientation, so lasting that it may be transmitted to some of his descendants in the same way as character, aptitudes, mental maladies, etc. It is then no longer a question of infantile reminiscences, but of ancestral recollections, capable of being revived. From that will proceed not only the fortuitous recognition of places which a person has never seen, but, moreover a whole category of peculiar dreams, admirably co-ordinated, in which we witness as at a panorama, adventures which cannot be remembrances, because they have not the least connection with our individual life" (Paul Joire, Psychical and Supernormal Phenomena, 1936).

Hereward Carrington called attention in The Story of Psychic Science (1930) to the neglect shown for the dreams of mediums. It is believed that if the communicators are subconscious personalities, some connection may be established between them and the dreams of the medium. In the Lenora Piper trances the communicators themselves alleged that they were in a dreamlike state. In one instant a statement came through that was quite wrong, but upon investigation, it turned out to be a remark that the communicator made in the delirium of death.

Modern Views on Dreaming

Modern scientists have studied the relationship of eye movements to dreaming. Professors N. Kleitman and E. Aserinsky of the Department of Physiology, University of Chicago, monitored eye movements of sleepers using electroencephalographic records. They distinguished four types of brain wave and sleep periods, ranging from lightest sleep to deep coma. In stage 1 there were rapid eye movements; in stages 2, 3, and 4, eye movements were slow. They concluded that rapid eye movements (REMs) were related to dreaming, when the eyes move like a spectator watching a theater play or reading a book.

This relationship between eye movement and mental states makes interesting comparison with Eastern religious techniques of meditation. In both Indian and Chinese yoga meditation exercises, eye rolling and focusing is linked to techniques of concentration and visionary experience.

The dream state plays a prominent part in Hindu religious philosophy, which recognizes four states of consciousness—waking, dreaming, deep sleep, and a fourth condition of higher consciousness that embraces the first three. Hindu mystics have stressed that since the essential self (the unconditioned sense of "I") is constant in all states of consciousness, identification with the body, mind, emotions, memories, age, sex, and so on in waking life is illusory—a false ego—since such characteristics are transitory. The pure self is always present, and this essential "I-ness" is the same in all individuals. Awareness of this true self in the fourth condition of higher consciousness (turiya) is known as self-realization, in which there is unity with all creation. The significance of dreaming, deep sleep, and waking states is discussed in the Hindu scripture Mandukya Upanishad.

Many out-of-the-body travel experiences (astral projection) appear to be stimulated by vivid dreams, particularly when waking consciousness is aroused by some irregularity in the logic of a dream. For example, a dreamer recognizes the familiar environment of his own room, but notices that the wallpaper is the wrong design and color, and immediately thinks "This must be a dream!" This gaining of waking consciousness while still in a sleeping condition sometimes results in a subtle or astral body moving independently of the physical body. (See dreaming true; lucid dreams)

Some experimenters have claimed that release of the subtle body may be stimulated by deliberately induced images of release (e.g., taking off in an airplane, traveling upward in an elevator), just before passing into the sleep state. Such out-of-the-body experiences were also recognized in Hindu religious philosophy and are described in ancient scriptures. The subtle body was named the sukshma sharira.

Freudian and Jungian psychoanalysis have moved in a different direction in their interpretation of the significance of dreams. Certain elements in dreams are said to be wish fulfilling, or to contain clues to psychic problems of the individual. In Jungian analysis, dream symbols are also understood as universal archetypes of human experience. Carl G. Jung drew heavily upon Eastern religious philosophies in his exposition of the concept of a collective unconscious.

Scientific research indicates other fascinating areas of dreaming. In 1927 J. W. Dunne, a British airplane designer, published his remarkable book An Experiment with Time, in which he analyzes a dream experiment suggestive of the occurrence of future elements in dreams, side by side with images from past experience.

In 1970 the Soviet psychiatrist Dr. Vasily Kasatkin reported on a 28 year study of 8,000 dreams and concluded that dreams could warn of the onset of a serious illness several months in advance, through a special sensitivity of the brain to preliminary physical symptoms.

At the Dream Laboratory, founded at Maimonides Medical Center, New York, in 1962, volunteers submitted to controlled experiments in dreaming, studying the rapid eye movements noticeable in people as they dream. One of the most interesting projects was a statistical study with pairs of subjects, which tended to show that telepathic dreams could be produced experimentally.

It would seem that dreaming and the elements in dreams have many different aspects of a physiological and psychological nature, with certain paranormal characteristics. Many of these aspects differ widely in various individuals. There have been well-authenticated prophetic dreams, as well as fragmentary elements of future events of the kind described by J. W. Dunne. Many aspects of dream imagery appear to be a visual presentation of individual psychic problems. Increasing evidence from out-of-the-body travel experiences has convinced some researchers of the reality of astral travel and of its stimulus through dream images. It may well be, as noted in several religious traditions, that there are also meta-physical dimensions to dream experience.

More than a century has passed since Sigmund Freud's The Interpretation of Dreams (1899) was first published. Its main premise, holding with Freud's conception of the unconscious mind, was that dreams are the symbolic fulfillment of repressed childhood desires. Although the book's sales were abysmally slow for its first several years in print and, despite the holes in Freud's theory that are obvious today, Interpretation of Dreams has greatly influenced Western thought and culture and is now considered by some dream analysts to be the bible of dream studies. Bookstores have long carried dream dictionaries that offer interpretations of nearly any and every symbol or image seen in a dream. Modern dream studies have demonstrated, if anything, that the evaluation of dreams is far more complex than these popular dream interpretation manuals even begin to suggest. To address a more educated society, recent dream manuals offer more in-depth in their analysis of dream interpretation with many concentrating on awareness of hidden messages and awakening the unconscious mind.

Sources:

Artemidorus. The Interpretation of Dreams: Oneirocritica. Translated by Robert White. Park Ridge, N.J.: Noyes Press, 1975.

Cartwright, Rosalind D. Night Life: Explorations in Dreaming. Englewood, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1977.

Christmas, Henry. The Cradle of the Twin Giants, Science and History. 2 vols. London, 1849.

Colquohoun, John C. An History of Magic, Witchcraft & Animal Magnetism. 2 vols. N.p., 1851.

De Becker, R. The Meaning of Dreams. London, 1968.

Diamond, E. The Science of Dreams. London, 1962.Dunne, J. W. An Experiment with Time. London, 1927.

Ellis, Havelock. The World of Dreams. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1922. Reprint, Detroit: Gale Research, 1976.

Faraday, Ann. Dream Power. New York: Coward, McCann & Geoghegan, 1972. Reprint, New York: Berkeley, 1973.

Freud, Sigmund. The Interpretation of Dreams. London, 1942.

Garfield, Patricia L. Creative Dreaming. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1974.

Green, Celia E. Lucid Dreams. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1968.

Hutchinson, H. Dreams and their Meanings. London, 1901.Jung, C. G. Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious. Collected Works, vol. 9. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1959.

Kelsey, Morton T. God, Dreams, and Revelation: A Christian Interpretation of Dreams. Minneapolis: Augsburg Publishing House, 1974.

LaBerge, Steven. Lucid Dreaming: The Power of Being Awake and Aware in Your Dreams. Los Angeles: Jeremy P. Tarcher, 1987.

Lang, Andrew. The Book of Dreams & Ghosts. London, 1897. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1974.

Lawrence, Lauren. Dream Keys: Unlocking the Power of Your Unconcious Mind. New York: Dell Publishing, 1999.

Lincoln, J. S. The Dream in Primitive Cultures. London, 1935. Reprint, Academic Press, 1970.

Luce, Gay Gaer. Body Time. Pantheon, 1961.

Luce, Gay Gaer, and J. Segal. Sleep. New York: Coward, McCann, 1966.

Lukeman, Alex. What Your Dreams Can Teach You. St. Paul: Llewellyn Publications, 1997.

Muldoon, Sylvan J., and Hereward Carrington. The Projection of the Astral Body. London, 1929. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1967.

Nikhilananda, Swami, trans. Mandukya Upanishad. Chicago: Vedanta Press, 1972.

Pohle, Nancy C. Awakening the Real You: Awareness Through Dreams and Intuition. Virginia Beach, Va.: A.R.E. Press, 1999.

Priestley, J. B. Man and Time. London, 1964. Reprint, New York: Dell, 1971.

Ratcliff, A. J. J. A History of Dreams. London, 1913.Sabin, Katharine C. ESP and Dream Analysis. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1974.

Seafield, Frank. The Literature & Curiosities of Dreams. 2nd ed. London, 1877.

Staff, V. S. Remembered on Waking; Concerning Psychic & Spiritual Dreams & Theories of Dreaming. Crowborough, UK: V. S. Staff, 1975.

Tart, Charles, ed. Altered States of Consciousness. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1969.

Tolson, Jay. "The Bible of Dreams Turns 100." US News & World Report. Vol. 127, No. 18. pp. 79.

Ullman, Montague, Stanley Krippner, and Alan Vaughan. Dream Telepathy. New York: Turnstone Books; London: Macmillan, 1973.

Dreams of Animals

It was believed by many people in ancient times that animals had dreams. According to Pliny the Elder:

"Evident it is, that horses, dogs, kine, oxen, sheepe and goats, doe dreame. Whereupon it is credibly also thought that all creatures that bring forth their young quicke and living, doe the same. As for those that lay egges, it is not so certian that they dreame; but resolved it is that they doe sleepe."

Beyond veterinary research, there has been little study of the actual dreams of animals. Researchers believe that domestic cats, for example, experience something resembling human dreaming, though they are likely dreaming of "cat" experiences such as attacking prey. Animals, however, do have symbolic meaning in the dreams of humans. For example, dreaming of an alligator may symbolically represent an enemy; dreaming of bees may symbolize that a person is hard-working; a donkey may symbolize that a person is carrying a heavy load, or is subconsciously recognizing his own stupidity; dinosaurs may represent the past or part of a personality that has changed; and a wolf may symbolize fear in oneself. Symbolic meanings vary from source to source.

Sources

Ackroyd, Eric. A Dictionary of Dream Symbols. London, England: Blandford, 1993.

Delaney, Gayle M.V. In Your Dreams: Falling, Flying and Other Dream Themes: A New Kind of Dream Dictionary. San Francisco: Harper San Francisco, 1997.

Reidel-Geubtner Virginia and Jo Jean Boushahla. The Dream Dictionary. New York: Berkley Publishing Group, 1992.

Dress, Phantom

The question of the apparel worn by apparitions has often aroused considerable controversy. Psychical researcher Frank Podmore provides some reflections upon the issue:

"The apparition commonly consists simply of a figure, clothed as the percipient was accustomed to see the agent clothed; whereas to be true to life the phantasm would as a rule have to appear in bed. In cases where the vision gives no information as to the agent's clothing and surroundings generally—and, as already said, such cases form the great majority of the well attested narratives—we may suppose that what is transmitted is not any part of the superficial content of the agent's consciousness, but an impression from the underlying massive and permanent elements which represent his personal identity. The percipient's imagination is clearly competent to clothe such an impression with appropriate imagery, must indeed so clothe it if it is to rise into consciousness at all. . . . The ghosts, it will have been observed, always appear clothed. Have clothes also ethereal counterparts? Such was and is the belief of many early races of mankind, who leave clothes, food, and weapons in the graves of the dead, or burn them on the funeral pile, that their friends may have all they require in the spirit world. But are we prepared to accept this view? And again, these ghosts commonly appear, not in the clothes which they were wearing at death—for most deaths take place in bed—but in some others, as will be seen from an examination of the stories already cited. Are we to suppose the ethereal body going to its wardrobe to clothe its nakedness withal? or that, as in the case of Ensign Cavalcante's appearance to Frau Reiken, the ghost will actually take off the ethereal clothes it wore at death and replace them with others? It is scarcely necessary to pursue the subject. The difficulties and contradictions involved in adapting it to explain the clothes must prove fatal to the ghost theory."

In The Ghost World (1893), Thistleton Dyer summarizes a large body of reported apparitions that mention the figures' appearance:

"It is the familiar dress worn in lifetime that is, in most cases, one of the distinguishing features of the ghost, and when Sir George Villiers wanted to give a warning to his son, the Duke of Buckingham, his spirit appeared to one of the Duke's servants 'in the very clothes he used to wear.' Mrs. Crowe, [in her Night Side of Nature,] some years ago, gave an account of an apparition which appeared at a house in Sarratt, Hertfordshire. It was that of a well-dressed gentleman, in a blue coat and bright gilt buttons, but without a head. It seems that this was reported to be the ghost of a poor man of that neighbourhood who had been murdered, and whose head had been cut off. He could, therefore, only be recognised by his 'blue coat and bright gilt buttons.' Indeed, many ghosts have been nicknamed from the kinds of dress in which they have been in the habit of appearing. Thus the ghost at Allanbank was known as 'Pearlin Jean,' from a species of lace made of thread which she wore; and the 'White Lady' at Ashley Hall—like other ghosts who have borne the same name—from the white drapery in which she presented herself. Some lady ghosts have been styled 'Silky,' from the rustling of their silken costume, in the wearing of which they have maintained the phantom grandeur of their earthly life. There was the 'Silky' at Black Heddon who used to appear in silken attire, oftentimes 'rattling in her silks;' and the spirit of Denton Hall—also termed 'Silky'—walks about in a white silk dress of antique fashion. This last 'Silky' was thought to be the ghost of a lady who was mistress to the profligate Duke of Argyll in the reign of William III, and died suddenly, not without suspicion of murder, at Chirton, near Shields—one of his residences. The 'Banshee of Loch Nigdal,' too, was arrayed in a silk dress, green in colour. These traditions date from a period when silk was not in common use, and therefore attracted notice in country places. Some years ago a ghost appeared at Hampton Court, habited in a black satin dress with white kid gloves. The White 'Lady of Skipsea' makes her midnight serenades clothed in long, white drapery. Lady Bothwell, who haunted the mansion of Woodhouselee, always appeared in white; and the apparition of the mansion of Houndwood, in Berwickshire—bearing the name of 'Chappie'—is clad in silk attire.

"One of the ghosts seen at the celebrated Willington Mill was that of a female in greyish garments. Sometimes she was said to be wrapped in a mantle, with her head depressed and her hands crossed on her lap. Walton Abbey had its headless lady who used to haunt a certain wainscotted chamber, dressed in blood-stained garments, with her infant in her arms; and, in short, most of the ghosts that have tenanted our country houses have been noted for their distinctive dress.

"Daniel Defoe, in his Essay on the History and Reality of Apparitions, has given many minute details as to the dress of a ghost. He tells a laughable and highly amusing story of some robbers who broke into a mansion in the country, and, while ransacking one of the rooms, they saw, in a chair, 'a grave, ancient man, with a long full-bottomed wig, and a rich, brocaded gown,' etc. One of the robbers threatened to tear off his 'rich brocaded gown,' another hit at him with a firelock, and was alarmed at seeing it pass through the air; and then the old man 'changed into the most horrible monster that ever was seen, with eyes like two fiery daggers red hot.' The same apparition encountered them in different rooms, and at last the servants, who were at the top of the house, throwing some 'hand grenades' down the chimneys of these rooms, the thieves were dispersed. Without adding further stories of this kind, which may be taken for what they are worth, it is a generally received belief in ghost lore that spirits are accustomed to appear in the dresses which they wore in their lifetime—a notion credited from the days of Pliny the Younger to the present day.

"But the fact of ghosts appearing in earthly raiment has excited the ridicule of many philosophers, who, even admitting the possibility of a spiritual manifestation, deny that there can be the ghost of a suit of clothes. George Cruikshank, too, who was no believer in ghosts, sums up the matter thus: 'As it is clearly impossible for spirits to wear dresses made of the materials of earth, we should like to know if there are spiritual outfitting shops for the clothing of ghosts who pay visits on earth.'

"Whatever the objections may be to the appearance of ghosts in human attire, they have not hitherto overthrown the belief in their being seen thus clothed, and Byron, describing the 'Black Friar' who haunted the cloisters and other parts of Newstead Abbey, tells us that he was always 'arrayed in cowl, and beads, and dusky garb.' Indeed, as Dr. Tylor remarks in [Primitive Culture] it is 'an habitual feature of the ghost stories of the civilised, as of the savage world, that the ghost comes dressed, and even dressed in well-known clothing worn in life.' And he adds that the doctrine of object-souls was held by the Algonquin tribes, the islanders of the Fijian group, and the Karens of Burmah—it being supposed that not only men and beasts have souls, but inorganic things. Thus Mariner, describing the Fijian belief, writes: 'If a stone or any other substance is broken, immortality is equally its reward; nay, artificial bodies have equal good luck with men, and hogs, and yams. If an axe or a chisel is worn out or broken up, away flies its soul for the service of the gods. The Fijians can further show you a sort of natural well, or deep hole in the ground, at one of their islands, across the bottom of which runs a stream of water, in which you may clearly see the souls of men and women, beasts and plants, stocks and stones, canoes and horses, and of all the broken utensils of this frail world, swimming, or rather tumbling along, one over the other, pell-mell, into the regions of immortality.' As it has been observed, animistic conceptions of this kind are no more irrational than the popular idea prevalent in civilized communities as to spirits appearing in all kinds of garments."

With the development of spirit photography around 1862 as a corroborative aspect of Spiritualist phenomena, the question of phantom apparel appeared finally to have some objective basis. However, later experiments in projecting mental pictures onto photographic materials suggested that mental impressions might still color representations of the clothing of phantoms. More important, spirit photography was so deeply involved in fraud that any data derived from it is at best suspect.

The question of ghost attire is a puzzling one, and it may be more useful to regard individual cases on their own merit. Above and beyond spirit photographs, there were many undoubted examples of deliberate fraud in the representation of spirit forms produced in materialization séances clothed in a drapery of ectoplasm, which turned out to be a person covered with cheesecloth. There were, of course, many examples in which scientific observers testified to seeing ectoplasm develop into spirit forms with vague clothing, and there are photographic records of such materializations in motion, showing progressive stages of formation and later dissolution. (See the discussions in From the Unconscious to the Conscious by Gustave Geley, 1920, and Phenomena of Materialisation by Baron von Schrenck-Notzing, 1923.) These have, however, been questioned in this century as more of the clever devices and techniques for producing materializations have been uncovered.

The experiments of talented exponents of out-of-the-body travel (astral projection) suggest that phantom clothing may be a mental creation or in some cases simply the human aura. The question is discussed by Sylvan J. Muldoon and Hereward Carrington in the book The Projection of the Astral Body (1929). According to Muldoon,

"I have noticed that, as a rule, if my physical body were clad in a certain garb, my astral counterpart would be clothed in an identical garb. I say as a rule. But again, there have been many exceptions to that rule—which demonstrates the eccentricities of the controlling intelligence! Sometimes the physical body will be clothed, and the astral body will be clothed in a different manner, e.g. a sort of flimsy gauzy white. This is not at all unusual, and is perhaps the reason why 'ghosts' have invariably become identified with white garments. Sometimes this astral garment is mistaken by observers for an 'aura,' and sometimes the aura is mistaken for the garment of white. There is a distinction. . . . One can be nude in the astral body and the aura would then act as clothing. In fact, it is my belief that the clothing is formed from the aura."

Sources:

Muldoon, Sylvan J., and Hereward Carrington. The Projection of the Astral Body. London: Rider, 1929.

Driesch, Hans (1867–1941)

Embryologist, professor of philosophy at the University of Leipzig, pioneer in many domains of science, and one of the most influential psychical investigators in Germany. Driesch was born in Bad Kreuznach, Germany, October 28, 1867, and had a distinguished academic and scientific career.

In his Philosophie des Organischen (1905) he expresses the opinion that behind psychic phenomena there may be a truth; and in his Wirklichkeitslehre (1917) he states, referring to the work of the Society for Psychical Research, that anyone who declares these things impossible has given up the right to be listened to by serious people.

He mainly meant mental phenomena, but he included physical phenomena as well after his sittings with Willi Schneider in 1922. In his report he saw no reason to deny the objectivity and the genuineness of the phenomena and in a lecture before the London University in 1924 he declared that "the actuality of psychical phenomena is doubted today only by the incorrigible dogmatist."

In the second edition of his Ordnungslehre (1926) a special part is devoted to parapsychology and parapsychophysics. In Grundprobleme der Psychologie, published in the same year, the problems also receive elaborate discussion. In answer to a questionnaire sent out by Oreste Parfumi, published in Luce e Ombra (1926), he states: 1. The mediumistic phenomena are not effects of simple hallucination; 2. It appears to me that they depend exclusively upon the organism of the medium; 3. The spirit theory does not seem to me proven; but spiritism, were it proven, would be a scientific theory. In acknowledgment of Driesch's contribution to psychical research the Society for Psychical Research elected him to the presidential chair for 1926–27, the first German so honored.

Driesch lectured widely on philosophy at universities throughout the world and associated with such pioneers of psychical research as Gustave Geley, Eugene Osty, Baron von Schrenck-Notzing, Sir Oliver Lodge, and Walter Franklin Prince. He also sat with such famous mediums as Willi and Rudi Schneider, "Margery" (Mina Crandon), and Gladys Osborne Leonard.

Driesch retired from his position as lecturer at the University of Leipzig in 1933 under pressure from the Nazis following his support of Jewish scientists. Thereafter he devoted time to his writings, which include a translation into German of J. B. Rhine's book New Frontiers of the Mind (1938). He died April 16, 1941, at Leipzig.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Driesch, Hans A. E. Alltagraetsel des Seelenlebens Psychical Research (Everyday Enigmas of the Mind). N.p., 1938.

———. The Crisis in Psychology. N.p., 1925.

———. Leib und Seele. (Body and Mind). N.p., 1916.

———. Parapsychologie, die Wissenschaft von den "occulten" Erscheingen (Parapsychology, Science of "Occult" Phenomena). N.p., 1932.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Sudre, R. "The Ideas of Hans Driesch." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 20 (1926).

Drop-in Communicator

Term coined by parapsychologist Ian Stevenson to indicate an uninvited entity or communicator at a séance, usually unknown to medium or sitters.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Stevenson, Ian. "A Communicator Unknown to Medium and Sitter." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 64 (1970).

Drown, Ruth B. (1891–1965)

American chiropractor who developed the pioneer work of Albert Abrams (1863–1924) in electronics (later known as ra- dionics), involving the correction of disease conditions by shortwave low-power electromagnetics and alternating magnetic currents. Dr. Drown was born in Greeley, Colorado, on October 21, 1891.

Drown called her treatment radio therapy and founded the Radio Therapy Institute as an outlet for her work. It involved placing a blood sample from a patient in a machine "tuned" to the patient and "broadcasting" healing radiations. This controversial system of treatment was developed further by George De la Warr in England. He describes her technique in several books, including The Science & Philosophy of the Drown Radio Therapy (1938) and The Theory & Technique of the Drown Radio Therapy & Radio Vision Instruments (1939).

Her apparatus was granted a British patent but declared "fraudulent" by the Food and Drug Administration in the 1940s. In 1950, at the request of several of Drown's supporters, an investigation was conducted at the University of Chicago. With blind controls, she was unable to make accurate diagnoses, and the American Medical Association reported on the negative results. These texts made Drown and anyone using her techniques open to charges of medical malpractice, and she soon disappeared from the public eye and lived the rest of her life in relative obscurity.

Through most of her life, Drown was also a metaphysical teacher and she developed her own system, which is presented in her book The Forty-Nine Degrees (1957). The "Gnostic" system discusses the soul's journey from heaven to earth and its eventual return, and the knowledge needed for that return.

Drown died in 1965 while awaiting trial for fraud.

Sources:

Drown, Ruth, ed. The Forty-Nine Degrees: The Road to Divine Truth. New York: Greenwich Book Publishers, 1957.

Inglis, Brian. The Case for Unorthodox Medicine. New York: Berkley Books, 1965.

Drugs (Psychedelic)

The use of hallucinatory drugs to enhance or alter consciousness has been known for centuries. Cannabis or hemp plant was cited in Chinese literature about 2737 B.C.E. and was used in India before 800 B.C.E. Primitive peoples used hallucinogens sacramentally in religious ceremonies. Much of the Romantic literature of the nineteenth century was written from drug experiences. Drawing primarily upon laudanum, a form of opium, novelists and poets created not only fantasy works, but the classical horror literature as well.

The publication of an English translation of Louis Levin's Phantastica; Narcotic and Stimulating Drugs, Their Use and Abuse (1931) drew the attention of physicians and other specialized readers to such vision-producing agents as peyote (from Mexican cactus) named anhalonium Lewinii because of Lewin's pioneer scientific researches. However, it was not until Aldous Huxley's The Doors of Perception (1954) and Heaven and Hell (1956) that the subject of the visionary powers of drugs like mescaline became more widely known in Britain and North America.

LSD (lysergic acid diethylamide), the active principle in peyote, had been discovered accidentally by the Swiss researcher Dr. Albert Hoffman in 1943. Huxley's The Doors of Perception mentioned LSD in relation to the work of psychiatrists like Humphrey Osmond, who had experimented with the drug in order to elucidate problems of schizophrenia. Psychiatrists and doctors began to experiment cautiously and observed the strange changes of consciousness and vision experienced through taking LSD. Hoffman also synthesized psilocybin, the active principle in a Mexican mushroom used in religious ceremonies by certain tribes.

It was Huxley's description of his own visionary experiences with mescaline and his sophisticated discussion of the possibilities of chemical ecstasy as a kind of religious experience that stimulated American intellectuals to initiate experiments. The mass media society of the fifties and sixties, with its instant communication geared to a bandwagon of populist trends, helped to spread the concept of instant chemical mysticism, and the growing availability of drugs like LSD and marijuana rapidly created a mass counterculture.

At the spearhead of the psychedelic revolution were two Harvard psychologists, Timothy Leary and Richard Alpert, who had instituted experiments with psilocybin at the beginning of the 1960s. Their own use of the drug and their conclusion that it should be available broadly with control given over to the public eventually led to their dismissal from their research and teaching positions. Subsequently, believing that psychedelics opened individuals to an awareness of their own inner psychic structures, they eagerly took leadership roles in the emerging psychedelic subculture with a manifesto that ran:

"The game is about to be changed, ladies and gentlemen. Man is about to make use of that fabulous electrical network he carries around in his skull. Present social establishments had better be prepared for the change. Our favorite concepts are standing in the way of a floodtide, two billion years building up. The verbal dam is collapsing. Head for the hills, or prepare your intellectual craft to flow with the current. . . ."

Many individuals elected to flow with the current and began to press for legalization of certain drugs like marijuana. With the backing of millionaire investment banker William Hitchcock, Leary and Alpert campaigned vigorously for the new world of inner space revealed by LSD. Psychedelic religious groups sprang up combining insights from their drugs experiences, yoga, the Tibetan Book of the Dead, and other mystical literature.

At first the new democracy of psychedelic drug consumption was characterized by the presence of a creative artistic culture nurtured by the glamour of an awakening mystical experience. It soon provided the opening for an underworld of hard drug pushers to invade the psychedelic scene, with its associated crime and violence. Although many discriminating LSD and marijuana users claimed that their lives were changed by a single beatific drug experience that illuminated new dimensions of existence, their testimonies were countered by horror stories of the bad trips and anti-social behavior of LSD users.

Leary became a counterculture hero, evading police and imprisonment and preaching a gospel of "Tune in, turn on, drop out." Alpert eventually went off drugs and made a trip to India, returning shortly as Baba Ram Dass, a Hindu guru with a message of conventional Hindu mysticism. He found a large following among what would soon be known as the New Age movement. While leaving drugs behind, he continued to believe, on the authority of his guru, that LSD had served a valuable function in introducing the spirituality to a society dominated by materialistic pursuits.

The psychedelic era came to an end. For many it had been a time of awakening that led them to a range of mature spiritual visions from orthodox Christianity to occultism and Eastern mysticism. The possibilities of the use of mind-altering drugs such as LSD were, however, distorted beyond recognition by the intrusion of legal structures that made continued controlled use and experimentation impossible, an underground culture which became solely dependent on the drugs as a source for spirituality rather than using them as a help in the spiritual quest, and the popular confusion of psychedelic drugs with hard drugs in both the psychedelic community and among the public at large.

In the aftermath of the psychedelic revolution it now seems clear that the primary benefit from the consumption of psychedelic substances came from garnering the wisdom of native cultures that to some extent limit and control their use and advise consumption only within a meaningful system of mystical development. There are significant qualitative differences between the bare chemical experiences of an ecstatic nature and the traditional mystical experience to which they were frequently compared. Sudden changes of consciousness can be life-changing, but also addictive; one experience creates a demand for its repetition. However, when mysticism is sought for its own sake at any cost, particularly with chemical shortcuts, this perpetuates the self-serving egoism of the affluent society, in which one buys metaphysics with the same attitude with which one buys a new automobile.

Within the patient gradual character transformations that come with the mystical life (in all of the traditional world religions) a maturity of physical, mental, and emotional life is attained. It may be the case, as many native peoples suggest, that some drugs assist that process. However, a chemical experience that emphasizes spirituality-upon-demand quickly ceases to expand consciousness and merely reproduces the initial heightened feelings as the by-product of its intense sensory and emotional stimuli.

A remnant of the psychedelic culture remains in such groups as the Neo-American Church and the Peyote Church of God, and in the continued popularity of the writings of Carlos Castaneda (even though his original writings have been demonstrated to have been fraudulently produced.)

Sources:

Baudelaire, Charles. Artificial Paradise: On Hashish & Wine as Means of Expanding Individuality. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1971.

Leary, Timothy. Flashbacks: An Autobiography. Los Angeles: J. P. Tarcher, 1983.

———. Politics of Ecstasy. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1968.

Masters, Robert E., and Jean Houston. Varieties of Psychedelic Experience. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1966. Reprint, New York: Dell, 1967.

Osmond, Humphry, and B. Aaronson. Psychedelics: The Uses & Implications of Hallucinogenic Drugs. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1970.

Slack, Charles W. Timothy Leary, the Madness of the Sixties and Me. New York: Peter H. Wyden, 1974.

Zaehner, R. C. Mysticism; Sacred & Profane. London: Clarendon Press, 1957. Reprint, London: Galaxy Book; Oxford University Press, 1961.

Druidism

Druidism was the ancient magical religious faith found to be operating in Gaul and later England and Ireland as the Romans pushed northward that has been revived as a twentieth-century Neo-Pagan religion. The name derives from an old Welsh term for oak, implying that they are the people who know the wisdom of the trees. Julius Caesar encountered the Druids in Gaul in the first century B.C.E. where, among other duties, they oversaw the human sacrifices that were then part of the Celtic religion. From that time forward, a number of Romans chronicled their life, especially after the conquest of Britain in the next century. Gradually, Christianity was introduced into England and then in the fifth century into Ireland. Over the next few centuries, it replaced the Druid religion.

The ancient Druid tradition, largely passed through the oral tradition, was rendered into written form in the Middle Ages in two primary texts, the Mabinogion and the Book of Taliesin. Various elements of Druidism passed into folklore and survived in local customs and folk songs. Numerous archeological remains have been discovered and through the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, efforts to reconstruct the history and belief of the Druids have proceeded. It is now generally believed that the Druids were firmly in place by the sixth century B.C.E., and evidence has emerged that suggests that Druidism may be traced to the time of the monolithic culture that built Stonehenge and related structures across the British Isles. Druidism may have survived in remote corners of rural Britain, and some have suggested that it could be found on the island of St. Kilda as late as the eighteenth century.

The fragments of literature on ancient Druidism leave considerable room for interpretation of Druid belief and practice (thus providing the base for the broad spectrum of belief and behavior among contemporary Druids). It is known that the community was organized around the three groups of functionaries. The bards were the keepers of the wisdom tradition. They memorized the key material of the tradition, much of which was put into poetic form and made it available to the people. The Ovates were the mediums/shamans of the community. Among their duties was the establishment of contact with ancestors in the spirit realm. They also engaged in divination of various kinds, including the reading of entrails, in attempts to predict the future. The Druid priests were the most powerful leaders in the community. They presided over worship and group ceremonies, and often served as advisors to the secular rulers.

The Druid religion was nature-based and its worship cycle was marked by the movements of the Sun and Moon. The year was marked by the changing positions of the rising sun, the solstices and equinoxes, and the four additional festivals halfway between these four that marked important points in the agricultural seasons. These were known by different names in different locations and at different times. Among the major contemporary British Druids, these are known as:

Samhuinn (October 31–November 2)
Winter Solstice (December 21 or 22)
Imbolc (February 1)
Spring Equinox (March 21)
Beltane (May 1)
Summer Solstice (June 21 or 22)
Lughnasadh (August 1)
Fall Equinox (September 22)

Today, the most notable date in the calendar is the summer solstice, when British Druids gather at Stonehenge for a sunrise service.

The Druids were especially associated with oaks and the mistletoe that grows as a parasite on it. According to Pliny, they gathered the mistletoe in a ritualized manner, used it in their rites, and drank its juice for its medicinal value.

Among the most controversial practices associated with Druids was human sacrifice. In their priestly service among the Celtics in Gaul, it was noted by Julius Caesar and Strabo that they oversaw the sacrifice of humans. Caesar mentioned the immense images which they filled with living victims and burned to death, a practice that was vividly pictured in the 1975 movie The Wicker Man.

Modern Druidism

Modern interest in Druidism can be traced to an amateur antiquarian, John Aubrey (1676–1697), who delved into the classical Druid texts and suggested that the Druids had worshiped at the old stone monuments in Wiltshire. His work began the association of Druidism and Stonehenge. A modern Druidism emerged into public notice in the next century when, in 1717, Deist writer John Toland (1670–1722) was elected the chief of the first modern Druid order, An Tigh Geatha Gairdeachas. Reportedly Druids from previously existing groups from across England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and Brittany attended the inaugural meeting in London. Toland spent the last years of his life working on a history of the Druids, excerpts of which were posthumously published.

Building on Aubrey's work, the physician William Stukeley (1687–1765) did extensive observations in Wiltshire and brought the monumental structures to public attention. He published a book on Stonehenge in 1740 and on Avebury three years later. He described Druidism as the aboriginal patriarchal religion and reputedly succeeded Toland as the second chief of the modern Druid order. Stukeley was himself reputedly succeeded by the likes of poet William Blake and writer Geoffrey Higgins.

Interest in Druidism as the traditional pre-Christian religion of the British Isles led to the formation of several Druid organizations through the eighteenth century. The most important was the Ancient Order of Druids founded in London in 1781 by Henry Hurle. It is the largest Druid body in England with some 3000 members. Of interest, the order is primarily a male group, with women not permitted entrance to the majority of their lodges. There are some all-female lodges. Also founded at the end of the eighteenth century was a uniquely Welsh Druid tradition centered in the channeled material of Edward Williams, better known by his Druid name Iolo Morganwg. A controversial figure, Williams offered his channeled material as genuine remnants of ancient Druid wisdom, and they were so accepted by some who did not understand their origin. When their origin was discovered, many dismissed Morganwg as a fraud; however, his group, the Bardi/Druidic Eisteddfoddau, still exists.

In the nineteenth century, the Druid movement spread across Europe and through the British Empire, though the groups that formed remained small and ephemeral. It was only in the context of the emergence of a larger Neo-Pagan movement, spearheaded by the new Witchcraft created by the British witch Gerald B. Gardner, that Druidism has found a friendly environment in which to grow and proliferate. Among the important groups to emerge in England in the post-Gardnerian context are the Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids founded in 1864 by Ross Nichols and the Golden Section Order founded in 1975 by Colin Murray. Recently, a Council of British Druid Orders has emerged to provide fellowship among the many independent Druid groups.

In America, a new and separate Druid tradition was initiated in 1963 by students at Carlton College in Northfield, Minnesota, as part of a protest of compulsory chapel at the church-related school. In order to gain permission not to attend chapel, the students fashioned a separate religion based upon their reading of books on ancient religion. Once the rules on compulsory chapel were dropped, the Druids discovered that they liked what they had created. Thus was born the Reformed Druids of North America that spread through the Neo-Pagan subculture. In Berkeley, California, the movement found a new leader in the person of Isaac Bonewits, who emerged as the most visible spokesperson of Druidism in North America. In 1983 he left the loosely organized Reformed Druid coalition to found Ar nDraiocht Fein, currently the largest Druid group in North America. It has in turn given birth to additional groups such as the Henge of Keltria.

Sources:

Carr-Gomm, Philip. The Elements of the Druid Tradition. Shaftesbury, Dorset, UK: Element, 1991.

Matthews, John, ed. The Druid Source Book. London: Brandford, 1998.

Drummer of Tedworth

A poltergeist manifestation that disturbed Magistrate John Mompesson's household at Tedworth, Wiltshire, England, from 1661 to 1663. It was believed to be caused by a vagrant drummer who was aggrieved at his drum being confiscated.

The drummer was William Drury, a vagrant who "went up and down the country to show hocus-pocus [juggling], feats of activity, dancing through hoops and such like devices." In March 1661 Drury was accused of using counterfeit documents and taken before a justice of the peace. Drury was freed, but his drum was confiscated, and during Mompesson's temporary absence of the drum was taken to the magistrate's house. When Mompesson returned, he was told that night after night thumping and drumming noises were heard in the house. An invisible drum beat the rhythms of "Roundsheads," "Cuckolds," and "Tat-too," and knocks were heard.

This was the beginning of a period of extraordinary phenomena, reminiscent of the claimed disturbances of the modern Amityville Horror. The drumming was heard inside and outside the house, children were lifted up in the air, a Bible was hidden in ashes, shoes flung at a man's head, and chamberpots emptied onto beds. Mysterious lights were seen, a servant was terrified by "a great body with two glaring eyes," and there were sulphurous smells and drops of blood. A horse was found with one of its rear legs forced into its mouth.

In 1663 Drury was arrested in Gloucester and charged with pig stealing. He was found guilty and sentenced to deportation instead of the customary penalty of hanging. For a time, the poltergeist phenomena ceased. However, Drury jumped overboard from the convict ship and escaped to Uffcot, a few miles from Tedworth. The poltergeist phenomena started again. Surprisingly enough, Drury also continued his earlier nuisance, acquiring a new drum and beating it recklessly. On the orders of Mompesson he was seized and jailed. This time Drury was accused of witchcraft, but was acquitted due to a lack of evidence. On the earlier charge of pig stealing he was found guilty and sentenced to deportation to Virginia. Once again, the phenomena ceased, this time for good.

The case was investigated by Joseph Glanvill and reported in his book Saducismus Triumphatus (1668). According to Glanvill;

"The noise of thumping and drumming was very frequent, usually five nights together, and then it would intermit three. It was on the outside of the house, which is most of it board. It constantly came as they were going to sleep, whether early or late. After a month's disturbance without, it came into the room where the drum lay, four or five nights in seven, within half an hour after they were in bed, continuing almost two. The sign of it, just before it came was . . . an hurling in the air above the house, and at its going off, the beating of a drum like that at the breaking up of a guard. . . .

"On the fifth of November, 1662, it kept a mighty noise, and a servant observing two boards in the children's room seeming to move, he bid it give him one of them. Upon which the board came (nothing moving it that he saw) within a yard of him. The man added, 'Nay, let me have it in my hand.' Upon which, it was shoved quite home to him. He thrust it back, and it was driven to him again, and so up and down, to and fro, at least twenty times together, till Mr. Mompesson forbade his servant such familiarities. This was in the daytime, and seen by a whole room full of people. . . .

"Mr. Mompesson perceiving that it so much persecuted the little children, he lodged them at a neighbor's house, taking his eldest daughter, who was about ten years of age, into his own chamber, where it had not been a month before. As soon as she was in bed, the disturbance began there again, continuing three weeks drumming, and making other noises, and it was observed that it would exactly answer in drumming anything that was beaten or called for. After this, the house where the children were lodged out, happening to be full of strangers, they were taken home, and no disturbance having been known in the parlor, they were lodged there, where also their persecutor found them, but then only plucked them by the hair and night clothes without any other disturbance. . . .

"After this, it was very troublesome to a servant of Mr. Mompesson's, who was a stout fellow and of sober conversation. This man lay within, during the greatest disturbance, and for several nights something would endeavor to pluck his clothes off the bed, so that he was fain to tug hard to keep them on, and sometimes they would be plucked from him by main force, and his shoes thrown at his head. And now and then he should find himself forcibly held, as it were bound hand and foot, but he found that whenever he could make use of his sword, and struck with it, the spirit quitted its hold. . . .

"The drummer was tried at the Assizes at Salisbury upon this occasion. He was committed first to Gloucester Jail for stealing, and a Wiltshire man coming to see him, he asked what news in Wiltshire. The visitant said he knew of none. 'No,' saith the drummer, 'Do not you hear of the drumming at a gentleman's house at Tedworth?' 'That I do enough,' said the other. 'I,' quoth the drummer, 'I have plagued him (or to that purpose) and he shall never be at quiet, till he hath made me satisfaction for taking away my drum.' "

Glanvill reports: "During the time of the knocking, when many were present, a gentleman of the company said, 'Satan, if the drummer set thee to work, give three knocks and no more;' which it did very distinctly, and stopped."

Glanvill himself heard some of the unusual sounds, stating: "At this time it used to haunt the children, and that as soon as they were laid in bed. . . . I heard a strange scratching as I went up the stairs, and when we came into the room I perceived it was just behind the bolster of the children's bed, and seemed to be against the ticking. It was as loud a scratching as one with long nails could make upon a bolster. There were two little modest girls in the bed, between seven and eight years old, as I guessed. I saw their hands out of the clothes, and they could not contribute to the noise that was behind their heads; they had been used to it, and had still somebody or other in the chamber with them, and therefore seemed not to be much affrighted. I, standing at the bed's head, thrust my hand behind the bolster, directing it to the place whence the noise seemed to come, whereupon the noise ceased there, and was heard in another part of the bed; but when I had taken out my hand it returned, and was heard in the same place as before. I had been told it would imitate noises, and made trial by scratching several times upon the sheet, as five and seven and ten, which it followed, still stopping at my number." Glanvill searched the room and was unable to find any evidence of trickery.

Mr. Mompesson suffered as word of these manifestations spread. Those who did not believe in spirits and witches declared him an impostor; other people considered the visitations to be the judgment of God upon him for some wickedness or impiety. As a result, he was continually exposed to censure and harassed by the curious people who gathered around the house.

The essayist Joseph Addison (1672–1719) wrote a comedy on the affair, "The Drummer, or the Haunted House," first performed at Drury Lane Theater on April 14, 1713. (See also Cock Lane Ghost)

Sources:

Wilson, Colin. Poltergeist: A Study in Destructive Haunting. New York: Perigree Books, 1981.

Dual Personality

What is popularly termed dual, split, or multiple personality is one form of what psychologists call disassociation. Two or more mental process in the individual can be said to be disassociated if they either coexist or alternate without apparently influencing one another or becoming connected. In the nineteenth century, disassociation described a host of phenomena from dreams to neurotic symptoms. Neurosis was explained as a constitutional weakness in the person that prevented their integrating their personality. Thus daydreaming was condemmed as a symptom of nonintegration. A more extreme example would be what had previously been called spirit possession.

When Freud proposed the existence of an underlying unconscious, the idea of an underlying constitutional weakness was abandoned in favor of a discussion of various mechanisms by which the ego, the central waking personality, suppressed or isolated unwanted elements and kept them out of the ongoing ego formation.

However, Freudian categories do not handle well the most extreme of disassociation phenomena characterized by the subject maintaining for an extended length of time some action not apparently initiated by the conscious self and the memory of which is not available to the conscious self. Such phenomena includes forms of amnesia, sleepwalking, and post-hypnotic suggestions. It would also include the trance phenomena of a Spiritualist medium or someone engaged in channeling, and the now well-known phenomena of multiple personality, in which the person appears to change from one person to another. This last phenomena challenges some basic assumptions about self identity, that each individual is just that, a single person with a single memory, a more or less unified being.

Sometimes, in trance state, there occurs a split so pronounced that the subject seems to have two or more distinct personalities. The secondary personality may differ from the primary in many ways, and possess entirely distinct intellectual and moral characteristics. The entranced subject may allude to his normal consciousness in the third person, may criticize its opinions and attitude, or even express direct antagonism towards it.

This secondary personality sometimes alternates with the primary in such a way as to suggest that two spirits are struggling to possess the same physical organization. (For an example, see William Sharp.) Another peculiarity of this state is that whereas the normal consciousness generally knows nothing of the others, the secondary personalities usually have full knowledge of each other and of the normal consciousness.

The more extreme disassociation is by no means confined to the trance state, but may arise spontaneously. Robert Louis Stevenson made effective use of the philosophical implications of dual personality in his science fiction horror story The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde (1886). In a less horrendous setting, it became familiar to many through the book and movie The Three Faces of Eve. Sometimes the appearance of a dual personality leads to other multiple personalities. In the famous case of Sally Beauchamp, investigated by Morton Prince, four well-defined personalities developed, as described in Prince's book Dissociation of a Personality (1905).

In many cases the emergence of secondary personalities is due to a patient's response to his or her counselor, an attempt to fulfill a real or imagined request.

While much work and discussion has been done on the dysfunctional multiple personality as a disassociation disorder, little effort has been put into understanding mediumship and channeling in the same way. Mediumship differs significantly from multiple personality both in the control of the medium over the appearance of the secondary personality and its nonpathological nature.

Sources:

Prince, Morton. The Disassociation of a Personality. 1905. Reprint, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1978.

Ducasse, C(urt) J(ohn) (1881–1969)

Philosopher and parapsychologist. Ducasse was born July 7, 1881, in Angoulême, France. He was educated in France and England, but migrated to the United States in 1900 and was naturalized in 1910. He began teaching at the University of Washington, Seattle, in 1912 and remained there until 1926 when he moved to Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island. He rose from associate professor to chairman of the Department of Philosophy (1930–1951). He was named professor emeritus at the time of his retirement in 1951.

Ducasse served as president of the Association for Symbolic Logic (1936–38), the American Philosophical Association (1939), the American Society for Aesthetics (1945–46), and the Philosophy of Science Association (1958–61).

As a scholar, Ducasse argued for the legitimacy of psychical research, stating that such research had established a body of facts with implications for philosophy. He read about psychic phenomena, conducted fieldwork with mediums, and regularly attended parapsychological gatherings. He joined the board of the American Society for Psychical Research in 1951 and served a term as vice president beginning in 1966.

Ducasse was most concerned about survival of death. He argued that survival was not only philosophically possible but that the evidence of psychical research was impressive as proof of such survival. He also was impressed by the evidence for reincarnation.

Ducasse established his place in American philosophy quite apart from his concerns for psychical matters. He wrote a number of books over the years. Only during the 1950s did his concern with parapsychology become evident, in such books as Nature, Mind and Death (1951) and A Philosophical Scrutiny of Religion (1953). He is remembered for his text A Critical Examination of the Belief in a Life After Death (1961). Shortly before his death he wrote Paranormal Phenomena, Science, and Life After Death (1969). He died September 3, 1969.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Dommeyer, Frederick C., ed. Current Philosophical Issues: Essays in Honor of Curt John Ducasse. N.p., 1966.

Ducasse, C. J. A Critical Examination of the Belief in a Life After Death. Springfield, IL: Charles C. Thomas, 1961.

———. Nature, Mind and Death. LaSalle, IL: Open Court Publishing, 1951.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Duguid, David (1832–1907)

Scottish medium, chiefly famous for his automatic and direct drawings. Duguid was born in Glasgow and became a cabinetmaker by trade.

His two brothers, Robert, of Glasgow, and Alexander, of Kirkcaldy, also claimed psychic powers, but David eclipsed them both with phenomena comprising the whole scale of séance-room manifestations. Above and beyond the more common raps, he supposedly moved objects without contact; heavy music boxes sailed about in the room in the dark and invisible hands wound them up when they ran down. Sitters reported hearing direct voices, usually in husky whispers but sometimes in thunderous tones. Reportedly on one occasion, the medium was levitated, placed on the table in his chair, to which he was bound, and a coat was put on him without disturbing the knots. Often objects were brought out from closed rooms, psychic lights were seen, phantom hands touched the sitters, redolent perfumes were produced, and, according to the testimony of Thomas S. Garriock, as quoted in E. T. Bennett's Direct Phenomena of Spiritualism (1908), "On one occasion Mr. Duguid put his hand into the blazing stove, took out a large piece of coal and walked round the room with it for five minutes."

The beginnings of all these marvels dated from 1865, when, out of curiosity, he took part in table-sitting experiments at the house of H. Nisbet, a publisher of Glasgow. At one of these sittings he felt his arm shake and a cold current ran down his spine. When Nisbet's daughter, who was an automatic writer, placed her right hand on his left it at once began to move and drew rough sketches of vases and flowers, and then the section of an archway. Duguid began to sit in his home for automatic painting. The influence that manifested claimed to feel Duguid hampered by absolute lack of artistic education. On his suggestion Duguid took lessons at a government school of arts for four months.

Later the influence suggested that after his usual work on large pictures Duguid should draw or paint on little cards in the presence of onlookers. In eight to ten minutes he turned out complete pictures. Working in total darkness, sitters reported that the "spirits" would arrive in less than a minute and, independently of the medium's hands, produce a new picture in as short a time as 35 seconds. They were tiny and sometimes so fine in execution that their merit was enhanced if viewed under a magnifying glass. Now and then, many of these little oil paintings were found on a single card. The noise of the brushes and paper, prepared in light, would be heard by those present as coming from well above the table. When the paintings were completed, everything was dropped. Invariably the paper would be found with painted side up, wet and sticky. As a rule these little paintings were then freely distributed among the sitters.

To ensure control, Duguid allowed himself to be held or tied. When the light was put on, the bindings were often found exchanged. If the medium was too tightly bound he was liberated in a few seconds in the darkness and the ligatures were quietly dropped into the lap of one of the sitters. On several occasions the little cards were found missing. As soon as the darkness was restored they were heard to drop onto the table from above.

To prevent substitution, the cards were usually signed at the back with the initials of the sitters. Later, a better method of identification was employed. A corner of the card was torn off and handed to a sitter before the painting began. For several years, Duguid took no fee for his séances.

In August 1878 Frank Podmore attended a sitting at which this method of control was already employed and discerned the method of its subversion. Describing how he placed the fragments of the cards securely in his pocket and how the medium was fastened with silk handkerchiefs, with adhesive paper on the ends, he writes in Modern Spiritualism (2 vols., 1902):

"After a quarter of an hour the lights were turned up and two small oil paintings, one circular, about the size of a penny, the other oval and slightly larger, were found on the two cards. The colours were still moist and the fragments in my pocket fitted the torn corners of the cards. The two pictures, which lie before me as I write, represent respectively a small upland stream dashing over rocks, and a mountain lake with its shores bathed in a sunset glow. The paintings, though obviously executed with some haste, were hardly such as one can imagine to have been done in such a short interval and in almost complete darkness. For many years I was quite at a loss to understand how the feat could have been accomplished by normal means. The explanation, which I have now no doubt to be correct, is an extremely simple one. Duguid, it has been seen, would not suffer profane hands to touch the cards; and, when he had torn off the corner of a card, he no doubt dropped into the sitter's hand not the piece torn from the blank card on the table, but a piece previously torn from a card on which a picture had already been painted."

Podmore's explanation also suggests other methods that could have been employed in the dark and often were employed by mediums such as Duguid.

The first extended publicity to David Duguid's mediumship was given by the North British Daily Mail in 1873 in a series of articles entitled A Few Nights with the Glasgow Spiritualists. It was later followed by the report of a subcommittee of the Psychological Society of Edinburgh. They claimed to witness 11 distinctly different forms of manifestation that they could not explain as normal. Direct writing that began to alternate with direct painting and drawing was among the phenomena observed. Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German scripts were produced, sometimes on a folded sheet of paper enclosed in a sealed envelope.

(It was by this method that the frontispieces of three volumes of William Oxley's Angelic Revelations were allegedly illustrated.) Thomas Power was quoted by Bennett as saying:

"The plain paper was put into an envelope. The three gentlemen placed their fingers on the sealed envelope and turned off the gas. In three minutes the gas was turned on, the envelope cut open and the drawing was found in its complete state."

The control who worked through Duguid did not disclose his identity for a long time. He called himself "Marcus Baker." Eventually he promised a copy of one of his masterpieces. The medium worked for four days, four hours at a time, on a large painting. It was initialed "J.R.," and from Cassell's Art Treasures Exhibition it was recognized as "The Waterfall," by Jakob Ruysdael. The copy was not exact, however; some figures were omitted. The control, when questioned, said those figures were added later by Bergheim. When they consulted Ruysdael's biography this was found to be true.

The second of Duguid's painting controls also claimed a famous name, that of Jan van Steen. Apparently neither of them had taken the trouble to always produce original compositions. Great inconvenience arose from this for the medium after the arrival on the scene, in August 1869, of "Hafed," the third of Duguid's famous guides.

From the book that he dictated in 46 sittings between 1870 and 1871 it appears that Hafed lived nearly 2,000 years ago as a warrior-prince of Persia. At an early age he fought against an invading Arabian army, was later admitted to the order of the Magi, and was ultimately chosen arch magus. He described the creeds and social life of ancient Persia, Tyre, Greece, Egypt, Judea, Babylon, and many other long perished civilizations that he studied in travels.

The climax of his story was reached when he revealed that he conducted the expedition of the Three Wise Men to Judea to the cradle of Jesus. He was summoned by his guardian spirit to go on the journey with two brother magi and take rich gifts to the babe. He described the youthful years of Jesus that are not chronicled in the Gospels. According to his story, he traveled with Jesus in Persia, India, and many other countries and marveled at the miracles the young child performed. After the martyrdom of Jesus he became a Christian himself, met Paul in Athens, preached the gospel in Venice and Alexandria, and finally perished at age 100 in the arena at Rome.

The book, as taken down in notes by Hay Nisbet, was published in 1876 under the title Hafed, Prince of Persia: His Experiences in Earth Life, being Spirit Communications Received Through Mr. David Duguid, the Glasgow Trance Speaking Medium, with an Appendix, containing Communications from the Spirit Artists Ruisdael and Steen, illustrated by Facsimiles of Forty-Five Drawings and Writings, the Direct Work of the Spirits. Reportedly the book was produced in trance. Trouble arose, however, over the illustrations, and the first edition of the book had to be withdrawn as some of the sketches were discovered to be copies from Cassell's Family Bible. In the second edition, published in the same year, eight full-page plates had been withdrawn, although Cassell's protest only applied to three full-page and one half-page plates.

Suspicion of the rest of the expunged drawings appears to be justified. E. T. Bennett submitted an Arabic doorway inscription that supposedly came in direct writing but is also visible in an illustration in the Family Bible according to the expert examination of Stanley Lane-Pool. He found the text to read, "There is no conqueror but God," the characteristic motto of the Moorish kings of Granada, which occurs on all their coins and all over the Alhambra. "But the writer of the direct card," he says, "evidently had not the Alhambra nor the Syrian Gateway in his mind, but Cassell's Family Bible. The engraver of the cut in the Bible, which you sent me, made a muddle of the lower line of inscription under the lintel, not knowing Arabic, and the direct card exactly reproduces the engraver's blunders."

There was a sequel to Hafed, titled Hermes, a Disciple of Jesus: His Life and Missionary Work; also the Evangelistic Travels of Anah and Zitha, two Persian Evangelists, sent out by Hafed; together with Incidents in the Life of Jesus given by a Disciple through Hafed (1887). Thomas Garrioch, a member of Duguid's circle, acted as recorder. According to Hay Nisbet's preface, this book was only one-third finished by 1887. The remainder was composed of the life and missionary work of a Brahmin priest who was raised from the dead by Jesus, the autobiographies of an ancient Mexican priest and a red Indian chief, and various other spirit autobiographies, tales, addresses, and answers to questions.

Hermes—after the lesson learned from the publication of Hafed—was not illustrated. Supposedly, the misadventure of the Hafed illustrations was brought to the attention of the controls. They defended themselves by saying that the memory of these pictures was retained in Duguid's subconscious mind. If so, these impressions were apparently subject to elaboration in the reproduction as, for instance, a ruined church nave of the Family Bible appears in a restored condition in Duguid's book. A similar incident occurred in Duguid's demonstrations of spirit photography. His Cyprian priestess, a recurring spirit photograph, was found to be the exact copy of a German picture, Night.

Dukes, Sir Paul (1889–1967)

British author, secret agent, and pioneer of yoga in Western countries, Dukes was born in 1889. He was educated at Caterham School, England, and Petrograd Conservative, Russia. Dukes was always seeking and affirming a higher purpose in life than everyday existence. His first marriage, in 1922, was to Margaret Rutherford; his second, in 1959, to Diana Fitzgerald.

As a young man he took a position as a language teacher in Riga, Latvia. He later moved to St. Petersburg, where he was a secret agent in prerevolutionary Russia. In 1913 he spent a season in the Russian province of Tula, acting as a tutor, and briefly claimed an ability for psychic healing.

After World War I, in 1921 he became a special correspondent of The Times newspaper in Eastern Europe. Under the name "Paul Dukaine" he appeared on stage in a ballet act. Dukes also studied yoga, lectured, traveled widely, and wrote a number of books on a variety of topics. He was director of a company that manufactured components for the British Ministry of Aircraft Production. During his travels he met mystics and wonder workers, and also spent a night alone in the Great Pyramid of Gizeh in Egypt. He died on August 27, 1967 in Capetown, South Africa.

Sources:

Dukes, Paul. Come Hammer, Come Sickle. N.p., 1947.
———. Red Dusk and the Morrow. N.p., 1922.
———. The Unending Quest. London, 1950.
———. Yoga for the Western World. N.p., 1953.
———. The Yoga of Health, Youth and Joy. N.p., 1960.

Dumas, Andre A(lfred) (1908–)

French engineer and author of La Science de l'âme (1947) and many articles on parapsychological subjects. He was born November 1, 1908, in Levullois-Perret (Seine) and was educated at the Fine Arts School and the Professional and Technical School, Geneva.

Duncan, Helen Victoria (1898–1956)

Controversial British materialization medium exposed on several occasions as a fraud. Born in Perthshire, Scotland, she had a working-class background. She later married and became the mother of six children. Duncan became well known as a materialization medium, manifesting spirit forms.

Controversy ensued in the journal Light in 1931 following her sittings for the London Psychic Laboratory, the research department of the London Spiritualist Alliance. Ectoplasm (a psychic substance supposedly exuded from mediums) was reportedly seen in quantities, and specimens were obtained for analysis. In addition, figures of adults and children appeared under voluminous drapery, and movements of objects beyond the reach of the medium were observed. As a means of control the medium was placed nude into a sleeved sack with stiff buckram fingerless gauntlets sewn to the sleeves of her suit. The sack was sewn together at the back and fastened with tape and cords to the chair. At the end of the sitting the medium was often found outside the bag, the seals, tape, and stitching remaining intact.

The first report of the London Psychic Laboratory was published in Light, May 16, 1931. It advanced no definite conclusion but disclosed a favorable impression. Meanwhile, Duncan also gave sittings at the National Laboratory of Psychical Research. In the July 14, 1931, Morning Post, a long article was published on her exposure there and psychical researcher Harry Price branded her in a statement "as one of the cleverest frauds in the history of Spiritualism."

A portion of her teleplasm (another term for ectoplasm) was found to be composed of woodpulp and egg white. Photographs taken during the séance disclosed rubber gloves and rough portraits wrapped in cheesecloth. An X-ray examination revealed that Duncan possessed a remarkable faculty of regurgitation and merely swallowed the necessary paraphernalia before the séance.

Two days after this article the second report of the London Psychic Laboratory appeared in Light. It also branded Duncan as a clear-cut fraud and quoted a statement by her husband that was interpreted as a confession. In subsequent issues of Light many Spiritualists supported the medium. Dr. Montague Rust, who was responsible for introducing Duncan to London, deplored the hasty conclusions and despite the adverse report maintained that Duncan was the most remarkable physical medium in Europe. Many other impressive testimonies were given on her behalf. Will Goldston, the famous magician, confessed to having witnessed astounding results that no system of trickery could achieve (Psychic News, May 28, 1932).

However, another exposure followed on January 5, 1932, in Edinburgh. "Peggy," the materialized child control, was seized and found to be identical to the medium. "I see no escape from the conclusion," writes J. B. Mc Indoe, president of the Spiritualists' National Union, in Light, "that Mrs. Duncan was detected in a crude and clumsy fraud—a pitiable travesty of the phenomena she has so frequently displayed. I have no doubt that the fraud was deliberate, conscious and premeditated."

Yet in the Edinburgh Sheriff Court, where the exposers carried the case, he said that he had considerably modified his view because of the evidence of the Crown witnesses. Ernest W. Oaten and Montague Rust were the chief witnesses for the defense, the latter describing amazing experiences of the partial dematerialization of Duncan's body. The court found Duncan guilty of fraud and sentenced her to a fine of 10 pounds or a month's imprisonment. After she was convicted for "obtaining money from a sitter by false pretences," her followers declared that she was wrongly condemned. On a later occasion she was tried under the old British legislation of Section 4 of the Witchcraft Act of 1735 (see fortune-telling). Between December 1943 and January 1944 she gave public séances in Portsmouth. At one of these sittings she was grabbed by a policeman acting in concert with an investigator who believed the proceedings fraudulent. As a result, Duncan was tried at the Central Criminal Court in London.

A detailed account of the proceedings was published in The Trial of Mrs. Duncan, edited by C. E. Bechhofer Roberts, (London, 1945). Duncan was sentenced to nine months imprisonment. After her release she resumed mediumistic activities, and in October 1956 was seized by police at a séance in Nottingham. She became ill and died five weeks later. It is possible that her death (from diabetes and heart failure) may have been accelerated by the shock of the police raid.

The records of the séances at the National Laboratory for Psychical Research, with impressions of the phenomena by several professors, were published by Harry Price in book form under the title Regurgitation and the Duncan Mediumship (1931). Although Price concluded that her phenomena were fraudulent, Duncan continued to be endorsed by some Spiritualists, including Maurice Barbanell, editor of Psychic News.

At the time of her trials, there was considerable official opposition to Spiritualism in Britain, and the treatment of mediums accused of fraud verged on persecution. Convictions were often obtained by use of an outdated vagrancy act and the Witchcraft Act of 1735. Duncan's case became a focus for the Spiritualists' campaign for the abolition of prosecution of mediums under outdated and punitive legislation.

Sources:

Cassiver, Manfred. "Helen Victoria Duncan: A Reassessment." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 53, 801 (October 1985).

Crossley, Alan E. The Story of Helen Duncan. N.p., 1975.

Roberts, C. E. Bechhofer, ed. The Trial of Mrs. Duncan. London, 1945.

Dunne, J(ohn) W(illiam) (1875–1949)

Parasychologist who studied the implications of dreams for survival of death. Dunne was born in Roscommon, Ireland, but lived and worked in Britain. He was a pioneer aeronautical engineer and in 1904 invented the stable, tailless airfoil, which was named after him. Between 1906 and 1907 he built and flew the first British military airplane.

In the field of parapsychology he achieved a lasting position through his theories on dreams. In his book An Experiment with Time (1927) he describes his own experiments with dreaming, from which he concluded that precognitive elements frequently occur in dreams. The book has been frequently reprinted.

Dunne developed a theory called "serialism," which postulates an infinite series of dimensions within time, giving any present moment extensions into the past and future. His later books developing this theory are The Serial Universe (1934), The New Immortality (1938), and Nothing Dies (1940). He died August 24, 1949, in Banbury, England.

Sources:

Dunne, J. W. An Experiment with Time. New York: Macmillan, 1927.

Prince, Walter Franklin. Noted Witnesses for Psychic Occurrences. Boston: Boston Society for Psychical Occurrences, 1928. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Dunwich, Gerina (1959–)

Gerina Dunwich, a contemporary writer and Witch, was born in Illinois on December 27, 1959. As a young girl, she had vivid dreams of having been executed as a witch. She was introduced to both Spiritualism and Witchcraft in 1969 by a cousin, and found an immediate agreement with them. Shortly thereafter she read Sybil Leek's Diary of a Witch and Raymond Buckland's Witchcraft from the Inside, both of which became important guides directing her to Neo-Pagan Wicca.

In 1977 she moved to Los Angeles to pursue an entertainment career. She learned astrology and Tarot and began to work on a book, The Lexicon of the Occult. She eventually became a professional card reader and astrologer. In 1980 she began a literary journal, Golden Isis, that soon focused on Goddess-oriented poetry and Wicca. She found a mate in Al Jaeker, a musician, and in 1984 they moved to Massachusetts. She landed her first book contract for Candlelight Spells, published in 1988. Through this period she became ever more deeply involved in the occult and Wicca. She moved back to Los Angeles in 1990 and then to upstate New York, to a small town near the Canadian border, in 1994.

In New York Dunwich opened an occult shop, The Country Witch, that became a focus for local Pagans. Two years later she founded Coven Mandragora, an eclectic Wiccan group; Wheel of Wisdom School, which offered correspondence courses; and North Country Wicca, a networking organization for Wiccans. In 1998 she accepted an ordination from the Universal Life Church. That same year, she disbanded Coven Mandragora and moved back to Los Angeles. There she created a new form of Wicca drawing heavily on Egyptian themes, which she called Bast–Wicca, named after the cat deity of ancient Egypt.

Through the 1990s, Dunwich wrote a series of books on the Craft, including several introductory texts, The Wicca Spellbook (1994), Wicca Love Spells (1996), and The Wicca Source Book (1996); and several reference books, the Concise Lexicon of the Occult (1990) and Wicca A to Z (1998). She has a webpage at http://www.wicca.drak.net/dunwich/main.htm.

Sources:

Dunwich, Gerina. Concise Lexicon of the Occult. Secacus, NJ: Citadel Press, 1990.

———. Wicca A to Z. New York: Citadel Press, 1998.

———. Wicca Love Spells. New York: Citadel Press, 1996.

———. The Wicca Source Book. New York: Citadel Press, 1996.

———. The Wicca Spellbook. New York: Citadel Press, 1994.

Du Potet de Sennevoy, Baron (Jules Denis) (1796–1881)

A leading exponent of animal magnetism in nineteenth-century France, familiar with the whole range of paranormal phenomena that later figured prominently in Spiritualism.

Du Potet began his experiments in 1821 and recorded his experiences in Le Propagateur du Magnétisme animal, a journal founded in 1827, and in the Journal de Magnétisme, which was founded in 1845 and continued until 1861 and was subsequently revived by Hector Durville.

He claimed to have discovered in animal magnetism "the magic of antiquity." Apports, fire resistance, levitation of the human body, and spirit communications were frequently observed and studied by him. On a visit to England he introduced Dr. John Elliotson, the first exponent of animal magnetism in Great Britain, to the phenomena. Over the years he wrote a number of books that kept the issue of animal magnetism alive in France.

Sources:

Du Potet de Sennevoy, Baron. Cours de magnétisme animal. N.p., 1834. 1840.

———. Discours sur le magnétisme animal. N.p., 1833.

———. Essai sur l'enseignement philosophique du magnétisme. N.p., 1845.

———. Exposé des expériences sur le magnétisme animal. N.p., 1821.

———. La Magie dévoilée ou principes des sciences occultes. 1852. Translated as Magnetism and Magic. Edited by A. H. E. Lee. London, 1927.

———. Le magnétisme animal opposé à la médecine, mémoire pour servir a l'histoire du magnétisme en France et en Angleterre. N.p., 1840.

———. Manuel de l'étudiant magnétiseur ou nouvelle instruction pratique du magnétisme fondée sur 30 années d'observations. N.p., 1846.

Du Prel, Baron Carl (1839–1899)

German philosopher, author of Die Philosophie der Mystik (1885), translated as The Philosophy of Mysticism (2 vols., 1889), dealing with latent human powers, the phenomena of dreams, trance, and hypnotic sleep. Du Prel conducted many experiments on the phenomena of hypnotism (then known as animal magnetism) before investigating the newer fields of Spiritualism and psychical research.

He investigated such famous mediums as John Eglinton and Eusapia Palladino and concluded that the phenomena of Spiritualism furnished empirical evidence of the existence of transcendental beings. He also accepted that belief in human survival was justified by his research.

However, he laid himself open to criticism by his argument that comparisons between mediums and conjurers were fallacious. His treatise Ein Problem für Taschenspieler emphasized that skilled conjurers had declared mediums they had investigated to be free from imposture. He neglected to note that conjurers had also exposed fake mediums. Du Prel's defense of psychography (slate writing) did not incluce the techniques used by fraudulent mediums. According to Du Prel:

"One thing is clear, that is, that Psychography must be ascribed to a transcendental origin. We shall find (1) that the hypothesis of prepared slates is inadmissible. (2) The place on which the writing is found is quite inaccessible to the hands of the medium. In some cases the double slate is securely locked, leaving only room inside for the tiny morsel of slate pencil. (3) That the writing is actually done at the time. (4) That the medium is not writing. (5) The writing must be actually done with the morsel of slate, or lead pencil. (6) The writing is done by an intelligent being, since the answers are exactly pertinent to the questions. (7) This being can read, write, and understand the language of human beings, frequently such as is unknown to the medium. (8) It strongly resembles a human being, as well in the degree of its intelligence as in the mistakes sometimes made. These beings are, therefore, although invisible, of human nature or species. It is no use whatever to fight against this proposition. (9) If these beings speak, they do so in human language. If they are asked who they are, they answer that they are beings who have left this world. (10) Where these appearances become partly visible, perhaps only their hands, the hands seen are of human form. (11) When these things become entirely visible, they show the human form and countenance. . . . Spiritualism must be investigated by science. I should look upon myself as a coward if I did not openly express my convictions."

Du Prel also claimed to know three private mediums "in whose presence direct writing not only takes place inside double slates, but is done in inaccessible places."

We know that conjurers can fake spirit messages on slates under conditions that seem to preclude trickery, and the whole phenomenon of slate writing remains questionable. In spite of his credulity on the issue of slate writing, Du Prel declared his belief in the reality of Spiritualist phenomena. He was also ahead of his time in recommending psychical research by state-appointed and paid commissions.

Other publications by him include Studien aus dem Gebiete der Geheimwissenchaften (2 vols., 1890, 1891) and Die vorgeburtliche Erziehung als Mittel zur Menschenzüchtung (1899). He contributed to such journals as Die Übersinnliche Welt.

Dupuis, Charles François (1742–1809)

French author and politician who studied ancient civilization and anthropology. He was born on October 26, 1742 at Trie le-Chateau and was tutored by his father until he was able to enter the College d'Harcourt. At age 24 he was made professor of rhetoric at Lisieux, but his inclination led him into the field of mathematics. Several of his anthropological writings had occult implications. In Origine de tous les Cultus (3 vols., 1795) he attempts to explain not only all the mysteries of antiquity, but also the origin of all religious beliefs. In his Memoire explicatif du Zodiaque chronologique et mythologique (1806) he maintains a common origin for the astronomical and religious opinions of the Greeks, Egyptians, Chinese, Persians, and Arabians.

Depuis died on September 29, 1809.

Durandal

A magical sword belonging to Roland, hero of medieval legends relating to Charlemagne and the Twelve Peers of France.

Durville, Gaston

Son of Hector Durville, brother of Henri Durville, jointly involved in publications concerned with animal magnetism and nature therapy. His publications included Les Succès de la Médecine psychique, Le Sommeil provoqué et les Causes qui le déterminent: Magnétisme, Hypnotisme, Suggestion, Etude étiologique de l'hypnose. With Hector and Henri Durville, he founded the International Psychical Society and codirected the Journal du Magnétisme and the Revue du Psychisme Expérimental.

Durville, (Marie-François) Hector (1849–1923)

Author, healer, and experimenter in the field of animal magnetism and other occult subjects. Durville also investigated the phenomenon of astral projection (out-of-the-body travel). He was born April 8, 1849, in Mousseau, France. With his sons Henri and Gaston, he played a significant part in popularizing occult studies in France. The publishing house of Hector & Henri Durville in Paris issued a wide range of books and journals dealing with animal magnetism, occultism, Spiritism, divining, and nature therapies, a number of which he wrote. With his son Henri, he directed the Institut du Magnétisme et du Psychisme expérimental, founded in 1878. In 1887 he founded the Societé Magnétique de France, and in 1893, the Ecole Pratique de Magnétisme et de Massage. With his sons Henri and Gaston he continued the Journal du Magnétisme, originally founded by Baron du Potet.

He also published the Revue du Psychisme expérimental and Psychic Magazine. He died September 1, 1923, in Montmorency, France.

Sources:

Durville, (Marie-François) Hector. Almanach spirite et magnétique illustre pour 1893. N.p., 1893.

———. Bibliographie du Magnétisme et des Sciences Occultes. N.p., 1895.

———. Le Fantôme des Vivants, Anatomie et physiologie de l'àme; Recherches expérimentales sur le dédoublement du corps de l'homme. N.p., 1909.

———. Le Magnétisme considéré comme agent lumineux. N.p., 1896.

———. Le magnétisme des animaux; Zootherapie (Polarité des animaux morts et vivants; Zoothérapie, Biothérapie, etc.). N.p., 1896.

———. Le Magnétisme humain considéré comme agent physique. N.p., 1890.

———. Le massage et le magnétisme menacés par les médecins; le proces Moureux à Angers; necessite d'un amendement a la loi du 30 Nov. 1892, sur l'exercice de la médecine. N.p., 1897.

———. Le Massage et le magnétisme sous l'empire de la loi du 30 Nov. 1892, sur l'exercice de la médecine; Règlement statutaire de l'Ecole pratique de Magnétisme et de Massage: statuts du syndicate des Masseurs et Magnétiseurs de Paris. N.p., 1894.

———. Lois physiques du magnétisme; Polarité humaine; Traité expérimental et thérapeutique de magnetisme. N.p., 1886.

———. Magnétisme personnel; Education de la Pensée—Développement de la Volonté—Pour être heureux, fort, bien portant et réussir en tout. N.p., 1905.

———. Pour combattre la surdité, les bourdonnements, l'otite, etc. . . . par le magnétisme. N.p., 1906.

———. Pour combattre les maladies par suggestion et auto- suggestion, se débarrasser de ses mauvaises habitudes, prendre de l'Energie et de la Confiance en soi, dominer les autres, et éviter leurs suggestions. N.p., 1896.

———. Pour combattres les maladies par l'application de l'aimant. N.p., 1906.

———. Traité expérimental de Magnétisme avec Portrait de l'auteur et Figures dans le texte; Cours professé a l'Ecole pratique de Magnétisme et de Massage. 2 vols. N.p., 1895–1896.

———. Traité Expérimental de Magnétisme . . . Cours professé a l'école Pratique de Magnetisme et de Massage par Hector Durville; Théories et Procédés. 2 vols. N.p., 1898–1904.

Durville, Henri (1888– ?)

Writer, psychotherapist, and son of occult publisher Hector Durville. He was born November 30, 1888, in Paris. He founded the International Psychical Society and (with his father Hector and brother Gaston) edited the Journal du Magnétisme, originally founded by Baron du Potet. He wrote a number of books and organized international study conferences on animal magnetism.

Sources:

Durville, Henri, ed. 1 er Congres international de Psychologie expérimentale. N.p., 1910.

———. 2 e Congres international de Psychologie expérimentale, La Science secrete. N.p., 1923.

———. Cours de magnétisme personnel. N.p., 1933.

———. La Magie divine. N.p., 1930.

———. Mystères initatiques. N.p., 1929.

Durville, Henri, and Andre Durville, eds. Les Trucs de la Prestidigitation dévoilés. A series of 17 titles reprinted from Revue du Psychisme expérimental and Journal du Magnétisme 1911–1914.

Du-Sith

The Black Elf, a little man believed to be of fairy origin who killed Sir Lachlan Mor M'Clean in 1598 at the battle of Trai-Gruinard in Islay, Scotland. According to legend this little man offered his services to Sir James Macdonald, the opponent of Sir Lachlan, and that the latter's death was caused by an arrow that struck him on the head, afterward found to be an elf bolt (see also elf arrows). In answer to a question of Macdonald's the little man said, "I am called Du-sith, and you were better to have me with you than against you."

Dwyer, Walter W(illiam) (1894– ?)

Leader during the 1950s of the Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship. He was born on August 11, 1894, in New York City, and educated at Columbia University (M.A., 1916). In 1918 he married Geraldine Grace McKeown. He was a charter member of Academy of Religion and Mental Health, New York, and a member of the Order of St. Luke the Physician and the Institute of Pastoral Care, Worchester, Massachusetts. He developed a particular interest in spiritual healing.

Sources:

Dwyer, Walter W. The Churches' Handbook for Spiritual Healing. 9th ed. New York: Ascension Press, 1965.

Dykshoorn, Marinus Bernardus (1920–)

Dutch psychic whose passport uniquely bears the occupation entry "clairvoyant." According to Paul Tabori, in his book Crime and the Occult (1974), Dykshoorn has:

". . .solved some extremely complex crimes, has located graves that have been "lost" since 1917, foretold a great many events that defied probability, and once tracked a thief in a distant country by telephone. His fame is solidly established in his native Holland and in a number of European countries. He has actually been licensed by the Dutch government authorities as a 'practitioner of the psychic arts.'"

He was born on July 10, 1920 in Gravenzande, near The Hague, and claimed to have had clairvoyant and precognitive gifts as a child. In 1938 a German scientist diagnosed his condition as being a result of ESP, and Dykshoorn decided to become a professional clairvoyant. At first he practiced in Holland, moving to Australia in 1960. His reception there was somewhat unsympathetic, and in 1970 he traveled to the United States, where he became widely known.

In his autobiography, Dykshoorn claimed extraordinary success in tracking criminals, finding buried treasure, and in other clairvoyant and precognitive feats. Some of these claims, however, depend upon Dykshoorn's own statements and have proved difficult to verify independently. For a skeptical view of Dykshoorn's claims, see Piet Hein Hoebens's 1982 article in the Zetetic Scholar.

Sources:

Dykshoorn, Marinus Bernardus, as told to Russell H. Felton. My Passport Says Clairvoyant. N.p., 1974.

Hoebens, Piet Hein. "The Mystery Men From Holland, III: The Man Whose Passport Says Clairvoyant." Zetetic Scholar 10 (December 1982).

Tabori, Paul. Crime and the Occult. N.p., 1974.

Dynamistograph

An instrument said to have been constructed under spirit guidance by the Dutch physicists Dr. J. L. W. P. Matla and Dr. G. J. Zaalberg Van Zelst of The Hague to obtain direct communication with the spirit world without using a medium. The device consisted of a cylinder into which the spirit influence was supposed to enter, a table isolated by a sheet of glass and charged with an electric current, a pair of scales, and a writing apparatus arranged on the Morse system. Enclosed in a room, the action of the instrument was observed through a small glass window. Long communications were allegedly spelled out by spiritual intelligences using a lettered dial at the top of the machine.

The result of these investigations was detailed by the inventors in their work Het Geheim van den Dood (5 vols., ca. 1911). A one-volume version was issued in French under the title La Solution du Mystère de la Mort (1930). A report of the Dutch Physical Society objected that no sufficient allowance was made for possible earth tremors and other normal causes. Nevertheless, such objections do not give satisfactory explanation for the curious communications received from the deceased father of Zaalberg Van Zelst.

For a discussion of the work and apparatus of Matla and Van Zelst, see Hereward Carrington, Laboratory Investigations into Psychic Phenomena (1939). (See also Ashkir-Jobson Trianion; Communigraph; Reflectograph)

E

The E. F. Benson Society

British society organized to arrange social and literary events relating to E. F. Benson, his writings, and the Benson family's. It publishes a journal for members, The Dodo, named after Benson's 1893 novel. Address: Allan Downend, The Old Coach House, 10 A High St., Rye, E. Sussex, TN31 7FJ England.

EA See BABYLONIA

Eaglesfield, Francis

Pseudonym of Arthur Guirdham, physician, novelist, and writer on ESP and reincarnation.

Eaks, Duane L. (1940–)

Duane L. Eaks, a contemporary Australian astrologer, was born in Montrose, Colorado, on March 6, 1940. He grew up in Colorado and attended Northern Colorado University, from which he earned a degree in chemistry in 1963. Following graduation he switched to psychology and attended San Diego State University. He earned his master's degree in guidance and counseling in 1967 and completed his education at the University of California at Berkeley with a doctorate in counseling psychology (1972). Soon afterwards he moved to Melbourne, Australia, as a lecturer and counseling psychologist at the Royal Melbourne Institute of Technology in Victoria.

Eaks began his study of astrology in 1977 at the Melbourne Academy of Cosmobiology, where he mastered the system of uranian astrology as developed by Reinhold Ebertin. Over several years he studied with some of the country's leading astrologers, including Pamela Rowe, Gillian Murray, and Doris Greaves. With his educational background, he quickly emerged as one of the most prominent voices in Australian astrology, and he lectured widely on the psychological aspects of astrology, drawing deeply from Jungian themes. He also pioneered exploration of the gay experience and astrology. Sex and love relationships have been a major theme in astrology, but have dealt almost exclusively with heterosexual relationships.

In 1982 Eaks was elected to the National Executive Committee of the Federation of Australian Astrologers (FAA) and named its executive secretary, a post he retained for the next six years. In 1985 he was made a professional member of the FAA and in 1988 named a fellow. Through the 1980s he also served as the treasurer of the Victoria branch of the FAA and as the newsletter editor of the Regulus Ebertin Study Group that began in 1981.

Sources:

Eaks, Duane L. Student Project Guide on Astrology. Heidelberg, Victoria, Australia: Federation of Australian Astrologers, 1991.

———. "Symbolic Analogies of the Elements." Regulus-Ebertin Newsletter 1, no.1 (September 1981): 6–7.

Ear Magazine

Journal concerned with music and related literature that has given special attention to the esoteric aspects of music and the use of sound for healing. It is published five times per year. Address: New Wilderness Foundation, 365 West End Ave., New York, NY 10024.

Earth Laid upon a Corpse

Old Scottish superstition described by eighteenth-century writer Thomas Pennant. It was the custom in the Highlands to lay on the breast of the deceased a wooden platter containing a little earth and a little salt—the former to symbolize the corruptibility of the body, the latter the incorruptibility of the soul.

Sources:

Pennant, Thomas. A Tour in Scotland and Voyage to the Hebrides, MDCCLXXII. 1774. Reprint, Chester, U.K.: J. Monk, 1969.

Earthquake Prediction

Human sensitivity to earth tremors over vast distances at the time of seismic disturbance, or hearing the ominous rumbling days before, is an unclassified psychic phenomenon. Conversations with Goethe (1838) by Johann P. Eckermann, relates one such account concerning Goethe: "During the night of February 5–6, 1783, my master rang for me. I went to his room and saw him dragging his bed from the end of the room to the window. Then he looked up at the sky and said, 'Listen, we are at a very serious hour, for earthquakes are happening at this very moment.'" The next day, at the court of Weimar, Goethe repeated to several persons what he had said in the night, but he was laughed at, and one lady cried, "Goethe is raving." However, two weeks later accounts of a terrible earthquake arrived. It had occurred in Calabria and Sicily at the very time Goethe called to his valet.

Lady Conan Doyle claimed possession of the same gift that Eckermann recorded of Goethe. As many as five days preceding she stated that she could hear the rumbling of the earth over thousands of miles, especially in the quiet of the night. It broke in on her usual activity at unexpected moments, stopped, then recommenced and often continued up to the hour of the earthquake. She could tell the comparative distance but not the geographical position. She felt normal during such episodes and considered her ability to be a kind of predictive clairaudience.

Since ancient times, it has been popularly believed that animals are able to sense the approach of earthquakes. One of the earliest writers to record this belief was Pliny the Elder (ca. 23–79 C.E.), and it has persisted even until today. It was reported that weeks before the great West Indian earthquake with the eruption of Mount Pelée in Martinique in 1902 cattle became so uneasy that they could hardly be managed, dogs were fearful and howled continually, snakes left the vicinity of the volcano, and even the birds ceased to sing and left the trees on the mountainside. Such claims were often considered superstitious folklore, but are now taken seriously by scientists and parapsychologists, who refer to the phenomenon as anpsi, the psi faculty in animals.

There is ample evidence that animals do in fact behave in an unusual way prior to earthquakes, and Western scientists have taken great interest in the study of animal sensitivity in the People's Republic of China. In 1976 a group of ten United States' geologists and geophysicists visited China under the auspices of the National Academy of Sciences' Committee for Scholarly Communication with the People's Republic of China to investigate new techniques of predicting earthquakes. In addition to using electronic equipment to monitor earth sounds and the study of fluctuating water levels, the Chinese also study unusual animal behavior in an attempt to scientifically verify folk beliefs. Chinese farmers have believed for centuries that the onset of earthquakes is signaled by such unusual animal behavior as dogs howling, fish leaping, and snakes and rats emerging from hiding.

Similar observations have been reported from other countries. In Japan, fish have been reported to appear in large numbers in areas where they were normally scarce. Japanese householders in earthquake areas often keep goldfish in a bowl; if the fish swim about in a frantic manner, it is believed to signal an approaching earthquake. Rabbits and deer have been observed to run in terror from epicenter zones some hours before an earthquake. The Soviet publication U.P.I. Report on Soviet Studies (March 24, 1969) states that a Russian woman in Tashkent survived the earthquake of 1966 when her dog dragged her to safety minutes before her house was destroyed.

Various explanations have been advanced to account for the seeming ability of animals to predict earthquakes. Since animals are aware of super- and sub-sonic frequencies, it has been suggested that they hear the initial sound waves of an earthquake, which are inaudible to humans. Another suggestion is that animals perceive electromagnetic field variations. Another theory proposes that earthquakes produce an intensification of positive ions in the atmosphere, acting on the nervous system of creatures rather in the same way that some people claim to be able to perceive the onset of a storm. James B. Beal, in Extrasensory Ecology, discusses electrostatic and electromagnetic phenomena of this kind, including the "sky glow" that may precede an earthquake by several hours, and suggests that an earthquake causes a buildup in pressure in surrounding rocks.

Sources:

Beal, James B. "The Formerly 'Supernatural': Electrical and Psi Fields in Medical Anthropology." In Extrasensory Ecology: Parapsychology & Anthropology, edited by E. K. Long. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1977.

Cornell, James C., Jr., and John Surowiecki. The Pulse of the Planet: A State of the Earth Report from the Smithsonian Institution Center for Short-lived Phenomena. Harmony Books, 1972.

Gribben, John R., and Stephen H. Plageman. The Jupiter Effect. New York: Vintage Books, 1975.

James, Paul. California Superquake, 1975–77: Scientists, Cayce, Psychics Speak. New York: Exposition Press, 1974.

Schul, Bill. The Psychic Power of Animals. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett, 1976.

Earth Religion News

Short-lived magazine focused on magic and witchcraft published by Herman Slater (d. 1993), founder of the Magical Childe, an occult bookstore in Brooklyn, New York. The store was later moved and is now located in Manhattan.

East West; The Journal of Natural Health & Living See Natural Health

Eber Donn

Chief of the Milesian invaders of ancient Ireland. According to mythology, many Milesian ships were lost in a storm that the Danaans raised by magic.

Ebertine, Reinhold (1901–1988)

German astrologer, born on February 16, 1901, in Görlitz, Saxony, Germany. Ebertine became interested in astrology during World War I and in the early 1920s became a professional astrologer. He became a student of Alfred Witte's (1878–1943) and cofounder of the Uranian (Hamburg) School of Astrology. Ebertine appreciated the scientific rigor of the Uranian system but came to reject various elements of it, especially the postulation of hypothetical planets that Witte and his colleague Friedrich Sirggrün had developed. In 1928 Ebertine began the periodical Mensch in All.

Through the 1930s Ebertine developed "cosmobiology," an approach to astrology based on, but distinct from, the Uranian system. Its distinguishing trait was its use of a simplified form of the midpoint combinations originally utilized by Witte (midpoint theories suggest that halfway between two planets a mutual influence converges that can then form a significant relationship with another planet in the horoscope chart).

Ebertine's work was suppressed by the Nazis, but he survived the war and began anew with a new periodical, Cosmobiologie. He died on March 14, 1988. Over the years he wrote more than sixty books, most of which have yet to be translated into English.

Sources:

Ebertine, Reinhold. Applied Cosmobiology. Aalen, Germany: Ebertin Verlag, 1972.

———. Combination of Solar Influences. Aalen, Germany: Ebertin Verlag, 1972.

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

Eblis (or Iblis)

The "Satan" of the Mohammedans. It was said that Eblis was an inmate of Azaze, the heaven nearest God, and when the angels were commanded to bow down to the first man, he was the chief of those who rebelled. They were cast out of Azaze, and Eblis and his followers were sentenced to suffer in hell for a long time. It was supposed that he was composed of the elements of fire and that he succeeded the peris (fairylike nature spirits) in the government of the world.

Ebon, Martin (1917–)

Author and editor of popular books on parapsychology and related subjects. Ebon was born May 27, 1917, in Hamburg, Germany. In 1938 he moved to the United States, where he served as a managing editor of the Foreign Language Division of the Overseas News Agency. During World War II, he was on the staff of the U.S. Office of War Information. He became an expert on the Soviet Union and wrote and lectured widely on it. However, his interest in the paranormal became the more dominant part of his life.

After the war he was associated with the Parapsychology Foundation and for 11 years (1954–65) served as its administrative secretary. He was managing editor of the foundation's periodical, Tomorrow (1953–62), and executive editor of the International Journal of Parapsychology (1959–65). For a brief period beginning in 1969, he also served as executive editor of the quarterly Spiritual Frontiers.

Throughout the sixties and seventies, he wrote and edited numerous books and articles on all fields of parapsychology, the occult, and other anomalous phenomena, and he served as book review editor for several periodicals. Ebon first became known to many through his "true experiences" series of the late 1960s, which included True Experiences in Prophecy (1967), True Experiences in Telepathy (1967), True Experiences with Ghosts (1968), and True Experiences in Exotic ESP (1968).

Ebon's major contributions to parapsychology include Communicating with the Dead (1968), What's New in ESP (1976), The Evidence for Life After Death (1977), and The Signet Handbook of Parapsychology (1978). He also wrote two books that combined his knowledge of parapsychology and the Soviet Union: Psychic Discoveries by the Russians (1971) and The Soviet Propaganda Machine (1987). Ebon's books have always been very timely, as he possessed an accurate sense of specific public interests in paranormal subjects.

Sources:

Ebon, Martin. Communicating with the Dead. New York: New American Library, 1968.

———. The Evidence for Life After Death. New York: New American Library, 1977.

———. Psychic Discoveries by the Russians. New York: New American Library, 1971.

———. Psychic Warfare: Threat or Illusion? New York: McGraw-Hill, 1983.

———. The Signet Handbook of Parapsychology. New York: New American Library, 1978.

———. The Soviet Propaganda Machine. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1987.

———. True Experiences in Exotic ESP. New York: New American Library, 1968.

———. True Experiences in Prophecy. New York: New American Library, 1967.

———. True Experiences in Telepathy. New York: New American Library, 1967.

———. True Experiences with Ghosts. New York: New American Llibrary, 1968.

———. What's New in ESP. New York: New American Library, 1976.

Ecclesia Gnostica Alba

The Ecclesia Gnostica Alba (White Gnostic Church) had its beginning in the mid-1970s in Chicago, Illinois, where Michael Bertiaux claimed to have made contact with a number of higher spiritual intelligences, among them an entity named AIVAS (the same name of the entity contacted by Aleister Crowley when he channeled The Book of the Law early in the twentieth century). Bertiaux had become a thelemic magician and the leader of a collection of magical and Gnostic organizations, including a branch of the Ecclesia Gnostica Cattolicae. The Gnostic Catholic Church had its origins in the visionary experiences of Jules-Benoit Doinel, its first bishop, and one line of apostolic succession passed to Bertiaux through Haiti.

From AIVAS Bertiaux received knowledge of occult methods that were claimed to be the deepest Gnostic initiations and was told to prepare a set of adepts to spread the new Gnostic awareness. Among the people he began to train was Zivorad Mihaijlovic-Slavinski, a Yugoslavian psychologist and writer on occult topics. Bertiaux invited Mihaijlovic-Slavinski to Chicago and for a month in early 1978 Mihaijlovic-Slavinski underwent the new training. He emerged ready to return to Yugoslavia as a prophet of Gnosticism. He was also consecrated as the patriarch of the new Ecclesia Gnostica Alba. Two years later, while in California, Mihaijlovic-Slavinski experienced his own personal enlightenment.

Following his experience, Mihaijlovic-Slavinski returned to Yugoslavia and began to teach a method of group enlightenment. He initiated a number of people, among whom were several masters designated to continue the dissemination of Gnosticism in Yugoslavia and Italy. As these people followed the spiritual practices being taught to them, they experienced a new level of fellowship and moved to create a visible community. The White Gnostic Church came to exist beyond the person of its bishop.

The Ecclesia Gnostica Alba has members in contemporary Serbia, the other countries of the former Yugoslavia, Italy, and the United States. It may be contacted through its website at http://www.newciv.org/ncn/ega.html.

Sources:

Ecclesia Gnostica Alba. http://www.newciv.org/ncn/ega.html. January 11, 2000.

Ech-uisque

A Gaelic word meaning "water horse." The Ech-uisque was a goblin of Scottish Highland folklore, understood to be a favorite form assumed by the kelpie in order to lure souls to his master, the Devil. In the disguise of a fine steed, beautifully accoutered, the kelpie grazed innocently by the wayside. The weary traveler, passing by and believing this splendid animal to have strayed from his master, would be tempted to make use of him to help him on his way. The deceitful kelpie, remaining quiet as a lamb until the traveler was mounted, would then, with a fiendish yell of triumph, plunge headlong into an adjacent pool.

It was believed that the soul of the unfortunate man, who had no time to prepare for death, would thus be safely secured to the Evil One, while the kelpie received the body in payment for his trouble.

ECK

A term used by members of the religious organization ECKANKAR, founded by Paul Twitchell in October 1965. ECK (Hindi word for "one;" Sanskrit eka) is defined as "the totality of all awareness," "the audible life stream," "the living power that embraces the whole universes of God;" in brief, the essence of the Divine.

ECKANKAR

ECKANKAR, "the religion of light and sound of God," is a variation of the Radha Soami Sant Mat (tradition of the masters), a major religious tradition in the Punjab area of northern India. It was founded in 1965 by Paul Twitchell, a former student of Sant Mat Master Kirpal Singh. In 1964 Twitchell moved to San Francisco, California, and began to teach what he considered an advanced form of surat shabd yoga, the Sant Mat system of spiritual disciplines, which allows the student to hear the divine sounds and see the divine light and prepares the student's soul to travel on what are considered the inner planes of reality.

Twitchell claimed that he had come into contact with the Vairagi order of mahabtas (masters) and especially with their representatives Sudar Singh of India and ECK Master Rebazar Tarzs in the Himalayas. In 1965 Twitchell was named the 971st Living ECK Master, the lineage of the order dating back to prehistory. As the ECK master, he wrote a number of books and brought to publication two volumes of the Shariyat-Ki-Sugmad, the scripture of ECKANKAR. After his death in 1971 he was succeeded by Darwin Gross and then by the current ECK master, Harold Klemp.

ECKANKAR offers a picture of the inner worlds divided into an order of ascending levels through which the student may travel to the realm of God's presence. The student, or chela, is aided in this process by the work of the ECK master, who is believed to be able to meet and assist the student as he or she traverses the planes, especially in the nighttime while sleeping. The many ECK exercises (more than a hundred different techniques are now taught to students at different levels) assist students in their awareness of the planes, and the literature explains what they will encounter at the different levels of the inner reality. To travel the planes it is necessary to be able to see and hear the "divine light and sound."

Devotees of ECKANKAR consider it a living, growing religion headed by a master who continues to bring forth new teachings. Under Harold Klemp, the present ECK master, the organization moved into a new headquarters complex and temple in suburban Minneapolis, Minnesota. The religion is now international in scope, and in 1991 more than ten thousand attended an ECK seminar in Africa.

In the 1980s substantive charges were leveled that Twitchell had fabricated his spiritual career, had plagiarized some of his books from the writings of Julian Johnson, a prominent Sant Mat writer, and had attempted to cover up his early associations with Kirpal Singh and other spiritual teachers. Harold Klemp has largely acknowledged Twitchell's borrowing from Johnson and ECKANKAR's place in the Sant Mat tradition. Several ECKANKAR students have also left to found rival organizations, including Ancient Teachings of the Masters (Darwin Gross), The Divine Science of Light and Sound (Jerry Mulvin), and, most prominently, the Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness (John-Roger Hinkins). ECKANKAR address: Box 27300, Minneapolis, MN 55427.

Sources:

Klemp, Harold. Soul Travelers of the Far Country. Minneapolis, Minn.: ECKANKAR, 1987.

Lane, David Christopher. The Making of a Spiritual Movement. Del Mar, Calif.: Del Mar Press, 1983.

Twitchell, Paul. All about ECK. Las Vegas, Nev.: Illuminated Way Press, 1969.

———. ECKANKAR, the Key to Secret Worlds. New York: Lancer Books, 1969.

Eckartshausen, Karl von (1752–1803)

Author of Der Wolke vor dem Heiligthume (1802), a classic work of Roman Catholic mysticism, translated into English as The Cloud Upon the Sanctuary. Eckartshausen, by nature and education an intensely religious man, began his writing career with several small books of devotion that had great vogue in France and Germany. He later turned his attention to larger works of a more profound character.

According to Eckartshausen, the requisite faculty of true communion with the "interior church" is the inward conception of things spiritual; this sense makes possible the beginning of regeneration understood as the process of gradually eliminating Original Sin. His consideration of the interior church proceeds at two levels, beginning with an elucidation of his doctrine and moving to a series of assertions derived therefrom.

Isabelle de Steiger's translated The Cloud Upon the Sanctuary, which was first published in 1895 in The Unknown World was edited by Arthur Edward Waite. It was later issued in book form. The English version was soon adopted not only by spiritual seekers but also by many occultists. It had some influence on the development of the modern occult revival, finding some favor among the leadership of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. The book also impressed magician Aleister Crowley, who was attracted to its idea of the mystical interior church. Crowley was eventually consecrated into an independent Gnostic tradition, and he wrote a Gnostic mass for the church he founded as an auxiliary organization to the magical order he led.

Sources:

Eckartshausen, Karl von. The Cloud upon the Sanctuary. Translated by Isabel de Steiger. Introduction by Arthur E. Waite. London: Philip Wellby, 1903.

Eclectic Theosophist (Journal)

Former quarterly journal of the independent Point Loma Theosophical Institute, presenting theosophical teachings, news, and book reviews. Although no longer in publication, all issues of the Eclectic Theosophist are available in a bound, three-volume edition. Address: Point Loma Publications, P.O. Box 6507, San Diego, CA 92166.

Eclesia Católica Cristiana

The Eclesia Católica Cristiana is a Spanish-speaking Spiritualist church operating in the Bronx, New York. It was founded in 1956 as the Spiritualist Christian Church by Delfin Roman Cardona (b. 1918). The church was reorganized and renamed in 1969 to keep down any confusion between it and other Spiritualist centers. Cardona was born and raised in Puerto Rico. Raised a Roman Catholic, he was introduced to Spiritualism in his teens and gained some renown on the island because of his healing abilities. After moving to the United States, he founded the church to combine Roman Catholic and Spiritualist emphases. The Roman Catholic element is most evident in the development of a hierarchy that includes cardinals, bishops, and lay members.

Spiritualism in Puerto Rico derived from Brazil, which in turn derived its Spiritualist beliefs from the French spiritism of Allan Kardec, differentiated by its early acceptance of reincarnation. It has added elements of science (parapsychology) and Theosophy to create what it considers to be universal Christianity. The resulting synthesis of thought, termed the Delfinist Thought, places great emphasis on the virtues of love, comprehension, compassion, justice, humility, and faith.

Cardona has taught that women and men are equals in the spiritual as in the material world. Following the example of ancient Atlantis and the ancient Druids, the church ordains females and welcomes them into the bishopric. The first woman cardinal, Rev. Mother Olga Roman, was elevated in 1974.

Ecsomatic Experiences

One of many terms for out-of-the-body travel, also known as OOB, astral projection, or etheric projection. The term ecsomatic is used by parapsychologist Celia E. Green, director of the Institute of Psychophysical Research, Oxford, England, in conjunction with related technical terms, including parasomatic (in which the percipient appears to have another body as distinct from the normal physical body) and asomatic (in which the subject is unaware of having a body).

Sources:

Green, Celia E. Out-of-the-body Experiences. Proceedings of the Institute of Psychophysical Research, vol. 2. London, 1968.

Ecstasy

Described by parapsychologist F. W. H. Myers as "a change in the centre of perception from the material into the spiritual world," ecstasy is a state of rapture in which insights and visions of the invisible world unfold. It is characterized by an exaltation of sensory faculties. It is common to all religions and is one of the most-attested psychic experiences in both civilized and primitive countries.

The Waldenses, Italian Protestants of the twelfth century, sustained persecution from Roman Catholic forces with the superhuman strength and energy that came to them in ecstastic states. They routed French and Savoyard troops that were fifty times more numerous. During the war in the Cevennes, three thousand religious enthusiasts stood their ground against sixty thousand men of the king commanded by the best generals of France. In like measure, the Convulsionaires of St. Médard in the eighteenth century endured frightful blows—which could have felled an ox—on their chests and stomachs while in the ecstatic state.

Ecstatic states were frequently reported of Christian saints and were integral to the experience of such mystics as St. Teresa of Avila. In evaluating claims of visions of the Virgin Mary, officials of the Roman Catholic Church ask, among other things, whether or not the person was in a state of ecstasy during the vision.

In Hindu mysticism, ananda is the name given to the blissful condition of higher consciousness, and gurus often adopt a name extolling the virtue of such activities as meditation in producing that state.

It is clear that there are degrees of ecstasy, ranging from euphoric to transcendental states. Hindu mystical teachings have charted the different stages of samadhi, mystical trance, with their qualitative degrees of ecstasy. Samadhi is the aim of traditional yoga systems, in which body, mind, and spirit are controlled and purified.

In some forms of tantric yoga, the vital energy known as kundalini, commonly the dynamic of sexual experience, is transformed into spiritual force as it follows its pathway through subtle channels along the spine and through the vital centers in the body (chakras) to the crown of the head, culminating in mystical experience accompanied by blissful sensations. However, this particular yoga is said to be more likely to result in sexual fixation and obsession.

Similar to tantric yoga is the sex magic of Western occultists developed in the late nineteenth century out of the alchemical tradition. Aleister Crowley, best known for his experimentation and development in this field, viewed sex as the primary tool available to the magician in raising magic energy.

In both the Eastern and Western mystical tradition, many have argued that celibacy is the more rewarding lifestyle for those on the mystical path. In such celibate systems, the mundane ecstatic pleasure of sex has supposedly been sublimated into spiritual force, and the ecstastic experience has been transcended in mystical union.

In the 1960s, as transpersonal psychology developed, consciousness studies became a primary area of research. Ecstasy was pigeonholed under such categories as the "highest state of consciousness" or "expanded state of consciousness." Note was made of the many ways of inducing such states of their desirability. Attempts have also been made to correlate such states with various measurable body states, but progress has been difficult because most such states occur spontaneously and in the context of sacred activity.

Sources:

Avalon, Arthur [Sir John Woodroffe]. The Serpent Power. Madras, India, 1922.

Bucke, R. M. Cosmic Consciousness: A Study of the Evolution of the Human Mind. N.p., 1910.

Danielou, Alain. Yoga: The Method of Re-Integration. London: Christopher Johnson, 1949. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1955.

Gopi Krishna. Kundalini: The Evolutionary Energy in Man. Boulder, Colo: Shambhala, 1970.

James, William. The Varieties of Religious Experience. London, 1902.

Row, M. C. Nanjunda. Cosmic Consciousness, or the Vedantic Idea of Realisation of Muktu in the Light of Modern Psychology. Madras, India, 1910.

Underhill, Evelyn. Mysticism: A Study in the Nature and Development of Man's Spiritual Consciousness. London: Methuen, 1911.

White, John, ed. The Highest State of Consciousness. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Anchor, 1972.

Ecstasy Journal of Divine Experience

Ecstasy Journal of Divine Experience is a full-color newsstand magazine devoted to exploring altered states of consciousness and spiritual experiences from the standpoint of psychedelic mind-altering substances. The magazine's name derives from both the ecstatic experience produced from ingesting a wide variety of substances and the single substance called Ecstasy that became well known for its identification with rave parties. Featured in each issue of the magazine are a number of articles describing the origin, effects, and legal status of different substances. Other articles concentrate on the particular ecstatic state produced by various substances and relate them to traditional spiritual experiences. Many people have come to believe that psychedelic experiences are basic to religious experience and integral to the origin of ancient religious communities.

Like the manufacturers of the various paraphernalia used by individuals for the ingestion of different psychedelics, the publishers of Ecstasy operate on the edge of the laws concerning the use of mood altering substances, many of which are outlawed or strictly regulated by the United States government. Ecstasy is one of the few magazines to carry the names of its lawyers on the title page. Ecstasy carries ads for a wide spectrum of drug-related paraphernalia and different legal substances.

Ecstasy is published by the Center for Sacred Plant Research which may be contacted at P.O. Box 17191, Beverly Hills, CA 90209. Closely related is the Temple of Ecstasy, also headquartered in Beverly Hills, which sells books, paraphernalia, and legal substances, such as Ecstasy tobacco-free cigarettes, and preempts the majority of the magazine's advertising space. Neither Ecstasy nor the center have a webpage, but the Temple of Ecstasy may be contacted at http://www.templeofecstasy.net/, where a page offering subscriptions for the magazine can be found.

Sources:

Ecstasy. Beverly Hills, CA, n.d

Ectenic Force

A supposed physical force emanating from the person of the medium and directed by his or her will, by means of which objects may be moved without contact in apparent defiance of natural laws. The existence of such a psychic force was postulated by Count Agenor de Gasparin in the mid-nineteenth century to explain the phenomena of table-turning and rapping, and the term ectenic force was bestowed upon the supposed agency by de Gasparin's colleague Marc Thury.

The experiments of Thury and de Gasparin were widely cited as among the most convincing evidence that Spiritualism could produce, and influenced many eminent students of psychic research. If tables can be moved without contact, then such a theory is plausible, but the evidence for this type of phenomena is not abundant. During the latter twentieth century, the phenomenon postulated by Thury and de Gasparin has been placed under the broad label of psychokinesis.

Ectoplasm

A term coined by psychical researcher Charles Richet and widely used in Spiritualism, derived from the Greek ektos and plasma (meaning "exteriorized substance"). It denotes a mysterious vaporlike substance that, Spiritualists claimed, streamed out of the body of entranced mediums. The manipulation of ectoplasm, either by the subconscious self or by discarnate intelligences, resulted in the phenomena of a superphysical order (including partial and complete materializations.) Psychoplasm and teleplasm are terms similarly used to convey the same meaning, the latter denoting action at a distance from the medium's body, while ideoplasm progresses a step further and means the molding of the ectoplasm into the likeness of a self.

From the eighteenth century through the early twentieth century, numerous reports of an ectoplasmic substance were reported. Emanuel Swedenborg, for example, in his first vision spoke of "a kind of vapour steaming from the pores of my body." It was a visible watery vapor and fell downward to the ground upon the carpet. Eugene A. D. Rochas compared the luminous vapor he saw arising from the breast of Elizabeth d'Esperance to the Milky Way. Paul Lecour likened the process to the condensation of a nebula. The same idea is suggested by Venzano's description of a mass of swirling vapor at the side of Eusapia Palladino. In the case of Franek Kluski and that of Eva C., the substance was observed as white luminous spots from the size of a pea to that of a crown piece on the medium's clothes. In Kluski's case they were much brighter than in Eva's. Gustav Geley described a dimly phosphorescent column that formed beside him, out of which a luminous hand, perfectly formed and of natural size, appeared and patted him several times on the forearm in a friendly way. At the slight shock, a drop of luminous liquid fell on his sleeve and shone there for 15 to 20 minutes after the disappearance of the hand.

D'Esperance wrote of her experiences with ectoplasm:

"As soon as I have entered the mediumistic cabinet, my first impression is of being covered with spider webs. Then I feel that the air is filled with substance, and a kind of white and vaporous mass, quasi luminous, like the steam from a locomotive, is formed in front of the abdomen. After this mass has been tossed and agitated in every way for some minutes, sometimes even for half an hour, it suddenly stops, and then out of it is born a living being close to me."

Another time she added, "It seemed that I could feel fine threads being drawn out of the pores of my skin." This is significant in view of the cloudy, faintly luminous threads between the phantom and the medium that are sometimes observed in materialization séances. Such séances may help in understanding telekinetic phenomena.

The claimed discovery of ectoplasm is, of course, not recent. In the works of the alchemist Thomas Vaughan (1622–1666) is found a description under the term first matter or mercury of a substance, drawn from the body, that has some of the characteristics of ectoplasm. However, the first systematic study of ectoplasm was a joint effort by Baron Albert von Schrenck-Notzing and Juliette Bisson, who experimented with Eva C. Prior to this, Gabriel Delanne, Enrico Morselli, and Charles Richet published descriptions of the different evolutionary states of ectoplasm. Subsequently, important contributions to the discussion were made by Gustave Geley.

The questions that entertained psychical researchers, besides the basic one of establishing the very existence of ectoplasm, were its properties, the effect of its outflow upon the medium, and the means by which it could be manipulated. It was originally hypothesized that ectoplasm was a form of matter, invisible and intangible in its primary state but assuming vaporous, liquid, or solid condition in various stages of condensation. It was said to smell like ozone and to possess a number of extraordinary properties.

Experimental Findings and Inferences

A variety of photographs of what were supposed to be ectoplasm was put forward, some of which are rather repulsive. They show gelatinous, viscous material oozing from all the natural orifices of the medium's body—from the mouth, ears, nose, eyes, and lower orifices, and also from the top of the head, from the breasts, and from the fingertips. Most often it comes from the mouth. The form of the substance varies, according to Geley, between threads, cords, rigid rays, membranes, and fabriclike or woven material with indefinite and irregular outlines. The most curious picture is that of a widely expanded membrane with fringes and rucks and resembling a net in appearance. This resemblance to such materials as cheesecloth often provoked allegations of fraud, and, in fact, many mediums were caught in attempts to simulate ectoplasm.

The amount of ectoplasm found in the experiments varied greatly. It seemed at times to be conditioned by psychological factors of will and emotion. It could completely envelop the medium as in a mantle. It had different colors—white, black, or grey. White was the most frequent, or perhaps the most easily observed. Sometimes the three colors appeared simultaneously. Visibility varied a great deal. The impression to the touch was sometimes moist and cold, sometimes viscous and sticky, more rarely dry and hard. The substance was mobile, slow, reptilelike, or at other times quick as lightning. It was sensitive to light. The production could affect the general temperature of the room, a change being particularly noticeable near the medium or any object touched by the exuding substance.

Schrenck-Notzing in his book The Phenomena of Materialisation (1920) sums up hundreds of experiments conducted for a period of five years with Eva C.: "We have very often been able to establish that by an unknown process there comes from the body of the medium a material, at first semi-fluid, which possesses some of the properties of a living substance, notably that of the power of change, of movement and of the assumption of definite forms."

In Munich, with the Polish medium Stanislawa P., the baron succeeded in making a cinematographic record of ectoplasm as it flowed out of the medium's mouth.

The similarity between these observations and those of a Mrs. Davidson at the haunted Willington Mill is of interest. She saw:

". . . what she supposed was a white towel lying on the ground. She went to pick it up, but imagine her surprise when she found that it rose up and went behind the dressing table over the top, down on the floor across the room, disappeared under the door, and was heard to descend the stairs with a heavy step" (Journal of the Society for Psychical Research, vol. 5).

In séances in Boston with Mina S. Crandon, ectoplasm was photographed as it was being reabsorbed by the medium's body through the openings of the mouth, nose, and ears. In several of these photographs the ectoplasm still had the form it had first assumed in the materialization, a form then reduced to a species of placenta attached to the medium by a cord similar to an umbilical cord.

Dr. F. Schwab, in his experiments with Maria Vollhardt, made a photographic record of telekinetic movements and found ectoplasm on them. The matter was usually streaming out of Vollhardt's mouth. Her teethmarks were often found in it, suggesting it was a plastic substance.

The sensation of touch produced by ectoplasm also varied in the experiments. According to the invisible operators of the séance room, it could be made to have any desired "feel." "Walter," the control of Margery (Mina Crandon), put an ectoplasmic terminal in the hand of Dr. Crandon, telling him to feel and squeeze it gently. It was a more or less conical mass, half an inch wide at its tip, getting rapidly wider, up to about an inch and a quarter where it left Dr. Crandon's hand. The mass was ice cold, somewhat rough on the surface, and yielded slightly as a rubber eraser might do. On repetition with another sitter, named Conant, he was required to scrape his hand carefully, and he stated that through this process he recovered and put down on the table at Walter's command something that acted much like the finer inner membrane of an egg.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle also spoke of an occasion with Eva C. when, in good light, he was allowed to squeeze a piece of ectoplasm between his fingers. It gave him the impression of a living substance, thrilling and shrinking under his touch.

When ectoplasm was suddenly exposed to light, mediums reported being thrown into agony. However, it was suggested by Dr. W. J. Crawford that it is not so much the ectoplasm as the medium that cannot bear the light. If the medium is shielded with black cloth, the pain is considerably reduced and flashlight photographs become easily procurable. Juliette Bisson confirmed these observations with Eva C. Sudden flashes of light were avoided. Warnings were normally given before taking a picture, in the understanding that a sudden flash would drive the substance back into the medium's body with the force of a snapped elastic band.

Franek Kluski reportedly received an open wound from a violent retreat of ectoplasm. Doyle quoted the case of a medium who exhibited a bruise from the breast to the shoulder caused by the recoil of the ectoplasm. The medium Evan Powell, at the British College of Psychic Science, suffered a bad injury on the chest owing to an unintended violent movement of a sitter touched by an ectoplasmic arm. Hemorrhage was also reported as a result of sudden exposure to light. H. Dennis Bradley spoke of an instance in which the medium George Valiantine got a black bruise, measuring about two inches by three, on the stomach by the shock of returning ectoplasm when a powerful electric light was suddenly switched on in his garage, which faced one of the windows of the séance room. The substance was seen and described by the writer Caradoc Evans as a slimy, frothy bladder "into which you could dig a finger but through which you could not pierce."

Galey gives this report in From the Unconscious to the Conscious (1920):

"To its sensitiveness, the substance seems to add a kind of instinct not unlike that of the self-protection of the invertebrates; it would seem to have all the distrust of a defenseless creature, or one whose sole defence is to re-enter the parent organism. It shrinks from all contacts and is always ready to avoid them and to be reabsorbed."

Many observations led to the hypothesis that ectoplasm has an immediate and irresistible tendency toward organization and, as a natural sequel, tends to assume the shape of the medium's body. This hypothesis was supported by the frequently noted duplication of the medium's face in materialization séances as a preliminary to individualized forms and also the frequent identification of a phantom hand with that of the medium.

An alternative to this theory was that the double of the medium serves as a pattern on which the new creations are actually built up. The double, wholly or partially detached, might magnetically attract the ectoplasm; and one observer suggested that the initial stimulation of the medium's body before the double's detachment contributes to the ejection of the ectoplasm, but only when the double is fully withdrawn does it attract the ectoplasm and clothe itself with it.

In a series of interesting experiments in the Goligher Circle, W. J. Crawford traced the flow of ectoplasm by using powdered carmine. He found that the ectoplasmic stream carries coloring matter. Staining various parts of the medium's body, he discovered that in this particular case the flow started at the base of the spine and passed down to the feet. On returning, it encountered frictional resistance; the fabric of the medium's clothing was found abraded in places. After staining Miss Goligher's blouse with carmine and asking for a rap on the wall, Crawford found carmine spots at the location of the raps.

Materialized hands produced wonderful paraffin molds in séances with Franek Kluski. He was amply controlled, yet once he was found smeared with wax. On another occasion, particles of wax were found in out-of-the-way corners of the séance room and even in the adjoining room, indicating a long extension of psychic structures.

It was not only particles of paint but also particles of clothing material that were believed to have been carried along by the ectoplasmic flow. At least, this conclusion was suggested to Crawford when he found that the fabric of the medium's stockings was nearly always impressed in the soft clay when he asked for an impression to be produced by the psychic rods. Because these particles were not deposited, they apparently flowed back giving rise to the possibility that ectoplasm acts as a solvent on material particles through which it passes, reducing them to an unknown fluidic state.

Crawford also noticed that if he passed his hand between the medium's ankle and the levitated table, the table dropped to the floor. If his hand was gloved, the table dropped more slowly. If he passed a glass rod between the table and the medium, the levitation was unaffected. Similarly, he found that if the medium touched the levitated table, the psychic energy became short-circuited and the table dropped. The medium's touch with a gloved hand retarded the drop, whereas a touch with wood or paper had no appreciable effect.

Schrenck-Notzing was able to get a fragment of ectoplasm into a tube. The moment he tried to trap it, it vanished with lightning speed. Occasionally, however, with the medium's consent, specimens were amputated for chemical and microscopic analysis. Of the result Schrenck-Notzing wrote:

"Very probably the formation of the substance, which appears in the sittings as liquid material, and also as amorphous material, or filmy net-like and veil-like material in the form of shreds, wisps, threads, and cords, in large or small packets, is an organised tissue which easily decomposes—a sort of transitory matter which originates in the organism in a manner unknown to us, possesses unknown biological functions, and formative possibilities, and is evidently peculiarly dependent on the psychic influence of the medium. . . . As regards the structure of the teleplasm, we only know this: that within it, or about it, we find conglomerates of bodies resembling epithelium, real plate epithelium with nuclei, veil-like filmy structures, coherent lamellar bodies without structure, as well as flat globules and mucus. If we abstain from any detailed indications concerning the composition and function of teleplasm we may yet assert two definite facts:—(1) In teleplasm, or associated with it, we find substances of organic origin, various cell-forms, which leave behind cell detritus. (2) The mobile material observed, which seems to represent the fundamental substance of the phenomena, does not consist of india rubber or any other artificial product, by which its existence could be fraudulently represented. For substances of this kind can never decompose into cell detritus, or leave a residue of such."

Schrenck-Notzing also analyzed ectoplasm obtained from Stanislawa P. This analysis was made in February 1916. It was controlled by a Dr. Dombrowski, who obtained half of the ectoplasm in Warsaw, Poland. He found leucocytes and epithelial cells, but otherwise the analysis yielded no secret. The summary of a bacteriological report published by the Polish Society for Psychical Research concluded, "The substance to be analyzed is albuminoid matter accompanied by fatty matter and cells found in the human organism. Starch and sugar discoverable by Fehling's test are absent." Camille Flammarion described Eusapia Palladino's sensation during the withdrawal of ectoplasm:

"She suddenly experiences an ardent desire to produce the phenomena; then she has a feeling of numbness and the gooseflesh sensation in her fingers; these sensations keep increasing; at the same time she feels in the lower portion of the vertebral column the flowing of a current which rapidly extends into her arms as far as her elbow, where it is gently arrested. It is at this point that the phenomenon takes place."

As regards telekinetic effects produced by psychic rods, Conan Doyle suggested that the psychic rods may not be strong in themselves. They may be conveyors of strength, similar to a copper wire carrying electricity. According to all indications the ectoplasmic lines are conveyors of feeling and emotion, too, not only between the materialized figure and the medium, but between the medium and the sitters as well. Elizabeth d'Esperance writes in Shadow Land (1897) of the period when she was conscious during materialization: "I felt conscious of the thoughts, or rather the feelings, of everyone in the room, but had no inclination to as much as lift a finger to enable me to see anything." She also states that her brain apparently became:

". . . a sort of whispering gallery where the thoughts of other persons resolved themselves into an embodied form and resounded as though actual substantial objects. Was anyone suffering, I felt the pain. Was anyone worried or depressed, I felt it instantly. Joy or sorrow made themselves in some way perceptible to me. I could not tell who among the friends assembled was suffering, only that the pain existed and was in some way reproduced in myself. If anyone left his or her seat, thus breaking the chain, this fact was communicated to me in a mysterious but unmistakable manner."

In a lecture reported in Light (November 21, 1903), she added:

"I lost physical strength, but no particle of my individuality. On the contrary, the loss of physical power seemed but to intensify that of the senses. Distant sounds, beyond hearing at other times, became painfully audible; a movement of any of the sitters sent a vibration through every nerve; a sudden exclamation caused a sensation of terror; the very thoughts of the persons in the room made themselves felt as though they were material objects."

The exteriorization of ectoplasm seemed to require a state of passivity on the part of the medium. D'Esperance had no strength to exert herself during the process of materialization; but if she made a great effort, this invariably compelled the materialized forms to retire to the cabinet, as though deprived of the power to stand or support themselves.

It also seemed that feelings of pain could be transferred from the medium to the materialized phantom. Once, d'Esperance scorched her arm prior to a séance and felt herself fainting, during the séance, from pain. Suddenly she felt a series of something like electric shocks and the pain left her; but the phantom "Yolande" carried her arm as though she were in pain, and when accidentally touched she flinched as though hurt. Another time, however, when a dislocated shoulder required d'Esperance to wear a surgical bandage for a few days, Yolande appeared with both arms uninjured. Nor did she exhibit any sign of weakness, for she lifted with ease a pitcher of water in her right hand, a feat that, under the circumstances, would have been quite impossible for the medium. D'Esperance conjectured that Yolande had sufficient material on that occasion from the persons in the circle, who numbered more than 20. On the occasion of the burnt arm fewer than 10 persons formed the circle.

The physiological effect of the sitters on the medium was again curiously demonstrated in a case with d'Esperance. After sittings for spirit photography in Sweden, she felt prostrate. The symptoms were those of nicotine poisoning. Through experiments it was discovered that none of the uncomfortable sensations were felt when the séances were conducted with nonsmokers.

Partial Dematerialization

W. J. Crawford, in his study of the Goligher Circle, decided that the sitters also contributed to the ectoplasmic flow. He measured the variation in weight during the séance of both the medium and the sitters. Ordinarily the loss of the medium's weight did not amount to more than 10–15 pounds. In one case, however, it amounted to 54 pounds, the normal weight of the medium being 128 pounds. At 30 pounds the stress on the medium appeared to be severe. The withdrawal of her bodily substance went on with difficulty, in fluxes, as if an elastic resistance had to be overcome. There was a distinct collapse in the hips of the girl; however, they filled back out when the ectoplasm was reabsorbed.

The medium Charles Williams, whose normal weight was 153 pounds, was weighed while the materialized spirit "Peter" left the cabinet. His weight shrank to 35 pounds and remained there for half an hour. Annie Fairlamb Mellon and Miss C. E. Wood were several times observed to have lost half of their weight during the apparition of phantoms. It was noticed with George Spriggs, in Melbourne, Australia, that when there were tall people in the circle the forms were taller than when the sitters were of lower stature.

The apparent contraction of the medium's body was seen to reach further stages, even to the point of disintegration of the extremities and, in certain exceptional cases, the temporary disappearance of the entire body. On one occasion Eusapia Palladino was described by Julien Ochorowicz as "all shrunken together" during physical phenomena. Her hand seemed to be contracted. Arthur Levy, at a séance on November 16, 1898, similarly observed, "Her burning hands seemed to contract or shrivel. Eusapia seems shrunken together and is very much affected. . . .. when the lamps are again lighted she is seen to be very much changed, her eyes dull, her face apparently diminished to half its usual size." A Dr. Vezzano also once stated that he noticed the disappearance of the lower limbs of Eusapia. The control "John King" claimed to have dematerialized them to gain more power.

Of the medium Charles Eldred, before his exposure as a fraud, Charles Letort and Ellen S. Letort report as follows in Light:

"He had shrunk up like a mummy; his head seemed to have sunk in between his shoulders and his legs seemed to have become shorter. When he had sat down at the beginning of the sitting we had seen his feet reach out under the curtains; now they scarcely touched the floor. He seemed all shrivelled up, but on his cheeks there was a feverish red spot."

Willie Reichel, in the journal Psychische Studien (1905), writes of one of Charles Victor Miller's séances in San Francisco, "In the space of about three minutes the head of the medium became like that of a child, and after further shrinking disappeared altogether."

Florence Marryat claimed that she was led by the materialized spirit "Florence" behind the curtains to see the medium Mary Showers. She observed:

"The first sight of her terrified me. She appeared to be shrunk to half her usual size and the dress hung loosely on her figure. Her arms had disappeared, but putting my hands up the dress sleeves I found them diminished to the size of those of a little child—the fingers reaching only to where the elbows had been. The same miracle had happened to her feet, which only occupied half her boots. She looked in fact like the mummy of a girl of four or six years old. The spirit told me to feel her face. The forehead was dry, rough and burning hot, but from the chin water was dropping freely on the bosom of her dress."

The famous case of the partial dematerialization of d'Esperance's body in Helsinki on December 11, 1895, is described in Alexander Aksakof's book A Case of Partial Dematerialization (1898). He was not present himself, but he collected testimonies of 15 witnesses. As he reconstructed the case, the lower part of the medium's body, from the waist downward, disappeared. Her skirt was lying flat on the chair for about 15 minutes, and her trunk was apparently suspended in the air above the seat. The light was sufficient to see by, and d'Esperance permitted five persons to verify the phenomenon by passing their hands below her trunk. This examination caused her great distress, and she was ill for three months after the occurrence.

D'Esperance's account of her feelings is especially interesting. Aksakof quotes her as follows:

"I relaxed my muscles and let my hands fall upon my lap, and I then found out that, instead of resting against my knees, they rested against the chair in which I was sitting. This discovery disturbed me greatly, and I wondered if I was dreaming. I patted my skirt carefully, all over, trying to locate my limbs and the lower half of my body, but found that although the upper part of it—arms, shoulders, chest, etc.—as in its natural state, all the lower part had entirely disappeared. I put my hand where my knees should have been, but nothing whatever was there but my dress and skirts. Nevertheless, I felt just as usual—better than usual, in fact; so that if my attention had not been attracted by accident, I should probably have known nothing of the occurrence. Leaning forward to see if my feet were in their proper place, I almost lost my balance. This frightened me very much, and I felt that it was absolutely necessary to assure myself whether I was dreaming, or the victim of an hallucination. To this end I reached over and took Prof. Seiling's hand, asking him to tell me if I was really seated in the chair. I awaited his answer in a perfect agony of suspense. I felt his hand, just as if it touched my knees; but he said: 'There is nothing there—nothing but your skirts.' This gave me a still greater fright. I pressed my free hand against my breast and felt my heart beating wildly."

Fifteen minutes later her skirts filled out and her lower limbs appeared in full view of the sitters.

Professor Haraldur Neilsson, of the University of Reykjavik, Iceland, states (Light, October 25, 1919) that he witnessed the entire disappearance of the left arm of Indridi Indridason. It occurred three times. The medium was examined in light and the absence of the arm in the sleeve was also plainly felt. It reappeared half an hour later. Other professors testified to the same phenomenon.

In the Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (March 1925), there is an account by Miss Helen C. Lambert of a sitting in an experimental circle where the medium's forearm shrank in length and finally vanished. The hand appeared to grow out of the elbow. The return to normal was slow and the medium was badly scarred.

Ectoplasm in Scientific Perspective

The foregoing experimental findings appear as incredible to contemporary researchers as they were to the people who originally reported them. They attained some attention in psychical research circles because they often came from reputable observers, whose reports could not be simply dismissed as hallucination or fraud. It seemed reasonable to propose as a working hypothesis that something like the ectoplasmic process occurred during séances. The attempt to investigate that possibility was fraught with difficulties.

In the early investigations, psychical researchers speculated on the nature of such a mysterious and strange substance. French scientist Gustav Geley, for example, highlighted four striking analogies of the ectoplasmic process in the organic realm: the chrysalis, in which the body of the caterpillar is resolved into a creamy mass and reformed into the butterfly; the cold light of insects and microbes; the pseudopods of some protozoa; and certain similarities in the evolution of animal forms and dermoid cysts. In his last book, Clairvoyance and Materialisation (1927), he reaches the following conclusions:

"The primary condition of ectoplasmic phenomena is an anatomo-biologic decentralisation in the medium's body and an externalisation of the decentralised factors in an amorphous state, solid, liquid or vaporous. This decentralisation is accompanied by a considerable expenditure of vital energy. The vital energy thus released may take the form of mechanical energy, thus producing telekinesis or raps. It may be transformed into luminous energy, producing living lights in all respects similar to normal animal lights. Sometimes the luminous energy seems to be condensed in some organ either already materialised or in process of materialisation; sometimes it is connected with a phosphorescent secretion which can agglomerate and form actual living lamps; and sometimes it may manifest as discharges or flashes. The same vital energy which is manifested by telekinesis and bioluminescence may ultimate in the organisation of amorphous ectoplasm. It then creates objective but ephemeral beings or parts of beings. Complete materialisations are the final product of the ectoplasmic process."

On the question of whether "telekinetic" ectoplasm is a purely human contribution or if animals might also have a share in it, a séance with the medium "Margery" (Mina Crandon) shed some light. She took a cat with her into the cabinet. As told by F. Bligh Bond in Psychic Research (1929), ". . . presently we all observed a luminous appearance over the table, like a tall pale flame. This seemed to move slightly and vary in height. Then came Walter's voice, 'Here, someone take this animal out; it's croaking.' The sitter on Margery's left bent over and took up the cat from her lap. It was quite comatose and stiffened. . . ." Walter then explained that he had borrowed the cat's ectoplasm and that was what we had seen as a flame on the table. However, the strong presumption of fraud at some of the Mina Crandon's séances makes it difficult to place any reliance on this single claim of animal ectoplasm.

The evidence for the reality and the nature of telekinetic ectoplasm rests largely on the claims of the generation of psychical researchers at the end of the nineteenth and beginning of the twentieth century who examined the several Spiritualist mediums who claimed to produce the different forms of physical phenomena. This era came to an end as one after another of those mediums were discovered to be engaged in fraudulent mediumship and as more sophisticated forms of detection were developed. For example, even though most physical mediums wanted to operate in the dark, infrared cameras can take pictures as if it were daylight. Even the most capable manipulations can be quickly revealed. Harry Houdini was one of those who wrote against mediums faking ectoplasm.

Although many have bemoaned the inability of mediums in more recent decades to reproduce the feats reported by mediums in the decades prior to World War II, it is evident that such manifestations were largely the product of stage magic rather than any paranormal ability. Such manifestations either disappeared under controlled conditions or were uncovered by competent observers. Parapsychologists abandoned the search for telekinetic ectoplasm and have largely abandoned any belief that it exists.

Sources:

Carrington, Hereward. "An Examination and Analysis of the Evidence for 'Dematerialization' as Demonstrated in Mons. Aksakof's Book." Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research (March 1907).

Crawford, W. J. The Psychic Structures at the Goligher Circle. London, 1921.

D'Esperance, Elizabeth. Shadow Land. London, 1897.

Geley, Gustav. Clairvoyance and Materialisation: A Record of Experiments. London, 1927. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

———. From the Unconscious to the Conscious. London, 1927.

Gray, Isa. From Materialisation to Healing. London: Regency Press, 1973.

Holms, A. Campbell. The Facts of Psychic Science. London, 1925. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1969.

Houdini, Harry. A Magician Among the Spirits. New York: Harper, 1924. Reprinted as Houdini: A Magician Among the Spirits. New York: Arno Press, 1972.

Hyslop, J. H. "Replies to Mr. Carrington's Criticism of M. Aksakof." Proceedings of the American Society Psychical Research.

Olcott, Henry S. People from the Other World. Hartford, Conn.: American Publishing Co., 1875. Reprint, Rutland, Vt.: Charles E. Tuttle, 1972.

Schrenck-Notzing, Baron A. The Phenomena of Materialisation. London, 1920. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Eddy, Mary Baker (1821–1910)

Founder of the Church of Christ, Scientist, the organizational center of the Christian Science movement. She was born on July 16, 1821, in Bow, New Hampshire. She grew up a member of the Congregational Church. She married George W. Glover in 1843, but he died suddenly the next year, though not before one child was born. In 1853 she married Daniel Patters. For a while the health problems that had plagued her off and on for many years receded, but they eventually returned. While her husband was away during the Civil War she visited a water cure sanitorium. She then heard about mental healer Phineas Parkhurst Quimby and eventually went to visit him in Maine.

Learning and applying Quimby's ideas about the mind as the key to health, Eddy found some real relief from her health problems, but she also discovered that soon after leaving his presence her symptoms returned. Then in 1866 she slipped and fell on the ice and for three days was largely immobile. During this period she read the Bible, and the truth about healing, that "God is all," the only reality, came to her. As a result, she was healed immediately.

She spent a period developing her new insight and working with individuals. In 1870 she put her ideas in a booklet, The Science of Man, which she used while writing her textbook, Science and Health, which appeared in 1875. By 1876 she had trained enough students as practitioners to warrant organizing the Christian Science Association as a fellowship and professional organization. Three years later she founded the Church of Christ, Scientist, and in 1881 she organized the Massachusetts Metaphysical College in Boston. Her work blossomed, and The Journal of Christian Science was begun in 1883.

The 1880s were a time of expansion, but also of controversy. Eddy was especially upset with students who taught personal variations on her system or separated from her organization and continued to function as practitioners of either Christian Scientists or under other names. One of her most promising students, Emma Curtis Hopkins, left in 1884 and eventually became the founder of what has become known as New Thought. In 1889 Eddy dissolved most of the structures she had founded and in 1892 reorganized her followers under a new church structure headed by herself. The organization was anchored by the First Church of Christ Scientist, the mother church in Boston, of which Eddy was pastor. The mother church chartered local congregations whose leaders had to be members in good standing with the mother church.

In the 1890s a major controversy erupted involving a lawsuit charging that Eddy had simply plagiarized the work of Phineas Quimby. The suit was settled in her favor, but unfortunately Quimby's mostly unpublished papers were not available in court, and Annetta and Julius Dresser, both former Quimby students, and their son Horatio Dresser perpetuated the idea that Eddy would have lost had the material been available.

Eddy's church had spread to every section of United States and Canada by the time of her death on December 3, 1910. She left behind a church manual, published in 1908, to guide the administration of the organization, which is now headed by a self-perpetuating board of directors.

Sources:

Beasley, Norman. The Cross and the Crown. Boston: Little, Brown, 1952.

Eddy, Mary Baker. Church Manual of the First Church of Christ, Scientist, in Boston, Mass. Boston: Trustees Under the Will of Mary Baker Eddy, 1908.

———. Poetical Works. Boston: Trustees Under the Will of Mary Baker Eddy, 1936.

———. Prose Works. Boston: Trustees Under the Will of Mary Baker Eddy, 1925.

———. Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures. Boston: Trustees Under the Will of Mary Baker Eddy, 1906.

Peel, Robert. Mary Baker Eddy. 3 vols. New York: Holt Rinehart and Winston, 1971.

Eddy Brothers, Horatio (1842–1922) and William (1832–1932)

American farmer mediums of Chittenden, a small hamlet near Rutland, Vermont. In 1874 the New York Daily Graphic assigned Henry Olcott to investigate the rumors of strange happenings in the house of the Eddy family. After ten weeks in the Vermont home, Olcott, who had no previous psychic experience, came away with a dislike of his gruff hosts and a remarkable story, which he told in 15 articles. These articles were later published in book form under the title People from the Other World (1875). This book and another, M. D. Shindler's A Southerner Among the Spirits (1877), are the primary sources for our knowledge of the Eddy brothers.

According to Olcott, the family tree showed psychic powers for generations back. In 1692, in Salem, their grandmother four times removed was sentenced to the pyre as a witch. In Horatio and William, the psychic "taint" made its appearance in infancy. A fanatical father tried to suppress it with the utmost cruelty. He employed means of torture to break their trances, poured boiling water over them, or placed red-hot coal on their heads. When the children grew older, their father realized the money-making possibilities in their strange gift and hired them out as mediums.

As eloquent evidence of the savage treatment the boys had received at the hands of ignorant investigators, Olcott saw grooves of ligatures, scars of hot sealing wax, and marks of handcuffs on their limbs. The boys exhibited every phenomenon of physical mediumship, from raps to materialization.

During ten weeks of investigation, Olcott claimed that he saw about 400 apparitions of all sizes, sexes, and races issue from their cabinet. The chief apparition was a giant Indian named "Santum" and an Indian woman by the name of "Honto." Olcott had every facility for investigation, measured the height and weight of the apparitions, roamed freely about, and became quite satisfied that the explanation of impersonation was insufficient. He found that the production of materialized forms was William Eddy's strong feature. Horatio Eddy usually sat before a cloth screen, not a cabinet, and, unlike his brother, was always in sight. Musical instruments were played behind the screen, and phantom hands showed themselves over the edge. If the same séance was held in darkness, the phenomena became very powerful. Vigorous Indian dances shook the floor, and the room resounded with yells and whoops. "As an exhibition of pure brute force," Olcott writes in one of the articles, "this Indian dance is probably unsurpassed in the annals of such manifestation."

Frank Podmore, in his book Modern Spiritualism (1902), characterizes Olcott's account as an imaginative history and quotes in confirmation C. C. Massey's account of a fortnight stay with the Eddy brothers, which thus describes the nightly apparition of a deceased relative of someone present:

"A dusky young man would look out and we had to say in turn, all round the circle 'Is it for me?' When the right person was reached three taps would be given and the fortunate possessor of the ghost would gaze doubtfully, upon which the ghost would look grieved, and that generally softened the heart of the observer, and brought about a recognition in the remark 'Lor, so you be.' And that sort of thing went on night after night at the Eddy's."

Because of Olcott's later adventures in Theosophy, some credence is lent to the charge that he was gullible.

Sources:

Olcott, Henry S. People from the Other World. Hartford, Conn.: American Publishing, 1875. Reprint, Rutland, Vt.: Charles E. Tuttle, 1972.

Podmore, Frank. Modern Spiritualism. London: Methuen, 1902. Reprinted as Mediums of the Nineteenth Century. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Shindler, M. D. A Southerner Among the Spirits. Memphis, Tenn., 1877.

Eden, Jerome (1925–1989)

Writer on UFO phenomena who claims to have observed UFOs on several occasions and has interpreted them in light of the orgone energy theories of Wilhelm Reich. Eden was born August 23, 1925, in New York City. He studied at New York University (B.A.) and Columbia University (M.A.). He served in World War II and the Korean War, later becoming managing editor of the American Water Works Association Journal, the city and military editor of the Idaho Falls Post Register, and the director of the Eastern Idaho Special Services Agency. He also edited and published the Eden Bulletin.

In 1971 he claimed he suffered severe conjunctivitis and high fever following observation of a beam of light from a UFO. His 25-year study of UFOs led him to believe that they are responsible for drought conditions on Earth. His conclusions are in line with those of the later work of Wilhelm Reich in the field of weather changing (cloud busting) and flying saucers. Eden himself was registered with Idaho's Department of Agriculture as a weather modification operator. He has experimented with a cloud-busting apparatus similar to one described by Wilhelm Reich.

He founded the PPCC (Planetary Professional Citizens Committee), which is concerned with the problem of UFOs in relation to the development of global deserts, and publishes the quarterly PPCC Bulletin (which superseded the Eden Bulletin).

Eden died on January 18, 1989.

Sources:

Eden, Jerome. Animal Magnetism and the Life Energy. Hicksville, N.Y.: Exposition Press, 1974.

———. The Desert Makers: A Study of the Creation of Deserts in Man, His Atmosphere and Planet. N.p.: PPCC, 1981.

———. Do Not Disturb: The Emotional Plague in Education. Valdez, Ala.: Eden Press, 1959.

———. Orgone Energy—The Answer to Atomic Suicide. N.p., 1972.

———. Planet in Trouble—The UFO Assault on Earth. Hicksville, N.Y.: Exposition Press, 1973.

———. Suffer the Children. New York, 1959.

———. View From Eden—Talks to Students of Orgonomy. N.p., 1976.

Mesmer, F. A. Memoir of F. A. Mesmer, Doctor of Medicine, On His Discoveries, 1799. Translated by Jerome Eden. Mount Vernon, N.Y.: Eden Press, 1957.

Edinburgh College of Parapsychology

Originally founded under the name Edinburgh Psychic College and Library by Ethel Miller in 1932 at 30 Heriot Row, Edinburgh, Scotland. The college was affiliated with the British College of Psychic Science, London, and organized along similar lines. It became the representative psychic organization in Scotland.

Following the death of her husband, Miller received evidence of survival through such well-known mediums as Annie Johnson, Hester Dowden, and Estelle Roberts and decided to make such psychic assistance and knowledge available to other seekers. She placed special importance on providing a good library for study and a quiet, sympathetic, and friendly atmosphere. She was especially solicitous of the welfare and procedures of mediums and insisted that they should not be overworked or be given the names of sitters or other information concerning them. The Edinburgh College outlived the British College of Psychic Science and became widely known as a leading center of psychical studies. Many well-known mediums, including Geraldine Cummins, Lilian Bailey, Helen Hughes, and Helen Duncan, visited the college.

In 1973 the Heriot Row address was sold, and the college moved to its present address under the new name Edinburgh College of Parapsychology. Its current aims are summarized as "the study of psychic or parapsychological phenomena and their implications, and the development of psychic or parapsychological powers in its members." Address: 2 Melville St., Edinburgh, EH3 7NS, Scotland.

Edinburgh Psychic College and Library See Edinburgh College of Parapsychology

Edmonds, John Worth (1799–1874)

One of the most influential early American Spiritualists. Edmonds was born March 13, 1799, at Hudson, New York, and educated at local public schools. In 1814 he entered Williams College, Williamstown, Massachusetts, moving a year later to Union College, Schenectady, New York, where he graduated in 1816. He went on to read law at Cooperstown, New York. After a great public career in the course of which he was a member of both branches of the state legislature of New York, president of the senate, and judge of the supreme court of New York, he resigned the latter position on account of the outcry raised against him because of his beliefs in Spiritualism.

His interest in the phenomena called the Rochester rappings was aroused in January 1851; the first account of his experiences was published on August 1, 1853, in the New York Courier in an article entitled "To the Public." To meet the continual attacks of the press against Spiritualism, he confessed his complete conversion to this belief and told the story of his investigation. This bold step produced a great sensation. His subsequent copious writings aroused a furious controversy.

In a letter published in the New York Herald on August 6, 1853, he writes:

"I went into the investigation originally thinking it a deception, and intending to make public my exposure of it. Having from my researches come to a different conclusion, I feel that the obligation to make known the result is just as strong. Therefore it is, mainly, that I give the result to the world. I say mainly because there is another consideration which influences me, and that is, the desire to extend to others a knowledge which I am conscious cannot but make them happier and better."

He witnessed both physical and mental phenomena, kept a careful record running to 1,600 pages, struggled against conviction, and resorted to every expedient he could devise to detect fraud and to guard against delusion. He told the story of his experiences and conversion again and again in his Appeal to the Public (published in answer to the abuse heaped upon him) and in his series of letters on Spiritualism, published in the New York Tribune.

Later his experiences became more direct. He himself developed the gift of mediumship. Between 1853 and 1854, in a small circle formed with a few chosen friends, he received many spirit communications. The chief communicators were alleged to be Emanuel Swedenborg and Francis Bacon. Their messages were published in the two-volume Spiritualism (1852–53), by Edmonds and George T. Dexter, which had an enormous sale.

Laura, the daughter of Edmonds, also became a medium. She developed great musical powers and the gift of tongues. Although she knew only English and a smattering of French, she spoke in nine or ten different languages in trance with the fluency of a native. Spanish, French, Greek, Italian, Portuguese, Latin, Hungarian, and Indian dialects were identified.

These phenomena and many others were carefully recorded by Edmonds. The account of his experiences with raps, as given in the New York Tribune, March 1859, is especially illustrative:

"And finally after weeks of such trials, as if to dispel all idea in my mind as to its being done by others, or by machinery, the rappings came to me alone, when I was in bed, when no mortal but myself was in the room. I first heard them on the floor, as I lay, reading. I said 'It's a mouse.' They instantly changed their location from one part of the room to another, with a rapidity that no mouse could equal. 'Still, it might be more than one mouse.' And then they came upon my person—distinct, clear, unequivocal. I explained it to myself by calling it a twitching of the nerves, which at times I had experienced, and so I tried to see if it was so. It was on my thigh that they came. I sat up in bed, threw off all clothing from the limb, leaving it entirely bare. I held my lighted lamp in one hand near my leg and sat and looked at it. I tried various experiments. I laid my left hand flat on the spot—the raps would be then on my hand and cease on my leg. I laid my hand edgewise on the limb and the force, whatever it was, would pass across my hand and reach the leg, making itself as perceptible on each finger as on the leg. I held my hand two or three inches from my thigh and found that they instantly stopped and resumed their work as soon as I withdrew my hand. But, I said to myself, this is some local affection which the magnetism of my hand can reach. Immediately they ran riot all over my limbs, touching me with a distinctness and rapidity that was marvelous, running up and down both limbs from the thighs to the end of the toes."

Edmonds never wavered in his belief in later years. His reputation and fearless championship of the cause for a period of more than two decades was an important factor in the growth and spread of American Spiritualism. In addition to his legal work, Report of Select Law Cases (1868), he also published Letters and Tracts on Spiritualism (1874). He died April 5, 1874, in New York City.

Edmunds, Simeon (1917–)

British hypnotist and writer on psychical research, born on April 13, 1917. Edmunds was research secretary of the College of Psychic Science, London, 1956–62, and contributed articles to Light, the journal of the Society for Psychical Research. He became associate editor of Tomorrow magazine in 1962. He also wrote several books.

Sources:

Edmunds, Simeon. Hypnosis: Key to Psychic Powers. London: Aquarian Press, 1968.

———. Hypnotism and the Supernormal. Hollywood, Calif.: Wilshire Book Co., 1968.

———. The Psychic Power of Hypnosis. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1968.

———. Spiritualism: A Critical Study. London: Aquarian Press, 1966.

Edwards, Frank (Allyn) (1908–1967)

Journalist, broadcaster, and author who publicized anomalous mysteries, bizarre events, and flying saucers (UFOs). Born August 4, 1908, in Mattoon, Illinois, Edwards became a golf professional and then a technical adviser in a shipyard before beginning a radio career with KDKA in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, in 1924. Starting in 1925 he worked for WHAS and WLAP in Louisville, Kentucky. He was a news analyst for the Mutual Broadcasting System from 1942 to 1952. Between 1949 and 1954 he was a White House correspondent. From 1955 to 1959 and from 1961 to 1962 he was a commentator for WTTV in Indianapolis; from 1964, for WXLW; and from 1965, for WLWI-TV. He subsequently lectured at Butler University on broadcast journalism.

In the Radio Daily poll of 1953, he was cited, along with Edward R. Murrow and Lowell Thomas, as one of the nation's top broadcasters. His "Strange to Relate" column was widely syndicated throughout the world, and he was a contributing editor to Fate magazine for a decade beginning in 1957. He was also a member of the Board of Governors of NICAP (National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena) from 1957 until his death on June 23, 1967.

Edwards is most remembered for the many popular books in which he compiled brief accounts of extraordinary and paranormal events. Beginning with Strange World in 1954, he produced a series of popular books featuring short summaries of numerous anomalous occurrences, a format that served him well for the next decade. In the mid-1960s he wrote two popular books on flying saucers that rode the wave of public interest but were considered disasters by the UFO community for their numerous factual errors.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. The Emergence of a Phenomenon: UFOs from the Beginning through 1959. Vol. 2 of The UFO Encyclopedia. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1992.

Edwards, Frank. Flying Saucers Here and Now. New York: Lyle Stuart, 1967.

———. Flying Saucers—Serious Business. New York: Lyle Stuart, 1966.

———. My First Ten Million Sponsors. New York: Ballantine Books, 1956.

———. Strange World. New York: Lyle Stuart, 1964.

———. Stranger Than Science. New York: Lyle Stuart, 1959.

———. Strangest of All. Secaucus, N.J.: Citadel Press, 1958.

Edwards, Harry (1893–1976)

British spiritual healer (born Henry James Edwards on May 29, 1893) who also did much to publicize the subject of spiritual healing. He treated patients directly at his Healing Sanctuary in Britain or on the platform at public meetings, and also by "absent healing" through correspondence.

Edwards was born on May 29, 1893, in Islington, London, and grew up in various sections of the metropolitan area. At the age of 14 he was apprenticed to a printer and his seven years of service were up just in time for him to join the army in 1914. He was sent to India the following year and for a time worked in a construction project in Persia (Iran). While there he had his first experiences as a healer, as he was the one in charge of handing all of the minor work-related injuries. However, even the few medicines he had available led to his gaining a local reputation as a healer of note.

He returned to England in 1921 and established himself as a printer and was actively involved in local politics. In 1936, in the wake of the untimely death of a nephew, he visited a Spiritualist meeting. Years ago he had on one occasion attended such a gathering, but it had made little impression. This time, however, he was intrigued and began to attend a development class from which he emerged as a medium.

He and his wife soon formed a home circle they called the Fellowship of Spiritual Service. Told by a medium that he was to become a healer, he followed instructions to concentrate upon the recovery of the next account of a sick person described to him. It happened to be of a person with tuberculosis who experienced a recovery after Edwards' intervention. Edwards was just becoming known as a healer when World War II began. He joined the Home Guard. His home was destroyed during the bombing of London, and Edwards relocated to Surrey, eventually giving up his printing business and purchasing a large house, Burrows Lea, which became the sight of his Spiritual Healing Sanctuary.

Edwards operated as a Spiritualist healer, and believed that the late Louis Pastuer and Lord Lister worked through him from the spirit world. He was in great demand for the rest of his life and frequently gave lectures and led healing services throughout Great Britain.

He received some two thousand letters daily, many from patients in distant countries. His records indicated close to a 80 percent recovery rate dealing with such diseases as cancer, tuberculosis, arthritis and epilepsy, although, only a minority of these cases were documented to the level required to verify the healing claimed.

Edwards worked closely with physicians. He believed that spiritual healing power passed through him with the assistance of discarnate spirit helpers, and also claimed to have traveled outside his body to visit distant patients. He authored a number of books and published a monthly magazine The Spiritual Healer from his home.

Edwards died December 7, 1976, but his healing work has been continued at his Burrows Lea sanctuary by Joan and Ray Branch, whom he designated as his successors. The Branches have stated that they feel Edwards is still with them in their work of healing. The journal The Spiritual Healer continues publication from the Healer Publishing Co., Ltd., Burrows Lea, Shere, Guildford, Surrey G5 9QG.

Sources:

Branch, Ramus. Harry Edwards: The Life Story of the Great Healer. Burrows Lea, Guildford, Surrey, UK: Healer Publishing, 1982.

Edwards, Harry. The Evidence for Spirit Healing. London: Spiritualist Press, 1952.

———. The Healing Intelligence. New York: Taplinger, 1971.

———. The Science of Spirit Healing. London: Rider and Co., 1945.

———. Spirit Healing. London: Herbert Jenkins, 1960.

———. Thirty Years a Spiritual Healer. London: Herbert Jenkins, 1968.

———. The Truth about Spiritual Healing. London: Spiritualist Press, 1956.

Miller, Paul. Born to Heal. London: Spiritualist Press, 1948.

Eel

The eel, popularly known for the electrical properties of some species, has been credited with many marvelous virtues. If left to die out of the water, its body steeped in strong vinegar and the blood of a vulture, and the whole placed under a dunghill, the composition is said to be able to raise from the dead anything brought to it and give it life as before. It has also been said that anyone who eats the still-warm heart of an eel will be seized with the spirit of prophecy and will predict things to come.

Eels figure in the folklore of many countries. The Egyptians worshiped the eel, which their priests alone had the right to eat. In Polynesian, Melanesian, and Indonesian stories, men are sometimes transformed into eels. In the Philippines, eels were believed to be the souls of the dead. In New Zealand, an eel head was eaten to cure toothache. In other countries, eel skins were laid on wounds to heal them. In the United States, there was a folk tradition that eels eat human flesh, and some fishermen were reputed to have caught large quantities of eels with human bait.

In the eighteenth century, magic eels were made of flour and the juice of mutton. There is an anecdote told by William of Malmesbury about a dean of the church of Elgin, in the county of Moray in Scotland, who, having refused to cede his church to some pious monks, was changed, with all his canons, into eels, which the brother cook made into a stew.

Egg, Orphean

The cosmic doctrine of the legendary Greek hero Orpheus, who claimed that "God, the uncreated and incomprehensible Being, created all things; the ether proceeded from him; from this the unshapely chaos and the dark night arose, which at first covered all things. The unshapen mass was formed into the shape of an egg, from which all things have proceeded."

According to this belief, the whole universe has the form of an egg, and everything in it strives to attain the same form. The Orphean concept of a universal soul permeating all nature has something in common with the doctrines of animal magnetism and other pantheistic beliefs.

Eglamour of Artoys, Sir

An English magic legend of medieval French origin. The story tells of the winning of Christabell by Eglamour. Christabell's father agrees to their union if Eglamour will fulfill three tasks. He must conquer the giant Sir Maroke, bring from a distant land the head of an enormous boar, and kill a powerful dragon that has been devastating the country around Rome. In these adventures he is successful, but is kept in Rome by illness. In the meantime, Christabell has given birth to a son and is banished by her angry father. Her son is stolen from her by a griffin and taken to Israel, where he is adopted by the king and named Degrabell.

Many years afterward, Eglamour and Degrabell meet in a tournament for the hand of Christabell. Eglamour is successful, and eventually their identities are revealed. Eglamour and Christabell are married and return to their native country with their son.

Versions of this legend survived in the English ballad of Sir Lionel (Child No. 18) and in modern times in the American ballad "Old Bangham." It has been suggested that the conquest of the giant boar has an ancient origin in the Hindu myth of Lord Vishnu in the form of the gigantic boar Vahara, who created the mighty Himalayan mountain range in his battle with a demon.

Eglinton, William (1858–1933)

Famous British medium who convinced statesman W. E. Gladstone of the reality of psychic phenomena. Eglinton was born in Islington, London, July 10, 1858, and showed no sign of psychic power in his boyhood. He first heard of Spiritualism in February 1874 at a debate in the Hall of Science, London, between a Dr. Sexton and a Mr. Foote.

Moved by curiosity, Eglinton's father formed a home circle. For seven or eight evenings there were no manifestations, and William expressed his feelings by placing upon the door of the séance room large cards with the sarcastic inscription, "There are lunatics confined here; they will be shortly let loose; highly dangerous!" His father was highly offended and told him to either join the circle or leave the house during the investigation. He elected to join the circle and sat down at the table "determined that if anything happened I would put a stop to it. Something did happen, but I was powerless to prevent it." The table became animated and answered questions intelligently.

The evening following the séance, William himself passed into trance for the first time, and in a few months' time very strong phenomena developed under the guidance of a spirit calling himself "Joey Sandy." Eighteen months later another guide, "Ernest," appeared, and very good materializations were obtained in moonlight.

The news of Eglinton's powers soon spread. He was besieged with so many requests for séances that he gave up his job in a printing firm and became a professional medium. The earliest record of his séances was published in The Medium for September 1875. At the end of the year, several séances were given to the Dalston Association of Spiritualists, which later elected him an honorary member.

Many eminent men of the day attended his later sittings at the Brixton Psychological Society and at the British National Association of Spiritualists at 38 Great Russell St., Bloomsbury, London. These were the so-called Blackburn séances, three series of 12 sittings each, Eglinton being one of the first mediums engaged. They were made possible by the generosity of Charles Blackburn of Manchester and represented the beginnings of organized psychical research.

The sittings were mostly held in light, which greatly impressed the early observers of his work. It was also noted that from the time he turned professional until 1883 he never gave a séance in his own rooms and complied with all conditions of control, his hands restricted by his sleeves being sewn to his knees or behind his back to his coat.

His first levitation is described by Archdeacon Thomas Colley in The Spiritualist, June 2, 1876:

"The medium was next entranced and carried by invisible power over the table several times, the heels of his boots being made to touch the head of our medical friend [Dr. Malcolm]. Then he was taken to the further end of the dining room, and finally, after being tilted about as a thing of no weight whatever, was deposited quietly in his chair."

The general impression created by his power is conveyed in the Western Morning News of July 28, 1876: "If Mr. Eglinton is a conjurer he is undoubtedly one of the cleverest who ever lived. Maskelyne and Cook are not a patch upon Mr. Eglinton. The Egyptian Hall exposure of Spiritualism is mere child's play compared with what we witnessed." The Daily Telegraph reported on October 10, 1876, that the Scientific Research Committee of the British National Association of Spiritualists had obtained direct spirit writing under absolute test conditions through the membership of Eglinton.

Marvels of Materialization

Among the many remarkable séances for materialization he gave at this time, the most surprising results were obtained during his stay at Malvern as the guest of a Dr. and Mrs. Nichols. In a written account of the séances Nichols observes:

"All our séances are held under test conditions. They are held in a small upper room in my own house, with its one door locked, and its one window, thirty feet from the ground, fastened. The number of persons present never exceeds six, all of whom I know intimately. I know pretty accurately what can be done by sleight-of-hand, ventriloquism, palmistry or otherwise."

He sums up his experiences thus:

"Four times I have seen a white-robed form standing by Willie Eglinton. I have seen "Joey" make yards of muslin. I have seen him standing beside his medium, and I have heard him speak in a brilliantly-lighted room, when Mr. Eglinton was with us and no more entranced than the rest of us. I have seen hands and arms and the face only, and I have seen full forms appear and disappear. I have seen a tall man appear and after many minutes with us, and in good light, I have seen him gradually sink down and become invisible, all but a few inches of form, and then that seemed to snap out. I have seen a full form dissolve and leave the drapery suspended as if held up by a hand; and I have seen the form shrink away to nothing visible and leave the garments lying about the floor. These not long after disappeared."

Nichols's descriptions of Eglinton's open-air materializations in his garden, related in the appendix to Epes Sargent's The Scientific Basis of Spiritualism (1881), are among the most extraordinary accounts in the history of Spiritualism. In one he relates that,

"Mr. Eglinton lay on a garden bench in plain sight. We saw the bodies of four visitors form themselves from a cloud of white vapour and then walk about, robed all in purest white, upon the lawn where no deception was possible. One of them walked quite around us, as we sat in our chairs on the grass, talking as familiarly as any friend . . . [and] took my hat from my head, put it on his own, and walked off with it where the medium was lying; then he came and put it on my head again; then walked across the lawn and up a gravel walk to the foot of the balcony and talked with Mrs. Nichols. After a brief conversation he returned to the medium and gradually faded from sight."

According to this narrative, the medium was constantly in sight, no confederate could have come over the wall without being seen or heard, and the maximum distance of the materialized spirit from the medium was 66 feet in the direct line, whereas altogether about 400 feet were covered by the spirit from the time he first left the medium to his final return.

The accounts published in the Spiritualist periodicals of the time also describe Eglinton's one-armed control "Abdullah" who on occasion was reported to have materialized. He was adorned with amazingly rich jewels, which he allowed to be examined. He was bedecked with precious stones, rings, crosses, and clusters of rubies that were worth a fortune. A description by John S. Farmer, Eglinton's biographer, of a materialization séance so much agrees with observations of the flow of ectoplasm that it created a strong presumption for Eglinton's genuine psychic powers in many researchers' minds:

"All this time the breathing of the psychic had been increasingly laboured and deep, accompanied at times with groans. Now standing, in full view . . . I saw him, by a quick movement of the fingers, gently draw, apparently from under his morning-coat, the top button of which was fastened, a dingy, white-looking substance. . . . The movement of the fingers was such as to draw it at right angles from him, allowing it to fall and hand by its own weight down his left side. As it emerged from under his coat and fell, it gradually increased in volume until it reached the ground, covering Mr. Eglinton's left leg from the knee downwards, the connecting link between this portion and his side being preserved the whole time. The mass of white material on the ground increased in breadth, and now commenced to pulsate and move up and down, also swaying from side to side, the motor power being underneath the mass of material, and concealed from sight by it. . . . The height increased to three feet, and shortly afterwards, the 'form' quickly and quietly grew to its full stature, carrying the above-mentioned dingy white material with it. . . .

"All this time the link (of the same white appearance as already described) was maintained between the growing 'form' and Mr. Eglinton, who had remained in sight of all of us during the whole operation. The connecting link was either now completely severed, or became so attenuated as to be invisible, and the 'form' [a bearded man of middle age] . . . advanced to Mr. Everitt, shook hands with him, and passed round the circle, treating nearly every one in the same manner . . . then re-approached Mr. Eglinton, who was now partially supported from falling by Mr. Rogers, and, taking the psychic firmly by the shoulders, dragged him into the cabinet."

There is a strange contrast between the foregoing testimonies and Elington's subsequent exposure by Archdeacon Thomas Colley. During a séance in Owen Harris's house, Colley cut a piece of the robe and a piece of the beard of the materialized figure. The pieces fitted to perfection the muslin and beard that he found in the medium's portmanteau. The story of this exposure was published in the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR). Eglinton was in South Africa when the revelation was made public and denied the charge on his return. The Council of the British National Association of Spiritualists ordered an investigation, which, at the end, dismissed the charge on the basis that no direct evidence could be obtained from the accusers. Colley's exposure presaged events yet to come, but before Eglinton's fraudulent ways were decisively known, he presented some dramatic performances.

The most extraordinary phenomenon Eglinton produced was his own teleportation on March 16, 1878, at Mrs. Makdougall Gregory's house, through the ceiling into the room above, an account of which was published in The Spiritualist of March 22, 1878. He followed this with a year of travel. On July 5, 1878, on the invitation of a Dr. Hutchinson, Eglinton left for Cape Town, South Africa. He spent nine months with his host, giving many séances, of which copious notes were made. He studied dentistry in his leisure time and was enrolled in 1879 in England as a duly qualified practitioner.

After his return to England in May 1879, Eglinton produced some interesting results while the guest of Colonel and Mrs. Francis Lean (Florence Marryat) at Bruges, Belgium, in a haunted house, the ghost of which he finally laid to rest.

Shortly after this he received an invitation to visit Sweden. He gave 19 séances in Stockholm, which were attended by many scientific and literary men. Professors Tornebom and Edland, both of them skeptical previously, published a favorable report on his mediumship in the Aftonblad of October 30, 1879. He also gave sittings at Upsala University and then left for Denmark, Germany, and Bohemia. In Munich he was the guest of Gabriel Max, the eminent painter, and furnished the inspiration for his impressive painting Geistesgrüss.

After his return he gave striking séances at Cambridge University under the auspices of the Psychological Society, during which he was handcuffed to one person and held by another. It was in this month that Florence Cook was exposed by Sir George Sitwell and Carl von Buch. The atmosphere was decidedly hostile, and in March 1880 Eglinton again left for the Continent. He was engaged in Leipzig by Baron von Hoffman to give séances to Johann C. F. Zöllner and others connected with the University of Leipzig.

Zöllner was very satisfied with the result of his 25 sittings and intended to publish a book on his experiences, but death intervened. In Vienna Eglinton gave more than 30 séances to Baron Hellenbach.

After traveling again to Munich to carry out an engagement for 12 séances, the 11th of which was marred by some evidence of fraud, Eglinton returned to England. He gave no more professional séances that year, but the Spiritualist press was kept informed by Nichols of the many experiments in direct writing and drawing that were conducted in his house. In February 1881 Eglinton sailed for New York and remained in the United States until the middle of May.

Miracles in India—and a Disaster

In October 1881, following an invitation from J. G. Meugens, a wealthy Indian merchant, Eglinton left for Calcutta. He was apparently very successful in his Indian séances, some of which were held at the residence of the Maharajah Sir Jotendro Johun Tagore and reported in the daily Indian Mirror, but it is noteworthy that with the increase in distance from London there was a proportionate increase in the marvels.

The spirit "postmastership" that Eglinton "established" between London and Calcutta was almost unprecedented in the annals of Spiritualism. According to the narrative of a Mr. Meugens, privately marked sheets of paper were whisked by the spirits to London and returned shortly after to Calcutta with the handwriting of a close friend describing how his room had been suddenly filled with light and how the spirit "Ernest" stood by and waited for the letter to carry it back. It was claimed that this happened on several occasions. Indeed, once Meugens asked that the ring of a Mrs. Fletcher, who was then in Tothill Fields Prison (in Meugens's belief unjustly convicted), be brought to him. The spirits complied. The ring could not be identified, but a few days later the spirits brought a letter in Fletcher's own handwriting telling Meugens that she had sent the ring.

Such accounts of Eglinton's phenomena were so eagerly received that for the period of his stay in Calcutta a new fortnightly journal, similar to the Light, was started to meet the demand. The venture was said to have met with considerable success. Throughout Eglinton's visit to Calcutta, Harry Kellar, the famous conjurer, was also there, giving stage exposures of fraudulent Spiritualism. He issued a challenge to Eglinton in the Indian Daily News for January 13, 1882, and promised an unbiased opinion as to the natural explanations of the phenomena.

An invitation was duly extended. Afterward Kellar publicly stated, "I went as a skeptic, but I must own that I came away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening." He held the medium's left hand and was half levitated with Eglinton. He had no doubt that this phenomenon was genuine and reiterated this conviction in print many years later. But he wavered on endorsing independent slate writing, of which he also obtained a convincing demonstration.

After Meugens left India, Eglinton went to Howran, across the Hooghly River from Calcutta, as the guest of a Colonel and Mrs. Gordon and remained with them for the rest of his stay. He converted Lord William Beresford to Spiritualism and left for England in April 1882.

Eglinton sailed for England on the SS Vega. He claimed that during the voyage he was visited by Koot Hoomi (or Kut Humi). He described this meeting in a letter that was mysteriously transported from the open seas to Bombay and fell into the center of a room where Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, cofounder of the Theosophical Society, held company. The letter was addressed to Mrs. Gordon in Calcutta. Blavatsky wrote some notes on visiting cards and wrapped them up with the letter, which was then transported by the same mysterious agency to Calcutta and dropped from the ceiling in the company of Olcott and the Gordons. It was later claimed that the Mahatma letters were written by Blavatsky, and it appears likely that Eglinton was in concert with her and left a letter, identical to the one written on the ship, with her, and that she made careful arrangements for its mysterious appearance at the appropriate moment. There is indirect proof of this supposition in the fact that J. E. O'Conor, a Theosophist on board ship, unexpectedly asked Eglinton to enclose, as an additional test, a letter from himself to Blavatsky. Eglinton undertook the task. Blavatsky, however, at the time of the alleged delivery of Eglinton's letter, made no communication of O'Conor's note. In excuse she said that O'Conor's letter was private and she did not know whether he wished it to be made public. In further explanation she added that for some unaccountable reason, O'Conor's letter arrived an hour after the one from Eglinton was received.

Eglinton denied that he had met Blavatsky in India at all, but it appears to be a fact that he took many letters of introduction to her and to her colleague, Henry S. Olcott, then president of the society, and that he met Blavatsky in Calcutta. In light of this and considering that the evidence of the manufacture of the Koot Hoomi letters by Blavatsky appears to be strong, the grossness of the fraud seemed clear. He was also accused, in the Proceedings of the SPR (vol. 3, p. 254), of conspiring with Blavatsky.

This highly damaging incident was hardly touched upon in John Farmer's biography. He contented himself "with putting on record the maturer conclusions of Mr. Eglinton with regard to the 'appearance' on board the Vega. He now believes the apparition to have been a spontaneous materialization, of a somewhat unusual order, of someone who called himself 'Koot Hoomi.' "

After his return from India, Eglinton attempted to retire from professional mediumship by entering into partnership with a gentleman in a publishing firm, operating under the name Ross Publishing Company. In August 1883, however, he severed his connection and fell back again on mediumship as a means of living.

The Great Slate-Writing Problem

From 1884 on Eglinton concentrated on slate writing, which he suggested was simply a far easier means of bringing conviction than materializations (and also offered less chance of detection in fraudulent activity). According to biographer Farmer, he sat almost daily for this phenomenon for upward of three years before he obtained any results at all. His slate-writing séances were impressive, as he subjected himself to every test condition posed to him and, in contrast to Henry Slade, remained passive and quiet throughout the performance. As a result of some very successful sittings, W. P. Adshed of Belper, in northern England, offered a challenge of £500 to anyone who was not a medium and could produce the same results under the same conditions.

On October 29, 1884, British Prime Minister W. E. Gladstone had a séance with Eglinton. He obtained answers to his questions, which were privately written on the hostess's own slates, both when the slates were held under the table and when they were laid upon the table in full view of all present, as well as when the slates were locked. Some of the questions were put in Spanish, French, and Greek and answered in the same language. Gladstone was so impressed that soon after he joined the Society for Psychical Research (SPR).

On two occasions in 1884 Eglinton gave public performances from the stage at a meeting of the London Spiritualist Alliance and at a lecture of his own in St. James's Hall, London. Both séances were eminently successful.

In 1885 Eglinton left again for the Continent. In Paris he made the acquaintance of J. Tissot, the celebrated French genre painter, and in a materialization séance on May 20 completely convinced him of spirit return. Tissot's mezzotint Apparition Medianimique, later hung at the offices of the London Spiritualist Alliance, was an idealized conception of his experience.

During Eglinton's stay in Paris, Charles Richet had some sittings with him. He obtained what was for him further verification of Eglinton's powers on a subsequent visit to London in company with a Dr. Myers, brother of F. W. H. Myers.

Richet nevertheless did not attribute much importance to his slate-writing experiences, as revealed in his book Thirty Years of Psychical Research (1923):

"I drew a design on the slate so that Eglinton could not see the drawing. The slate was reversed and a small piece of chalk placed on it. I took the slate in my hand and without letting it go, held it under the table, Eglinton holding the other end of the slate. After two or three minutes a curious facsimile of my sketch was reproduced, but I think that a skillful illusionist could have done as much."

Yet Richet admitted, in the same book, that "Eglinton was a very powerful medium, and though he has been suspected of fraud, he was able, finally, to prove that the allegations of his enemies were calumnies."

Alfred Russel Wallace was convinced of the genuineness of Eglinton's materializations. He had seen his phantom "Abdullah" in a private house while Eglinton was also visible, sitting in evening dress in an armchair. A careful search was made, but no paraphernalia were discovered.

From Paris Eglinton left for Vienna, where he met Baron du Prel, who published some of his experiences under the title A Problem for Conjurers, in which he concludes: "Through Eglinton I have received the proof that [Johann] Zöllner, who was the first in Germany to have courage to speak of these slate writings, discovered a grand truth and that all his opponents who have neither read nor seen anything in this domain are in the wrong."

In 1886 a bitter fight over slate writing was waged between the SPR and Spiritualists in general. S. T. Davey, an associate of the SPR and also an amateur conjurer, was most impressed by Eglinton's performances, but soon became suspicious. He studied the subject from the point of view of conjuring and, placing himself in the hands of the SPR, came out, with Richard Hodgson as manager, under an assumed name as a medium. Owing to the ensuing sensation caused by Davey's performances, Eleanor Sidgwick, writing in the Journal of the SPR, claimed "no hesitation in attributing the performances of Eglinton to clever conjuring."

In Davey's account of his actions, which was published in the SPR's Proceedings, he told the story of about 20 sittings in which he rivaled the feats of professional slate writers. He produced messages on the sitters' own slates and in screwed, sealed, and locked double slates; wrote them in colors; answered questions in various languages; performed successful reading tests; produced written numbers on mental request; made a tumbler walk across the table in strong gaslight; floated music boxes; and produced materialized figures in a séance room.

Davey's explanation of his slate-writing feats was that he either substituted prepared slates with a message already written or wrote the message himself noiselessly under the table by means of a fragment of pencil fixed in a thimble that he slipped on his finger. For many of his phenomena, however, he failed to furnish a satisfactory explanation. Spiritualists took this as a confirmation of their belief that Davey himself was a renegade medium.

Alfred Russel Wallace, who responded to Davey in the 1891 issue of the Journal of the SPR, writes, "Unless all can be so explained, many of us will be confirmed in our belief that Mr. Davey was really a medium as well as a conjurer, and that in imputing all his performances to trick he was deceiving the society and the public."

In the same volume of the Proceedings in which the Davey report was published, Carvill Lewis reported that, by purposely turning his head away and pretending to divert his attention, he heard Eglinton write on a slate and occasionally saw the movements of the tendons of the wrist in the act of writing. The SPR also requested "Professor Hoffmann" (well-known conjurer Angelo J. Lewis) to report in his professional capacity on Eglinton's performances. He conducted 12 sittings and studied the reports furnished by others, concluding that, although many of the circumstances suggested occasional trickery,

". . . on the other hand, I do not believe the cleverest conjurer could, under the same conditions, use trickery in the wholesale way necessary to produce all these phenomena without exposing himself to constant risk of detection. If conjuring were the only explanation of the slate-writing phenomena, I should certainly have expected that their secret would long since have become public property."

As a result of the bitter controversy that arose over the accusations of the SPR, many Spiritualists resigned their membership. Eglinton invited testimonies from his sitters. They came forth in abundance. Eglinton had given nearly 3,500 sittings up to this period, and only three claims of fraud were made against him. Then assistant secretary to the SPR, Edward T. Bennett, in his Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism (1906), states: "What I may call the Eglinton problem was, at least so it seems to me, left not only in an incomplete, but in an unsatisfactory state after the death of Mr. S. T. Davey."

In 1887 Eglinton visited Russia and gave a séance for Emperor Alexander III. Spiritualist leader Alexander Aksakof had opportunities for repeated experiments, and he also maintained that Eglinton possessed great and genuine psychic powers. After returning from Russia, Eglinton married and started a new career. He abandoned mediumship and Spiritualism for journalism. He became editor of well-known publications such as The New Age and The Tatler. In 1890 he traveled in South Africa and indulged a passion for game shooting, acquiring a large private collection of trophies. In 1895 he was vice-chairman of the Anglo-African Writers Club, and he was chairman in 1896. He founded the British and South African Export Gazette, which he also edited, and was proprietor of the British Export Gazette. As a notable journalist his former association with mediumship was never referred to, and he achieved the distinction of entry in the prestigious publication Who's Who, where his recreations were listed as shooting, yachting, golf, and croquet. He died March 10, 1933.

Sources:

Farmer, John S. Twixt Two Worlds. London, 1886.

Marryat, Florence. There Is No Death. New York: John W. Lovell, 1891. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Egregore

A folklore term denoting a collective ritual designed to accumulate group magical energy for successful hunting, rainmaking, or planting of crops. Occultists have used the term to denote an astral entity evoked by group energies.

EGYPT

To people throughout history, Egypt has seemed the very birthplace of magic. In Egypt the peoples of the ancient world found a magical system more sophisticated than any other that was known. The emphasis on death and the care of the human corpse, central to Egyptian religion, seemed to other cultures to be suggestive of magic practice. As with all other systems, the Egyptians' magic consisted of two different kinds: that which was supposed to benefit either the living or the dead; and, that which has been known throughout the ages as black magic or necromancy.

The contents of the Westcar Papyrus show that as early as the fourth dynasty the working of magic was a recognized art in Egypt, while evidence suggests Egyptian magic practice began in neolithic times. Egyptians used magic for numerous purposes, including exorcizing storms and protecting themselves and their loved ones against wild beasts, poison, disease, wounds, and the ghosts of the dead. Throughout the centuries, the practice varied considerably evan as the principal means of operation remained the same: amulets; spells; magic books, pictures, and formulas; magical names and ceremonies; and the general apparatus of the occult sciences. The use of amulets was one of the most potent methods of guarding against any misfortune.

Not all ornaments or objects discovered on the mummy related to magical potency. These were frequently the possession of the ka or double, necessary to its comfort in a future existence. The small crowns, scepters, and emblems of Osiris, usually done in glazed earthenware or pottery, were placed beside the dead person. This ensured that he could wear them when he became one with the god Osiris, and consequently a king. The scarab, made in the likeness of a scarabaeus beetle, symbolized resurrection. The dad symbolized the human skeleton, and, possibly, the dead and dismembered Osiris. This was thought to have an influence on the restoration of the deceased. The uza, or eye, signified the health necessary to the dead person's soul.

The so-called palettes, originally thought to be used for the mixing of paint, are now known to have been amulets inscribed with words of power and placed on the breasts of the dead in neolithic times. The menat was worn, or held, with the sistrum (a musical instrument) by gods, kings, and priests and was supposed to bring joy and health to the wearer. It represented the vigor of the two sexes.

The simplest type of magic spell used in Egypt was that in which the exorcist threatened the evil principle, or assured it that he could injure it. In general, the magician requested the assistance of the gods, or pretended that he was a god. Invocations, when written, were usually accompanied by a note to the effect that the formula had once been employed successfully by a god—perhaps by a deified priest.

An incomprehensible and mysterious jargon was employed that was supposed to conceal the name of a certain deity. This deity was thus compelled to do the will of the sorcerer. These gods were usually the gods of foreign nations. The invocations themselves appear to be attempts at various foreign idioms, likely employed because they sounded more mysterious than the native speech. Great stress was laid upon the proper pronunciation of these names. Mispronunciation was accountable for failure in all cases. The Book of the Dead contains many such "words of power." These were intended to assist the dead in their journey in the underworld of Amenti.

People believed that all supernatural beings, good and evil, possessed a hidden name. If a person knew the name he could compel that being to do his will. The name was as much a part of the man as his body or soul. The traveler through Amenti not only had to tell the divine gods their names. They also had to prove that he knew the names of a number of the supposedly inanimate objects in the dreary underworld.

Many books of magic in Egypt contained spells and other formulas for exorcism and necromantic practice. The priestly caste who compiled those necromantic works was known as Kerheb, or "scribes of the divine writings" Even the sons of pharaohs did not disdain to enter their ranks.

The Ritual of Egyptian Magic

The ritual of Egyptian magic possessed many strong similarities to the ceremonial practices of other systems and countries. Wax figures were used to represent the bodies of persons to be bewitched or harmed. Models of all kinds indicated the belief that the physical force directed against them might injure the person or animal they represented.

But the principal rite in which ceremonial magic was employed was the very elaborate one of mummification. As each bandage was laid in its exact position, certain words of power were uttered that were supposed to help preserve the part swathed. After evisceration, the priest uttered an invocation to the deceased and then took a vase of liquid containing ten perfumes. He smeared the perfumed liquid twice over the body, head to foot, taking special care to anoint the head thoroughly. The internal organs were then placed on the body, and the backbone immersed in holy oil, supposed to be an emanation from the gods Shu and Seb. Certain precious stones were then laid on the mummy, each of which with magical significance. Crystal, for instance, lightened his face; and cornelian strengthened his steps.

A priest who personified the jackal-headed god Anubis then advanced, performed certain symbolic ceremonies on the head of the mummy, and laid certain bandages upon it. After a further anointing with oil the deceased was declared to have "received his head." The mummy's left hand was filled with 36 substances used in embalming, symbolic of the 36 forms of the god Osiris. The body was then rubbed with holy oil, the toes wrapped in linen, and after an appropriate address the ceremony was completed.

Dreams

The art of procuring dreams and their interpretation was widely practiced in Egypt. The Egyptian magician procured dreams for his clients by drawing magic pictures and reciting magic words. The following formulas for producing a dream are taken from British Museum Papyrus, no. 122, lines 64ff and 359ff:

"To obtain a vision from the god Bes: Make a drawing of Bes, as shewn below, on your left hand, and envelope your hand in a strip of black cloth that has been consecrated to Isis and lie down to sleep without speaking a word, even in answer to a question. Wind the remainder of the cloth round your neck. The ink with which you write must be composed of the blood of a cow, the blood of a white dove, fresh frankincense, myrrh, black writing ink, cinnabar, mulberry juice, rain-water, and the juice of wormwood and vetch. With this write your petition before the setting sun, saying, 'Send the truthful seer out of the holy shrine, I beseech thee Lampsuer, Sumarta, Baribas, Dardalam, Iorlex: O Lord send the sacred deity Anuth, Anuth, Salbana, Chambré, Breith, now, now, quickly, quickly. Come in this very night.'

"To procure dreams: Take a clean linen bag and write upon it the names given below. Fold it up and make it into a lampwick, and set it alight, pouring pure oil over it. The word to be written is this: "Armiuth, Lailamchouch, Arsenophrephren, Phtha, Archentechtha." Then in the evening, when you are going to bed, which you must do without touching food (or, pure from all defilement), do thus: Approach the lamp and repeat seven times the formula given below: then extinguish it and lie down to sleep. The formula is this: "Sachmu. . .epaema Ligotereench: the Aeon, the Thunderer, Thou that hast swallowed the snake and dost exhaust the moon, and dost raise up the orb of the sun in his season, Chthetho is the name; I require, O lords of the gods, Seth, Chreps, give me the information that I desire."

Medical Magic

Magic played a big part in Egyptian medicine. On this point, A. Wiedemann stated:

"The Egyptians were not great physicians: their methods were purely empirical and their remedies of very doubtful value, but the riskiness of their practice arose chiefly from their utter inability to diagnose because of their ignorance of anatomy. That the popular respect for the human body was great we may gather from the fact that the Paraskhistai who opened the body for embalmment were persecuted and stoned as having committed a sinful although necessary deed. The prescribed operations in preparing a body for embalmment were never departed from, and taught but little anatomy, so that until Greek times the Egyptians had only the most imperfect and inaccurate ideas of the human organism. They understood nothing about most internal diseases, and especially nothing about diseases of the brain, never suspecting them to be the result of organic changes, but assuming them to be caused by demons who had entered into the sick. Under these circumstances medicines might be used to cause the disappearance of the symptoms, but the cure was the expulsion of the demon. Hence the Egyptian physician must also practise magic.

"According to late accounts, his functions were comparatively simple, for the human body had been divided into thirty-six parts, each presided over by a certain demon, and it sufficed to invoke the demon of the part affected in order to bring about its cure—a view of matters fundamentally Egyptian. In the Book of the Dead we find that different divinities were responsible for the well-being of the bodies of the blessed; thus Nu had charge of the hair, Râ of the face, Hathor of the eyes, Apuat of the ears, Anubis of the lips, while Thoth was guardian of all parts of the body together. This doctrine was subsequently applied to the living body, with the difference that for the great gods named in the Book of the Dead there were substituted as gods of healing the presiding deities of the thirty-six decani, the thirty-six divisions of the Egyptian zodiac, as we learn from the names given to them by Celsus and preserved by Origen. In earlier times it was not so easy to be determined which god was to be invoked, for the selection depended not only on the part affected but also on the illness and symptoms and remedies to be used, etc.

"Several Egyptian medical papyri which have come down to us contain formulas to be spoken against the demons of disease as well as prescriptions for the remedies to be used in specified cases of illness. In papyri of older date these conjurations are comparatively rare, but the further the art of medicine advanced, or rather, receded, the more numerous they became.

"It was not always enough to speak the formulas once; even their repeated recitation might not be successful, and in that case recourse must be had to other expedients: secret passes were made, various rites were performed, the formulas were written upon papyrus, which the sick person had to swallow, etc. . . . But amulets were in general found to be most efficacious, and the personal intervention of a god called up, if necessary, by prayers or sorcery."

Magic Figures

As already confirmed, the Egyptians believed that it was possible to transmit to the image of any person or animal the soul of the being that it represented. The Westcar Papyrus related how a soldier who had fallen in love with a governor's wife was swallowed by a crocodile when bathing, the saurian being a magical replica of a waxen one made by the lady's husband. In the official account of a conspiracy against Rameses III (1200 B.C.E.) the conspirators obtained access to a magical papyrus in the royal library and employed its instructions against the king with disastrous effects to themselves. Others made waxen figures of gods and of the king for the purpose of slaying the latter.

Astrology

The Egyptians were fatalists and believed that a man's destiny was decided before birth. The people therefore had recourse to astrologers. The well-known Egyptologist Sir E. A. Wallis Budge stated:

"In magical papyri we are often told not to perform certain magical ceremonies on such and such days, the idea being that on these days hostile powers will make them to be powerless, and that gods mightier than those to which the petitioner would appeal will be in the ascendant. There have come down to us fortunately, papyri containing copies of the Egyptian calendar, in which each third of every day for three hundred and sixty days of the year is marked lucky or unlucky, and we know from other papyri why certain days were lucky or unlucky, and why others were only partly so."

In the life of Alexander the Great by Pseudo-Callisthenes it is noted that the Egyptians were skilled in the art of casting horoscopes. Nectanebus had a tablet made of gold and silver and acacia wood, with three belts attached to it, just for that. Zeus was on the outer belt with the 36 decani surrounding him; representations of the 12 signs of the zodiac were on the second; and the third the sun and moon were on the third. He set the tablet on a tripod, and emptied out of a small box with models of the seven stars that were in the belts, and put eight precious stones into the middle belt. He arranged these in the places where he figured the depicted planets would be at the time of the birth of Olympias. He then told her fortune from them.

It should be noted that the use of the horoscope is much older than the time of Alexander the Great. A Greek horoscope in the British Museum is attached to "an introductory letter from some master of the art of astrology to his pupil, named Hermon, urging him to be very exact and careful in his application of the laws which the ancient Egyptians, with their laborious devotion to the art, had discovered and handed down to posterity."

Ghosts

The notion that the ka or double of man wandered about after death added to the Egyptian belief in ghosts. E. A. Wallis Budge observed as follows:

"According to them a man consisted of a physical body, a shadow, a double, a soul, a heart, a spirit called the khu, a power, a name, and a spiritual body. When the body died the shadow departed from it, and could only be brought back to it by the performance of a mystical ceremony; the double lived in the tomb with the body, and was there visited by the soul whose habitation was in heaven. The soul was, from one aspect, a material thing, and like the ka, or double, was believed to partake of the funeral offerings which were brought to the tomb; one of the chief objects of sepulchral offerings of meat and drink was to keep the double in the tomb and to do away with the necessity of its wandering about outside the tomb in search of food. It is clear from many texts that, unless the double was supplied with sufficient food, it would wander from the tomb and eat any kind of offal and drink any kind of dirty water which it might find in its path. But besides the shadow, and the double, and the soul, the spirit of the deceased, which usually had its abode in heaven, was sometimes to be found in the tomb. There is, however, good reason for stating that the immortal part of man which lived in the tomb and had its special abode in the statue of the deceased was the 'double.' This is proved by the fact that a special part of the tomb was reserved for the ka, or double, which was called the 'house of the ka,' and that a priest, called the 'priest of the ka,' was specially appointed to minister the therein."

Esoteric Knowledge of the Priesthood

The esoteric knowledge of the Egyptian priesthood is believed to have been similar to the one for which the Indian medicine man is credited, with the addition of a philosophy close to that of ancient India. W. H. Davenport Adams observed as follows:

"To impose upon the common people, the priesthood professed to lead lives of peculiar sanctity. They despised the outer senses, as sources of evil and temptation. They kept themselves apart from the profanium vulgus, and, says Iamblicus, 'occupied themselves only with the knowledge of God, of themselves, and of wisdom; they desired no vain honours in their sacred practice, and never yielded to the influence of the imagination.' Therefore they formed a world within a world, fenced round by a singular awe and wonder, apparently abstracted from the things of earth, and devoted to the constant contemplation of divine mysteries. They admitted few strangers into their order, and wrapt up their doctrines in a hieroglyphical language, which was only intelligible to the initiated. To these various precautions was added the solemnity of a terrible oath, whose breach was invariably punished with death.

"The Egyptian priests preserved the remaining relics of the former wisdom of nature. These were not imparted as the sciences are, in our age, but to all appearances they were neither learned nor taught; but as a reflection of the old revelations of nature, the perception must arise like an inspiration in the scholar's mind. From this cause appear to have arisen those numerous preparations and purifications the severity of which deterred many from initiation into the Egyptian priesthood; in fact, not infrequently resulted in the scholar's death. Long fasting, and the greatest abstinence, appear to have been particularly necessary: besides this, the body was rendered insensible through great exertions, and even through voluntary inflicted pain, and therefore open to the influence of the mind. The imagination was excited by representations of the mysteries; and the inner sense was more impressed by the whole than—as is the case with us—instructed by an explanation of simple facts. In this manner the dead body of science was not given over to the initiated, and left to chance whether it would become animated or not, but the living soul of wisdom was breathed into them.

"From this fact, that the contents of the mysteries were rather revealed than taught—were received more from inward inspiration and mental intoxication, than outwardly through endless teaching, it was necessary to conceal them from the mass of the people."

Commenting on the same subject the egyptologist W. Schubart stated:

"The way to every innovation was closed, and outward knowledge and science could certainly not rise to a high degree of external perfection. . .They imparted their secret and divine sciences to no one who did not belong to their caste, and it was long impossible for foreigners to learn anything; it was only in later times that a few strangers were permitted to enter the initiation after many severe preparations and trials. Besides this, their functions were hereditary, and the son followed the footsteps of his father. . .for to the uninitiated the entrance was forbidden, and the initiated kept their vows."

Modern Views of Egyptian Magic

Beginning in the nineteenth century, scholarship removed much of the mystery surrounding ancient Egyptian magic. It also made magic an object of increasing occult and magic exploration. Modern work on Egypt really began in 1822, after J. F. Champollion (1790–1832) successfully deciphered the hieroglyphics through his work on the Rosetta Stone, opening the way to understanding ancient Egyptian inscriptions on monuments and papyrus. Champollion's basic work was supplemented by other philologists including, Richard Lepsius (1810–1884), Heinrich Brugsch (1827–1894), and Adolf Erman (1854–1916). Other renowned egyptologists included Sir Gaston Maspero (1846–1916), Sir E. A. Wallis Budge (1857–1934), J. H. Breasted (1865–1935), and Sir William Flinder Petrie (1853–1942). Popular interest in ancient Egypt rose with the discovery and excavation of the tomb of Tutankhamun (d. ca. 1352 B.C.E.) by Lord Carnarvon and Howard Carter. (See also Tutankhamun Curse)

Modern Egyptian magical practice was largely initiated by Aleister Crowley who in 1904 in Cairo received a supposedly channeled book, The Book of the Law. He later proclaimed its reception as the beginning of a new era, the Aeon of Horus, the Crowned and Conquering Child. Since that time, ritual magicians have been poring over the Western translations of Egyptian texts to ferret out their modern implications. The Church of Eternal Source, headquartered in Burbank, California, is one prominent revivalist Egyptian magic religion, founded in the 1960s. The Rosicrucian Society has constructed an elaborate museum, the Rosicrucian Egyptian Museum, in San Jose, California, also building on the ongiong fascination with the aura and magic of ancient Egypt. The elaborate museum and gardens also embodies sections that display ancient writing tablets from Babylonia and Assyria.

Much speculation has also revolved around the Great Pyramid of Giza (built in the reign of Cheops of the Fourth Dynasty). Ever since Col. Howard Vyse forced an entry into the pyramid and took measurements, an eccentric school of pyramidology focused upon speculation concerning pyramids in general, and Egyptian pyramids in particular has grown up. It drew the most interest in its association of various pyramid measurements with biblical prophecies (see pyramids and pyramidology). Other writers, most recently the devotees of the ancient astronauts hypothesis, have attempted to perpetuate the myth that the remarkable engineering achievements of pyramid building were the product of a long-lost occult secret (or ancient science) by which great blocks of stone could be levitated into position by the magical power of sound vibration. Such romantic speculations can be made only by ignoring archaeological and hieroglyphical evidence. The restoration work being completed on the Great Pyramids at the end of the 1990s continued to spark the interest of people all over the world. Tourism was hampered somewhat with threats of terrorism on foreign, particularly American, visitors.

Modern day Egypt continues to reveal an interest in the mystical. On April 2, 1968, two Moslem workers thought they saw a nun in white standing near the dome of St. Mary's Church of Zeitoun, one of Cairo's poorer districts. The church was a Coptic rite (a Middle Eastern rite of Roman Catholicism) testimony to the Christian converts in the midst of the Moslem country. The apparitions continued throughout April and May of that year, the brilliant figure radiating out of light over the dome of the church, as well as being visible in front of the church, walking on the roof and saluting the workers—often offering the sign of blessings on them. The apparitions declined to only a dozen in 1969, a few less in 1970, and disappearing altogether by 1971. These appearances were witnessed by thousands of people, both Christian and Moslem. The phenomenon was even photographed. According to Arthur and Joyce Berger in their 1991 Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research, "The spectacular event is of enormous interest to parapsychology as an evidential case. There is ample reason to think that the apparition was seen by people numbering in the hundreds of thousands. The impressive photographs taken of the figure suggest an authentic phenomenon." The story of St. Mary's Church indicated that was built in 1925 due to a dream in which Mary appeared and requested it. In another dream she reportedly had promised to return to the church. While Catholics believe it to be "simply" a miracle, some noted parapsychologists offered another explanation. They thought that perhaps the appearances were thought-forms physically objectified by crowds who knew her promise. That it happened, too, in light of Joseph and Mary fleeing with the infant Jesus away from the slaughter ordered by King Herod, right to the same place, adds further to the idea that the energy of the people actually created the phenomenon. The theory continues to be investigated.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Breasted, James. A History of Egypt: From the Earliest Times to the Persian Conquest. New York: Charles S. Scribner's Sons, 1919.

Brunton, Paul. A Search in Secret Egypt. London, 1935. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

Budge, E. A. Wallis. The Book of the Dead. London, 1898. Reprint, New York: Dover, 1967. Reprint, New York: Causeway, 1974.

———. Egyptian Magic. London, 1899.

———. The Gods of the Egyptians. 2 vols. London, 1898.

———. A History of Egypt. 8 vols. London, 1902. 4 vols. Reprint, The Netherlands: Anthropological Publications.

———. The Mummy. London, 1925.

de Camp, Sprague. The Ancient Engineers. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1960. Reprint, New York: Ballantine, 1974.

Erman, Adolf. Life in Ancient Egypt. London, 1894. Reprint, New York: Dover, 1971.

Ghalioungui, Paul. The House of Life: Magic and Medical Sciences in Ancient Egypt. Rev. ed., New York: Wittenborn, 1975.

Hornung, Erik. Conceptions of God in Ancient Egypt: The One and the Many. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1982.

Knight, Alfred E. Amentet: An Account of the Gods, Amulets and Scarabs of the Ancient Egyptians. London: Longmans, Green, 1915.

Massey, Gerald. Ancient Egypt, the Light of the World. 2 vols. London, 1907. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1974.

Rosicrucian Society. Rosicrucian Egyptian Museum, 2000. http://www.rosicrucian.org/. June 26, 2000.

Seiss, Joseph. The Great Pyramid: A Miracle in Stone. Blauvelt, N.Y.: Multimedia (Steiner Books), 1972.

Spence, Lewis. Mysteries of Egypt. London, 1929. Reprint, Baluvelt, N.Y.: Multimedia (Steiner Books), 1972.

Tompkins, Peter. Secrets of the Great Pyramid. New York: Harper & Row, 1971.

EHE See Exceptional Human Experience

Ehrenberg, Wolfgang (1909–)

Chemist and lecturer on atomic physics with special interest in parapsychology. Ehrenberg was born January 8, 1909, in Munich, Germany. He attended the University of Munich and joined the teaching staff following his graduation in 1936. He became an industrial consultant and researcher in the fields of chemistry and physics and published many scientific papers on these subjects and on the psychophysics of color. From 1950 to 1953 he was a staff member of the thermonuclear pilot plant at the Argentine Atomic Energy Commission in Bariloche and also lectured on atomic physics in Argentina.

He was a founder of the Psychophysical Society and became its president in 1954. Ehrenberg's interest in parapsychology is reflected in his numerous articles on its relation to physics, many of which were published in Psychophysikalische Zeitschrift.

Ehrenwald, Jan (1900–1988)

Psychotherapist, psychiatrist, and author. Ehrenwald was born March 13, 1900, in Bratislava, Czechoslovakia, and studied at the University of Prague. He moved to England and practiced psychiatry in London. While there, an interest in parapsychology emerged and he joined the Society for Psychical Research. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society of Medicine and became a member of the Royal Medico-Psychological Association. He later moved to the United States, where he became a fellow of the New York Academy of Medicine, a member of the American Academy of Psychotherapists, a charter member of the Parapsychological Association, and a trustee of the research committee of the American Society for Psychical Research.

For 25 years he served as chief of the Psychiatric Outpatient Department of Roosevelt Hospital, New York City. After retirement in 1975, he lectured to audiences in Florida on the psychodynamics of creative individuals and in New York gave talks on professional methods and patient needs at Weschester Institute for Training in Psychoanalysis and Psychotherapy at Mount Kisco. Ehrenwald took a special interest in telepathy in relation to psychoanalysis. He contributed articles on parapsychology to various journals and wrote several books, including Telepathy and Medical Psychology (1948) and The ESP Experience: A Psychiatric Validation (1978). He died June 15, 1988.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Ehrenwald, Jan. Anatomy of Genius: Split Brains and Global Minds. New York: Human Sciences Press, 1984.

———. "An Autobiographical Fragment." In Men and Women of Parapsychology, edited by R. Pilkington. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1987.

———. The ESP Experience: A Psychiatric Validation. New York: Basic Books, 1978.

———. The History of Psychotherapy: From Healing Magic to Encounter. New York: J. Aronson, 1976.

———. New Dimensions in Deep Analysis. New York: Grune & Stratton, 1955.

———. Psychotherapy, Myth and Method. New York: Grune & Stratton, 1966.

———. Telepathy and Medical Psychology. New York: W. W. Norton, 1948.

Eikerenkoetter II, Frederick I. (1935–)

Popularly known as "Rev. Ike," a metaphysical healing and prosperity consciousness teacher in the African American community. Rev. Ike was born June 1, 1935, in Ridgeland, South Carolina, and as a young man became a Baptist minister. After graduation from the American Bible College in Chicago in 1956 he served two years in the U.S. Army chaplain's corps. In 1958 he founded the United Church of Christ for All People but over the next few years came to the conclusion that the over-emphasis on other worldly rewards was wrong and began to search for a way to help parishioners, many of whom where quite poor, in the present world.

The answer to Eikerenkoetter's quest came from New Thought and especially from their understanding that healing and prosperity came from changing one's mental attitude. He moved to Boston in 1964 and open a Miracle Temple. Without closing work in Boston, he moved to New York City in 1966, and in 1969 he purchased a headquarters for his church, the United Church and Science of Living Institute and its outreach structure, the United Christian Evangelistic Association.

He developed a radio ministry and during the 1970s was on more than 80 stations nationwide. Along with Johnnie Coleman of Chicago, he became the leading voice of New Thought within the African American community nationally and developed strong support outside of the community. He became a controversial figure for advocating that members of the Black community spend their tie in changing their consciousness rather than concentrating upon social reform. The preacher was often a popular target of the press for his presentation of metaphysical affirmations in highly quotable, phrases, which his audience could easily remember.

Sources:

Eikerenkoetter, Frederick. Reverend Ike's Secrets of Health, Happiness, and Prosperity—For You. New York: Reverend Ike Prayer Tower, n.d.

Martin, William. "This Man Says He's the Divine Sweetheart of the Universe." Esquire (June 1974): 76–78, 140–43.

Eisenbud, Jule (1908–1999)

Physician, psychiatrist, and parapsychologist. Eisenbud was born November 20, 1908, in New York, New York, and studied at Columbia College (B.A., 1929), Columbia College of Physicians and Surgeons (M.D., 1934), and Columbia University (D.Med.Sc., 1939). In 1950 he became a professor of psychiatry at the University of Colorado Medical School and an attending psychiatrist at the U.S. Veterans Administration Hospital in Denver.

Eisenbud was a charter member of the Parapsychological Association and wrote numerous articles on psychiatry and psychoanalysis based on his experiments on telepathy and the psi faculty. His first paper on a parapsychological subject led to a move (unsuccessful) to have him expelled from the New York Psychoanalytic Society. He attracted even more attention with his book The World of Ted Serios: "Thoughtographic" Studies of an Extraordinary Mind (1967), which deals with his investigation of Ted Serios, a former Chicago bellhop who claimed to imprint mental images on photographic film. His support of Serios provoked a controversy about his claimed abilities that in the end left a variety of unanswered questions amid charges of Serios's producing the effects by fraud.

Eisenbud died on March 10, 1999.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Eisenbud, Jule. Paranormal Foreknowledge: Problems and Perplexities. New York: Human Sciences Press, 1982.

———. "Paranormal Photography." In Handbook of Parapsychology, edited by B. B. Wolman. New York: Van Nostrand Reinhold, 1977.

———. Psi and Psychoanalysis. New York: Grune & Stratton, 1970.

———. "Psychic Photography and Thoughtography." In Psychic Exploration: A Challenge for Science, edited by Edgar D. Mitchell and John White. New York: Putnam, 1974.

———. The World of Ted Serios: "Thoughtographic" Studies of an Extraordinary Mind. 2d ed. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1989.

Ekisha

Term for a Japanese street fortune-teller, usually employing a system of astrology and palmistry.

Ekpe or Egbo

An African secret society that originated in the eighteenth century in Calabar, a section of Nigeria around the Niger River delta. The name means "leopard" and referred to a mysterious forest being that could be seen only by the initiates. On those occasions when the "leopard" was brought to town for ceremonies, the people could not see the animal but could hear its tremendous roar. Whenever an Ekpe day was announced, slaves, women, and children would remove themselves from the area of the ceremony, as the messenger of Ekpe, armed with a heavy whip, went through the village and lashed everyone he encountered.

The society was divided into eleven grades, of which the first three were not open to slaves. Members, as a rule, bought themselves into the higher grades in their turn, and the money thus obtained was shared among the Nyampa, who formed the inner circle. The king was president of the society under the title of Cyamba. Each grade had its special festival day, on which their Idem or spirit-master exercised complete control.

The Idem was usually a hermit who lived in the distant bush, and when he appeared it was in a fantastic guise of mats and branches that covered him from head to foot, and with a black mask on his face. The principals of the order were linked together by a garb of leaves so gathered up that they seemed to move in a connected mass. Ethnologist L. Froebenius observes:

"The Order of Free Egbos, is said to have originated at the fairs which were held at a great palm-oil market in the interior, midway between Calabar and the Kamerun. As the place became the scene of much disorder, while the European trade made it necessary for the maintenance of public credit that all engagements should be strictly carried out, this institution was formed as a sort of Hanseatic Union under the most influential traders, for the mutual safe-guarding of their interests. Later it acquired the political character of a Vehmgericht or secret tribunal, by bringing within its sphere of action the whole police of the Calabars and the Kamerun. The kings always sought to secure for themselves the Grand-mastership of the Order, since otherwise their authority would sink to a mere shadow. European skippers have frequently found it to their advantage to be enrolled in the lower grades, in order thereby the more easily to recover their debts. A member of the Egbo has the right to claim as his own property the slave of his debtor, wherever he may find him, merely by fastening a yellow strip to his dress or loincloth. Even in the interior of the continent the standing of an Egbo is still respected and feared, and affords one a certain immunity from molestation, such as is absolutely needed for the extensive commercial speculations in Africa.

"In the Kamerun, as a preliminary to their acceptance into the Free Egbos, the young men are sent for a protracted period to the Mokokos, a bush tribe in the interior; with these they live naked in the fields, and only now and then dart out, clad in green leaves, to have a bath in the river. All women, and especially slaves, are prohibited, under heavy penalties, from approaching the forest where they reside. In the Kamerun, it is customary to pay particular honour to a visitor, above all if he be a European, by introducing the Egbo goat, which the people are otherwise seldom allowed to set eyes upon.

"Holman reports that the whole of the Old Calabar district is subject to the rule of the so-called Egbo laws. These are promulgated at a secret Council, the Egbo Assembly, which is held in the 'Palaver-house' erected for this special purpose. In virtue of his sovereign rights, the head-chief presides, under the title of Cyamab, over this assembly. Amongst the members of the Egbo there are different ranks, which must be acquired in their due order, one after the other. Holman quotes Englishmen who state that Europeans have bought themselves into the Egbo, and even into the Yampai, in order to be thus better able to get in their money. He gives the following as the names and prices of the different grades of Egbo:

1 Abungo 125 bars
2 Aboko 75 bars
3 Makairo 440 copper bars
4 Bakimboko 100 bars
5 Yampai 850 copper bars

"To these must be added rum, clothes, membo, etc. The Yampai is the only grade whose members are allowed to sit in Council. The sums paid for the various titles of the Egbo are distributed exclusively amongst the Yampai, who, however, are not limited to a single share, since every Yampai can multiply his title as often as he can purchase shares, and these give him a claim to the receipt of the corresponding quotas from the profits of the whole institution."

The society emerged as a powerful force in nineteenth-century Calabar society and is still quite strong, though it must now compete with Christianity and a host of new religions for the hearts of the people. Much of the ceremony and belief of the society remains a secret kept from outsiders.

Sources:

Hackett, Rosalind I. J. Religion in Calabar. Berlin: Mouton de Gruyter, 1989.

Elbegast

A dwarf mentioned in the medieval semitraditional saga-cycle Dietrich of Bern. He was friendly toward Dietrich and helped him in his search for the giant Grim.

Elberfeld Horses

The mathematical wonders of the animal world in Elberfeld, Germany. The case was described by E. Clarapède, of Geneva University, as "the most sensational event that has happened in the psychological world."

The discovery of equine mathematical genius was made by William von Osten in 1891. The horse "Kluge Hans" (Clever Hans) was taught to count skittles (pins used in the bowling game of ninepins) by striking with his hoof as many times as there were skittles on the table. Von Osten first pronounced the numbers aloud and later wrote them on a blackboard. The results soon proved to be astonishing. The horse began to perform mathematical operations.

In 1904 von Osten invited cavalry officers to witness his experiments and exhibited the feats of Clever Hans without charge. As a result of the publicity that these performances attracted, scientists began to take an interest in the subject of animal intelligence. A scientific committee headed by C. Stumpf (director of the Institute of Psychology at Berlin University) investigated Clever Hans in 1904 and did not find trickery.

Their report was attacked by Albert Moll, a dogmatic specialist in hypnotism. Moll had visited Elberfeld and, as is often the case with unsympathetic or prejudiced observers, every experiment he made was a failure. He theorized that this proved that the animal could only perform the tasks by noting infinitesimal signs from the trainer or other persons present, and without any firm evidence Moll persuaded Stumpf to change his mind. A second committee reached a more positive conclusion concerning the horse's abilities. Thereafter, although Moll was not on either the first or second investigating committee, the myth of the "Clever Hans Error" of overlooking "unconscious signaling" passed into the psychology textbooks.

This view was reinforced by Stumpf's assistant Oskar Pfungst, who, with the permission of von Osten, conducted his own experiments with the horse. Pfungst virtually took over the horse's training, eliciting any response he desired by movements of his head, eyes, or hands. Eventually the horse paid little attention to its groom or even to its master. Pfungst's publication of his detailed experiments duly "proved" the unconscious signaling theory of Moll and gave scientific credence to the claim that animals cannot think. Even in modern times, Pfungst's work is cited as a model of reliable scientific investigation, although some years after publication of his work Pfungst himself was aware that it was not above criticism. In his book Clever Hans (1911) he writes:

"Someone could say that the horse had only been 'mechanized' and rendered useless for independent thinking by our experiments, and that previously the horse had been able to count, and simply became accustomed in my lessons to the bad habit of following my signals. But Herr von Osten never achieved results without error, as I did in my experiments."

The conclusion that, consciously or unconsciously, Pfungst retrained the horse to fit his own theories seems a likely one.

Von Osten became an irritable recluse, convinced that his lifework had been destroyed. In a newspaper article of August 1904 he states: "In spite of everything one can hardly see in these experiments more than a kind of scholarly jest which has no special value for science or practical life." He died in 1909.

The horse Clever Hans passed to Karl Krall, a jeweler in Elberfeld, who decided to continue von Osten's work and disprove the unconscious signaling theory. In his stables near Wuppertal, Krall taught four more horses: "Muhamed," "Zarif," "Berto," and "Hänschen." The last horse was blind and clearly unable to perceive visual signals but learned to calculate as rapidly as the other horses. Krall also put blinders on the eyes of the others during lessons so that they could only see a blackboard and not their trainer. At times he gave lessons in complete darkness. Krall improved on von Osten's training by introducing a phonetic system for language communication.

The horses not only learned the fundamental mathematical operations of addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division, but after only four months' training they extracted square and cube roots. They answered questions by stamping with their hoofs. To give the number 34, for instance, they struck three times with the left and four times with the right hoof. Krall's book Denkende Tiere (1912) stirred the world of science. Commissions and investigators from all over the world journeyed to the stables. Many scientists persisted in stubborn negations; others went away in awe and wonder. One committee of 24 scientists could not tolerate the suggestion that horses could calculate like men, which would be "subversive of the evolutionary theory." They drew up a document of protest against the facts reported earlier by the investigator Clarapède, although in fact only two of the scientists on the committee had ever seen the horses.

The famous author Maurice Maeterlinck paid a visit. The horse Muhamed, after a formal introduction, phonetically spelled out his name with his hoofs and solved almost instantaneously problems to which even Maeterlinck did not know the answer, refused to give the square root of a chance number that was afterward found to have none, and even expressed thoughts and feelings by spelling. On one occasion Muhamed complained, "The groom struck Hänschen."

Unless one is prepared to discount the evidence of Maeterlinck and the many distinguished scientists who confirmed that the horses could correctly answer questions when the answer was not even known to the inquirer, the "unconscious signaling" theory of Pfungst must be considered unproved. His own detailed experiments with Clever Hans and other animals, however consistent in results, probably proved what he expected them to prove and so cannot be considered impartial or definitive.

There are some interesting aspects about Krall's horses. Sometimes they gave messages that they were tired and would not answer. Sometimes they could not answer quite simple questions, such as the number of individuals present. If uncertain, they made a timid blow with their hoofs, and generally their intelligence and behavior appeared to be on the level of a six- to eight-year-old child.

In the experiments, care was taken to exclude the possibility of mind reading. As a precaution to prevent "unconscious signals," the questions were sometimes asked by telephone, the receiver being hung on the ear of the horse; frequently the problem was written on the blackboard and the horse left alone to solve it. Sometimes the figures were traced with a finger on the back of the animal. It is a curious fact that after six months of schooling, the horses made no further progress. They could only do what they had been taught, and they appeared to do it without any conscious effort.

No satisfactory conclusion was ever reached, although in more recent times experiments have been conducted on communication between human beings and dogs, chimpanzees, gorillas, and dolphins. Where there is a strong and friendly relationship between teacher and animal, the results indicate animal intelligence, although not amenable to formal scientific validation. An interesting development is the attempt to bypass tapping and language codes by establishing direct communication with the animal's mind, as suggested in the work of Barbara Lysedeck in the United States.

The horses of von Osten and Krall were not the first to appear to demonstrate intelligent communication. As early as 1591, in Shropshire, England, a certain Master Banks exhibited a white horse named "Morocco" that communicated by tapping with his hoofs, apparently able to tell how much money was in a spectator's purse. Shakespeare referred to the animal in his play Love's Labour's Lost (act 1, scene 2). It is possible that this particular case was one of fake "mind reading" similar to modern mentalist stage shows, but according to dramatist Ben Jonson, Banks and his horse were later burned at the stake for witchcraft.

In the twentieth century the "mind-reading horse 'Lady Wonder'" was investigated by parapsychologist J. B. Rhine in the winter of 1927–28. The horse gave answers to questions by touching her nose to letter or number blocks and seemed to be most successful when her owner, Claudia Fonda, was near. Rhine concluded that Lady Wonder was responding telepathically. Professional magician Milbourne Christopher believed that the horse was receiving visual cues from Fonda.

At any rate the evidence for the genuineness of the Elberfeld horses is strong, even if opposed by various scientists like Pfungst. Many scientists testified to the reality of the phenomena. Other favorable testimony came from members of the International Society of Animal Psychology.

The psychical researcher Count Cesar De Vesme speculated that the Elberfeld horses may have solved their problems in a mediumistic way, since they often spelled in the reverse order, suggesting mirror-writing, which is a characteristic of automatic scripts. De Vesme did not mean to suggest the intervention of spirits, but something like a manifestation of an equine subliminal self by motor automatism, unhampered by the limitation of the animal brain. Curiously enough, the system of communicating by tapping of hoofs is strongly reminiscent of table-turning séances.

Krall also experimented with training a young elephant, but the animal refused to learn. Since then, attempts have been made to teach dogs to communicate in a manner similar to that of Krall's horses. Between 1974 and 1975 two dogs, "Elke" and "Belam," were given some 500 lessons by Dorothy Meyer in the Berchtesgaden region of Bavaria. The dogs were owned by Hilde Meilmaier, founder of a dog school. For an account of the impressive achievement of these dogs see Maurice Rowdon's 1978 book The Talking Dogs.

Sources:

Christopher, Milbourne. ESP, Seers, and Psychics. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1970.

Gaddis, Vincent, and Margaret Gaddis. The Strange World of Animals and Pets. Cowles, 1970. Reprint, New York: Pocket Books, 1971.

Kindermann, Henny. Lola; or, the Thought and Speech of Animals. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1923.

Krall, Karl. Denkende Tiere. Leipzig, 1912.

Maeterlinck, Maurice. The Unknown Guest. London, 1914. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1975.

Pfungst, Oskar. Clever Hans (The Horse of Mr. Von Osten): A Contribution to Experimental Animal and Human Psychology. New York, 1911. Reprint, New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1965.

Rhine, J. B. "An Investigation of a 'Mind-Reading' Horse." Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology 23 (1929).

Rowdon, Maurice. The Talking Dogs. New York: Macmillan, 1978.

Woodhouse, Barbara. Talking to Animals. Croxley Green, England: Campions, 1970.

Elder Tree

Many superstitions and legends are associated with the elder tree and shrub (genus Sambucus). In some cultures, it is identified with the tree on which Judas hanged himself as well as with the wood used for the Cross. In some parts of Scotland and Wales, it was believed that the dwarf elder grew only on ground that had been soaked in blood. Elder was not used for a child's cradle because it could cause the child to pine or be harried by fairies. In Germany it was considered unlucky to bring an elder branch into a house, because it might also bring ghosts, or, in England, the Devil himself.

However, elder was also believed to protect against evil, and it was thought that wherever it grew witches were powerless. In England gardens were sometimes protected by having elder trees planted at the entrance, or in hedges around the garden. In some parts of the United States, an elder stick was burned on the fire at Christmas Eve to reveal witches, sorcerers, and other evil wishers in the neighborhood. In the Tyrol, it was believed that an elder stick cut on St. John's Eve (June 23) would detect witchcraft.

Many old gardens in Britain retained into the twentieth century some of the protective elder trees. The folklorist James Napier recalled:

"In my boyhood, I remember that my brothers, sisters, and myself were warned against breaking a twig or branch from the elder hedge which surrounded my grandfather's garden. We were told at the time as a reason for this prohibition, that it was poisonous; but we discovered afterwards that there was another reason, viz., that it was unlucky to break off even a small twig from a bourtree bush [old name for elder]."

In some parts of Europe, this superstition was so strong that before pruning the elder, the gardener would say, "Elder, elder may I cut thy branches?" If no response was heard, it was considered that permission had been given, and then, after spitting three times, the pruner began his cutting. Another writer claimed that elderwood formed a portion of the fuel used in burning human bodies as protection against evil influences, and drivers of funeral hearses had their whip handles made of elder for a similar reason.

In some parts of Scotland, people would not put a piece of elderwood into the fire. Napier observed one instance where "pieces of this wood were lying around unused when the neighbourhood was in great straits for firewood; but none would use it, and when asked why? the answer was: 'We don't know, but folks say it is not lucky to burn the bourtree.'"

Elderberries gathered on St. John's Eve were believed to ward off witchcraft and to bestow magic powers. If the elder was planted in the form of a cross upon a new grave and it bloomed, this was a sure sign that the soul of the dead person was happy.

Various magic powers against illness were claimed for elder. In Massachusetts, elder pulp in a bag worn around the neck was thought to cure rheumatism. Elsewhere elder was also used as an amulet, small pieces being cut up and sewn into a knot and hung around the neck or sewn in a knot in a piece of a man's shirt. Elder was also believed to be of medicinal value for deafness, faintness, strangulation, sore throat, ravings, snake and dog bites, insomnia, melancholy, and hypochondria.

Eldred, Charles (ca. 1906)

Notorious false materialization medium of Nottingham, England, during the early years of the twentieth century. He came into public notice when the journal Light (September 2, 1905) published a description of one of his early séances. The following year Eldred was unmasked at a séance in London by Abraham Wallace. A cavity was found in the back part of the chair on which he was sitting and in it was discovered, after the séance, a collapsible dummy head of stockinette with a flesh-colored mask, six pieces of white Chinese silk measuring 13 yards in all, and other "properties" of fake mediumship. Eldred had claimed that this chair was "highly magnetized," enabling spirit entities to manifest readily.

According to a friend of Eldred's, the unmasked medium asserted that the first phenomena of materialization that he produced were quite authentic but that afterward he could not satisfy the demands made upon him but by simulation. Even if this was true, the carefully premeditated fraud of Eldred's "magnetized" traveling chair completely negated any claim to genuine mediumship on his part.

Sources:

"Exposure of Mr. Eldred." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 12: 242–52.

Letort, Ellen. "The Frauds of Mediums." Annals of Psychic Science 3, no. 6 (1906).

Eleazar of Garniza

A Hebrew author who left many manuscripts, several of which have been printed. His books include Treatise on the Soul and Kabalistic Commentary on the Pentateuch.

Electric Girls

Girls in whose presence certain phenomena occurred, similar in nature to the time-honored phenomena of the poltergeist, but ascribed to the action of some physical force akin to electricity. The best known of these electric girls was perhaps Angelique Cottin, a Normandy peasant girl whose phenomena were first observed about 1846. She was later taken to Paris and placed under the observation of a Dr. Tanchon and others, who testified to the actuality of the phenomena. These included the movement of objects without contact, or at a mere touch from Cottin's petticoats, the agitation in her presence of a magnetic needle, and the blowing of a cold wind. In addition, chairs and sofas held down by one or more men were violently moved away when Cottin sat on them. She was also able to distinguish between the poles of a magnet by touch.

A commission appointed by the Academy of Sciences to examine Cottin, however, could observe nothing but the violent movements of her chair, which were possibly caused by muscular force.

Other electric girls practiced about the same time; even after the beginning of the Spiritualist movement in the United States, they were occasionally heard of. They are worthy of note as a possible link between the poltergeist and the Spiritualist medium. They include the American stage performers Lulu Hurst and Angie Abbott, and also Mary Richardson. However, Lulu Hurst was clearly an illusionist rather than a medium.

For an account of Cottin's remarkable phenomena, see the Journal des Debats (Paris, February 1846) and also the account by George Vale Owen in The Two Worlds (1891, p. 669).

Electric Phenomena

Phenomena with properties resembling electricity have sometimes been observed in animal magnetism and also in psychical mediumship.

Radioactivity was suggested when the medium Eusapia Palladino impressed with her fingers photographic plates wrapped in dark paper. The white fluctuating clouds or luminous vapors in the séance room were believed to be additional evidence of radioactivity, because it is a property of cathode rays to excite the formation of vapor or mist when they traverse a stratum saturated with humidity.

Enrico Imoda of Turin, Italy, wondered if the emanations of radium, of cathode rays in a Crookes tube, and of mediums were not fundamentally identical, in that the latter appear to render air a conductor of electricity. He discovered that Palladino had no influence over the electroscope in her normal state. One evening, however, when she woke from a trance and held her hands above the electrodes in the air, she was able, after three or four minutes, to produce a lowering of the gold leaf.

In the experiments of W. J. Crawford, an electroscope was immediately discharged when it was touched by a psychic rod. The rods, however, could not conduct a low-tension electric current.

Fritz Grünewald, a Berlin engineer who designed precision instruments, disputed the conductivity of the psychic fluid as he obtained raps upon an electrometer needle carrying a charge of 500 volts without producing the slightest discharge. The objection would seem to be scientifically valid only if the raps were physically struck upon the needle.

Psychical researcher Julien Ochorowicz came to the conclusion that the "rigid rays" of medium Stanislawa Tomczyk did conduct electricity. He formed an open electrical circuit of two silver plates four millimeters apart, a voltaic pile, and a galvanometer. Tomczyk was able to close the circuit by holding her hands at either side of the silver electrodes at a distance of one or two centimeters. He also found that the medium could decrease the electrical resistance of her own body; his own resistance was two or three times as great as that of the medium. This confirmed the experiments of E. K. Müller of Zürich, which led to the discovery of the "anthropoflux" (see emanations). Ever since the psychogalvanic reflex was scientifically demonstrated by O. Verdguth in 1909, it had been well known that emotions produce changes in the electrical conductivity of the tissues of the hand.

W. J. Kilner, who attempted to experiment with the human aura, reported that it also was sensitive to electric currents; the aura completely vanished under a negative charge.

Many mediums reportedly had electrical sensations before their séances. Sensations similar to holding the poles of a strong electric battery started eight or nine hours before the sitting in the case of Elizabeth d'Esperance. The hair of Florence Cook emitted sparks before a sitting. Mrs. J. H. Conant observed an electrical fullness hours before a séance. One Professor Winther wrote of an electrically charged atmosphere in séances with Anna Rasmussen. Finally Lord Adare gives the following account in Experiments with D. D. Home in Spiritualism (1869): "My chair began to vibrate rapidly in the most violent way; it gave me a curious tingling sensation up my arm to the elbow and up my legs as though I was receiving an electric shock." He also quotes the following communication from the control of D. D. Home: "Remember, Dan must not sit on a silk cushion while the hot weather lasts. To-night the atmosphere is so surcharged with electricity that it appears to us quite thick, like sand. We feel like men wading through a quicksand—slipping back as fast as we advance."

Similar sensations to those recorded by Adare have been experienced by people engaged in automatic writing when the power bursts upon them. The emanoscope of E. K. Müller, which detected the susceptibility of persons to electricity, disclosed much more powerful reactions in the presence of the medium Oscar Schlag than Müller had previously observed.

Several electric girls were known in the history of Spiritualism. The name of Angelique Cottin is the most famous. An earlier instance was furnished by two electric girls of Smyrna who landed at Marseilles in November 1838. According to E. C. Rogers in his book Philosophy of Mysterious Rappings (1853), various men of science and professors visited the girls and ascertained the following phenomena:

"The girls stationed themselves, facing each other, at the ends of a large table, keeping at a distance from it of one or two feet, according to their electrical dispositions. When a few minutes had elapsed a crackling, like that of electric fluid, spreading over gilt paper, was heard, when the table received a strong shake, which always made it advance from the elder to the younger sister. A key, nails or any piece of iron, placed on the table instantaneously stopped the phenomena. When the iron was adapted to the under part of the table it produced no effect upon the experiment. Save this singularity, the facts observed constantly followed the known laws of electricity, whether glass insulators were used or whether one of the girls wore silk garments. In the latter case the electric properties of both were neutralised. Such was the state of matters for some days after the arrival of the young Greeks, but the temperature having become cooler and the atmosphere having loaded itself with humidity, all perceptible electric virtues seemed to have deserted them."

Catherine Berry, a developing medium of the 1870s, was said to be the possessor of similar powers. A footnote signed by "Editor, Human Nature," in Berry's Experiences in Spiritualism (1876), states: "Mrs. Berry has the power of causing persons with a mediumistic temperament to fall down, or reel about, by the simple motion of her hand. At times, in her hands, a stick becomes a 'magic wand,' causing objects to move in a surprising manner."

Hector Durville, in his Traité Experimental de Magnétisme (2 vols., 1895–96) wrote of an infant, born at Saint Urbain in January 1869, who was always charged like a Leyden jar. No one could go near the baby without getting a shock, more or less violent, and luminous rays escaped now and then from the baby's fingers. The infant died in its ninth month.

The stage performances of Annie Abbot, "The Little Georgia Magnet," were unfavorably discussed by Sir Oliver Lodge in the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 5). The demonstrations of Lulu Hurst (Mrs. Paul Atkinson) in New York in 1884 were of a similar nature. By a mere touch of her fingertips she repelled strong men and lifted Hardinge Britten with his chair a foot from the floor by touching the back side of the chair with one hand. Britten felt what was described as the strength of a condensed cyclone. No psychic powers were claimed by Lulu Hurst herself, however, in her Autobiography (1897), and more mundane explanations of her performances were proposed by Walter B. Gibson and J. N. Maskelyne.

Sources:

Adare, Lord. Experiments with D. D. Home in Spiritualism. Privately published, 1869.

Gibson, Walter B. The Georgia Magnet. St. Louis, 1922.

Hurst, Lulu. Lulu Hurst Writes Her Autobiography. Rome, Ga., 1897.

Maskelyne, J. N. The Magnetic Lady; or, a Human Magnet Demagnetised. Bristol, 1892.

Electrobiology

A mode of inducing hypnotism by having the subject look steadily at metallic disks. The process originated about the middle of the nineteenth century, and its fame was spread by numerous lecturers in England and the United States.

Electronics

A later development of the work of Albert Abrams (1863–1924) that employs therapeutic apparatus to produce shortwave low-power electromagnetic and alternating magnetic currents to correct disease conditions. Abrams believed that diseases produced peculiar radiations, and that these radiations in turn produce a reflex in living tissue that can be detected by apparatuses and normalized by the appropriate electromagnetic energy produced by other apparatuses.

In 1922 the College of Electronic Medicine was founded in San Francisco. It was superseded in 1947 by the Electronic Medical Foundation. The magazine Physio-Clinical Medicine, started in 1916, later became the Electronic Medical Digest, reviewing a wide range of developments relating to electromagnetic theories and research in cell radiation and disease therapies.

Sources:

Abrams, Albert. Human Energy. San Francisco: The Author, 1914.

Barr, James. Abrams' Methods of Diagnosis and Treatment. London, 1925.

Electronic Video Phenomenon

Similar to the electronic voice phenomenon. Reports have been made of paranormal images appearing on television sets. There is no firm evidence for such claims, since faulty tuning, interference patterns, and other obvious technical reasons may explain unusual images on a television tube.

Electronic Voice Phenomenon (EVP)

Preferred term for the phenomenon discovered by Friedrich Jürgenson in 1959 and extensively developed by the experiments of Konstantin Raudive (1909–1974). The phenomenon is often referred to as Raudive voices. Raudive voices, apparently from dead individuals, are electronically impressed on tape recordings made on standard apparatus (sometimes enhanced by a simple diode circuit). The voices have also been discovered on the "white noise" of certain radio bands. This discovery, backed by thousands of experiments, has been seen as a way of obtaining communications from dead persons through electronic apparatus instead of Spiritualist mediums. However, some experimenters believe that the voice phenomenon is ambiguous or capable of mundane explanation, such as being the result of radio sources or even wishful thinking. George W. Meek developed an apparatus, the "spiricom," for use in testing the possibilities of more unambiguous Raudive voice data.

Sources:

Bander, Peter. Carry On Talking: How Dead are the Voices? Colin Smythe, 1972. Reprinted as Voices from the Tapes: Recordings from the Other World. New York: Drake Publishers, 1973.

Ellis, D. J. The Mediumship of the Tape Recorder. Polborough, West Sussex, England: The Author, 1978.

Raudive, Konstantin. Breakthrough: An Amazing Experiment in Electronic Communication. New York: Taplinger, 1971.

Electrum

Amber is the subject of some curious legends under this name, but there is also a metallic electrum, sometimes called orbas by the French. Electrum is an alloy of gold and silver in the proportion of four parts gold to one of silver. The pale yellow color resembles amber.

According to Pliny, a cup of this metal has the property of discovering poison by exhibiting certain semicircles like rainbows in the liquor, which it also keeps sparkling and hissing as if on the fire. A black species of electrum or amber is the gargates spoken of by Pliny and the jet sometimes used in jewelry.

Elementals

A term usually used synonymously with elementary spirits, but sometimes given a special connotation by Spiritualists to indicate discarnate entities of a malicious nature. Theosophists use the word elemental to denote the "astral remains" or "shell" of one who has lived an evil life on Earth and who is loath to leave the scene of his pleasures. With some occultists, again, elemental really signifies a subhuman being, probably identical to an elementary spirit, but of a mental and moral status considerably lower than that of a human.

Sources:

Lévi, Éliphas. Transcendental Magic. London: Redway, 1896. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

Elementary Spirits

The unseen entities said to inhabit the four elements; they are composed of the finest essence of each element. The creatures of the air are called sylphs; of the earth, gnomes; of fire, salamanders; and of water, nymphs or undines. The Abbé de Villars (1635–ca. 1673) is often cited as an authority on the subject, since he published a treatise entitled Comte de Gabalis (1670), from which a good deal of what follows is drawn.

According to this work, before the Fall, the creatures of the elements were subject to Adam in all things. By means of certain performances this ancient communication may be restored, and man may once more have at his command the elementary spirits. The abbot gives a brief sketch of the nature of these spirits.

The air, he says, is filled with a great number of sylphs, beings of human form, somewhat fierce in appearance, but really of a docile nature. They are interested in the sciences and are subtle. They are officious toward the sages and hostile toward the foolish and the ignorant. Their wives and daughters are of a masculine type of beauty, such as that of the Amazons.

The seas and rivers are inhabited as well as the air, and the beings dwelling there are designated undines, or nymphs, by the sages. The female population much exceeds the male, the women being so exceedingly beautiful that among the daughters of men there is none to equal them.

The Earth is filled almost to the center with gnomes, beings of small stature that guard subterranean treasure, minerals, and precious stones. They are ingenious, friendly toward men, and easy to command. They provide the children of the sages with all the money they require, asking no other reward for their services than the glory of performing them. The gnomides, their wives, are small of stature but very good-looking, and they dress very curiously.

As for the salamanders, the inhabitants of the region of fire, they serve the philosophers, but are not overanxious for their company. Their daughters and wives are rarely seen. Their women are very beautiful, beyond all the other elementals, since they dwell in a purer element. Their habits, mode of life, manners, and laws are admirable, and their mental brillance is even greater than their physical beauty. They know and religiously adore the Supreme Being, but have no hope of eternal enjoyment of him, since their souls are mortal. Being composed of the purest parts of the elements wherein they dwell, and having no contrary qualities, they can live for several centuries, yet they are much troubled because of their mortal nature.

It was revealed to the philosophers, however, that an elementary spirit could attain immortality by marrying a human being. The children born of such unions are more noble and heroic than the children of human men and women, and some of the greatest figures of antiquity—Zoroaster, Alexander, Hercules, and Merlin, to mention a few—are declared to have been the children of elementary spirits.

The salamanders, the Comte de Gabalis goes on to say, are composed of the most subtle particles of the sphere of fire, conglobated and organized by the action of the Universal Fire, so called because it is the principle of all the motions of nature. The sylphs are composed of the purest atoms of the air; the nymphs, of the most delicate particles of water; the gnomes, of the finest essence of earth. Adam was in complete accord with these creatures because, being composed of that which was purest in the four elements, he contained in himself the perfections of these four species and was their natural king. But since by reason of his sin he was cast into the excrements of the elements, there no longer existed the harmony between him, so impure and gross, and these fine and ethereal substances.

The abbot goes on to give instructions on how this state of things can be remedied and the ancient order restored. To attain this end mankind must purify and exalt the element of fire that is within all humans. All that is necessary is to concentrate the fire of the world, by means of concave mirrors, in a globe of glass. There will then be formed within the globe a solar powder that, having purified itself from the mixture of other elements, will become in a very short time a sovereign means of exalting the fire within us and make us, so to speak, of an igneous nature. Thereafter, the creatures of the fire will become our inferiors, and, delighted at the restoration of mutual harmony between themselves and the human race, they will show toward man all the goodwill they have for their own kind.

Sylphs, gnomes, and nymphs are more familiar with humans than are the salamanders, on account of their shorter term of life, and it is therefore easier to get in touch with them. To restore its dominion over the sylphs, gnomes, or nymphs, the human race must close a glass full of air, earth, or water and expose it to the sun for a month, after which its various elements must be separated according to science. This process is easiest in the case of water and earth. "Thus," states the Comte, "without characters, without ceremonies, without barbarous words, it is possible to rule absolutely over these peoples."

Other authorities prescribe other means of obtaining dominion over the spirits of the elements. The occultist Éliphas Lévi, for instance, stated that anyone desiring to subjugate the elementals must first perform "the four trials of antique initiation," but as the original trials are no longer known, similar ones must be substituted. Thus, he who would control the sylphs must walk fearlessly on the edge of a precipice; he who would win the service of the salamanders must take his stand in a burning building, and so on, the point of the ordeals being that the man should show himself unafraid of the elements whose inhabitants he desires to rule.

In medieval times the evocation and exorcism of elementary spirits was practiced extensively, the crystal being a favorite means of evoking them. The exorcism of earth was performed by means of breathing, sprinkling water, burning incense, and repeating a certain prayer to the gnomes. Air was exorcised by breathing toward the four cardinal points and by reciting prayers to the air spirits (sylphs). Casting salt, incense, sulphur, camphor, and white resin into a fire was considered efficacious in exorcising that element. In the case of water, breathing and laying on of hands, repeating formulas, mixing salt and ashes of incense, and other ceremonies were to be observed. In every instance, a special consecration of the four elements was a primary and essential part of the proceedings.

As stated, it was thought possible for a human being to confer immortality on an elementary spirit through marriage. This does not always occur, however. Sometimes the reverse is the case, and the elementals share their mortality with their human mate. In literature, at all events, countless stories relate how men have risked and lost their immortality by marrying a sylph or an undine. According to the Comte de Gabalis, however, it would seem to be a matter of choice whether a man confers his immortality on his ethereal partner or whether he partakes of her mortal nature, for it suggests that those who have not been predestined to eternal happiness would do well to marry an elemental and thus spare themselves an eternity of woe.

Not every authority has painted so attractive a picture of the creatures of the elements as has the Abbé de Villars. Some have contended that there are innumerable degrees among these beings, the highest resembling the lower angels, while the lowest may often be mistaken for demons, which they are not. Not only do multitudinous variations of form and disposition characterize the elementals of this planet, the other planets and the stars are also the abode of countless hosts of elementary spirits, differing from those of our world perhaps more than the latter differ from one another.

All the forms of beasts, insects, and reptiles, as well as strange combinations of the shapes of different animals, may be taken by the lower elementals of Earth. The inhabitants of each element have their peculiar virtues and vices that serve to distinguish them. The sylphs are capricious and inconstant, but agile and active; the undines, jealous and cold, but observant; the salamanders, hot and hasty, but energetic and strong; and the gnomes, greedy of gold and treasures, but nevertheless hardworking, good-tempered, and patient. Anyone who would seek dominion over any of these must practice their virtues but carefully avoid their faults, thus conquering them, as it were, on their own ground.

Each species can dwell only in its own proper element. Thus a sylph may not invade the sphere of a salamander, or vice versa, while both would be decidedly out of their element in the regions of the nymphs or the gnomes. Four rulers have been set over the four species—Gob, ruler of the gnomes; Paralda, of the sylphs; Djin, of the salamanders; and Necksa, of the nymphs. The dwellers in each element are assigned a point of the compass, which is where their special kingdom lies. To the gnomes is given the north, to the salamanders, the south, to the sylphs, the east, and to the undines, the west. The gnomes influence those of a melancholic disposition, because they dwell in the gloom of subterranean caverns. The salamanders have an effect on those of sanguine temperament, because their home is in the fire. The undines influence the phlegmatic, and the sylphs those of a bilious temperament. Although the elementals are invisible to human eyes, they may on occasion become visible to those who invoke them, to the sages and philosophers, and even to the multitude.

It is said that in the reign of King Pépin, Zedekias, a ninth-century physician, suggested to the sylphs that they should appear to men, whereupon the air was seen to be full of them, sometimes ranged in battle, or in an aerial army. It was said by the people that they were sorcerers—an opinion to which Charlemagne and his son Louis the Débonnaire subscribed, the latter at least imposing heavy penalties on the supposed sorcerers. To witness the admirable institutions of the sylphs, certain men were raised up in the air, and while descending were seen by their fellowmen on Earth. The latter regarded them as stragglers of the aerial army of sorcerers and thought that they had come to poison the fruits and fountains. These unfortunate persons were thereupon put to death, along with many others suspected of ties to the sorcerers.

The nature of these spirits was collated in the Comte de Gabalis with the oracles of antiquity, and even with the classic pantheons of Greece and Rome. Pan, for example, was the first and oldest of the nymphs, and the news of his death, communicated by the people of the air to the inhabitants of the waters, was proclaimed by them in a voice that was heard sounding over all the rivers of Italy—"The great Pan is dead!"

The scholar of occultism and mysticism A. E. Waite considered the "angels" evoked in medieval magic, as well as the "devils" of the witchcraft sabbat, to be higher or lower elementals. Others see in the brownies and domestic spirits of folklore some resemblance to the subjugated elementary spirits. Even the familiar poltergeist, when not clearly identified as the spirit of a deceased person, may be regarded as an elemental. Spiritualists believe that elementals occasionally manifest as mischievous or evil spirits at séances.

Although the book Comte de Gabalis is probably an imaginative or allegorical work, it brings together preexisting legends of elementary spirits in an entertaining and philosophical format.

Sources:

Barrett, Francis. The Magus. London: Lackington, Allen, 1801. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1967.

De Villars, l'Abbé de Montfaucon. Comte de Gabalis. 1670. Reprint, New York: Macoy Publishing and Masonic Supply, 1922.

Lévi, Éliphas. Transcendental Magic. London: Redway, 1896. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Book of Black Magic and of Pacts Including the Mysteries of Goëtic Theurgy, Sorcery, and Infernal Necromancy. London: George Redway, 1898. Revised as The Book of Ceremonial Magic. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961.

Elf Arrows (or Elf Bolts)

The superstitious name given to small triangular flints, known as Belemnites, found in many countries, but notably in Scotland. It was believed that these stones were arrows shot by the elves, which usually prove fatal to cattle—the cure being to touch the cow with the arrow with which it had been hit and give it water in which the arrow had been dipped to drink.

In his book The Secret Commonwealth of Elves, Fauns, and Fairies (1691), Robert Kirk describes the fairy arrow as being tipped with yellow flint and states that it inflicts a mortal wound without breaking the skin. He also says that he examined such wounds. It is even on record that an Irish bishop was thus shot at by an evil spirit, and it was said that the arrows were manufactured by the devil with the help of attendant imps who rough-hewed them while the archfiend finished the work.

Cases are on record of elf arrows allegedly made and used by the witches of Scotland within historic times. In 1662 Isobel Gowdie confessed that she had seen such elf arrows made. Similar superstitions regarding these remnants of the Stone Age prevail in Italy, Africa, and Turkey.

Sources:

Kirk, Robert. The Secret Commonwealth of Elves, Fauns, and Fairies. 1691. Reprint, London: D. Nutt, 1893.

Elf-Fire

The ignis fatuus, or "foolish fire," a name also given to fire obtained by rubbing two pieces of wood together, used in superstitious ways. The elf-fire proper is the phosphorescent light seen hovering over marshy ground. When approached, it appears to recede or vanish suddenly, reinforcing the superstition that it is a mischievous spirit. When seen in graveyards the ignis fatuus is known as a "corpse candle." Among the Russian peasantry it was believed that these wandering lights were the souls of stillborn children, who did not desire to lure people from the path but who got no rest until they found their bodies.

Eliade, Mircea (1907–1986)

Noted scholar on the history of religions and for many years a professor at the University of Chicago. Eliade was born March 9, 1907, in Bucharest, Romania, and was educated at the University of Bucharest (M.A., 1928; Ph.D., 1933) and the University of Calcutta. He was a cultural counselor for the Romanian Legation, Lisbon (1941–44) during World War II, and after hostilities ended he became a visiting professor at the Ecole des Hautes Etudes, the Sorbonne, Paris (1946–49), before moving to the University of Chicago, where he served first as the Haskell lecturer (1956) and later as a professor.

From his broad examination of the religious life of various peoples and his study of the nature of religious experience, Eliade wrote several important books dealing with topics related to parapsychology and the occult. He is most remembered for his studies of alchemy and shamanism and the monumental Encyclopedia of Religion (1987), which he edited during the last years of his life. He died April 22, 1986.

Sources:

Eliade, Mircea. 1907 to 1937: Journey East, Journey West. Vol. 1 of Autobiography. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1981.

———. Forgerons et alchemistes. 1956. Translated as The Forge and the Crucible. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1962.

———. Occultism, Witchcraft and Cultural Fashion: Essays in Comparative Religion. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1976.

———. Patanjali et le Yoga. 1962. Translated as Patanjali and Yoga. New York: Funk and Wagnall's, 1969.

———. Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1964.

———. Two Tales of the Occult. New York: Herder and Herder, 1970.

———. Le Yoga: Immortalité et liberté. 1954. Translated as Yoga: Immortality and Freedom. New York: Pantheon Books, 1958.

———. De Zalmoxis à Genghis Khan. 1970. Translated as Zalmoxis, the Vanishing God. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1972.

Eliade, Mircea, ed. Encyclopedia of Religion. 16 vols. New York: Macmillian, 1987.

Richetts, M. L., and Mircea Eliade. The Romanian Roots, 1907–1945. 2 vols., Eastern European Monographs, distributed by New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.

Eliezar (ca. 70–79 C.E.)

Legendary Jewish exorcist. According to the historian Josephus (ca. 37–ca. 100 C.E.), who claimed to have witnessed an exorcism in the presence of Emperor Vespasian, Eliezar applied to the possessed person a ring to which was attached a magical root prescribed by King Solomon. This drew out the devils, which Eliezar caused to pass into a basin of water, which was immediately poured away.

Elixir of Life

Medieval alchemists and mystics believed they were justified in their search for the mythical elixir of life, a universal medicine supposedly containing a recipe for the renewal of youth. The search for this elixir and a quest for gold became the grand goals of alchemy.

There was no standard method of manufacturing the elixir of life. In the grimoire, Le Petit Albert, for example, one is instructed to use eight pounds of sugar of mercury as the foundation of such a mixture. Fifteenth-century alchemist Bernard Trévisan said that dropping philosophers' stone into mercurial water would create the elixir. This process would, when "elaborated to the Red," transmute copper and other metals into pure gold, he stated; if "elaborated to the White" it would produce pure silver.

The possibility that the elixir could prolong life was undoubtedly the chief reason alchemists continued their search. The aged alchemist, weary with his quest for gold, craved the boon of youth and desired renewed health and strength to assist him in carrying out his great purpose. As an illustration of the alchemical concept of the elixir of life, the following extract from a work dealing with the secret of rejuvenescence (originally supposed to have been written by Arnuldus de Villanova and published by Longueville-Harcourt of Paris in 1716) is instructive:

"To renew youth is to enter once more into that felicitous season which imparts to the human frame the pleasures and strength of the morning. Here it is to no purpose that we should speak of that problem so much discussed by the Wise, whether the art can be carried to such a pitch of excellence that old age should itself be made young. We know that Paracelsus has vaunted the metamorphic resources of his Mercury of Life which not merely rejuvenates men but converts metals into gold; He who promised unto others the years of the sybils, or at least the 300 winters of Nestor, himself perished at the age of thirty-seven. Let us turn rather to Nature, so admirable in her achievements, and deem her not capable alone of destroying what she has produced at the moment she has begotten them. Is it possible that she will refuse unto man, for whom all was created, what she accords to the stags, the eagles, and the serpents, who do annually cast aside the mournful concomitants of senility, and do assume the most brilliant, the most gracious amenities of the most joyous youth? Art, it is true, has not as yet arrived at the apex of perfection wherefrom it can renew our youth; but that which was unachieved in the past may be accomplished in the future, a prodigy which may be more confidently expected from the fact that in isolated cases it has actually already taken place, as the facts of history make evident. By observing and following the manner in which nature performs such wonders, we may assuredly hope to execute this desirable transformation, and the first condition is an amiable temperament, such as that which was possessed by Moses, of whom it is written that for one hundred and twenty years his sight never failed him."

Trithemius (1462–1516) on his deathbed dictated a recipe that which he said would preserve mind, health, and memory with perfect sight and hearing, for those who made use of it. It consisted of, among other things, calomel, gentian, cinnamon, aniseed, nard, coral, tartar, and mace. Five grams of it were to be taken morning and night in wine or brodium during the first month; during the second month it was to be taken in the morning only; during the third month three times a week, and so on continuing throughout life. This was a more comprehensible recipe than that of Eugenius Philalethes (1622–1666), who stated:

"Ten parts of coelestiall slime; separate the male from the female, and each afterwards from its own earth, physically, mark you, and with no violence. Conjoin after separation in due, harmonic vital proportion; and straightway, the Soul descending from the pyroplastic sphere, shall restore, by a mirific embrace, its dead and deserted body. Proceed according to the Volcanico magica theory, till they are exalted into the Fifth Metaphysical Rota. This is that world-renowned medicine, whereof so many have scribbled, which, notwithstanding, so few have known."

In his History of Magic (1913) Éliphas Lévi describes Cagliostro's great secret of rejuvenescence in the following terms:

"Let us now turn to the secret of physical regeneration to attain which—according to the occult prescription of the Grand Copht—a retreat of forty days, after the manner of a jubilee, must be made one of every fifty years, beginning during the full moon of May in the company of one faithful person only. It must be also a fast of forty days, drinking May-dew—collected from sprouting corn with a cloth of pure white linen—and eating new and tender herbs. The repast should begin with a large glass of dew and end with a biscuit or crust of bread. There should be slight bleeding on the seventeenth day. Balm of Azoth should then be taken morning and evening, beginning with a dose of six drops and increasing by two drops daily till the end of the thirty-second day. At the dawn which follows thereafter renew the slight bleeding; then take to your bed and remain in it till the end of the fortieth day.

"On the first awakening after the bleeding, take the first grain of Universal Medicine. A swoon of three hours will be followed by convulsions, sweats and much purging, necessitating a change both of bed and linen. At this stage a broth of lean beef must be taken, seasoned with rice, sage, valerian, vervain and balm. On that day following take the second grain of Universal Medicine, which is Astral Mercury combined with Sulphur of Gold. On the next day have a warm bath. On the thirty-sixth day drink a glass of Egyptian wine, and on the thirty-seventh take the third and last grain of Universal Medicine. A profound sleep will follow, during which the hair, teeth, nails and skin will be renewed. The prescription for the thirty-eighth day is another warm bath, steeping aromatic herbs in the water, of the same kind as those specified for the broth. On the thirty-ninth day drink ten drops of Elixir of Acharat in two spoonsful of red wine. The work will be finished on the fortieth day, and the aged man will be renewed in youth.

"By means of his jubilary regimen, Cagliostro claimed to have lived for many centuries. It will be seen that it is a variation of the famous Bath of Immortality in use among the Menandrian Gnostics."

Aristaeus is said to have left to his disciples a secret rendering all metals diaphanous and man immortal. The process apparently consisted of a mystic treatment of the atmosphere, which was to be congealed and distilled until it developed a "divine sparkle" and then became liquefied. After the air was subjected to heat and underwent several other processes, the elixir supposedly emerged.

The great sixteenth-century physician Paracelsus was reputed to have discovered the elixir of life. In the De Tintura Physicorum (1570), ascribed to him, there is a description of a tincture that enabled individuals to live for centuries.

For an account of a modern claim to have made the elixir of life, see the entry on Rev. W. A. Ayton.

Sources:

Lévi, Éliphas. The History of Magic. London: Rider, 1913. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1971.

Elkins, Donald T. (1930–1984)

Donald T. Elkins, engineer, pilot, and paranormal researcher, was born and raised in Louisville, Kentucky. He grew up in a family of Christian Scientists, though he departed from the faith as a young man. He served in the Korean War, after which he completed his education at the University of Louisville. He earned three degrees in engineering, completing his last degree in 1960. He took a job at the University of Alaska and created its mechanical engineering program during his year there. In 1961 he accepted a position at his alma mater and returned to Kentucky.

Elkins had become interested in the paranormal and in flying saucers in the mid-1950s. In 1962 he called together a group to practice meditation and attempt contact with extraterrestrials, an idea he had gotten from a UFO contactee group in Detroit, Michigan. The experiment proved successful, and in 1963 he published an initial report, Telepathy Data Collected by Extraterrestrial Communication. In 1965 he left the university for a higher paying job as a pilot with a major airline based out of Atlanta, Georgia.

Among the original members of the group was Carla Rueckert. Following her divorce in 1968, they became close friends and he began to work with her as a channel, and she assisted him in his continuing research. Together in 1970 they founded L/L Research to provide structure for their ongoing work. Through the 1970s Elkins developed a new group of channels, the first result of his observations being a volume coauthored with Rueckert, Secrets of the UFO.

In 1980 Elkins invited a member of the meditation group, James McCarty, to work more closely with Rueckert and himself. As a result, Rueckert experienced an intensive period of channeling an extraterrestrial who called himself Ra. He claimed to have come to Earth many centuries ago, to have introduced monotheism into Egypt, and to have built the pyramids. He taught that the basic truth was that All are One. The material was gathered together and published over the next years as The Law of One (1981–83).

At the same time as the Ra material was being received, Elkins' work was requiring more time. In 1983 he and Rueckert moved to Atlanta to be closer to his working center. However, he soon developed a severe mental health problem. They moved back to Louisville, hoping that it would help. It did not, and in 1984, he committed suicide. Rueckert and McCarty have continued to operate L/L Research and periodically bring out new material, including a fifth volume of The Law of One in the tradition of Elkins' research.

Sources:

Elkins, Don T. Telepathy Data Collected by Extraterrestrial Communication. Clarksburg, W. Va.: Saucerian Press, 1963.

Elkins, Don T., and Carla Reuckert. The Crucifixion of Esmerelda Sweetwater. Louisville, Ky.: L/L Research, 1984.

———. Secrets of the UFO. Louisville, Ky.: L/L Research, 1977.

Elkins, Don T., Carla Rueckert, and James Allen McCarty. The Law of One. 4 vols. Louisville, Ky.: L/L Research, 1981–83. Reprint, Norfolk, Va.: Donning, 1984.

Ellide

The dragon-shaped ship of Frithjof, the hero of the Icelandic legend the Frithjof Saga. It was said to be golden-headed, with open jaws, its under part scaled with blue and gold, its tail twisted and of silver, and its sails red-bordered and black. When its wings were outspread, it could skim the calmest seas. This ship was said to have been given to one of Frithjof's forefathers as a reward for kindness by Aegir, the sea god.

Elliotson, John (1791–1868)

President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London and the first great exponent of animal magnetism in England. Elliotson was born October 29, 1791, in London. He later studied medicine at Edinburgh and Cambridge Universities, continuing after his M.D. degree with studies at Guy's Hospital, London. He became a professor of principles and practice of medicine at University College Hospital, which he helped to establish and where he lectured and served as a physician for a brief period (1834–38). In 1837 he became president of the Medico-Chirurgical Society, London, and was also a fellow of the Royal Society, Royal College of Physicians.

He was introduced to the subject of animal magnetism in 1837 by Baron Du Potet, whom he allowed to experiment at University College Hospital. His curiosity aroused, he himself began to study the phenomena and in 1838 found two wonderful somnambules in the O'Key sisters, Jane and Elizabeth. The success of his experiments created a stir. When he applied for a demonstration in one of the theaters of the college, he was refused permission, and he was finally requested to discontinue mesmeric practice in the hospital. Following this, in the autumn of 1838, he resigned his professorship and severed his connections with the hospital.

Elliotson's enthusiasm sustained the first serious blow when Thomas Wakeley, the editor of the medical journal The Lancet, invited the O'Key sisters to his own house and demonstrated that the violent convulsions into which the patients were sent were produced when, unknown to Elliotson and the patients, the mesmerized piece of money that was supposed to call forth the phenomena was resting in the waistcoat pocket of one of the company. He also proved that if the subjects were kept in ignorance, unmesmerized water could produce sleep, whereas mesmerized water had no effect.

After this the O'Keys were considered exposed and The Lancet closed its columns to mesmerism. Elliotson, nevertheless, was not discouraged. The year 1843 witnessed the birth of the journal The Zoist, which continued under the direction of Elliotson and one Engledue until 1856. It was a journal of mesmerism and phrenology, Elliotson being also an enthusiastic phrenologist. In 1824 he founded the Phrenological Society of London and was its president until 1843.

In mesmerism he saw a powerful means for phrenological research. Nevertheless, The Zoist was mainly concerned with the therapeutic aspects of mesmerism. With the advent of Spiritualism, it opened its columns to many critical articles on the phenomena. Elliotson himself attended a few sittings with Maria Hayden and described his experiences in an article, "The Departed Spirits." He was somewhat skeptical and attributed everything to the agency of the medium. Table-turning, however, meant something different to him. It fitted into the magnetic effluence theory, and Elliotson, on the basis of observations of others alone, concluded that: "there probably is true movement of the table independent of muscular force."

In 1863 he was introduced at Dieppe, France, to the famous medium D. D. Home, with the result that, according to the Morning Post of August 3, 1868 ". . . he expressed his conviction of the truth of the phenomena, and became a sincere Christian, whose handbook henceforth was the Bible. Some time after this he said he had been living all his life in darkness and had thought there was nothing in existence but the material."

Elliotson's first step after his conversion was to seek a reconciliation with John Ashburner, from whom he had become alienated by the latter's advocacy of Spiritualism. In 1867 Ashburner had published Notes and Studies on Animal Magnetism and Spiritualism. Elliotson now advocated what he saw as the truth of Spiritualism with the same zeal that he had formerly opposed it. Both Elliotson and Ashburner are of importance as representing the transition from animal magnetism to Spiritualism by the British. Elliotson died the next year on July 29, 1868, in London.

Elliott, G(raeme) Maurice (1883–1959)

Clergyman in the Church of England who explored the relationship between Christianity and psychical research. Elliott was born October 1, 1883, in London, and studied at the University of London and Hackney College. He was ordained a deacon in 1915 and a priest in 1917. From 1915 until his retirement in 1952 he served as curate, vicar, or rector of various parishes.

Through his religious studies, Elliott became interested in the psychical as a tool for interpreting the Bible and understanding what is commonly understood to be the "supernatural" element in Christianity, about which he wrote several important books: The Psychic Life of Jesus (1938), Spiritualism in the Old Testament (1940), In Search of Faith (1948), and The Bible as Psychic History (1959). He participated in the founding of the Churches' Fellowship for Spiritual and Psychical Studies and beginning in 1954 served as its secretary for many years. He was also a cofounder of the Confraternity, an association of laity and clergy concerned with Spiritualism, and a member of the directorate of the Order of the Preparation of Communion of Soul (a psychical research body). From 1954 to 1959 he served on the Commission on Divine Healing set up by the archbishop of Canterbury. He died June 8, 1959, in London.

Sources:

Elliott, G. Maurice. The Psychic Life of Jesus. 1938. Reprint, New York: London Press, 1974.

———. Spiritualism in the Old Testament. London: The Psychic Book Club, 1940.

Elm Tree

The elm tree (genus Ulmus) is prominent in Teutonic mythology, where it was said to have been given a soul by the god Odin, senses by Hoenir, and blood and warmth by Lodur, becoming Embla, the first woman. In Finno-Ugric mythology the elms were believed to be the mothers of the fire goddess Ut. In England the tree was associated with elves and sometimes known as "elven." At Lichfield, England, choristers of the cathedral used to deck the cathedral, close, and houses with elm boughs on Ascension Day.

It was believed that the falling of the leaves of an elm tree out of season predicted a murrain (disease) among cattle. The elm was also used to cure cattle disease by means of the "need fire," when two pieces of wood were rubbed together until they ignited and a bonfire was built, through the smoke of which the cattle were driven. The leaves were used medicinally as a poultice for swellings, and the inner bark of the tree was used for skin and venereal infections. The slippery elm (U. fulva or rubra), mixed with milk, is still used by herbalists as a demulcent drink.

"Éloge de l'Enfer"

A critical, historical, and moral work, an edition of which was published in two volumes at the Hague in 1759. The title means "The Praise of Hell," and an English translation was published in 1760, with authorship ascribed to "Bénard." The book is satirical and somewhat lacking in wit.

Elohim Journal

Elohim Journal is a leading Australian magazine serving the post-New Age spirituality movement. It began in 1997 as the Sedona Journal of Emergence Australia and New Zealand Edition, and served as its name implied as a South Pacific edition of the popular American channeling magazine, Sedona Journal of Emergence. After nine issues, it adopted its present name. Its first issue under its new name appeared in January 1999. Coeditor Roger Miles traces his involvement with the magazine to 1994 when in Aspen, Colorado, on vacation, he met the owner of a bookstore who also happened to be a trance channeler. The entity speaking through the man identified Miles as a Starship Commander with the Galactic Federation who had come from the Pleiades to Earth to "help take people home." He did not understand the weird encounter at the time, but strange coincidences began to occur. He soon had a feeling that he should leave his business and pay attention to his life's work. In the United States in 1996, he met Robert Shapiro, the channel for an entity named Zoosh, and soon was led to an encounter with O'Ryin Swanson, the founder of the Sedona Journal of Emergence. Swanson was looking for a way to expand her publication to the South Pacific. Shortly thereafter Miles met his new mate and current coeditor of the Journal, Suzanne Stallard. Like its parent, Elohim Journal specializes in reprinting brief articles, often around a general theme, of material channeled by a variety of post-New Age channelers, many of whom reside and/or work in the Sedona, Arizona, area. However, at the same time, there are a number of similar channelers operating in Australia and New Zealand where the New Age Movement had spread through the 1980s. Thus, Elohim Journal has also integrated material from local channelers (some of whom, like Jani King, have an international following) into its various issues. The editors of Elohim Journal, Roger Miles and Suzanne Stallard, see the magazine as serving the larger spiritual emergence movement and seek to provide an overview of humanity's journey into "Light and Love." It includes in each issue notices of new books, especially new volumes of channeled material, that have become available in the South Pacific, and announcements of seminars, special events, and tours from North American and European speakers. Elohim Journal may be ordered from Awakening to the Truth, P.O. Box 722, Spring Hill, Brisbane, Queensland 4000 Australia. Its website is at http://www.elohim.com/.

Sources:

Elohim Journal. http://www.elohim.com/. February 28, 2000.

Elongation of the Human Body

A comparatively rare but by no means modern psychical phenomenon. The Neoplatonists observed it in certain obsessed men. The Neoplatonist Jamblichus (ca. 363 C.E.) in a work on divination writes: "The person of the subject has been known to dilate and tower to supernormal height." J. J. von Görres, in La Mystique Divine, Naturelle et Diabolique (5 vols., Paris, 1854) states that one night while the blessed Ida of Louvain occupied a bed with a very devout nun, Ida assumed monstrous proportions until she was lying in all but a very narrow strip of the bed. So great was the strain that the skin of one of her legs burst and she had a scar there from then on. Suddenly, her body began to diminish until at last it was reduced to an extremely minute size. The phenomenon was repeated as she returned from church with her friend.

Among modern mediums it was the famous D. D. Home (1833–1886) who most often demonstrated it. The expansions and contractions of his body were witnessed by 50 people at the very least. He felt exceedingly sick after elongations. His maximum growth was found by the Master of Lindsay to be 11 inches. On being questioned by the members of the committee of the London Dialectical Society, he said:

"The top of the hip bone and the short ribs separate. In Home they are unusually close together. There was no separation of the vertebrae of the spine; nor were the elongations at all like those resulting from expanding the chest with air; the shoulders did not move. Home looked as if he was pulled up by the neck; the muscles seemed to be in a state of tension."

Lord Adare saw a Mr. Jencken, a taller man, standing beside Home when the phenomenon took place. Home's feet remained fairly level on the ground. His unbuttoned coat showed a space of about four inches between his waistcoat and the waistband of his trousers. Lord Adare estimated the entire growth to be six to eight inches. Home appeared to grow also in breadth and size all over. If an observer placed a hand flat upon Home's waist, the observer felt the lower rib pass under his hand until it was some inches above it, the whole flesh and muscle apparently moving and stretching. On the contraction taking place, the lower rib came down until it pressed against the upper edge of the observer's hand and moved into its proper position.

After two elongations—at another time—Home was shortened to less than his natural height. He could also elongate his arms. Lord Adare placed himself in front of Home when he stood against the wall and made a pencil mark at the tip of his extended arms. First his left, then his right arm was elongated. When the distance between the pencil marks was measured, it was ascertained that the total elongation amounted to nine and one half inches. During this elongation Home's chest expanded greatly.

H. T. Humphreys, a journalist, published in 1868 the following account: "Mr. Home was seen by all of us to increase in height to the extent of some eight or ten inches, and then sink to some six or eight inches below his normal stature. Having returned to his usual height, he took Lord Adare and the Master of Lindsay and placing one beside each post of the folding doors lay down on the floor, touching the feet of one with his head and the feet of the other with his feet. He was then again elongated and pushed both Lord Adare and the Master of Lindsay backward along the floor with his head and feet as he was stretched out, his arms and hands remaining motionless by his side." The distance, as measured by Mrs. S. C. Hall, was more than 7 feet.

H. D. Jencken in his account in Human Nature (1869) also describes the elongation of Home's legs:

"The right leg of Mr. Home was then elongated about six inches, then shortened, the foot literally shrinking into the trousers. I carefully examined the leg from the ankle joint to the hip. The limb felt shrunk and withered and, gradually elongated, it felt as if it were being expanded by air being inflated. Whilst the leg was so shortened he walked about the room, proving that, though lessened in size, the function of the limb was unimpaired. The final and most satisfactory test, however, was the lengthening and shortening of the hand. I caused Mr. Home to place his hand firmly on a sheet of paper, and then carefully traced an outline of the hand, causing the pencil point to be firmly kept at the wrist. I am, I believe, rendering the first positive measurement of the extension and contraction of the human organism."

Home could also impart the power of elongation to others. Miss Bertolacci, a medium herself, was once elongated together with him. The phenomenon was also witnessed in the mediumship of other individuals.

In an article in Light (May 10, 1902, p. 223), John E. Purdon writes that:

"On one occasion in my quarters at the Sandown Hospital, Isle of Wight, I held the feet of Miss Florence Cook firmly against the floor, and can certify that there was no lifting of the heels, either with or without her boots, and that there was such an elongation that my brother-in-law, the late assistant-surgeon, Mark A. Kilroy, whose hands were on her shoulders, cried out 'She is dragging me up to the ceiling.' As he was over five feet nine inches in height there could have been no posturing that would account for his experience. Further, I most distinctly remember Miss Cook coming back with a jerk to her normal stature. My wife, who was present and heard her brother make the above remark, fully endorses my statement."

Florence Marryat described a séance with Katie Cook in which the medium's arm, which she held, was elongated to such an extent that it reached the sitters on the other side of the table, where it would have been impossible for her own much longer arms to follow it. She believed that the limb must have been stretched to three times its natural length and in sight of everybody.

The mediums Frank Herne, J. J. Morse, Eusapia Palladino, and (in her early career) Rosina Thompson were also reported to have demonstrated the strange gift of elongation. In his book Modern Spiritualism (1902), Frank Podmore quotes Rev. C. J. M. Shaw for an account of the elongation in his house of a professional clairvoyant named Peters. The arm of the medium was said to have grown six inches.

Pepito Arriola, the Spanish infant musical prodigy, when three and a half years old, sounded full octaves on the piano. His hands did not stretch more than five notes. It seemed to the onlookers that his hand increased during the time he played.

In the case known as the Great Amherst Mystery (see poltergeist), Esther Cox's body repeatedly puffed out to an abnormal size. She was screaming with pain, but the physicians could do nothing to relieve her agony. In a short time, however, the trouble always subsided.

In the case of Rosina Thompson, the elongation was said to be an attempt to quiet an "angry nerve," as the medium complained of violent neuralgic pains. The attempt was successful and the medium, on coming to herself, found all her pain gone.

There are difficulties in assessing the validity of the phenomenon of elongation. It is well known that there are variations in height when the musculature of the vertebrae are relaxed or tensed. The seventeenth-century British posture master Joseph Clark could voluntarily dislocate the vertebrae of his back and other parts of his body, exhibiting apparent deformity or variation in appearance. Some acrobatic entertainers can appear to lengthen or shorten their limbs through skillful manipulation of their muscles and clothing. On the other hand, one is reluctant to impute such deceptions in the case of saints of whom the phenomenon was reported, though, of course, in all cases a question of what the reporters observed remains pertinent.

In the case of mediums, the evidence is variable. Mediums like Herne or Palladino have been accused of fraud. On the other hand, D. D. Home, in spite of his many unusual feats, escaped any detection in fraud, and the claims of elongation in his case rest upon various reputable witnesses.

Sources:

Dunraven, Earl of. Experiences in Spiritualism with D. D. Home. 1969. Reprint (enlarged), Glasgow: Society for Psychical Research and Robert Maclehose, 1924.

Marryat, Florence. There Is No Death. New York: John W. Lovell, 1891. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Podmore, Frank. Modern Spiritualism. London: Methuen, 1902. Reprinted as Mediums of the Nineteenth Century. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Elvis

Following the death of Elvis Presley on August 16, 1977, numerous reports of contact with him began to surface. One set of these reports concluded that he was still alive and for whatever reason had made some random contact with different individuals. The exploration of that hypothesis even became the subject of a prime-time television special on United States television.

At the same time, a number of mediums and other people with some psychic abilities claimed to have contacted Elvis and to have received messages from him in the spirit world. (It is not unusual for mediums to claim contact with famous people who have recently died.) Among the first to claim contact was Milwaukee medium June Young, who claims to have begun receiving messages within days of Elvis's death. She published a magazine, Elvis Still Lives, which included texts of her ongoing contacts.

Journalist Hans Holzer received information on a variety of people with messages, but was most impressed with those received by Dorothy Sherry, who seems to have begun contact in January 1978. The account became the basic story of his recent book Elvis Speaks from the Beyond and other Celebrity Ghost Stories (1993).

Such stories have appeared regularly in the weekly tabloids, among the most recent being a 1995 account of a woman who claimed that she was cured by the ghost of Elvis.

Sources:

Holzer, Hans. Elvis Speaks from the Beyond and other Celebrity Ghost Stories. New York: Dorset Press, 1993.

"I Was Cured by Ghost of Elvis." Sun (January 24, 1995).

Elymas the Sorcerer (ca. 47 C.E.)

As reported in the Christian New Testament (Acts 13:7–12), a magician of Paphos, in Cyprus, who openly defied the Apostle Paul before the Roman governor. "Oh, full of all subtlety and mischief," said Paul in righteous anger, "child of the devil, enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord? And, now, behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thee, and thou shalt be blind, not seeing the sun for a season."

How Elymas exercised his talents is not related, nor are the characteristics of his sorceries, but we are told that the sentence of Paul immediately took effect, and "there fell on him a mist and a darkness; and he went about, seeking some to lead him by the hand."

"Elymus the Sorcerer Struck with Blindness" is the title of a famous cartoon by Raphael Sanzio (1483–1520), from which tapestries in the Vatican were executed.

Emanations

Supposedly perceived by psychics and identified by some parapsychologists, but largely unrecognized by mainstream science, emanations play a significant part in theories about psychic phenomena. Throughout history, subtle emanations have been postulated under a variety of names, such as the prana of ancient India, the mana of Polynesian primitives, the telesma of Hermes Trismegistus, the pneuma of Gallien, the astral light of the Kabbalists, and the spiritus of Robert Fludd. Since the late eighteenth century and Franz Anton Mesmer's proposals concerning magnetic fluid, a variety of terms for emanations have been proposed, such as "odic force," "animal magnetism," "ether," "radiations," and "vibrations." At various times emanations were said to proceed from and surround everything in nature. When living things were brought into contact through this medium the result was either interpenetration or repulsion.

Early Theories

Analogies with magnetism were inevitable because the properties of the magnet were known to ancient peoples, some authorities claiming that it was used in religious rites in Egypt, Greece, and Rome. They offered as evidence the iron rings and wings used in the Samothracian mysteries, the iron wings worn by priests of Jupiter to increase their magic power, and the various symbols ascribed to the paganistic gods.

It was said too that meteoric stones, because of a force they radiate, were used in religious rites, either as objects of worship or as tools for divination and soothsaying. Small stones were worn by the priests, and Pliny described the temple of Arsinoe as being vaulted with magnetic stone in order to receive a hovering statue of its patron. Cedrenus gave an account of an ancient image in the Serapium at Alexandria suspended by magnetic force.

The most ancient writing extant in which a theory of emanations may be found is ascribed to Timaeus of Locris (ca. 420–380 B.C.E.). He assigns the creation of the universe to divine emanations of God, an imparting of his being to unformed matter. By this union a world-soul was created that vitalized and regulated all things he said. Claudian, in his Idyl of the Magnet, uses the concept of emanations as a symbol of the informative spirit of things, the laws of nature, creative and existent.

The mysticism of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries mainly depended on ideas of radiation emanating from all things, but especially from the stars, magnets, and human beings—of a force that would act on all things and was controlled by an indwelling spirit. The writings of Paracelsus abound with instances of the theory. He asserted that every substance in itself contained something of the nature of the lodestone, that an "astral light"—one of the finer media of nature, finer than the luminiferous ether—existed throughout planetary space and especially around the human brain and spinal cord. He wrote that humans are simply organized magnets, each with poles that attract and repel, that our thoughts are magnetic emanations projected from our minds.

According to Paracelsus, the universe emanated from a great First Being and there was a reciprocity in all things. In man too there existed an "astral quality" emanating from the stars, which, when compared with the physical body, might be considered a spirit. He wrote that this life stood in connection with the stars from which it sprang and drew to it their power like a magnet. Paracelsus called this sidereal life the magnes microcosmi and made use of it to explain the manifestations of nature—it glowed in the flower, glided in the stream, moved in the ocean, and shone in the sky.

The alchemist Jean Baptiste Van Helmont wrote of an ethereal spirit, pure and living, that pervades all things. Robert Fludd explained sympathy and antipathy by the action of the emanatory spheres surrounding man: in sympathy the emanations proceed from the center; in antipathy the opposite movement takes place. He maintained that these sensitive emanations could also be found among animals and plants, drawing an argument from the fact that if inert substances, such as the earth and magnet seem to be, have their emanations and their poles, living forms must also have them. William Maxwell, a seventeenth-century Scottish physician, wrote: "There is a linking together of spirits, an incessant outpouring of the rays of our body into another."

The philosopher Descartes asserted that all space is filled with a fluid matter that he held to be elementary, the foundation and fountain of all life, enclosing all globes and keeping them in motion. The idea of emanation and magnetism is also found in Newton's doctrine of attraction, which he called the "Divine Sensorium." As he suggests in his Principles of Natural Philosophy,

"Here the question is of a very subtle spirit which penetrates through all, even the hardest bodies and which is concealed in their substance. Through the strength and activity of this spirit, bodies attract each other and adhere together when brought into contact. Through it electrical bodies operate at the remotest distances as well as near at hand, attracting and repelling; through this spirit the light also flows and is refracted and reflected and warms bodies."

Mesmer, in detailing his theoretical work for the committee of the French Academy of Science, broke down his ideas into a series of propositions. One was the following:

"Between the heavenly bodies, the earth and human beings, there exists a mutual or interchangeable influence. The medium of this influence is an universally distributed fluid which suffers no vacuum, is of a rarity with which nothing can compare and has the property of receiving and transmitting all impressions of movement. Animal bodies experience the mutual effect of this agent, because it penetrates the nerves and affects them directly. In the human body particularly are observed properties analogous to those of the magnet. It is shown by experiment that a matter flows out so fine that it penetrates all bodies without apparently losing any of its activity. This may be communicated to other bodies, animate or inanimate, such as mirrors; it is communicated, propagated, augmented by sound. Its virtues may be accumulated, concentrated and transported."

These propositions were basic to Mesmer's larger understanding of animal magnetism and its use in curing disease. Some experimenters in the field who followed Mesmer began to place increasing emphasis on the "mesmeric trance" and the phenomena associated with a mesmerized subject rather than the claimed physical properties of animal magnetism. In the trance condition, many sensitive individuals were said to exhibit clairvoyant and other paranormal faculties, as well as insensitivity to pain and susceptibility to suggestion. This direction of research culminated in two contradictory developments: a natural association between the psychic faculties of mesmerized subjects and the phenomena of Spiritualism; and the medical transition from mesmerism to hypnotism, in which psychic faculties were discredited and emphasis was given to abnormal physical phenomena.

Reichenbach Phenomena

During the nineteenth century, these different directions of research and theory coexisted and were often inextricably entangled. From 1840 on, German chemist Baron Karl von Reichenbach conducted experiments in electromagnetic phenomena in relation to a vital force which he called od or "odyle." Reichenbach maintained that this force was perceptible to sensitives, or psychic individuals, who could identify the poles of magnets as well as lines of force from human, animal, mineral, and vegetable sources in a totally dark room. These emanations were perceived by the sensitives as differing in color, size, intensity, and temperature according to the nature of the object examined. The poles of a magnet emitted flames which were reddish-yellow from the south pole and bluish-green from the north; similar polarity was perceived in the luminous emanation from crystal. He said that human fingers also radiated patterns of light. His claims have a unique bearing on the phenomena of psychical research and parapsychology because they deal with the question of special sensitivity of certain individuals to subtle force.

Dowsing or water witching, with its associated fields of radionics and radiesthesia, is specifically concerned with a claimed sensitivity to subjective and objective aspects of subtle force and polarity. The visual indications of subtle force allegedly perceived by Reichenbach's sensitives also have relevance to aura research, where lines of force and colors are described by psychics as surrounding the human body. Theories of emanations are also invoked for such phenomena as psychometry. Sir Oliver Lodge, lecturing before the Literary and Philosophical Society of Liverpool, speculated:

"Here is a room where a tragedy occurred, where the human spirit was strung to intense anguish. Is there any trace of that agony still present, and able to be appreciated by an attuned or receptive mind? I assert nothing, except that it is not inconceivable. If it happens, it may take many forms—that of vague disquiet perhaps, or even imaginary sounds or vague visions, or perhaps a dream or picture of the event as it occurred. Relics again. Is it credible that a relic, a lock of hair, an old garment retains any indication of the departed—retains any portion of his personality? Does an old letter? Does a painting?—an old master we call it. Aye, much of the personality of an old master may be thus preserved. Is not the emotion felt looking at it a kind of thought transference from the departed?"

Writing on the psychic gifts of the medium Stephan Ossowiecki, Charles Richet stated:

"There is something profoundly unknown in a line of our writing, other than the lines traced on the paper. This unknown something may be called an emanation. I have called it pragmatic emanation, which would act on our cryptesthesis and stimulate cognition. It resembles somewhat the emanation from subterranean water that provokes the movements of the dowsing rod."

The simile is suggestive. Running water, metals, crystals, and magnets produce strange sensations in some sensitives. In hypnotic and in hysteric cases the sensitivity to metals is very pronounced. The magnetism of the earth is felt by some sleepers according to whether they lie in the north-south or in the east-west position. Reichenbach discussed all these phenomena.

His famous work Researches on Magnetism, Electricity, Heat, Light, Crystallisation and Chemical Attraction in their Relations to the Vital Force was published and translated in 1849 and 1850. However, his Letters on Od and Magnetism (1852) provides a less complex introduction.

In the 1880s the Society for Psychical Research (SPR) investigated and replicated Reichenbach's claims. In trials with 45 subjects of both sexes, with ages ranging between 16 and 60, three professed to see something luminous. With one subject 14 consecutive successes were recorded. The SPR's committee concluded:

"In view of these apparent confirmations of previous testimony, the committee is inclined to the opinion that, among other unknown phenomena associated with magnetism, there is a prima facie case for the existence, under conditions not yet determined, of a peculiar and unexplained luminosity resembling phosphorescence, in the region immediately around the magnetic poles, and visible only to certain individuals" (Proceedings, vol. 1, 1883: 230).

However, another, more exhaustive, investigation on behalf of the American Society for Psychical Research by Prof. Joseph Jastrow and Dr. George Nutthal was entirely negative.

Other Turn-of-the-Century Experimenters

During the decades before World War I, the first generation of psychical researchers devoted a signifcant amount of energy in attempts to verify the existence of various forms of emanations from the human body. Among the more famous of these efforts center upon the experiments on the human aura by the physician Walter J. Kilner.

An interesting analogy can be found in the experiments of Dr. Joseph Maxwell regarding a "digital effluvium," the colored perception of which, according to his conclusions, indicated a highly psychical temperament. He advised that a dark object (e.g., an armchair covered with dark velvet) be placed between the light and the experimenter; the subject's hands were joined at the fingertips, palm toward the chest, and then slowly withdrawn, with the fingers kept stretched out. Seven or eight out of ten subjects, if their heads were on a level with the operator's head, perceived a sort of gray mist uniting the fingertips. Maxwell found that out of three hundred people of both sexes 240 to 250 perceived the effluvium; two or three out of a sample of one hundred saw it blue. Two saw it yellow and one saw it red. If the hands ceased to move, the effluvium disappeared. If the movements of withdrawal ceased when the fingertips were within 10 to 15 centimeters' proximity, the effluvium remained visible for a longer time.

Maxwell's experiments were conducted in daylight. One of his mediums saw the effluvium escape from the hands of the sitters and spread itself over the séance table. Putting out all light, Maxwell traced letters on the table with the tip of his finger. The medium was able to read five-lettered words thus traced.

This effluvium recalls the magnetic fluid of mesmerizers about which controversy ran high through much of the nineteenth century. Charles Richet believed that no satisfactory answer could be given to the question of whether the old method of mesmeric passes sets free some special human power that acts on other human beings. Eugene A. D. Rochas, Hyppolite Baraduc, and Emile Boirac claimed photographic evidence for its existence, though this evidence has proved inconclusive.

E. K. Müller, an engineer of Zürich and director of the Salus Institute for electromagnetic treatment of nervous disorders, also indicated the existence of an emanation from the human body that is capable of decreasing the resistance of an electric circuit. The experiments were further supported by the work of a Professor Farny of the Zürich Polytechnicum, who gave the name "anthropoflux" to the emanation. The maximum emission came from the inner surfaces of the fingers of the left hand. Its source appeared to be in the blood, but the breath was also charged with it. It penetrated a large number of substances, many of which gave off a secondary radiation and it could be stored in an inverted test tube in the same way as a gas.

Other mysterious emanations were claimed by Prosper Blondlot of the University of Nancy, France, in 1903. He asserted that the human brain and nerves give off rays that are capable of penetrating aluminum, black paper, and other opaque objects. He named them "N-rays" after the town of Nancy. The rays were believed to consist of at least four groups of ether vibrations. They were said to be of long wavelength and near electromagnetic waves in frequency. They could be obtained from various sources other than the Roentgen tube, and certain bodies seemed to have the property of retaining or storing the rays for a considerable amount of time. The human body was said to emit them continuously. Although nonluminous in themselves, the rays would increase the glow of any phosphorescent body they touched. A small spark or flame was similarly influenced. The existence of "N-rays" was supposedly demonstrated in photography; pictures taken without the rays were very faint, while those obtained while the "N-rays" were in action were much stronger.

Dr. Jules Regnault held it probable that the "N-rays" only constituted part of the radiation studied under the name "odic force." The reports of "N-rays" were followed by those of "N1-rays" and by the demonstration of Gustave LeBon that all bodies emit effluvia, which he called "dark light." In 1893 a Dr. Luys published a book on the direct visibility of cerebral effluvia.

Of the several attempts to substantiate the existence of human emanations, the "N-rays" were most singularly proven nonexistent. A few months after Blondlot had been honored by the French Academy of Science, he was visited by an American physicist, Robert W. Wood. Wood slyly removed a prism from Blondlot's apparatus while the latter was describing an "N-ray" spectrum. According to Wood, this had no effect on Blondlot's observations, which he concluded could only be imaginary. The ridicule that followed this "exposure" (see Nature, vol. 70, 1904, p. 530) culminated in Blondlot's madness and death.

In 1896 Commandant Darget of Tours, France, claimed to have proven the existence of vital emanations in plants by placing a freshly cut small fern on a photographic plate in a dark room. After two days he obtained the exact portrait of the plant, effluvia thrown from each leaflet and zones of contracting during its loss of vitality. His experiments led him to propose that a photographic plate be placed on the head and heart of a man who was believed to be dead but might be in danger of being buried alive. Darget believed that traces of life would show themselves on the plate. But G. de Fontenay advised caution, saying there might be "perfidies of the sensitive plate" and the interchange of gaseous matter between living bodies and the atmosphere, the influence of secretions, or the action of radiant heat that might well be responsible for some of the phenomena.

Dr. Louis Favre, experimenting with Agnes Schloemer, claimed to have discovered powerful vital emanations of the human body. By the imposition of her hands, Schloemer could allegedly destroy such resistant bacteria as the Bacillus subtilis and the bacillus anthracis.

Dr. H. Durville published similar results with the typhoid bacillus in the Bulletin General of the Psychological Institute of Paris, but the most sensational experiments in this field were conducted by Drs. L. Clarac and B. Llaguet of Bordeaux with a Mme. X. The report of their seven-year investigations, published in 1912, appeared to prove the existence of a fluid emanation by certain individuals that prevented the decomposition of plants or animals and preserved them in a desiccated but much finer state than any mummification process could.

The experiments were conducted in the doctors' own laboratory; the various objects were provided by the physicians and placed immediately under lock and key. The treatment took place in light, under perfect control, each experiment taking about twenty minutes and consisting of placing the hands of Mme. X in contact with the object or sometimes only near it. Plants dried up with the preservation of perfect color; wine showed no signs of acid fermentation; in oysters the process of putrefaction was prevented, or stopped if the treatment began at a later stage; and fish and birds were preserved in their form, color, and brightness of the eyes. The blood of a rabbit (without being drained) was preserved in a liquefied state for 25 days and remained as a solid red mass afterward.

Similar phenomena were demonstrated by Joanny Gaillard, a shoe dealer of Lyons. He claimed that from his youth he had been able to heal burns and bruises of any sort by laying on his right hand. He observed that when he juggled with oranges they became hardened. He believed that a fluid that counteracted putrefaction and had germicidal qualities emanated from his hands. He made experiments beginning in January 1928, one being to mummify animal corpses and perishable commodities in general. He found that even fish, after treatment, were perfectly preserved. Oranges and lemons became as hard as wooden balls.

He made a little museum of such objects, which René Sudre in Psychic Research (March 1929) admits having seen. Lyons physicians tested Gaillard's "fluid" on seeds and microbes. It appeared that he had succeeded in arresting the germination of lentil seeds. When he tried his fluid on a bacterial culture, however, it seemed to be reflected in some curious fashion and he got the sensation of having burned his hands. A committee of physicians in Paris before whom Gaillard appeared came to the conclusion that the existence of his fluid had not been demonstrated.

A. Bue, in his Le Magnétisme curatif (1894), narrates interesting experiments in hastening the growth of plants by "magnetic passes." Bulbs of hyacinths were used. According to Bue, "By magnetizing every day, for about five or ten minutes, the water in the vases where the roots of these tubercles are immersed, one is able to give such vitality to the sap, that stem and flower will speedily assume extraordinary appearances."

Similar experiments were reported by Dr. Louis Favre at a meeting of the Psychological Institute at Paris in 1905. According to his findings, the human hand exercised an action over the germination and growth of plants, the right hand being the most active. It strengthened feeble vitality and the influence of six minutes' action on the first day extended to the whole period of germination. The better the health of the plant, the stronger the action.

Heinrich Nusslein, the German automatic painting medium, claimed the power to prolong the life of fresh-cut flowers for several days by making passes over them.

Gambier Bolton, in his book Psychic Force (1906), recommends the flower-healing test to discover mediumistic powers. In this test a dying blossom is put into fresh water in a place where it is sheltered from the full rays of the sun. The experimenter rubs the palms of his hands together sharply for half a minute and then, standing in front of the flower, places the palms of both hands behind the flower and draws the hands in a semicircle toward his body. This action is repeated slowly and steadily, with concentration, from 12 to 20 times, remembering that it is not at all necessary to touch the flower. As a further test, another dying blossom might be placed in water three feet away from the first. When the 20 passes have been made over the first blossom, both should be placed out of reach, in a moderate temperature, and left there for 24 hours. If at the end of that period the one treated shows any signs of improvement, the experimenter has some powers; if both look better, he is likely to be a good medium.

Hyppolite Baraduc spent many years studying the emission of human "fluid" and photographed the emanations of human hands. He also invented a biometer to register vibrations emitted from the hands. In the hands of psychics he found luminosity radiating from the base of the palm. The subjects' mental state had great influence over the lines of light he obtained.

Mental distress was disclosed by confused lines. Baraduc also photographed his son and his wife, one four minutes after death and the other 24 hours after death. In each instance there was seen stretching from the lifeless body a great stream of force that extended to the ceiling of the room and then turned down again. The son's face allegedly could be recognized in the stream, seen close to the body, by anyone who had known him. A profile of his wife was also seen in the room.

Albert Nodon, president of the Bordeaux Astronomical Society, tested the radioactivity of living substances by a specially constructed electrometer. He found that the radioactivity of vegetable matter was of the same order as that of uranium. It was found to be greater in the reproductive organs than in other parts of the plants, and was greater in newly cut plants than in dried ones. Freshly dug earth had similar radioactivity. The insects showed three to five times greater radioactivity by unit of weight than uranium. Unfortunately Nodon's instrument, because of its construction, could not be applied to humans.

As reported in The Lancet in 1931, British physician Charles Russ constructed an instrument to demonstrate that an energy radiates from the human eye. He suspended in a jar a delicate solenoid of mica covered with strips of aluminium. Electrically charged metal plates were fixed to the outside of the glass vessel. When a person's gaze was focused intently on one end of the cylinder it moved away from the eye. When the gaze was fixed on the other end it moved toward the eye. When the gaze was directed at the center it remained stationary.

The destructive effect of the human gaze on séance room phenomena was claimed frequently. D. D. Home, before his levitations, usually asked the sitters not to look at him. The fire-resistance test was sometimes similarly handicapped by the spectators' earnest stares. Experiments suggest that when sitters blindfold their eyes, psychical phenomena gain in strength, and direct voice may be obtained in fair visibility. Unfortunately, preventing close observation in séances also facilitates the production of fraudulent phenomena.

Recent Experiments

In spite of years of research and thousands of experiments there has been no completely satisfying scientific demonstration of emanations of psychic force nor any definitive explanation. Most of the earlier experiments have not proved repeatable under strict control conditions.

The best of recent work on emanations began with the efforts of Bernard Grad, a gerontologist at McGill University in Montreal. In the 1960s he began work with Oscar Estabany, a Hungarian immigrant who claimed healing powers. Utilizing his large laboratory and trained staff, Grad was able to put Estabany through a series of tests involving the stimulation of plant growth and the healing rate of mice, all with positive results. His work was followed by that of biochemist M. Justa Smith, who also worked with Estabany. By using nonhuman targets in their work, they were able to isolate the healing "power" as the causative agent and eliminate human suggestibility. Their research has stood for several decades without refutation and has been supported by parapsychological research on psychokinesis.

Sources:

Academy of Parapsychology and Medicine. The Dimensions of Healing: A Symposium. Palo Alto, Calif.: The Author, 1972.

Burr, Harold S. The Fields of Life. New York: Ballantine, 1973.

Crile, George. The Phenomena of Life: A Radio-Electric Interpretation. London: William Heinemann, 1936.

Grad, Bernard. "Healing by the Laying on of Hands: Review of Experiments and Implications." Pastoral Psychology 21 (September 1970): 206.

Hasted, John. The Metal-Benders. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1981.

Kilner, Walter J. The Human Atmosphere. London, 1911. Reprinted as The Human Aura. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1965.

Krippner, Stanley, and D. Rubin. The Kirlian Aura; Photographing the Galaxies of Life. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Anchor, 1974.

Maby, J. Cecil, and T. B. Franklin. The Physics of the Divining Rod. London: G. Bell and Sons, 1939.

Maxwell, Joseph. Metapsychical Phenomena. London, 1905.

Presman, A. S. Electromagnetic Fields and Life. New York: Plenum Press, 1970.

Price, Harry. Fifty Years of Psychical Research. London: Longmans, Green, 1939.

Rahn, Otto. Invisible Radiations of Organisms. Berlin, 1936.

Reichenbach, Karl, Baron von. Letters on Od and Magnetism. London, 1926. Reprinted as The Odic Force: Letters on Od and Magnetism. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1968.

———. Researches on Magnetism, Electricity, Heat, Light, Crystallization and Chemical Attraction in Their Relations to the Vital Force. London, 1850. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1974.

Russ, Charles. "An Instrument Which is Set in Motion by Vision." The Lancet (July 3, 1931).

Tromp, S. W. Physical Physics; A Scientific Analysis of Dowsing, Radiesthesia, and Kindred Divining Phenomena. New York: Elsevier, 1949.

Emants, Marcellus (1848–1923)

Dutch author and poet who took a special interest in psychical phenomena. With the physiologist G. A. van Rijnberk, Emants took part in experiments with the famous medium Eusapia Palladino and became convinced of the genuineness of her phenomena. As a result, in 1903 Emants published an article in the Hague journal Het Vaderland proposing the foundation of a Dutch Society for Psychical Research. However, this did not take place at the time, and it was not until the efforts of G. Heymans of Groningen University that such a society was founded in 1920.

Emerald

One of the most highly esteemed precious stones, known to ancient Egyptians, Hindus, Greeks, and Romans. In India emeralds were used to adorn images in temples, and Moslems used emeralds as amulets, inscribed with verses from the Koran. Emeralds were believed to change color when surrounded by deception and treachery. They were also believed to be preservatives against decay, dysentery, and the bites of venomous creatures and to promote easy childbirth. In ancient Rome the emperor Nero was said to have had an unusually large emerald that he used for viewing gladiatorial contests. Presumably he was shortsighted and used it as a lens.

The Emerald Table (of Hermes)

A brief document believed to be the earliest statement of the principles of spiritual alchemy, ascribed to Hermes Trismegistus, after whom alchemy has been named "the hermetic art."

Hermes Trismegistus is a shadowy figure, possibly mythical. The old alchemists believed him to have been an Egyptian living about the time of Moses; others have claimed him to have been a personification of Thoth, the Egyptian god of learning. There is a legend that the Emerald Table (also known as the Smaragdine Table) was discovered by Alexander the Great in the tomb of Hermes in a cave near Hebron.

The earliest printed version in Latin dates from an alchemical work of 1541, but a commentary on it was known three centuries earlier, and the table might well be ancient. The original was believed to have been inscribed on emerald (smaragdine) in Phoenician letters, later translated into Greek and Latin. It has been translated into English as follows:

"True, without error, certain and most true; that which is above is as that which is below, and that which is below is as that which is above, for performing the miracles of the One Thing; and as all things were from one, by the mediation of one, so all things arose from this one by adaptation; the father of it is the Sun, the mother of it is the Moon; the wind carries it in its belly; the nurse thereof is the Earth. This is the father of all perfection, or consummation of the whole world. The power of it is integral, if it be turned into earth. Thou shalt separate the earth from the fire, the subtle from the gross, gently with much wisdom; it ascends from earth to heaven, and again descends to earth; and receives the strength of the superiors and of the inferiors—so thou hast the glory of the whole world; therefore let all obscurity flee before thee. This is the strong fortitude of all fortitudes, overcoming every subtle and penetrating every solid thing. So the world was created. Hence were all wonderful adaptations of which this is the manner. Therefore am I called 'Thrice Great Hermes,' having the Three Parts of the philosophy of the whole world. That which I have written is consummated concerning the operation of the Sun."

This statement's theme of "as above, so below" became a keystone of occult philosophy.

Sources:

Hauck, Dennis William. The Emerald Tablet: Alchemy for Personal Transformation. New York: Penguin/Arkana, 1999.

Mead, G. R. S., ed. Thrice-Greatest Hermes. 3 vols. London: J. M. Watkins, 1964.

E-Meter

Common term for a device known as an "electropsychometer," invented by Volney Mathison in the United States. It measures galvanic skin response through changes in the electrical conductivity of the skin when the subject is emotionally aroused. The subject holds a handle in each hand, and strongly emotive thoughts cause a meter needle to register a dramatic change from zero. In the 1950s, the E-meter became an established part of the procedures of Dianetics and Scientology. Use of the E-meter by the members of the Church of Scientology is explained in a series of books written by church founder L. Ron Hubbard.

Sources:

Hubbard, L. Ron. The Book Introducing the E-meter. Los Angeles: Church of Scientology of California, 1975.

———. The Book of E-meter Drills. Compiled by Mary Sue Hubbard. Los Angeles: Church of Scientology of California, 1965.

———. E-Meter Essentials. Los Angeles: Church of Scientology of California, 1975.

———. Understanding the E-Meter. Los Angeles: Bridge Publications, 1981.

Emissaries of Divine Light

The Emissaries of Divine Light is an international spiritual community founded in 1932 by Lloyd Arthur Meeker, then a resident of Tennessee. He had for several years been giving focused consideration to the meaning of life which finally led him on an inner search and to a realization that he was responsible for the quality of his life experience. He came to the conclusion that humans were created to manifest the divine design. God is thus the focus of all beingness. Distortions in life appear when evil influences (fear, hate, anger, etc.) gain control of the mind. However, humans have the power to choose which influences they will allow to influence their mind.

Meeker began to write his conclusions under the pen name Uranda. He was soon joined by a young colleague, Lord Martin Cecil (d. 1988), who became head of the Emissaries following Meeker's death in a plane crash in 1954. Meeker had established the main U.S. center of the movement, Sunrise Ranch, in 1945 in Loveland, Colorado. Cecil opened the primary Canadian center at 100 Mile House in British Colombia.

The Emissaries now exists through 12 communal centers scattered around the globe, and in more than one hundred teaching centers, each managed by a small group of people affiliated with the movement. They offer classes and workshops that assist people in remembering their own divine nature. One method for doing that is "The Opening," a seminar/workshop experience that introduces individuals to their divine identity, the universal principles that govern life, and the nature of the invisible realm. Meeker also developed a unique healing process called Attunement, a non-touch healing technique that attempts to restore the spiritual element to the healing process. It begins in the harmonization of the healer, the patient, and the source of all being.

The Emissaries may be contacted through its American headquarters at 5569 N. Country Rd. 29, Loveland, CO 80537. It has an Internet site at http://www.emissaries.org.

Sources:

Cecile, Martin. Being Where You Are. New Cannaan, Conn.: Keats Publishing, 1974.

———. On Eagle's Wings. New York: Two Continents Publishing Group, 1977.

Exeter, Martin. Thus It Is. Denver, Colo.: Foundation House Publications, 1989.

Layne, Laurence. Attunement: The Sacred Landscape. St Augustine, Fla.: The Florida School of Attunement and Natural Healing, 1998.

Emma

The servant girl of Joseph Haddock, a well-known English exponent of animal magnetism before the advent of Spiritualism. Emma was the first English somnambule or trance subject whose powers of clairvoyance and trance visions were carefully recorded. These were published in Haddock's book Somnolism and Psychism (1851) and in such journals of the time as The Zoist and the Boston Chronicle.

Haddock narrated that one day, trying to put a patient into magnetic (mesomeric) sleep, he thought of suspending a magnet from the ceiling and directing the patient to look steadfastly at it. Emma was in the kitchen under the room where he was practicing and knew nothing of his movements. In a few minutes Haddock smelled burning and called out to his daughter to look for the cause. She found Emma on fire. Haddock quickly ran down and found her mesmerized, on her knees before the kitchen fire, engaged in sweeping the hearth and with her apron burning from contact with a glowing coal. She was unconscious of the fire and her attention was wholly directed to a point in the kitchen ceiling. When asked what she was doing, she replied, "I want that magnet." When Haddock pretended not to understand, she replied, "that magnet hanging up there" and accurately described its position.

Subsequent experiments disclosed that Emma had remarkable powers both in medical and in traveling clairvoyance. Haddock freely employed her for making diagnoses. She could describe the diseased structures in the patient's body without medical terms. Looking at the heart she called the auricles the "ears" and the ventricles the "meaty part." She distinguished between arterial and venous blood in the heart by calling one the "light side" and the other the "dark side." She could see events at a distance and described the whereabouts of lost or stolen property.

One case attracted considerable attention at the time. A Mr. Arrowsmith of Bolton, England, was considerably worried over a sum of £650 that one Mr. Lomax the cashier remembered to have paid into the bank but which the bank denied receiving. Emma was consulted. On being given the envelope that had contained the money, she correctly described the contents and how they were handed in at the bank counter and finally described the missing banknotes and the bill of exchange in an envelope with other papers in an inner room of the bank. Arrowsmith went to the bank and demanded another search, and on the directions given by Emma, the money was found among some old circulars in the manager's private room.

Like her contemporary Adèle Maginot, Emma had visions of the future life and spiritual matters, which Haddock also recorded in his book.

Sources:

Haddock, Joseph. Somnolism and Psychism. 1851. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Emmanuel

Emmanuel, an entity who speaks through channel Pat Rodegast, emerged in the early 1980s as a being of golden light. Once he was comfortable with Emmanuel's presence, Rodegast worked with Emmanuel regularly, and some of the material from the channeling sessions were published in 1985 as Emmanuel's Book: A Manual for Living Comfortably in the Cosmos.

Emmanuel emphasizes a message of humans coming into a new relationship with God as co-creators. Separation from God had served a purpose and was now coming to an end. The clarity and simplicity with which Emmanuel spoke attracted popular New Age teacher Baba Ram Dass (Richard Alpert), who backed Rodegast in her channeling activity and wrote the introduction to Emmanuel's Book. He was convinced of Emmanuel's reality because of the perceived differences between Rodegast and her channeled entity.

Sources:

Rodegast, Pat, and Judith Stanton. Emmanuel's Book: A Manual for Living Comfortably in the Cosmos. New York: Some Friends of Emmanuel, 1985.

Emmerich, (Anne) Catherine (1774–1824)

German nun of the Augustine order who had ecstatic visions. Born September 8, 1774, at Flamske, Westphalia, Emmerich grew up in a peasant family. She became a servant in the household of an organist named Söntgen, and when his daughter Clara entered the convent of Agnetenberg at Dülmen, the sisters there were persuaded to take Catherine Emmerich as well. She was admitted as a postulant November 13, 1802, and professed a year later.

At the end of 1811, however, the government of Jerome Bonaparte, king of Westphalia, suppressed the convent. The church was closed and the community dispersed. Emmerich was destitute and ill, and for a few months stayed in the convent buildings, ministered to by Abbé Jean Martin Lambert (an elderly priest) and a servant girl. The three were later obliged to vacate the premises, and in 1812 the priest and Emmerich were lodged in the house of a widow.

Here she experienced frequent and prolonged ecstatic states. They were discovered accidently by Clara Söntgen, who went to visit her and found her in ecstasy with stigmata, blood falling from her outstretched hands. Clara at first thought she had met with an accident, but when she mentioned it to Emmerich afterward, Emmerich begged her to keep it secret.

On December 31, 1813, Emmerich's confessor, Father Limberg, also saw the stigmata when giving her Holy Communion. He discussed it with Father Lambert, and the two priests agreed to keep the matter secret, as they were uncertain what should be done.

Meanwhile Clara reported the matter to her father, and soon everyone in Dülmen was talking about it. The local physician visited Emmerich, determined to end her "hysteria," but came away convinced of the genuineness of the phenomena. He made an official report, and soon the administrator of the diocese of Münster took up the matter. Priests and doctors examined the girl, and as the news spread far and wide, famous visitors also came to see her, including the poet Clemens Brentano.

During her ecstasies, Emmerich experienced and described detailed scenes of Jesus' passion and crucifixion, including the story of the woman Seraphia said to have wiped the face of Jesus with a cloth, which later bore a miraculous picture of Jesus formed from the blood and sweat. Such sacred images came to be called veronicas (from the Greek icon, "image," and the Latin vera, "true"), the most famous being the Turin Shroud. The visions were approved by a number of theologians and priests, and highly regarded by Pope Pius IX, who requested that an Italian translation of them appear with the German original.

Emmerich continued to experience ecstasies and stigmata with severe wounds. She died February 9, 1824, after much agony caused by a wound in her side. She died murmuring the name of Jesus. She was buried on February 13, and six weeks later was exhumed, after a rumor that the body had been stolen. It was found that there was no corruption. The grave was opened again 32 years later, on October 6, 1856, and the body was still intact.

Sources:

Emmerich, Anne Catherine. The Dolorous Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ. Springfield, Ill.: Templegate, 1951.

———. Leben der Heil, Jungfrau Maria. Munich: Literarisch-artistische Anstalt, 1852. Translated as The Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary by Michael Paliret. Springfield, Ill.: Templegate, 1954.

Schmöger, Carl E. The Life of Anna Catherine Emmerick. 2 vols. Los Angeles: Maria Regina Guild, 1968.

Encausse, Gérard (1865–1916)

Physician and occultist who wrote under the pseudonym "Papus." He was born July 13, 1865, at La Corogne, Spain, the son of a French chemist and Spanish woman. At the age of four, he went to France with his parents and was educated in Paris. As a young man he spent much time at the Bibliothèque Nationale, studying magic and alchemy. He became a physician and also joined the Theosophical Society, but resigned from it because of its emphasis on Eastern occult teachings.

In 1888 Papus published his Traité élémentaire de science occulte, the first of a number of books, and that same year founded the journal L'Initiation (1888–1914). He was an associate of such other well-known occultists as Joséphin Peladan, Stanislas de Guaita, and Oswald Wirth and founded the Independent Group for Esoteric Studies, which attracted a large number of students of the occult. He later directed the Martinist Order, based on the teaching of Louis Claude de Saint-Martin (1743–1803).

The many books by Papus cover the whole realm of occult thought, but his works on the tarot have remained by far his most popular. Three of his works were edited by his son Philippe Encausse.

Papus played a part in exposing the famous Leo Taxil hoax against Freemasonry and the Roman Catholic Church in France. Notwithstanding his occult activities, Encausse remained a popular and devoted physician. He served in the French army medical corps during World War I and died of a pulmonary infection October 25, 1916.

Sources:

Papus [Gérard Encausse]. Le tarot des bohémiens. 1889. Revised edition as The Tarot of the Bohemians. Translated by A. P. Morton. Edited by A. E. Waite. London: Rider & Son, 1910.

———. Le tarot divinatoire (The divinatory tarot). 1909. Reprint, Paris: Dangles, 1969.

———. The Qabalah. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1977.

———. Traité élémentaire de science occulte (Elementary treatise on occult science). 10th ed. Paris: A. Michel, 1926.

———. Traité méthodique de magie pratique (Systematic treatise on practical magic). 1924. Reprint, Paris: Dangles, 1969.

Waite, A. E. "Papus: A Biographical Note." Occult Review 25 (January 1917): 34–36.

The Enchiridion of Pope Leo III

A collection of charms, cast in the form of prayers, that have nothing in common with those of the Roman Catholic Church. The Enchiridion is concerned chiefly with worldly, rather than spiritual, advantages. It is said to have been printed in Rome in 1523, and again in 1606. Its magical virtue rests on a supposed letter from Charlemagne to Pope Leo, in which the former states that since receiving the Enchiridion he has never ceased to be fortunate. However, no such letter appears to be in the Vatican library, where it was supposed to be lodged. The charms that the Enchiridion contains are supposed to be effectual against all the dangers to which human flesh is heir—poison, fire, wild beasts, and tempests.

When a copy of the book has been secured, it must be placed in a small bag of leather, carried on the person, and one page at least read daily. The reading must be done upon the knees with the face turned to the east, and works of piety must be performed in honor of the celestial spirits, whose influence it is desired to attract. The first chapter of the Gospel according to St. John is declared to be the most potent in the book. As for the symbols, they are mostly of Oriental origin.

The book also includes what are claimed as the mysterious prayers of Pope Leo III and certain conjurations of a semimagical character, including the seven mysterious orisons, which are merely clumsy imitations of the Roman ritual. From an extant edition of 1633, it seems unlikely that this book was the work of Pope Leo III and is more likely a compilation by a maker of grimoires (textbooks of black magic).

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Book of Black Magic and of Pacts Including the Mysteries of Goëtic Theurgy, Sorcery, and Infernal Necromancy. London: George Redway, 1898. Revised as The Book of Ceremonial Magic. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961.

Endless Cord, Tying Knots in

Around 1877–78 J. C. F. Zöllner (1834–1882) of Leipzig, Germany, investigated the phenomena of the medium Henry Slade, looking particularly for anything that might prove a fourth dimension of space, a hypothesis in which Zöllner was greatly interested.

Tying in an endless cord such knots as could ordinarily only be made if the ends of the cord were free was to provide such a test. In December 1877 Zöllner visited Slade with two pieces of hempen cord, the free ends of each being sealed to a piece of cardboard. To ensure that the cord was always in sight, Zöllner hung it round his neck, and kept Slade's hands continually in view. Under these circumstances four knots were produced, apparently on the original sealed cord. This experiment was in no way conclusive in the light of Slade's later reputation as a fraud and in view of the startling tricks performed by stage magicians with cords and rings. Zöllner reported on his experiment in his book Transcendental Physics (1880), which became the object of much ridicule by his colleagues.

End of the World

One of the most common concepts in prophetic literature, especially in the apocalyptical literature of Judaism and Christianity. The term can denote either the end of the physical world (cosmos) or the end of the social order (aeon). The theological term eschatology refers to teachings about the "last things," (from the Greek eschaton). Eschatology includes a consideration not only of the destiny of the world but of the individual (death, judgment, heaven, hell).

The most dramatic form of eschatology is apocalypticism. The apocalyptic vision views the world as essentially on a downward path. It will soon reach such a negative state that divine powers will intervene and bring the present order to an end. Only the faithful will be saved from destruction. There are a number of biblical passages representative of the apocalyptic viewpoint. In the Hebrew Bible (the Christian Old Testament) passages in Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Joel, Zechariah, and especially Daniel speak in apocalyptic terminology. In the Christian New Testament, passages in Mark and Thessalonians have strong apocalyptic overtones, while the Apocalypse or book of Revelation is an entire apocalyptic tract, demonstrably the most influential apocalyptic text in Western culture. Apocalyptic reflections also dominate some of the apocryphal literature, books written by ancient Hebrews but not included in the Bible. Such writings embody inspirational visions of the coming or second advent of a messiah, the state of faith, and interpretations of the future.

The most well-known apocalyptic book is that "channeled" by St. John of Patmos, the book of Revelation, which describes in some detail a vision of the endtime. It circulated widely among Christians at a time when they were under severe persecution for their faith. Like many older apocalyptic works, it is written in highly metaphorical language and describes a climatic cosmic war between the forces of good and evil. The forces of good are represented by the church and God's angels and the forces of evil by the Antichrist, the beast whose name can be determined by numerology, "666," and their respective human supporters. The powerful images of this book constantly reappear in Western prophetic and apocalyptic literature over the centuries. One persistent theme in apocalyptic literature, for example, is the figure of the Antichrist, the mighty ruler opposed to God, as cited in the Epistles of John. This image harks back to the historical figure of Antiochus IV, a persecutor of the Jews.

The apocalyptical concept of the end of the world and the Antichrist figure have analogies in pre-Christian religions, such as Iranian mythology of the final conflict between Ahura Mazda and Ahriman. However, it is within the Jewish and Christian traditions that apocalyptic enthusiasm has been most notable.

In the West, in almost every generation there have arisen groups with an apocalyptic worldview and an expectation that they are witnessing the last days of human history. Not infrequently, these groups go so far as to set a specific date on which the endtime events will be initiated. Basic to such groups have been a "historicist" reading of the apocalyptic passages of the Bible, in which the prophetic texts are seen as referring to contemporary events. The failure of the proposed events to occur on time always creates a crisis in apocalyptic groups. Only rarely do they admit any significant error. Rather, they suggest that the date was incorrect and propose a new date, or, more often, they spiritualize the prophecy and suggest that it really occurred, but in an invisible spiritual realm.

In recent centuries, a number of apocalyptic date-setting groups arose from the teachings of British visionaries Joanna Southcott and, more notably, William Miller. Miller led an Adventist movement in the United States in the 1830s, a forerunner of both the Jehovah's Witnesses and the Seventh-Day Adventists. Miller proclaimed the Day of Judgment as March 21, 1843, but the date passed without apocalypse, and a revised calculation by one of the Adventist leaders proposed a new date of October 22, 1844. Many Adventists made special preparations for the coming of Christ, and most gathered for all-night prayer meetings on the eve of the expected event, but did not, as was widely reported by their theological enemies, don ascension robes and gather on hilltops. All were disappointed. Many, including Miller, admitted their mistake. Some posed new dates, and out of their subsequent failures have come a host of small Adventist groups (including the Advent Christian Church and the Jehovah's Witnesses).

Others found a means of reinterpreting Miller's teachings in a spiritualizing direction. Among them, Ellen G. White suggested that the date did not refer to a terrestrial event, but to a cleansing of a heavenly sanctuary. That event, which began in 1844, presages the more visible return of Christ in the indefinite but imminent future. White's teachings became the interpretation accepted by the Seventh-day Adventist Church.

In Britain in 1881 there was a panic in country districts during which people left their houses and spent the night in prayer, convinced that the world was coming to its end. This was occasioned by a fake prophecy ascribed to the legendary prophetess Mother Shipton: "The world to an end shall come, in eighteen hundred and eighty one." In fact, these and similar lines were invented by an eccentric bookseller named Charles Hindley, who had published them for a prank. He had already confessed to the hoax years earlier, but by then the prophecies had passed into folklore, and ordinary country people did not have access to the learned journals in which the hoax was discussed.

The end of the world concept figures in Eastern religions such as Hinduism and Buddhism, but Eastern and Western eschatology differ radically in their concepts of time. In esoteric Hinduism, time is regarded as a limitation of human consciousness and as illusory as the material world itself, designated as maya. On a popular level, Hindu mythology proposes vast cycles of time (yugas) in the ages of the world, during which there are great periods of creation, righteousness, decline, and eventual dissolution, part of an infinite cycle of creation and destruction of the cosmos. In the period of decline, there is the messianic concept of the rebirth of the divine Shree Krishna, who will redeem the world.

However, all these cycles are only a dreamlike moment of time in divine consciousness, of which the individual souls are myriad fragments; and in self-realization, or moksha, the individual consciousness goes beyond the duality of subject and object and is subsumed in a timeless and blissful divine consciousness, independent of time, space, and causality, which fall away as illusory.

It is of some interest that astrology has been the basis of apocalyptic speculations. For example, at the end of the seventeenth century, a group of German Rosicrucians settled in Pennsylvania and established an astrological observatory to search for the signs of Jesus' return. The group, known as the Woman in the Wilderness, died out, disappointed, in the early eighteenth century. More recently, with the alignment of most of the planets in the solar system in 1982, many astrologers predicted significant changes. Their predictions were bolstered by the predictions of two geophysicists, John R. Gribbin and Stephen H. Plageman, who termed their discovery of the effects of such events "the Jupiter effect," which became the title of a popular book they wrote. Gribbin and Plageman dealt honestly with the flaws in their predictions in a sequel, The Jupiter Effect Reconsidered. (See also Malachy Prophecies)

Sources:

Balleline, G. R. Past Finding Out: The Tragic Story of Joanna Southcott and Her Successors. New York: Macmillan, 1957.

Chamberlin, E. R. Antichrist and the Millennium. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1975.

Clark, Doug. Earthquake—1982: When the Planets Align—(Syzygy). Garden Grove, Calif.: Lyfe Production Publications, 1976.

Gribbin, John R. Beyond the Jupiter Effect. London: MacDonald, 1983.

———. The Jupiter Effect. New York: Walker, 1974. Revised as The Jupiter Effect Reconsidered. New York: Vintage, 1982.

Griffin, William, ed. Endtime: The Doomsday Catalog. New York: Macmillan, 1979.

Lowery, T. L. The End of the World. Cleveland, Tenn.: Lowery Publications, 1969.

Nichol, Francis D. The Midnight Cry. Washington, D.C.: Review & Herald Publishing Association, 1944.

Robinson, Douglas. American Apocalypses: The Image of the End of the World in American Literature. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1985.

Endor, Witch of

The Witch of Endor, one of the most important characters in Western occult history, was a figure who briefly appeared in the Jewish Bible (the Christian Old Testament) in 1 Samuel 28. She was what in Hebrew was called an "ob." According to the story, Saul was about to fight his climactic battle with his traditional enemies, the Philistines. It was common prior to battle for him, the first king of the Jewish tribes, to seek supernatural guidance. Previously, he had several sources available to him, the most important being the seer Samuel. He could also consult dreams, cast lots, or refer to the mysterious stones worn on the high priest's breastplate called the Urim and Thummin. However, Samuel was dead and Saul had been cut off from Yahweh, the Hebrew deity, because of his disobedience. In his desperation, Saul turned to the "ob," a practitioner of one of the neighboring religions who had occult powers. He asked the woman to bring up the spirit of Samuel, his deceased seer advisor, who appeared and affirmed what Saul already knew, that it was the end. The next day Saul lost the battle. His sons were killed and he committed suicide.

The modern question is, who or what was the "ob." The "ob" was what today would be described as a psychic or medium. More importantly, the "ob" was represented in the Pagan religions of all the lands that surrounded Israel, and of the nations that had formerly imprisoned her (Exod. 7:11). Saul, in his early attempts to consolidate his own power as the king of a Jewish kingdom, had banished all of the obs from the land. This was in keeping with the laws that obs should not be allowed among the Jews (Lev. 20:27; Exod. 22:18). In the Middle Ages, the biblical ob was identified with the new idea of a witch and witches, formerly the practitioners of the European Pagan religions, who were redefined as Satanists—that is, as Christians who had turned their back on Jesus Christ and now worshiped the Christian anti-god, Satan. The myth of Satanism, most clearly stated in a book, The Witches Hammer, written by two Dominican priests, became an excuse for the church (through the Inquisition) and various governments to persecute a wide range of people who were accused of practicing what were termed the black arts. At the time of the Protestant Reformation the myth of Satanism passed into Protestantism and at times Protestant countries persecuted people as witches in a manner far more extreme than Roman Catholics.

The issue of the ob arose acutely at the beginning of the seventeenth century in England. Under Elizabeth's lengthy rule, Anglicanism had been established as the dominant religion. However, at the same time there were many Puritans, Protestants who wished to purify the church along what they saw to be more biblical standards, and one of their goals was to have a new translation of the Bible published in English. The problem in this endeavor was Elizabeth's successor, James I, a Roman Catholic. In order to assure themselves that James would approve the publication, they made a number of moves, the most important being the dedication of the new translation to the new king, and it has since been known as the King James Bible.

The Puritan leaders were also aware that King James believed in the existence of witches and greatly feared them. This appears to be the rationale for the translation of "ob" as "witch" in the King James Bible and for the description of her as a woman with a familiar spirit. In popular mythology, all witches had a demon spirit who lived with her, often in the form of a pet animal such as a black cat. James' approval of the Bible, and its subsequent rise to a position of dominance as the Bible translation of choice in the English-speaking world, identified the ancient ob as a Satanist witch in the eyes of many Christians for several centuries. This identification provided a theological foundation for the last round of witch hunts in England and the New England colonies and the popular image of witches in folklore.

The reappraisal of the "ob" became part of modern historical biblical criticism in the twentieth century, and as new translations appeared, the more descriptive term "medium" was used in place of "witch." This term has similar problems in that it tends to identify the ob with modern Spiritualist mediums who work at spirit contact put forth as a demonstration of an individual's conscious survival of death. As there was no belief in such survival in ancient Israel, obs would not have functioned as mediums. They were simply seers working out of a different religious/cultural context.

Sources:

Brown, Cheryl Anne. No Longer Silent: First Century Jewish Portraits of Biblical Women. Louisville, Ky.: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1992.

Sutphin, John E., Jr. The Bible and Spirit Communication. Starkville, Miss.: Metamental Missions, 1971.

Wallis, E. W., and M. H. Wallis. Spiritualism and the Bible. London: The Authors, n.d.

Enfield Poltergeist

The poltergeist that for several years disturbed the home of a family in the Enfield section of London in the 1970s has become one of the best-documented incidents in modern parapsychology. The story began in 1977 when Mrs. Harper and her three children moved into their new residence in Enfield. One August evening after putting the children to bed, Mrs. Harper was called to their room and witnessed a large chest of drawers move. She returned it to its place, and it moved again. Knocking was heard. She called the police, and they also heard the knocking coming from the walls and saw a chair move. The phenomena continued for the next week. A priest and a medium were called in. They could do nothing and the knocks and unusual movements of objects continued. Next they invited the news media. Their patient waiting was finally rewarded with a host of flying objects, including a pan that hit the photographer on the forehead.

At this point the Society for Psychical Research was called in. Thus, for the next 13 months, Michael Grosse and Guy Lyon Playfair made extensive observations and kept detailed records of the paranormal phenomena. They recorded over 2,000 unexplained events. They also tried means such as wiring down a bed to stop the phenomena. In the case of the bed, the wire was snapped and the bed moved regardless. They were continually frustrated in their attempts to photograph or make sound recordings of the phenomena.

A medium, Annie Shaw, was brought in to communicate with any possible spirit entity who might be in the house. She suggested that there were several entities feeding off an energy leakage in the aura of Mrs. Harper and one of the children, Janet, who had been especially associated with the unusual happenings. Shaw fixed the leakages and the phenomena were quelled for a short period, but when they reappeared a few weeks later, they reached a new level of violence. Over the next months Grosse and Playfair observed and recorded, and gradually focused upon Janet. In December of 1977, a voice began to speak through her. He claimed to be an old man whose family had once lived in the house. In succeeding weeks Janet levitated on several occasions, was bombarded with objects, and had a pillow stuffed in her mouth.

The number of incidents began to decline in the spring of 1978. By this time several additional psychics had been involved, including Dutch psychic Dono Gmelig-Meyling. He brought to light an outside factor, Grosse's involvement in the case was due to his grief reaction to the untimely death of his daughter two years previously. Grosse and Playfair went on to write a book, This House Is Haunted (1980). Two years later Janet was given a test at Birkbeck College, and to the surprise of all she was able to move the marker on a weighing machine by a kilogram.

Explanations of the Enfield poltergeist have divided those who accept a paranormal explanation between those who attribute it to a spirit entity and those who attribute it to telekinetic power emanating from one or more of the children, especially Janet. A more skeptical perspective was offered by Anita Gregory, who tried to explain the phenomena away as having been fraudulently produced by the children, though a number of the incidents do not seem to yield to such an analysis. The case remains one of the most spectacular in parapsychological records.

Sources:

Gregory, Anita. "Anatomy of a Fraud." Annals of Science 34 (1977).

Playfair, Guy Lyon. This House Is Haunted. London: Souvenir Press, 1980.

Engelbrecht, Johann (1599–1642)

German religious visionary. Engelbrecht acquired his psychic gifts after an illness, when he announced that he would live forever. In an account of his visions he states:

"I heard for 41 nights the holy angels singing and playing on the heavenly music to my bodily ears. Those would be wise witlings who are unable to believe anything but what they hear or grasp themselves. Our Lord has been beforehand with, for he opened the corporeal ears of the widow Shamann, who, sitting up with me one night and being in profound devotion, clapping her head to mine heard such a grand heavenly concert of music that she was not able to express it sufficiently. Anyone inquiring of her she will give the same account."

The ecstatic visions of Engelbrecht were followed by physical and other psychic phenomena. Troopers fired at him and broke a lance to splinters on his head, but he walked off uninjured. In ecstatic condition he preached for weeks without food, weariness, or loss of strength. To prove that his abstinence from food was genuine, and that he was fed spiritually, he went voluntarily to prison, guarded for a week or so from all possibility of material sustenance, and came out as strong as when he entered.

He predicted and foresaw in a vision in 1625 the events that the French Revolution brought about. When the vision was explained to him, he writes that he heard a voice say,

" 'John, get up and write down what thou hast seen.' But as I kept lying still in my bed I received a blow upon my face, and heard a voice say: 'Thus shall it be with all who do the work of God negligently.' Upon which I got up, lit a candle and wrote down the vision and exposition. Now when the day came and the pastor saw me, observing my eye to be black and blue, he asked me which way it became so. On explaining he was greatly surprised."

Sources:

Engelbrecht, Johann. The Divine Visions of Johann Engelbrecht. 2 vols. Northampton, England, 1780.

ENGLAND

This entry covers Anglo-Saxon practices of magic and witchcraft through the Middle Ages in England. See also separate entries for Scotland, Wales, and the pre-Saxon inhabitants of England, the Celts. For the modern period, see separate entries on magic and witchcraft.

Early Magic and Witchcraft

The Anglo-Saxon system of magic was based on the Teutonic. Witchcraft practitioners were called wicca (or wicce, feminine), scin-laeca, galdor-craeftig, wiglaer, and morthwyrtha. A wiglaer (from wig, idol or temple, and laer, learning) was a wizard, and a wicca or wicce was a witch. Scin-laeca (a shining dead body) was a species of phantom or apparition; the term was also used to identify someone who had the power of producing such phantoms. Galdor-craeftig implies one skilled in incantations, and morthwyrtha is, literally, "a worshiper of the dead." Another general appellation for such personages was dry (magician).

The laws prohibiting these practices carried severe penalties. The best account given of them is found in a passage written during the reign of Edward and Guthrun (tenth century):

"If any wicca, or wiglaer, or false swearer, or morth-wyrtha, or any foul, contaminated, manifest horcwenan [whore queen or strumpet], be any where in the land, man shall drive them out. We teach that every priest shall extinguish all heathendom, and forbid wilweorthunga [fountain-worship], and licwiglunga [incantations of the dead], and hwata [omens], and galdra [magic], and man-worship, and the abominations that men exercise in various sorts of witchcraft, and in frithspottum, and with elms and other trees, and with stones, and with many phantoms."

From subsequent regulations, it is clear that witchcraft and magic were used for violence, for penitentiary penalties were levied against anyone who injured or killed another by wiccecraefte (witchcraft).

Witches apparently used philters (love potions), for it was also a crime to gain another's love through enchanted food or drink. Wicca were also forbidden to wiglian (divine) by the moon. King Canute renewed the prohibitions. He declared it illegal to worship the sun or the moon, fire or floods, wells or stones, or any sort of tree; to love wiccecraefte, or to frame death spells, either by lot or by torch; or to effect anything by phantoms. The Poenitentiale of Theodore reveals that witches also claimed the power of letting loose tempests.

Another name for magic among the Anglo-Saxons was unlybban wyrce (destructive of life). Penitence was prescribed for a woman who killed a man by unlybban. In one account a woman who had resolved to kill her stepson, or at least to alienate him from his father's affection, sought a witch who knew how to change minds by arts and enchantments. Offering the witch rewards, the stepmother inquired how the father's mind might be turned from the child and fixed on her. The witch immediately made a magic medicament and it was mixed with the husband's meat and drink. The episode ended with the murder of the child and the stepmother's exposure.

The Anglo-Saxons used numerous charms. They trusted in their incantations to cure disease, for successful planting and harvest, for the discovery of lost property, and for the prevention of casualties. Specimens of their charms have been preserved. The Venerable Bede recorded that "many, in times of disease (neglecting the sacraments) went to the erring medicaments of idolatry, as if to restrain God's chastisements by incantations, phylacteries, or any other secret of the demoniacal arts."

Their prognostications—from the sun, from thunder, and from dreams—were so numerous that they perpetuated superstition. Every day of every month was cataloged as a propitious or unpropitious date for certain transactions. There were Anglo-Saxon treatises that contained rules for discovering the future and disposition of a child from the day of birth. One day was useful for all things; another, though good to tame animals, was poor for sowing seeds. One day was favorable to business, another to let blood; on others these things were forbidden.

On a particular day it was said that one must buy, on a second sell, on a third hunt, on a fourth do nothing. If a child was born on a certain day it would live; if on another, it would be sickly; if on still another, it would perish early. The future could be predicted by noticing on what day of the week or month it first thundered, or when the new moon appeared. Dreams likewise had regular interpretations and applications, and thus life, instead of being governed by counsels of wisdom, was directed by those solemn rules of superstition.

Beginnings of Witchcraft in England

Prior to the Reformation, little official notice was given to the practice of witchcraft, "the craft of the wise," but authorities were always on the lookout for anyone believed to be practicing sorcery (i.e., malevolent magic). It was regarded as a political offense to employ sorcery against the ruling powers and it was punished severely, as is witnessed by the execution of the duchess of Gloucester in Henry VI's reign and the duke of Buckingham in 1521. In Henry VI's time Lord Hungerford was beheaded for consulting certain soothsayers concerning the duration of the king's life.

Witchcraft was widespread and of early origin in England, but it seems those practicing it were not systematically punished until after the sixteenth-century Reformation period. Prosecution may have taken place against witches in Plantagenet and early Tudor times, but the popularity of sorcery was probably so widespread and the protection against it by the church was supposed to be so powerful that nothing like a crusade was directed against it.

At very early periods the church had fulminated against those who practiced witchcraft. In 696 C.E. a canon of council held at Berkhampstead condemned to corporal punishment those who made sacrifices to evil spirits.

According to James I. F. A. Inderwick, in Side-Lights on the Stuarts (1888),

"For centuries in this country strange as it may now appear, a denial of the existence of such demoniacal agency was deemed equal to a confession of Atheism and to a disbelief in the Holy Scriptures themselves. But not only did Lord Chancellors, Lord Keepers, benches of Bishops and Parliament attest the truth and the existence of witchcraft, but Addison writing as late as 1711, in the pages of the Spectator, after describing himself as hardly pressed by the arguments on both sides of this question expresses his own belief that there is and has been, witchcraft in the land.''

It was in the twelfth century that pagan witchcraft practices were first associated with the devil. The tale of the old woman of Berkeley that Southey's ballad familiarized was earlier related by William of Malmesbury (ca. 1125) on the authority of a professed eyewitness. When the devil informed the witch of the near expiry of her contract, she summoned the neighboring monks and her children, and, after confessing her criminal compact, displayed great anxiety lest Satan should take her body as well as her soul.

She asked that her body be sewn in a stag's hide and placed in a stone coffin closed with lead and iron. The coffin was then to be loaded with heavy stones and the whole fastened down with three iron chains. In order to baffle the power of the demons, she further directed that 50 psalms be sung by night, and 50 masses be sung by day, and at the end of three nights, if her body was still secure it could be buried with safety.

All these precautions, however, proved of no avail. The monks bravely resisted the efforts of the fiends on the first and second nights, but on the third night in the middle of a terrific uproar an immense demon burst into the monastery and in a voice of thunder commanded the dead witch to rise. She replied that she was bound with chains, but the demon snapped them like thread. The coffin lid fell aside, and when the witch arose the demon bore her off on a huge black horse, galloping into the darkness while her shrieks resounded through the air.

The first trial for witchcraft in England is believed to have occurred during the tenth year of the reign of King John (Robin Hood's opponent) when, according to the Abbreviato-Placitorum, Agnes, the wife of Odo the merchant, accused one Gideon of the crime. He proved his innocence, however, by the ordeal of the red-hot iron.

A trial for sorcery was reported with more detail in the year 1324. Certain citizens of Coventry had suffered at the hands of the prior, whose extortions were approved of and supported by two of Edward II's favorites. By way of revenge they plotted the death of the prior, the favorites, and the king.

To carry out their plot they consulted John of Nottingham, a famous magician of the time, and his servant Robert Marshall of Leicester. Marshall, however, betrayed the plot and stated that he and his master fashioned images of wax to represent the king, his two favorites, the prior, his caterer and steward, and one Richard de Lowe—the latter being brought in merely as an experimental figure to test the effect of the charm.

At an old ruined house near Coventry on the Friday following Holy Cross Day, John gave Marshall a sharp-pointed leaden branch and commanded him to plunge it into the forehead of the figure representing Richard de Lowe. This being done, John dispatched his servant to Lowe's house to find out the result of the experiment. Lowe it seems had lost his senses and went about screaming ''Harrow!'' On the Sunday before Ascension, John withdrew the branch from the image's forehead and thrust it into the heart, where it remained until the following Wednesday, when the unfortunate victim died. Such was Marshall's testimony, but the judges gave it little credence, and after several adjournments the trial was abandoned.

The first enactment against witchcraft in England was by the Parliament of 1541 and was annulled six years later. In 1551 further enactments were leveled at it, but it was not until 1563 that Parliament defined witchcraft as a capital crime. The regular persecution of witches followed. Many burnings occurred during the last years of Elizabeth's reign.

Early Witchcraft Trials

At the village of Warboys, in Huntingdon county, in 1589 lived two country gentlemen, Robert Throgmorton and Sir Samuel Cromwell. Throgmorton's family consisted of his wife and five daughters, of whom the eldest, Joan, a girl of 15, was well versed in ghost and witch lore.

On one occasion Joan had to pass the cottage of a laboring family by the name of Samuel. This family consisted of a man, his wife, and their grown daughter. Mother Samuel was sitting at the door, where she was busily engaged in knitting. Joan accused her of being a witch, ran home, and fell into strange convulsive fits, swearing that Mother Samuel had bewitched her. In due course the other Throgmorton daughters were beseiged by similar fits and placed the blame on Mother Samuel.

The parents began to suspect that their children were really bewitched and reported the matter to Lady Cromwell, who, as an intimate friend of the family, took up the matter. She and Sir Samuel ordered that the alleged witch be put to ordeal. Meanwhile the children let loose their imaginations and invented all sorts of weird and grotesque tales about the old woman.

Eventually Throgmorton had the poor old woman dragged to his grounds, where she was subjected to torture, pins being thrust into her body to see if blood could be drawn. Lady Cromwell tore out a handful of the woman's hair, which she gave to Mrs. Throgmorton to burn as an antidote to witchcraft. Suffering under these injuries the old woman invoked a curse against her torturers that was afterward remembered, although she was allowed her liberty. She suffered much persecution thereafter at the hands of the two families; every misfortune occurring among their cattle and livestock was blamed on her.

Eventually Lady Cromwell was seized with an illness that caused her death, and Mother Samuel was blamed. Repeated efforts were made to persuade her to confess and amend what she had done. At last, tormented beyond endurance, she let herself be persuaded to pronounce an exorcism against the spirits and confessed that her husband and daughter were associates with her and had sold themselves to the devil. On the strength of this confession the whole family was imprisoned in the Huntingdon jail.

At the following court session the three Samuels were put on trial and indicted with various offenses, among them, ''bewitching unto death'' the Lady Cromwell. In the agony of torture the old woman confessed all that was required, but her husband and daughter strongly asserted their innocence. All were sentenced to be hanged and burned. The executions were carried out on April 3, 1593.

With the accession of James I, (the former James IV of Scotland) the Continental crusade against witchcraft that had begun in the late fifteenth century came to England. James, who believed deeply in the negative power of witches, became greatly concerned about the spread of witchcraft in his land. He studied the nature of witchcraft and wrote a significant polemic against the practice. His book Daemonologie (1547) gave great impetus to the persecution of witches in England. Some 50 witches were executed during his reign. (English Protestants, who needed the approval of James, a Roman Catholic, to get their new translation of the Bible published, not only dedicated it to him but improperly translated the Hebrew word ob as ''witch'' as an additional means of gaining his support.)

The famous case of the Lancashire witches, notable for its accounts of witch covens (as opposed to the actions of individual sorcerers) arose in 1612. Twenty-two years later, when a boy called Robinson claimed that he had witnessed a witches' Sabbat at the Hoare Stones, some 17 women were brought to trial at Lancaster assizes.

Witchfinders

As a result of the severe legislation against witchcraft, there arose a class of self-appointed witchfinders who used their power for personal advantage and caused the sacrifice of many innocent lives.

The most famous of these witchfinders was Matthew Hopkins of Manningtree, in Essex. He assumed the title "Witchfinder General," and, with an assistant and a woman whose duty it was to examine female suspects for devil's marks, he traveled about the counties of Essex, Sussex, Huntingdon, and Norfolk. In one year, from 1645 to 1646, Hopkins brought about the death of 60 people.

His general test was that of swimming. The hands and feet of the accused were tied together crosswise. She was wrapped in a sheet and thrown into a pond. If she sank—as frequently happened—she was deemed innocent, but at the cost of her life; if she floated she was pronounced guilty and immediately executed.

Another test was to repeat the Lord's Prayer without a single falter, a thing said to be impossible for a witch. Sometimes the suspect was weighed against the Bible, obtaining her freedom if she outweighed it. There is an apocryphal legend that when Hopkins's frauds were discovered an angry crowd subjected him to his own test by swimming. Hopkins retired to his home in Manningtree, Essex, in 1646, where he died about a year later.

In his book Witch, Warlock, and Magician (1889), W. H. D. Adams states:

"I think there can be little doubt that many evil-disposed persons availed themselves of the prevalent belief in witchcraft as a cover for their depredations on the property of their neighbours, diverting suspicion from themselves to the poor wretches, who through accidental circumstances had acquired notoriety as the devil's accomplices. It would also seem probable that not a few of the reputed witches similarly turned to account their bad reputation."

Decline of the Witchcraft Superstition

Toward the close of the seventeenth century, the tide began to turn and witchcraft convictions began to be discouraged by the courts. An old superstition dies hard, however, and in the early part of the eighteenth century, witchcraft was still considered credible, even among the educated classes of England. The last execution of witches in England took place at Northampton, where two were hung in 1705 and five others in 1712.

Francis Hutchison, commenting on this in his Historical Essay Concerning Witchcraft (1718), states, "This is the more shameful as I shall hereafter prove from the literature of that time, a disbelief in the existence of witches had become almost universal among educated men, though the old superstition was still defended in the Judgment Seat, and in the pulpit."

According to John Wesley (1703–1791), who had considerable influence as a bishop,

"It is true likewise that the English in general, and, indeed, most of the men of learning in Europe, have given up all accounts of witches and apparitions as mere old wives' fables. I am sorry for it. The giving up of witchcraft, is in effect giving up the Bible. But I cannot give up to all the Deists in Great Britain the existence of witchcraft, till I give up the credit of all history sacred and profane."

Judge and legal authority Sir William Blackstone (1723–1780) claimed that "to deny the possibility, nay, the actual existence of witchcraft and sorcery is at once flatly to contradict the revealed Word of God in various passages of the Old and New Testaments, and the thing itself is a truth to which every nation in the world hath in its turn borne testimony."

With every passing year, however, the old belief diminished, and in 1736, decades before Wesley stated his foregoing opinion, the laws against witchcraft were repealed. Yet the superstition was long-lived. In 1759 Susannah Hannaker of Wengrove was put to the ordeal of weighing, but she fortunately outweighed the Bible. Cases of ducking supposed witches occurred in 1760 at Leicester, in 1785 at Northampton, and in 1829 at Monmouth, while as late as 1863 a Frenchman died as the result of an illness caused by his having been ducked as a wizard. On September 17, 1875, an old woman named Ann Turner, a reputed witch, was killed at Long Compton in Warwickshire.

Magic

Magic in England in early times coexisted with witchcraft; only Roger Bacon, scientist-philosopher, displayed a separation between the two. Of course the occult traditions concerning Bacon are merely legendary, but they help to crystallize the popular idea of an English magician of medieval times. The Elizabethan History of Friar Bacon was probably the first to place these legends on record. It has no factual concern with the Bacon of science, for the Bacon of superstitious belief is a magician who cheated the devil, made a brazen head that spoke, and engaged in all manner of black magic.

In England the popular belief in magic was strengthened by the extraordinary effects of natural processes then known only to a small number of individuals who concealed their knowledge with the most profound secrecy. In England before the Reformation, the study of magic and alchemy were extremely common among the Roman clergy.

The rapid rise to power of statesmen like Cardinal Thomas Wolsey and Thomas Cromwell led people to think that they had gained their high positions through diabolical assistance. There were a great number of magicians during the reign of Henry VIII, as is witnessed by documents in the Public Record Office in London.

According to Thomas Wright in his Narratives of Sorcery and Magic (2 vols., 1851), at the height of Wolsey's career a magician described as "one Wood, gent." was dragged before the privy council, charged with some misdemeanor that was connected with the intrigues of the day. In a paper addressed to the lords of the council, Wood stated that William Neville had sent for him at his house at Oxford, it being the first communication he had ever had with him. After he had been at Weke a short time, Neville took him by the arm and led him privately into the garden. Wood said Neville then asked him to make a ring that would bring him favor with the king, but he declined and left.

Neville sent for him again and entered into further communication with him on the subject, telling him that he had another conjurer (occult magician) named Wade who could show him more than Wood could. Among other things, Neville said, the conjurer had shown him that "he should be a great lord." This was an effective attempt to move Wood to jealousy, and Neville then prevailed upon him to make "moldes" (probably images) of a woman on whom he seemed to have set his love. Wood again refused, declaring that, although at the desire of "some of his friends," he had "called to a stone for things stolen," he had not undertaken to find or make treasures.

The search for treasure, which the conjurer Wood so earnestly disclaimed, was, however, one of the most usual occupations of magicians of this period. The frequent discoveries of Roman, Saxon, or medieval deposits in the course of accidental digging (then probably more common than today) was enough to whet the appetites of the needy or the miserly. The belief that the sepulchral barrow, or the long-deserted ruin, or even the wild and haunted glen concealed treasures of gold and silver was carried down in a variety of local legends. Hidden treasures were said to be under the charge of spirits who obeyed the magician's call. These searches were not always successful, as is evident from the following narrative, abridged from the account of William Stapleton, the main character in the story.

In the reign of Henry VIII, a priest named William Stapleton was placed under arrest as a conjurer, having been involved in some court intrigues. At the request of Cardinal Thomas Wolsey he wrote an account of his adventures, which is preserved in the Roll's House records (it is addressed to Wolsey, and not, as has been supposed, to Thomas Cromwell). Stapleton stated that he was a monk of the mitred abbey of St. Benet in the Holm, in Norfolk, where he lived in the nineteenth year of Henry VIII's reign (i.e., in 1527 or 1528), at which time he borrowed from one Dennys of Hofton a book called Thesaurus Spirituum, and after that another, called Secreta Secretorum, a little ring, a plate, a circle, and also a sword for the art of digging, and spent six months in studying their use.

Stapleton disliked rising early, and after having been frequently punished for being absent from matins and negligent of his duty in church he obtained a leave of six months from the abbot to go into the world and try to raise money to buy a dispensation from an order that did not suit him.

The first person Stapleton consulted with was his friend Dennys, who recommended he try his skill in finding treasure. Dennys introduced Stapleton to two "knowing men" who had "placards" or licenses from the king to search for treasure troves, which were not infrequently bought from the crown at this period. These men lent him other books and instruments related to the "art of digging," and they went together to a place named Sidestrand in Norfolk to search and mark out the ground where they thought treasure should lie. It happened, however, that the lady Tyrry, to whom the estate belonged, learned of their trespassing, and after sending for them and subjecting them to a close examination, ordered them to leave her grounds.

After several more futile attempts at "conjuring" treasure at other towns, a disappointed and disgusted Stapleton gave up the pursuit. Back in Norfolk, however, he soon met with some of his old treasure-seeking acquaintances, who urged him to go to work again, which he refused to do unless he had better books. They told him of a man called Leech who had a book to which the parson of Lesingham had bound a spirit called "Andrea Malchus." Stapleton went to see the man.

Leech gave Stapleton all his instruments, and told him that the parson of Lesingham and Sir John of Leiston (another ecclesiastic) as well as others, had recently used the book to call up three spirits: Andrea Malchus, "Oberion," and "Inchubus."

After Stapleton acquired Leech's instruments he journeyed to Norwich, where he was soon found by a messenger from Lord Leonard Marquees, who lived at "Calkett Hall" and wanted a person expert in the art of digging. Stapleton met him at Walsingham; the lord promised him that if he would take pains in exercising the dig he would request a dispensation that would make Stapleton a secular priest and the lord's own chaplain.

Leonard proceeded rather shrewdly to test the searcher's talents: he directed one of his servants to hide a sum of money in the garden, and Stapleton dug for it, and one Jackson "scryed" (invoked the treasure's "spirit" through a crystal), but they were unable to find the money. Undaunted, Stapleton went directly with two other priests, Sir John Shepe and Sir Robert Porter, to a place beside Creke Abbey, where treasure was supposed to be, and "Sir John Shepe called the spirit of the treasure, and I shewed to him, but all came to no purpose."

Stapleton went to hide his disappointment in London, where he remained some weeks, until Leonard, who had arranged the dispensation he promised, sent for him to pass the winter with him in Leicestershire. Toward spring Stapleton returned to Norfolk. There he was informed that there was "much money" hidden in the neighborhood of Calkett Hall, especially in the Bell Hill (probably an ancient grave). After some delay, he obtained his instruments and went to work with the parish priest of Gorleston but reported, "of truth we could bring nothing to effect." After this Stapleton returned to London, carrying his instruments with him; on his arrival he was thrown into prison at the suit of Leonard, who accused him of leaving his service without permission, and all his instruments were seized. He never recovered them, but he was soon released from prison and obtained temporary employment in the church. The number of such treasure hunters appears to have been far greater among Stapleton's contemporaries in almost all classes of society than one might believe.

A few years before these events, in the twelfth year of Henry VIII's reign (1521) the king granted to Robert, Lord Curzon, the monopoly of treasure seeking in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk. Curzon immediately delegated to a man named William Smith of Clopton, and to a servant or retainer of his own named Amylyon, not only the right of search given to him but also the power to arrest and press charges against any other person they found seeking treasure within the two counties.

Smith and Amylyon apparently used this delegated authority for purposes of extortion, and in the summer of 1521 Smith was brought before the court of the city of Norwich, at the suit of William Goodred of Great Melton.

It appears that the treasure diggers, who had received their "placard" (license) from Curzon in March, went to Norwich about Easter and paid a visit to the schoolmaster George Dowsing, who, they had heard, was skilled in magical arts. They showed him their license for treasure seeking, which authorized them to press into their service any persons they might find who had skill in the science; so it appears that they were not capable of raising spirits themselves without the assistance of "scholars."

The schoolmaster entered willingly into their project, and they went, about two or three o'clock in the morning, with one or two other persons who were admitted into their confidence, and dug in the ground beside "Butter Hilles," within the walls of the city, but found nothing there. (These "hilles" were probably ancient games.) They next proceeded to a place called "Seynt William in the Wood by Norwich," where they excavated two nights but with no better success.

They then held a meeting at the house of one Saunders in the market of Norwich and called to their assistance two ecclesiastics, one named Sir William, the other Sir Robert Cromer, the former being a parish priest. At this meeting, Dowsing allegedly raised "a spirit or two" in a scrying glass, but Cromer "began and raised a spirit first." Spirit or no spirit, however, they seem to have had as little success as ever in discovering the treasure.

Unable after so many attempts to find the treasure themselves, they resolved to extort a general contribution from everybody who followed the same calling. They accused a person of the name of Wikman of "digging of hilles" and by threatening to take him before Curzon they obtained ten shillings from him.

With the era of John Dee and Edward Kelley (middle to late sixteenth century), a much more definite system of magico-astrology evolved on English soil. Although Kelley was a rogue, there is little doubt that Dee possessed psychic gifts of no mean character. His most celebrated followers were William Lilly and Elias Ashmole. Lilly gathered about him quite a band of magicians—Ramsey, Scott, Hodges, and others, as well as his "skryers" (crystal gazers) Sarah Skelhorm and Ellen Evans. These may be said to be the last of the practical magicians of England. Their methods were those of divination by crystal gazing and evocation of spirits, combined with practical astrology.

The mid-seventeenth century also produced such individuals as Robert Fludd, who wrote concerning the secrets of mysticism and magnetism. Fludd was a Paracelsian (after sixteenth-century Swiss alchemist Paracelsus) and regarded man as a microcosm of the universe. He was an ardent defender of the Rosicrucians and wrote two spirited works about them, as well as his great Tractatus Apologeticus and many other alchemical and philosophical treatises. The part of the Tractatus that deals with natural magic is one of the most definitive ever written on the subject.

Thomas Vaughan is likewise a figure of intense interest from this period. He was a supreme expert of spiritual alchemy, and his works written under the pseudonym "Eugenius Philalethes" show he possessed an exalted mind. It is through men of this type that a mystical or spiritual dimension was added to the earlier uncritical and superstitious belief in magic.

(For the development of Spiritualism, psychical research, and parapsychology in Britain, see entries under those headings.)

Modern-day England

The British occult witnessed a revival in the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries, resulting in keen interest in spiritualism, psychic readings, and the development of magical orders, including Wicca. The word Wicca refers to British Traditional Witchcraft, also called English Traditional Witchcraft, a specific magical Mystery tradition that evolved over centuries. The use of the Old English word Wicca distinguishes British Traditional Witchcraft from the many other forms of religious witchcraft that exist. While the Old English form was "wiccecraeft," the modern usage has become "Wicca Craft" or the Craft of the Wicca. The concepts of Wicca known today derive from ceremonial magic and Freemasonry. Wiccans are a proper subset of religious practitioner Witches and are very active today.

Claims of the paranormal remain popular in the British Isles, with many of the twentieth centuries' most world-renown and controversial cases emerging from England. In 1998 The Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of Paranormal compiled what they believe to be the top 10 enduring paranormal "hoaxes," three of which are based in England. Number five on the list is the Cottingley Fairies, where in 1917 two English schoolgirls took photographs of winged fairies dancing in Cottingley Glen. Although photography experts attested the images were not double exposures nor had the negatives been altered, the scene itself was eventually determined to be faked, as the girls had merely posed with paper fairy cutouts. The photos deceived many for several years, however, including Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, the creator of Sherlock Holmes.

Crop circles were number six on the skeptic's list. Elaborate patterns have been mysteriously appearing in southern English wheat fields since the late 1970s. Many offered mystical or extraterrestrial explanations for the bent stalks. In 1991, however, two men demonstrated how they had created the first crop circles, which others have repeatedly copied.

Number eight on the list was the Piltdown "Missing Link" case. The "missing link" between mankind and our prehistoric ancestors was reportedly uncovered near Piltdown Common in England by an amateur fossil collector in December 1912. The story was recognized across the world and the bones were exhibited in the British Museum. In 1953, however, the find was revealed to be a combination of ordinary human cranial pieces and the jawbone of an orangutan.

With the exception of the Piltdown Missing Link case, people worldwide continue to believe in claims of paranormal activity.

Despite skeptical rebuff to many paranormal and supernatural claims, psychical research is currently undergoing a boom in the United Kingdom, especially in the form of university-based research; in England alone this includes research projects at the University of Hertfordshire, the University of the West of England, University College Northampton, and Coventry University. Organizations dedicated to the subject include the Society for Psychical Research, based in London, and the Student Parapsychology Society, based in Cheltenham, Gloucester.

Sources:

Adams, W. H. Davenport. Witch, Warlock, and Magician: Historical Sketches of Magic and Witchcraft in England and Scotland. London and New York, 1889. Reprint, Detroit: Gale Research, 1973.

Ashton, John. The Devil in Britain and America. London, 1896. Reprint, Detroit: Gale Research, 1974. Beloff, J. Parapsychology: A Concise History. London, England: Athlone Press, 1993.

Cockayne, T. O. Leechdoms, Wortcunning, and Starcraft. 2 vols. London, 1864–1866. Reprint, London: Holland Press, 1968.

"CSICOP Compiles Top Ten Paranormal Hoaxes." Skeptical Inquirer. No. 4, Vol. 22, pp. 14.

Gleadow, Rupert. Magic and Divination. London: Ryerson Press, 1941.

History of Wicca in England: 1939–1991. http://www.starkindler.org/hist-jp.html. June 19, 2000.

Hole, Christina. Witchcraft in England. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1947.

Kittredge, George Lyman. Witchcraft in Old and New England. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1929. Reprint, New York: Atheneum, 1972.

L'Estrange, Ewen C., Witch Hunting and Witch Trials: The Indictments for Witchcraft from the Records of 1373 Assizes Held for the Home Circuit, A.D. 1559–1736. London: Kegan Paul, 1929.

Mackay, Charles. Memoirs of Extraordinary Popular Delusions and the Madness of Crowds. London, 1841. Reprint, New York: Farrar, Strauss & Giroux, 1932.

Maple, Eric. The Dark World of Witches. London: Robert Hale; New York: A. S. Barnes, 1962. Also reprinted with two other Eric Maple books in one volume as The Complete Book of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: A. S. Barnes, 1964.

Notestein, Wallace. A History of Witchcraft in England from 1558 to 1718. Washington, 1911. Reprint, New York: Russel & Russel, 1965.

Peel, Edgar. The Trials of the Lancashire Witches: A Study of Seventeenth-Century Witchcraft. Nelson, England: Hendon Publishing, 1985.

Robbins, Rossell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1959.

Smith, Matthew. An Overview of Psychical Research in Britain. http://moebius.psy.ed.ac.uk/~spr/ParanormalReview10.html. June 19, 2000.

Summers, Montague. Witchcraft and Black Magic. London: Rider, 1946. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1974.

Thomas, Keith. Religion and the Decline of Magic. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1971.

Valiente, Doreen. An ABC of Witchcraft Past and Present. New York: St. Martin's Press; London: Macmillan, 1973.

Wright, Thomas. Narratives of Sorcery and Magic. 2 vols. London, 1851. Reprint, Detroit: Gale Research, 1974.

English Qabala

The English Qabala is a system of correspondences used for making magical correlations that is used by some members of the thelemic magic community. Its origins can be traced to some numerological speculation on The Book of the Law (also known as Liber AL), the revelation channeled by magician Aleister Crowley in 1904. Within the book was a command, "Thou shalt obtain the order & value of the English Alphabet." This was interpreted as a command to find a system of assigning a numerical value to each of the 26 letters of the English alphabet in such a way that it would lead to a meaningful manipulation of the text. The normal way to assign numerical values to the English alphabet is straight numerical order, so that A=1, B=2, C=3, and so forth. This system produced no meaningful results when applied to The Book of the Law.

While Crowley attempted to find such a system, he failed and had hoped that Frater Achad (Charles Stanfeld Jones), his magical child, would succeed. While Achad made some useful suggestions at the time he was in conversation with Crowley in 1918, he, too, was unable to find the ultimate secret, and soon dropped the problem. Then in 1976, Jim Lees, a British thelemite, discovered what he believed to be the secret, which he shared with two colleagues—Jake Stratton-Kent and Carol Smith. They published Lees' findings through Kaaba Publications.

Lees had started with Frater Achad's suggestion of using the letters "A" and "L" as a starting point and noted that "L," the second letter in the Hebrew alphabet, was the 12th letter of the English alphabet. (Kabbalah was of Hebrew origin; Qabala is a favored spelling of the term in non-Jewish magical circles). In the end he developed a system of counting every 12th letter in the English alphabet and upon reaching the end of the alphabet, continuing on at the beginning again. In this manner they found a new ordering of the alphabet as: A L W H S D O Z K V G R C N Y J U F Q B M X I T E P

He assigned each letter a numerical value such that A=1, L=2, W=3, and so forth. Playing with the new letter/number equivalents, Lees and his associates discovered that all of a sudden, the text of The Book of the Law began to yield what thelemites would consider useful and meaningful results. Those who first worked with the numbering system found some immediate confirmation in the striking anomalies in The Book of the Law. One appeared in a page of the original manuscript of Liber AL, a copy of which is generally reporduced in printing of the typeset text. It contains a grid imposed on the text, and a line drawn diagonally across the text. Assuming the new ordering of the alphabet for the new Qabala, Lees and his associates found the new ordering appeared prominently in relation to the grid. Stratton-Kent applied the new system to verse II, 76 of Liber AL, which contains a seemingly random set of letters and numbers. He gave all of the letters numerical value, with a central "X" serving as a multiplication symbol. The end result was 17x11=187, the numerical value of the phrase "English alphabet."

At this point Frater Damon and Soror Ishtaria of the Hermetic Alchemical Order of the QBLH began to work with the basic information. Sorar Ishtaria developed a computer program, "Lexicon," to manipulate the text more quickly, and began to generate new correspondences. Information on the English Qabala circulated through The New Equinox: British Journal of Thelema, which Lees and Carol Smith assumed editorship of for Ray Sherwin in 1980, and other publications. Over the years, the QBLH has continued to work with the English Qabala. It has subsequently been adopted for use by other thelemic groups and has been the catalyst for the formation of completely new groups, such as the Gnostic Alchemical Church of Typhon-Christ.

Sources:

Cherubim, David (Frater Aurora Aureae). "The New Qabalah and the Tree of Life." http://members.aol.com/CSahk/qabalah.html. May 20, 2000.

"The English Qabala." http://www.geocities.com/Hollywood/1800/alav.htm. May 20, 2000.

QBLH, Frater D. T. "The New Aeon English Qabala: A Brief Introduction." http://www.thelema.net/TextOnly/naeq/naeq.html. May 20, 2000.

Enlightenment

Enlightenment is a term used in occultism, mysticism, and Eastern religions to denote the awakening to and/or appropriation of the highest and most essential truths of the universe. Enlightenment usually includes an intellectual mastery of the teachings of a particular tradition, the personal mastery of various occult techniques (spiritual disciplines), the direct contact with and embodiment of the highest divine realities, and the social acknowledgment of the enlightened one's accomplishments by at least a small community of students or followers. Enlightened teachers may claim authority from their having studied personally with an enlightened master who transmitted his/her wisdom and acknowledged that transmission more or less publicly. Others may have engaged in a systematic study of a tradition that included both the study of tests and the practice of a guarded set of spiritual disciplines. Acknowledgment of enlightenment in such cases is due not so much to the status of one's teacher but to the passing of a set of standard initiations. In many Western initiatory systems, the highest grades of enlightenment are self-proclaimed and then verified by one's fruits. Of course, new groups often arise when a student reaches the higher levels of accomplishment only to reach a very new or different understanding of the universe.

Most enlightened teachers offer students a system of practice, some form of yoga or meditation being the most popular. It is generally assumed that the teacher has followed this method successfully and that their success offers hope that the student can also attain enlightenment by perpetuating the master's course of action. Having followed the path, the master provides evidence of his/her contact with higher realities and his/her embodiment of them. One of the most obvious examples is the kundalini yoga teacher who offers students the experience of shaktipat, the transfer of energy from the master to the student to initiate the enlightenment process. Others demonstrate their contact with the divine by the aura of sanctity that encompasses them, the wisdom of their words, and/or the austerity of their lives, although it often comes in the demonstration of their ability to speak directly to the immediate situation of a particular student (a sign that they have experienced and already passed that situation).

Enlightened teachers make claims to have perceived occult (that is, hidden) realities. Though ultimately no acknowledgment of that status should be necessary, if they are to become teachers, they generally find confirmation of their status in a social context. Confirmation of an enlightened master's status may be partially based upon outward accomplishments, but also always has an element of subjectivity since the members making the profession do not have access to the levels of reality to which the master has claimed access. Members of most occult, mystical, and Eastern religions will profess a belief in the enlightened status of their leader, while occasionally questioning the enlightenment of the leaders of rival groups. People who leave a group will often justify their action by claiming a loss of belief in the enlightened status of their former teacher.

Underlying any discussion of enlightenment is a belief that our perception of the ordinary world of waking consciousness is distorted, lost in illusion. Matter is less than real, and the avenue to the real world is found in the inner search, through a change in consciousness, through a gaining of a new perception of reality.

British scholar Andrew Rawlinson, who has made the most extensive study of modern teachers considered to be enlightened by their followers, has noted several basic approaches to the topic. One set of teachers generally holds that enlightenment is a state to be attained. To become enlightened requires a lengthy period devoted to spiritual practices, possibly over several lifetimes. The wide variance in the recommended practice (yoga, meditation, occult development, prayer and chanting, magic) is the major item distinguishing these types of groups. Some of the more advanced practitioners of a spiritual discipline may in fact be picking up their accomplishments from a previous lifetime.

Another set of teachers feels that enlightenment is an inherent quality of human existence. The divine is the only reality and all we have to do is wake up to that fact. As humans are in essence divine, the whole of reality is immediately accessible. In these cases, exemplified by some forms of Advaita Vedanta and Zen Buddhism, the teacher's job is to place the student in situations where they are likely to grasp the truth. Enlightenment comes not from mastering the environment, even if that is an inner environment, but from an act of self-realization.

In the case of the former understanding of enlightenment, the condition under which most occult teachers operate, the world is generally considered to be divided into a complex set of layers, the visible world being but the lowest. These various layers emanate from the divine. Enlightenment comes from accessing the highest levels of spiritual reality. An enlightened teacher would not only have accessed those higher levels, but be capable of communicating some elements of those higher realities to others and of assisting their disciples in their movement upward. In most occult systems, people who have accessed the lower levels may possess various occult abilities, a sign that they have at least begun the pathway to enlightenment, though they would not yet be considered enlightened.

Rawlinson has made important observations concerning the unique situation in the modern West in which a variety of enlightened teachers are available to the average seeker, who may compare and contrast their personal suitability.

Sources:

Cohen, Andrew. Enlightenment Is a Secret. Corte Madera, Calif.: Moksha Foundation, 1991.

Enomiya-Lassalle, Hugo. Zen: Way to Enlightenment. Marlboro, N.J.: Taplinger Publishing Co., 1968.

Hixon, Len. Coming Home: The Experience of Enlightenment in Sacred Traditions. Burdett, N.Y.: Larson Publications, 1995.

Ichazo, Oscar. The Human Process for Enlightenment and Freedom: A Series of Five Lectures. New York: Arica Institute Press, 1972.

Lozowick, Leo. The Book of Unenlightenment/The Yoga of Enlightenment. Prescott Valley, Ariz.: Hohm Press, 1980.

Melton, J. Gordon. Finding Enlightenment: Ramtha's Ancient School of Wisdom. Hillsboro, Ore.: Beyond Words, 1998.

Millman, Dan. Everyday Enlightenment. New York: Warner Books, 1998.

Rawlinson, Andrew. The Book of Enlightened Masters. Chicago: Open Court Publishing, 1997.

Ennemoser, Joseph (1787–1854)

Distinguished physician at the University of Bonn, Germany, from 1820 to 1841. He subsequently practiced in Munich. Ennemoser was an early investigator of animal magnetism and compiled an encyclopedic work titled The History of Magic (1854).

Sources:

Ennemoser, Joseph. The History of Magic. Translated by William Howitt. 1854. Reprint (2 vols.), New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1960.

Enoch, Book of

A Hebrew apocryphal book. It was originally written in Aramaic rather than Hebrew and hence was not included in the canon of the Hebrew Bible or in the Christian Old Testament. It was included in the collection of other materials generally called pseudepigrapha (various pseudonymous or anonymous Jewish religious writings of the period 200 B.C.E. to 200 C.E.). The original version was lost about the end of the fourth century, and only fragments remained, but James Bruce, the Scottish explorer, brought back a copy in Ethiopian from Abyssinia in 1773, which was probably made from the version known to the early Greek fathers. In this work the spiritual world is minutely described, as is the region of Sheol, the place of the wicked.

The book also deals with the history of the fallen angels, their relations with the human species, and the foundations of magic. The book says that:

"There were angels who consented to fall from heaven that they might have intercourse with the daughters of Earth. For in those days the sons of men having multiplied, there were born to them daughters of great beauty. And when the angels, or sons of heaven, beheld them, they were filled with desire; wherefore they said to one another: 'Come let us choose wives from among the race of man, and let us beget children.'

"Their leader Samyasa, answered thereupon and said: 'Perchance you will be wanting in the courage needed to fulfil this resolution, and then I alone shall be answerable for your fall.' But they swore that they would in no wise repent and that they would achieve their whole design.

"Now there were two hundred who descended on Mount Armon, and it was from this time that the mountain received its designation, which signifies Mount of the Oath. Hereinafter follow the names of those angelic leaders who descended with this object: Samyasa, chief among all, Urakabarameel, Azibeel, Tamiel, Ramuel, Danel, Azkeel, Sarakuyal, Asael, Armers, Batraal, Anane, Zavebe, Sameveel, Ertrael, Turel, Jomiael, Arizial. They took wives with whom they had intercourse, to whom also they taught Magic, the art of enchantment and the diverse properties of roots and trees. Amazarac gave instruction in all secrets of sorcerers; Barkaial was the master of those who study the stars; Akibeel manifested signs; and Azaradel taught the motions of the moon."

In this account, which harkens back to several biblical passages (Genesis 6:4; Isaiah 14:12), there is a description of the profanation of mysteries. The fallen angels exposed their occult and heaven-born wisdom to earthly women, whereby it was profaned, and brute force, taking advantage of the profanation of divine law, reigned supreme. Only a deluge could wipe out the stain of the enormity and pave the way for a restitution of the balance between the human and the divine, which had been disturbed by these unlawful revelations.

According to tradition, Enoch did not die, but was carried up to heaven (Genesis 5:18–24), from where he will return at the end of time. He has also been identified with Thoth of the Egyptians, Cadulus of the Phoenicians, and Palamedes of the Greeks. According to some occultists, he inspired the Kabala and the symbols of the tarot.

The Book of Enoch is one of the most important works of the pseudepigrapha and is actually a set of books. The first book of Enoch was known from a surviving Ethiopian translation, parts of which were found in the caves of Qumran among the Dead Sea Scrolls. In 1892, however, R. H. Charles found a second manuscript of the Book of Enoch, which existed in a Slavonic text. Upon seeing the book, he also discovered that it was an entirely different Book of Enoch, and he soon translated and published it. Finally, a third Book of Enoch, which has circulated among the Babylonian Jews, was discovered and published in 1928 by Hugo Odeburg.

Sources:

Andrews, H. T. An Introduction to the Apocryphal Books of the Old and New Testament. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Baker Book House, 1964.

Charles, R. H., ed. The Book of Enoch [Ethiopic text]. London: Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1917.

Laurence, Richard, trans. The Book of Enoch the Prophet . . . from an Ethiopian Manuscript. London: Kegan Paul, Tench, 1883.

Morfill, W. R., trans. The Book of the Secrets of Enoch. Oxford, England: Clarendon Press, 1896.

Enochian Calls

The magic incantations used by John Dee and Edward Kelley in the sixteenth century to invoke "angels" or elementary spirits. The Enochian language, in which the calls were spoken, has a consistent grammar and syntax and curiously impressive sound values.

There are 19 Enochian calls or keys. The first two conjure spirits; the next 16 the elements earth, fire, air, water; the nineteenth any of the "30 Aethyrys." The calls were supposed to have been dictated backward to Kelley, as direct communication from the "angels" would have invoked forces that were too powerful.

In 1912 magician Aleister Crowley, in the company of Victor Neuburg, worked a series of magic operations using the Enochian calls. During the midst of these Crowley discovered the principles of what he would later develop into a system of sex magic. He recorded his work in a lengthy article originally published in his journal Equinox and later published a separate book The Vision and the Voice. The writings of Crowley made Enochian magic widely known to twentieth-century magicians, several of whom have developed it as a variation of modern ceremonial magic. Among those who have discovered and utilized Enochian magic is Anton LaVey, who adapted it to his Satanic system as described in his book The Satanic Bible (1969).

Sources:

Crowley, Aleister. The Vision and the Voice. Dallas, Tex.: Sangreal Foundation, 1972.

LaVey, Anton S. The Satanic Bible. New York: Avon, 1969.

Regardie, Israel. Enochian Dictionary. Dallas, Tex.: Sangreal Foundation, 1971.

Schueler, Gerald J. An Advanced Guide to Enochian Magic: A Complete Manual for Angelic Magic. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1987.

———. Enochian Magic: A Practical Manual. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1985.

———. Enochian Physics: The Structure of the Magical Universe. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1988.

Turner, Robert. Elizabethan Magic. Londmead, Dorset, England: Element Books, 1989.

Zalewski, Patrick J. Golden Dawn Enochian Magic. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1990.

Epworth Phenomena

The psychic disturbances of a poltergeist nature at Epworth Vicarage, England, in 1716 during its occupancy by Rev. Samuel Wesley, father of Methodist Church founder John Wesley. The phenomena lasted for several months and were first attributed to trickery, then to the devil, although Samuel's wife, Susannah Wesley, disagreed with the latter hypothesis. Instead, she connected it with the fate of her brother who, in the service of the East India Company, disappeared and was never heard of again. It was not proved that the rappings were caused by his discarnate agency, but the members of the family took it for granted after a while that "Old Jeffrey" was involved in the manifestations, which appeared to be connected mostly with Hetty Wesley. She was noticed to tremble strongly in her sleep when the knockings occurred.

The main disturbances lasted with intervals for two months, December and January 1716–17, and broke out occasionally afterward. The contention that they still recurred a generation later is based on a letter by Emily Wesley, dated February 16, 1750, containing this passage: "Another thing is that wonderful thing called by us Jeffrey. You won't laugh at me for being superstitious if I tell you how certainly that something calls on me against any extraordinary new affliction; but so little is known of the invisible world that I am at least not able to judge whether it be friendly or an evil spirit."

The records of the phenomena consist mostly of family letters and an account written by Samuel Wesley. The disturbances began with knockings. Susannah Wesley wrote on January 12, 1717:

"One night it made such a noise in the room over our heads as if several people were walking; then run up and down the stairs, and was so outrageous that we thought the children would be frightened, so your father and I rose and went down in the dark to light a candle. Just as we came to the bottom of the broad stairs, having hold of each other, on my side there seemed as if somebody had emptied a bag of money at my feet and on his as if all the bottles under the stairs (which were many) had been dashed into a thousand pieces. We passed through the hall into the kitchen and got a candle and went to see the children. The next night your father would get Mr. Hoole to lie at our house and we all sat together till one or two o'clock in the morning and heard the knocking as usual. Sometimes it would make a noise like the winding up of a jack; at other times, as that night Mr. Hoole was with us, like a carpenter planning deals; but mostly commonly it knocked three and stopped and then thrice again and so many hours together."

Her daughter Hetty heard "something like a man in a loose nightgown trailing after him" coming down the stairs behind her, and sometimes a shape like a "badger" was seen under the bed. The noises answered knock for knock and came in any part of the house. At family prayers they became very agitated at the names of King George and the Prince. Samuel Wesley often tried to speak to them but the only answer he received was "two or three feeble squeaks a little louder than the chirping of a bird, but not like the noise of rats which I have often heard."

Another daughter, Nancy, was once lifted up with the bed in which she sat. She leapt down and said that surely Old Jeffrey would not run away with her. She was persuaded to sit down again when the bed was lifted several times successively to a considerable height. The noise affected the mastiff of the household. It whimpered in terror and strove to get between the people of the house. (See also Ashtabula Poltergeist; Cock Lane Ghost; Drummer of Tedworth; Enfield Poltergeist; haunted houses; and Eliakim Phelps)

Sources:

Clarke, Ada. Memoirs of the Wesley Family. 4th ed. London: W. Tegg, 1860.

Priestley, Joseph. Original Letters by the Rev. John Wesley and his Friends. Birmingham, England, 1791.

Wilder, Franklin. Good News for Martha Wesley. Hicksville, N.Y.: Exposition Press, 1976.

Wright, Dudley. The Epworth Phenomena. London: William Rider & Son, 1917.

Equilibrium (in Occultism)

According to occultist Éliphas Lévi, magic harmony is said to depend upon equilibrium. In ceremonial magic operations, if the will of the operator is always at the same tension and directed along the same line, moral impotence will ensue. On the other hand, mediums who submit themselves passively to psychic forces are equally unbalanced. Lévi extols the all-powerful action of harmony in exalting the soul and giving it rule over the senses, guided by the will.

Sources:

Lévi, Éliphas. Transcendental Magic. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

Equinox

The term "equinox" (from the Latin for equal night) refers to those times during the year in which the length of the day and the night are equal. The equinox occurs twice yearly, at the beginning of spring (around March 21) and the beginning of fall (around September 23). From an astrological perspective, the equinox occurs when the sun appears to be at the point where the celestial equator (the Earth's equator imaginably projected outward into space) meets the eliptical, the path that the sun appears to take as viewed from earth. As people observed the heavens in ancient times, among the first phenomena that became noticeable to them were the apparent movements of the sun, especially the different points on the horizon at which it rose day after day, and the variant length of days. The longest and shortest days (the solstices) and the equinoxes were important markers in the annual calendar, as were the points halfway between each of these days, signaling as they did important activities in the agricultural season. Very early these points became ritualized, the occasions for feasts and celebrations.

In astrology, the spring equinox is the beginning of the new astrological year. At that time the sun enters 0° Aries. At the fall equinox it enters 0° Libra. The planetary configurations at the time of the equinoxes have a particular importance in the interpretations of mundane astrology (the astrology of nations).

The astrological year was largely replaced by the Christian calendar in the West, but came back into use for marking the year with the rebirth of ritual magic in the nineteenth century. It was notable that magician Aleister Crowley named his biannual journal Equinox. However, as with most ritual magicians and astrologers, the equinox, while being an important marker in the calendar, was not a particularly significant point for ritual activity or horoscope interpretation.

Ritual significance was poured back into the equinox within the Neo-Pagan Witchcraft Movement launched by Gerald Gardner in the mid-twentieth century. Gardner revived the eight annual sabbats, two of which occurred on the equinoxes.

Sources:

Cunningham, Scott. Wicca: A Guide for the Solitary Practitioner. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1988.

Farrar, Stewart. What Witches Do. New York: Coward, McCann & Geoghegan, 1971.

The Equinox

Official organ of the A∴A∴, subtitled "The Review of Scientific Illuminism," originally published by magician Aleister Crowley beginning in March 1909. Each issue amounted to a book-length journal. It contained the official materials of the A∴A∴, articles and stories by Crowley, and book reviews. Crowley, who had recently left the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, published many of the secrets of his former colleagues. The ten issues of the first volume appeared biannually at the equinoxes, beginning in March 1909.

It appears that Crowley projected alternating five-year periods of publication and silence. The second volume was thus designated a volume of silence and was never published.

The issues of the third volume appeared sporadically, the first in March 1919. The third volume is usually designated the The "Blue" Equinox, as it was published with a blue cover. It followed the general format of the earlier volumes. The second issue made it to galley proofs, but was never published. The succeeding issues took the form of a series of occasional monographs. Number three did not appear until 1937. It includes a commentary on Crowley's major revelatory work, The Book of the Law. Number four appeared in 1938 under the title Eight Lectures on Yoga and number five as The Book of Thoth, Crowley's commentary on the tarot. The original edition of The Book of Thoth was limited to 200 signed and numbered copies.

Crowley died in 1947. His successor as outer head of the order, Karl Germer, saw to the publication of issue number six of the third volume, which appeared in 1962 as Liber Aleph. The last four issues were published by Grady McMurty ("Caliph Hymenaeus Beta"), who took charge of the order and revived it through the 1970s. The first three of these appeared as The Shih Yi (1971), the Tao Teh King (1975), and The Holy Books of Thelema (1983). A tenth issue, containing a variety of brief articles, appeared in 1986.

In 1975 the Society Ordo Templi Orientis, a rival organization headed by Marcelo Ramos Motta that for a while also claimed to be the official Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO) headed by Crowley, began to issue a new series of The Equinox. Four issues of what was projected as volume five were published before legal action by McMurty and the OTO stopped further publication.

Sources:

Crowley, Aleister. The Book of Thoth: A Short Essay on the Tarot of the Egyptians. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1974.

———. Eight Lectures on Yoga. 1938. Reprint, Phoenix, Ariz.: Falcon Press, 1985.

The Equinox. 1, nos. 1–10. London, 1909–1913. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

The Equinox. 3, no. 1. Detroit: Universal Publishing, 1919. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

The Equinox. 5, nos. 10–4. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1975–1981.

The Equinox of the God. London: Ordo Templi Orientis, 1936.

Hymenaeus Beta, Caliph [Grady McMurtry]. "Introduction: Culture vs. Cult." Equinox 3, 10 (1986): 9–12.

———. Tao Teh King. London: Askin Publishers; New York: Samuel Weiser, 1976.

Erfahrungswissenshaftliche Blätter (Journal)

Quarterly German-language journal published by Psychophysikalische Gesellschaft V. Reports scientific research connected with psychology and parapsychology. Last known address: Klarastrasse 22, D-8000 München 19, Germany.

Erhard, Werner (1935–)

Public name adopted by John Paul Rosenberg, who developed a modern system of experiential philosophy known as est (Erhard Seminars Training). Erhard was born September 5, 1935, in Philadelphia.

He left home in 1960, and to keep his family from finding him, he changed his name to Werner Erhard. Over the next few years, he held a variety of jobs and also examined a variety of the new spiritual disciplines and self-help programs, including the Church of Scientology, Zen Buddhism, and Mind Dynamics. Erhard's own system, distilled from his involvement in the many movements, coalesced for him one morning in 1971 while driving on the 101 highway in Marin County, California. Basic to his insight was that each individual is the source of their own experience, they were not the labels that others had put on them. Understanding this insight would later be labeled "getting it" in the est training. Shortly after receiving this new insight, he founded est.

Nearly 500,000 people attended the est seminars usually given on two consecutive weekends. Most people were not dissuaded by a small chorus of detractors who noted cases of psychological problems experienced by attendees, accused est of brainwashing tactics, or were upset with the large sums of money Erhard was making.

In 1978 Erhard created The Hunger Project, a motivational program to get people to see the situation with world hunger as an opportunity to make a difference in the world and to commit themselves to ending hunger in the next twenty years.

In 1985 Erhard replaced est with a new program, The Forum. It represented an evolvement of his understanding as well as answering some of his critics, especially those who had complained of the rigid rules forced upon the attendees of the est training. He also founded Transformational Technologies to market training courses to corporations for employees.

All of Erhard's ventures came to an end in 1991. The IRS attached liens on seven million dollars worth of property; he faced a law suit from a former top employee he discharged; he was accused of child molestation on a national news show. Est was sold by Erhard to a group of 150 employees who formed a new company called Landmark Education Corp., led by Erhard's brother Harry Rosenberg. It was then that Erhard disappeared from public view. Landmark is still thriving today, carrying on Erhard's legacy to a new generation.

Sources:

Bartley, William Warren. Werner Erhard: The Transformation of a Man, the Founding of est. New York: C. N. Potter, 1978.

Bry, Adelaide. est, Erhard Seminars Training: 60 Hours That Transform Your Life. New York: Avon, 1976.

Fenwick, Sherida. Getting It: The Psychology of est. Philadelphia: J. P. Lippencott, 1976.

Self, Jane. 60 Minutes and the Assassination of Werner Erhard: How America's Top Rated Television Show Was Used in an Attempt to Destroy a Man Who Was Making a Difference. Houston: Breakthru Publishing, 1992

Eric of the Windy Hat

According to Hector of Boêce, Eric (or Henry), an early king of Sweden, was surnamed "the Windy Hat" because it was believed that he could change the wind merely by turning his hat on his head to show his demon which way he wished the wind to blow. The demon obeyed the signal so promptly that the king's hat might have served the people for a weathercock. This story gave rise to the expression "a capful of wind."

Ermacora, Giovanni Battista (1869–1898)

An Italian scientist who abandoned his research in electricity (which had already caused him to be looked upon as a successor to Faraday and Maxwell) for psychical research and who became a fervent exponent and defender of paranormal phenomena when the subject was looked upon with contempt by official science. In his first work, I fatti spiritici e le ipotesi affrettate (1892), he severely criticized the neuropathological interpretation of mediumistic phenomena, which Cesare Lombroso had adopted after his first series of sittings with the medium Eusapia Palladino in Naples. Ermacora took part in the memorable Milan investigation with the same medium.

After the failure of his first attempt to establish an Italian Society for Psychical Research, he founded with Giorgio Finzi in January 1895 the Rivista di Studi Psichici, a periodical analogous to the British Society for Psychical Research Proceedings, in which most of his studies were published.

Ermacora devoted himself to all branches of psychical science, but especially to telepathy, to the experimental demonstration of which he made important contributions. His work on the subject was cut short by his murder. The 150-page work titled La Telepatice, posthumously published in 1898, is considered one of the best and most systematic treatises of the period on the subject.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Ermacora, Giovanni B. I fatti spiritici e le ipotesi affrettate (Spiritistic facts and hasty hypotheses). Padua, Italy, 1892.

Eromancy

One of six kinds of divination by means of air and water practiced by the Persians. They enveloped their heads in a napkin and exposed to the air a vase filled with water, over which they muttered in a low voice the objects of their desire. If the surface of the air showed bubbles, it was regarded as a positive prognostication.

Erto, Pasquale (1895– ?)

Also known as "the human rainbow," Erto was an Italian chemist who claimed to be a medium for unique colored-light phenomena and other less striking psychical and trance effects. According to his own story, he attended a séance at age 14 at the house of an Egyptian woman. She told him that he was a medium. Shortly afterward he was able to produce direct voice mediumship and automatic writing.

In 1924 he gave a series of séances at the Institut Métapsychique International in Paris. Streaks of light resembling electric flashes lit up the room and luminous spheres zigzagged in the dark. The phenomena appeared to defy human production. But, as stated by Gustav Geley in a letter to Le Matin dated April 7, 1924, one of his colleagues had been able to produce a minute instrument with which Erto's lights were reproduced to perfection. In addition, more direct evidence of fraud was also discovered: 1) A small rectangular block of ferro-cerium, one centimeter long, was found in the syphon of a sink in which Erto washed immediately after a séance and before the final X-ray examination that Erto was to undergo; 2) Analysis of the workings of the medium revealed the presence of minute but unmistakable traces of ferro-cerium; 3) At the close of the last séance Erto refused to allow himself to be examined at the level of the pelvis by the doctors present; and 4) A circular hole sufficient to enable a small pencil to be pushed through was found in Erto's tights at the pelvic level. Although Erto's methods would be easily discerned today, Geley could find no explanation for the fingerprints that he could produce on photographic plates in sealed enclosures. They resembled those used as identification in criminology.

In 1924 Erto was invited once more to Paris by a committee formed by L'Opinion and Le Matin. The investigation took place at the Sorbonne and resulted in a complete exposure. Several pen nibs were found in his clothes and a piece of ferro-cerium in his shoes. By scratching the ferro-cerium with a pen nib in the dark, Erto's light effects could be easily reproduced.

For many years nothing further was heard of Erto's psychic adventures. In 1931, however, Emanuele Sorge, a prominent Italian scientist, requested the National Laboratory of Psychical Research of London to undertake an investigation. Erto arrived in London during December and under conditions of increasing severity gave a series of sittings under the auspices of psychical researcher Harry Price.

When left to himself, Erto produced brilliant flashes of light in the dark. Under conditions of strict control, however, beyond the roaring voice of "Near," a claimed trance personality, and whisperings of a female voice, no phenomena came forth. Erto was investigated by Emilio Servadio in 1932, but although the sittings were considered more satisfactory, the results were still ambiguous, and Erto is generally considered a fake medium on the basis of the damaging evidence from his 1924 sittings in Paris.

Sources:

Mackenzie, William. "Les Experiences de Genes avec le medium Erto." Revue Métaphysique (November–December 1922).

Price, Harry. Leaves from a Psychist's Case-Book. London: Gollancz, 1933.

Esalen Institute

A center at Big Sur, California, formed to explore trends in the behavioral sciences, religion, and philosophy that emphasize the potentialities and values of human existence. It was founded in 1962 by Michael H. Murphy to devise ways of extending human potential. The name derives from a tribe of Indians who once lived along the California coast.

Murphy spent three years in study and meditation before creating Esalen and lived for 18 months at the Sri Aurobindo ashram in Pondicherry, India. His associates have included Baba Ram Dass (Richard Alpert), William C. Schutz, Ida P. Rolf, and Frederick S. Perls. Many famous individuals have given lecture courses or acted as advisers, including veteran mythologist Joseph Campbell, Alan Watts, Ralph Metzer, and Bishop John Robinson (of Britain). Esalen made encounter group a universally recognized term and has conducted courses in mythology, mysticism, meditation, psychotherapy, group awareness, emotional reeducation, and expansion of consciousness. Michael Murphy has also been associated with the formation of Quaesitor, a European center with programs similar to Esalen's.

Inevitably, the wide range of activities and lecturers at Esalen has invited criticism that the center has sometimes sensationalized sensitive areas of human experience and potential. In addition to reputable and accredited individuals, workshops have also been conducted by self-styled mystics, shamans, and experimenters. For example, one staff member of Esalen whimsically claimed in a brochure current or previous bouts as "a drug user, village idiot, thief, madman, carny, masseur, and shaman." However, Esalen has undoubtedly pioneered and popularized new directions in human awareness and relationships and introduced methods of "turning on" without drugs. It has been considered a power center of the human potential movement.

Esalen grew out of an exciting discussion between Aldous Huxley, Michael Murphy, and Richard Price in Santa Monica in the summer of 1961. The story of the founding and history of Esalen, and the many famous names associated with it as the consciousness revolution swept the United States and influenced the world, is chronicled by Walter Truett Anderson in his book The Upstart Spring: Esalen and the American Awakening (1983). The title derives from the play A Sleep of Prisoners, by British playwright Christopher Fry, which describes a dark and frozen winter of centuries that begins to thaw in the "upstart spring." The quotation occurred in an introduction to the 1965 Esalen brochure. The book describes Esalen's beginnings; its exploration of new lifestyles; its development as a gathering place for such individuals as Alan Watts, Gregory Bateson, Timothy Leary, and Abraham Maslow; and the triumphs, mistakes, tragedies, and controversies of Esalen's heady history.

Anderson is a political scientist, journalist, author of books on American politics and social movements, and a former contributing editor to Human Behavior magazine. He has also served on the editorial board of the Journal of Humanistic Psychology. He visited Esalen in the mid-1960s and later became an instructor there.

Esalen maintains a wide range of programs and continues to pioneer new approaches to the development of human consciousness. Address: Esalen Institute, Big Sur, CA 93920.

Sources:

Anderson, Walter Truett. The Upstart Spring: Esalen and the American Awakening. Reading, Mass.: Addison-Wesley, 1983.

Miller, Stuart. Hot Springs. New York: Viking Press, 1971.

Esbat

Within modern Neo-Paganism, particularly among Wicca (or Witchcraft), time is measured by the movements of the Sun and Moon. In ancient European cultures, such a frame of reference would be common to the community, but in the modern world, the secularized Christian calendar has become dominant. The ancient calendar was anchored in the observation of the movement of the rising sun as it traveled north and south along the eastern horizon. The most northerly point coincided with the longest day of the year and the most southerly point with the shortest day. Halfway between, the day and night would be equal. These four days became known as the summer and winter solstices and the spring and fall equinoxes, and they, along with four additional days, half way between the solstices and equinoxes, provided an overall framework for community activity. In the modern world, no longer tied to an agricultural cycle, the points on the solar calendar have become the holidays that assist in defining the Wiccan faith.

While there are records of ancient European tribes marking the important points on the solar calendar, there are few records of their paying attention to the lunar cycles, at least as a point for gathering and the working of magic. The idea of meeting monthly at the new moon or bi-weekly at the new and full moons (the esbat), appears to be a practice introduced by Gerald B. Gardner, who created modern Wicca over a number of years after retiring to England in the 1930s. Previously, he had been a Mason in Southeast Asia and while there may have learned of the so-called "Moon Lodges," Masonic groups that met monthly according to the lunar calendar.

Modern Wicca is built around small intimate groups of ten to twenty people (covens) who gather in a culture that is either secular or follows another faith. While several covens may father for the solar festivals (sabbats) to celebrate together, the real work of the coven is done in its esbats. Common to all Wiccans is the full moon esbats. It is at these meetings that one develops their psychic powers, learns to do magic, and focuses the spiritual life.

Most covens also meet at the new moon. New Moon rituals tend to be for personal growth, healing, and the initiation of new ventures. These tend to be the most intimate meetings of the coven and rarely are outsiders admitted. Full Moon rituals are for the working of magic, banishing of unwanted influences, and assistance for those in need. Central to the esbat is the ritual act of "drawing down the moon," magically raising a whirlwind of power and symbolically drawing it into the circle within which the coven meets, As the energy is released, each member feels an empowerment for their life.

Sources:

Ravenwolf, Silver. To Ride a Silver Broomstick: New Generation Witchcraft. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1995.

Valiente, Doreen. The ABC of Witchcraft Past and Present. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1973.

Esdaile, James (1808–1859)

Scottish surgeon and mesmerist. Esdaile was born February 6, 1808, at Sydenham, England, and educated at Edinburgh University (M.D., 1830). After graduation he took a position as a physician for the East India Company (1831–35). He initially developed an interest in mesmerism from reading reports on the medical uses of mesmerism by John Elliotson, who originally introduced the subject into Britain.

Esdaile became a pioneer of surgical operations under mesmeric trance. As director of Hooghley Hospital, Calcutta, India, he performed many operations using mesmerism at the same time that another surgeon, James Braid, was using similar techniques in Britain. In support of his work, he wrote a series of books: Mesmeric Facts (1845), Mesmerism in India and its Practical Application to Surgery and Medicine (1846), and Record of Cases Treated in Mesmeric Hospital, 1846–47, with Reports by Official Visitors (1847). In 1848 Esdaile was appointed Bengal presidency surgeon. That same year chloroform and ether became available as anesthetics in India, but Esdaile recommended caution in their use, on the basis of his successful use of mesmerism.

He returned to Scotland in 1851 and wrote two books—The Introduction to Mesmerism as an Anesthetic and Curative Agent into the Hospitals of India (1852) and Natural and Mesmeric Clairvoyance (1852)—detailing his work in an attempt to introduce his successful procedures into Great Britain. He found that his mesmeric techniques were not nearly as successful with Europeans as they had been with Indians. He died January 10, 1859, in England.

Sources:

Esdaile, James. Mesmerism in India and its Practical Application to Surgery and Medicine. 1846. Reprint, Chicago: Psychic Research, 1902.

———. Natural and Mesmeric Clairvoyance. New York; London: H. Bailliere, 1852.

Eskimos

Traditional religion among the Eskimo people had a strong element of magic centered on the shamans, whom they called angekok. Eskimos consulted their shamans at important times, such as before a hunting expedition or when ill. The nature of the ceremonies employed on those occasions may be inferred from the account of Captain G. F. Lyon, who once employed an angekok named Toolemak to summon a tomga (familiar spirit) in the cabin of a ship. He gave an account of the ceremony that was used, as follows.

In complete darkness the sorcerer began vehemently chanting to his wife, who responded with the Amna-aya, the favorite song of the Eskimo. This song lasted throughout the ceremony. Toolemak began to spin around, shouting for the tomga while blowing and snorting like a walrus. His noise, agitation, and impatience increased steadily, and at length he seated himself on the deck, varying his tones, and rustling his clothes.

Suddenly the voice seemed smothered, as if the shaman was retreating beneath the deck. It became more distant, ultimately sounding as if it were many feet below the cabin. Then it ceased entirely. In answer to Lyon's queries, the sorcerer's wife declared that the shaman had dived and would send up the tomga.

In about half a minute a distant blowing was heard, approaching very slowly, and a voice different from the shaman's was mixed with the blowing. Eventually both sounds became distinct, and the old woman said that the tomga had come to answer the stranger's questions. Lyon asked several questions of the sagacious spirit, receiving what he understood to be an affirmative or favorable answer by two loud slaps on the deck.

A hollow yet powerful voice, certainly not Toolemak's, chanted for some time. A medley of hisses, groans, shouts, and gobblings like a turkey's followed in swift succession. The old woman sang with increased energy, and because Lyon conjectured that the exhibition was intended to astonish "the Kabloona," he said repeatedly that he was greatly terrified. As he expected, this admission added fuel to the flame until the spirit, exhausted by its own might, asked leave to retire. The voice gradually faded and an indistinct hissing followed. At first it sounded like the tone produced by wind on the bass cord of an Eolian harp. This was soon changed to a rapid hiss like that of a rocket, and Toolemak, with a yell, announced the spirit's return.

At the first distant sibilation Lyon held his breath, and twice exhausted himself; but the Eskimo conjurer did not breathe once. Even his returning, powerful yell was uttered without previous pause or inspiration of air.

When light was admitted Toolemak was in a state of profuse perspiration and exhausted by his exertions, which had continued for at least half an hour. Lyon then observed two bundles, each consisting of two strips of white deerskin and a long piece of sinew, attached to the back of the shaman's coat. He had not seen them before and was told that they had been sewn on by the tomga while Toolemak was below.

The performance had much in common with that of a Western medium at a spirit séance. The angekoks claim to visit the dwelling places of the spirits they invoke and give circumstantial descriptions of these habitations. They have a firm belief in their own powers.

The explorer Dr. Elisha Kane (1820–1957) considered it interesting that wonder-workers from indigenous cultures and postindustrial societies had so much in common. He observed:

"I have known several of them personally, and can speak with confidence on this point. I could not detect them in any resort to jugglery or natural magic; their deceptions are simply vocal, a change of voice, and perhaps a limited profession of ventriloquism, made more imposing by the darkness." They had, however, like the members of the learned professions everywhere else, a certain language or jargon of their own, in which they communicated with each other.

"While the angekoks are the dispensers of good, the issintok, or evil men, are the workers of injurious spells, enchantments, and metamorphoses. Like the witches of both Englands, the Old and the New, these malignant creatures are rarely submitted to trial until they have suffered punishment—the old 'Jeddart justice'—castigate auditque. Two of them, in 1818, suffered the penalty of their crime on the same day, one at Kannonak, the other at Upernavik. The latter was laudably killed in accordance with the 'old custom'. . . . custom being everywhere the apology for any act revolting to moral sense. He was first harpooned, then disembowelled; a flap let down from his forehead to cover his eyes and prevent his seeing again—he had, it appears, the repute of an evil eye—and then small portions of his heart were eaten, to ensure that he should not come back to earth unchanged."

Kane's observations of Eskimo shaman practice have special interest because he became the husband of Margaretta Fox, one of the Fox sisters, the first modern Spiritualist mediums.

Sources:

Kane, Elisha. Arctic Explorations in Search of Sir John Franklin. London: T. Nelson, 1885.

Merkur, Daniel. Becoming Half Hidden: Shamanism and Initiation among the Inuit. New York: Garland, 1992.

Walker, Daniel E. Witchcraft and Sorcery of the American Native Peoples. Moscow: University of Idaho Press, 1989.

Esoteric Society

British organization founded in 1974 to present a wide range of esoteric studies, including Kabala, the Rosicrucians, exorcism, magic, alchemy, Stonehenge, astrology, and the Holy Grail. The society organized meetings as well as arranged tours to such sites as Stonehenge, Avebury, and Glastonbury. It issued a quarterly newsletter, Esoterica. Last known address: 40 Buckingham Gate, London, SW1, England.

ESP See Extrasensory Perception

ESP Laboratory of Texas

Not a laboratory for research in the scientific sense of the term, but a mystical organization founded as the ESP Laboratory by Alcie Gwyn Manning in Los Angeles, California, in 1966. With the help of a spirit guide, "Professor Reinhardt," Manning wrote his initial book. He also became a minister of Spiritual Science and opened a church. He developed a program of psychic development designed to bring success, prosperity, and healing.

In 1970 Manning introduced a course on the I Ching and the following year one on white magic and witchcraft. His practical approach was emphasized in a new book, Helping Yourself with White Witchcraft (1972). In the early 1980s Manning moved the laboratory to Texas. He also made a most endearing and original contribution to contemporary mythology with the felicitously named Gronkydoddles, a race of invisible pixies helpful to the human race. Address: ESP Laboratory of Texas, Box 216, 219 S. Ridge Dr., Edgewood, TX 75117.

Sources:

Manning, Alcie G. Helping Yourself with White Witchcraft. West Nyack, N.Y.: Parker Publishing, 1972.

———. Helping Yourself with the Power of Gnostic Magic. West Nyack, N.Y.: Parker Publishing, 1979.

"Esplandian"

A medieval Spanish legend that tells how Amadis of Gaul and his wife Oriana of the Firm Island had the wicked enchanter Archelous in their keeping but set him free in answer to his wife's entreaties. Certain calamities occurred that were attributed to Archelous, and Amadis's son Esplandian was carried off by the enchantress Urganda. The legend goes on to relate the adventures of Esplandian, including how he was given a magic sword and killed a dragon. With this sword he also succeeded in killing Archelous himself and his nephew, and he then set free a kinsman. His next opponent was Matroed, son of Arcobone, whom he also vanquished. Finally, he utterly destroyed the stronghold of Archelous and freed the land from the pagan influence of Matroed.

ESP Magazine

A short-lived 1970s American newsstand publication featuring articles on psychic phenomena and parapsychology.

ESP Research Associates Foundation

A psychic phenomena research and interest organization founded in 1962 with a membership of individuals who believed they had genuine ESP experiences and wished to learn more about the functioning of these powers of the mind. President and guiding force of the foundation was Harold Sherman (b. 1898), a leading figure in the psychic community in America through the mid-twentieth century.

Sherman began his adult life as a journalist and novelist. Then in 1935 he wrote a short metaphysical book, Your Key to Happiness, which led to his radio show by the same name. In 1937 and 1938 Sherman conducted an ESP experiment with Arctic explorer Sir Hubert Wilkins that yielded a significant account of telepathic communication of interest to parapsychologists. A log of Wilkins's thoughts and actions compared with Sherman's received impressions provide a startling record of the possibilities of psychic comunication. This served as a model for a similar experiment conducted by Edgar Mitchell during his voyage to the Moon on Apollo 14 in 1971.

Through the 1940s and 1950s Sherman continued to write metaphysical and psychic books that brought him a great following. They became the basis for the formation of ESP Research Associates Foundation, which among other activities provided a contact point for people who wished to have psychic readings from Sherman. Through the 1980s, the foundation conducted conferences but was unable to continue effectively after Sherman's death and was discontinued.

Sources:

Sherman, Harold. How to Foresee and Control Your Future. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett, 1970.

———. How to Know What to Believe. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett, 1976.

———. How to Make ESP Work for You. Los Angeles: DeVorss, 1964.

———. You Live After Death. New York: C. R. Anthony, 1949.

———. Your Key to Happiness. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1935. Reprint, Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett, 1964.

Sherman, Harold, and Sir Hubert Wilkins. Thought Through Space. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett, 1972.

Essene, Virginia (1928–)

Contemporary channel, Virginia Essene was born Virginia Varner in Denver, Colorado, in 1928. She attended the University of Colorado, where she earned a B.A. degree in psychology and social science. After several years of being an elementary schoolteacher, she completed a master's degree at the University of California–Los Angeles (UCLA) in 1954. Through the 1960s and 1970s she taught at several schools (University of Oregon, San Jose State University). She continues to teach in various adult education courses on a variety of topics, but has concentrated through the 1990s on hospice work and counseling with the bereaved. She founded the Casa Serena hospice care unit in San Jose, California.

Essene is not as well known for her educational and hospice work, but for her channeling activity. In 1984, she visited Israel and, while at the Sea of Galilee, had a life-changing mystical experience, during which she experienced what she believed to be the "energies of Jesus." She began to channel messages from him that became the basis of a book, New Teachings for an Awakened Humanity (1986, rev. exp. ed. 1995). She founded the Spiritual Education Endeavors Publishing Company and the Share Foundation to nurture and disseminate her channeled material. She has subsequently published Secret Truths: A Young Adults Guide for Creating Peace, Descent of the Dove (with Ann Valentin), You Are Becoming a Galagtic Human (with Sheldon Nidle), and The Hathor Material (with Tom Kenyon) (1966).

New Teachings for an Awakened Humanity espoused the idea of the "Love Corps" an alliance of people who seek inner peace and the application of such peace to the global situation. Those who associate with Essene—the SHARE Foundation and the Love Corps—dedicate themselves to a process of achieving inner peace through meditation and self-healing and in sharing that reality with others. The Love Corps work is carried out by a group of "lightworkers" who work for the foundation.

The SHARE Foundation may be contacted 1556 Halford Ave., #288, Santa Clara, CA 95051-2661. It publishes a newsletter, Love Corps. Essene was originally ordained by the Unity-in-Diversity Church and later became a priest in the theosophically oriented Church of Antioch. In 1997 she affiliated with the Madonna Ministry and information about her and her writings as well as the SHARE foundation may be found on the ministry's website.

Sources:

The Christ [through Virginia Essene]. New Teachings for an Awakened Humanity. Santa Clara, Calif.: S.E.E. Publishing, 1986. Rev. exp. Ed., 1995.

Essene, Virginia. The Earth, the Cosmos and You: Revelations by Archangel Michael. Santa Clara, Calif.: S.E.E. Publishing, 1999.

Essene, Virginia, and Tom Kenyon. The Hathor Material. Santa Clara, Calif.: S.E.E. Publishing, 1996.

Feurst, Irving, and Virgina Essene. Energy Blessing from the Stars: 7 Initiations. Santa Clara, Calif.: S.E.E. Publishing, 1998.

Madonna Ministry. http://www.madonnaministry.org/. October 15, 1999.

The Essene Foundation

The Essene Foundation was established in the early 1980s following the death of Edmond Bordeaux Szekely (d. 1980) by Archbishop Garry White, a long-time associate. Originally founded as the First Christian's Essene Church, it perpetuates the teachings found in the many books written by Szekely that grew out of The Essene Gospel of Peace, an ancient text that he had claimed to have found, translated, and published. The church believes that ancient Christianity was rooted in the Essene community, a belief they claim was strengthened by the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls. The Essene Gospel of Peace was released in four volumes, the first in 1937. Volumes two and three were released in 1974 and the last volume posthumously in 1981. They present a very different picture of Jesus, including the idea that he was a vegetarian. The church's creed emphasizes the fatherhood of God, the motherhood of Nature, and the brotherhood of Man. Members are encouraged to follow a path to enlightenment that begins in adopting practices that perpetuate physical, mental, and emotional health. Vegetarianism and the use of natural foods are highly recommended, as is healing through the use of various forms of naturopathic remedies.

In the early 1990s the church changed its name to The Essene Foundation. In 1992 Garry White retired as archbishop and was named patriarch. He was succeeded as archbishop by Dr. Emmanuel M. Winocur. The foundation is headquartered at 2536 Collier Ave., San Diego, CA 92116. It has a number of affiliated missions scattered across the western United States (California, Oregon, Arizona), New York, and Arkansas.

Sources:

Berskov, Per. Strange Tales About Jesus. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1983.

Szekely, Edmond Bordeaux. The Gospel of Peace by the Apostle John. London: C. H. Daniels, 1937. Reprinted as The Essene Gospel of Peace. San Diego: Academy of Creative Living, 1971.

———. The Essene Way, Biogenic Living. Cartago, Costa Rica: International Biogenic Society, 1978.

———. Talks. San Diego: Academy of Creative Living, 1972.

The Essenes

An esoteric Jewish sect that flourished in Palestine in the century immediately prior to the emergence of the Christian movement and from whom the early Christians may have drawn some of their basic ideas. They were very exclusive and possessed an organization peculiar to themselves. The earliest mentions of the Essenes come from the writings of Philo and Josephus, both contemporaries of Jesus. According to Philo, they lived separated lives apart from the cities, had a voluntary communal life with a subsistence level of existence, and avoided temple worship. They had a threefold rule of love of God, love of virtue, and love of humankind. Pliny, most importantly, located a holy of Essenes on the west bank of the Dead Sea at a point far enough away as to escape its noxious fumes.

Josephus was for a short period an Essene, which he described as one of three sects among the Palestinian Jews. He also notes their communalism and their voluntary poverty. He dealt with their tendency to adopt celibacy and to make room for orphans, which they treated as their own children. They had their own worship and beliefs, within a larger Jewish context. As to their peculiar beliefs, Josephus notes: ". . . they firmly believe that their bodies perish and their substance is not enduring, but that the souls are immortal. . . and that when released from the bounds of the body, they, as if released from a long servitude, rejoice and mount upwards." Josephus was criticized for trying to explain the Essene belief in such a way as to make it appear similar to Greek thought.

The Dead Sea Scrolls

We knew little of the Essenes until the late twentieth century. In 1947 a Bedouin boy discovered a cave near the northwest shore of the Dead Sea. In the cave was a jar with scrolls in it. After the initial discovery, eventually a number of other caves and an enormous number of additional scrolls were found. Slowly, texts of the scrolls have been published, and while various ideas were explored as to the identity of the community at Qumran, the site of the caves, there is now general consensus that the scrolls were gathered and reflect the beliefs and practices of at least one segment of the Essene community. Qumran existed from around the middle of the second century B.C.E. to the time of the Jewish anti-Roman revolt, 66–70 C.E.

The members of the group began their day with a prayer facing the rising sun, as Josephus described it, "as though entreating it to rise." They ate a communal meal several times during the day and spent their evenings (and all of the Sabbath) in prayer and biblical exposition. They followed the rites and festivals laid out in the Jewish Bible (the Christian Old Testament). It may be that a calendar question occasioned by the adoption of a Hellenized calendar in Jerusalem may have led to the formation of the Essenes.

Membership in the group was by initiation, which was predated by a year's probation. The initiation ceremony included baptism and the beginning of daily purification rites within the group. The purification was followed by the evening meal. The meal had an eschatological significance, a foretaste of the meal to be presided over by the Messiah.

They believed the soul to be in the midst of a war between good and evil, the Angel of Darkess viewing with the Prince of Light. They also believed in astrology to some degree, ascribing a place in the battle based upon the day of one's birth. They saw themselves as collectively a militia in the service of light and individually at war with the darkness that entered through the body. Their understanding of the body led them to celibacy and asceticism.

The understanding of the life and teachings of the Essenes, at least those at Qumran, will be more fully explicated as the additional texts only recently released to the larger scholarly world are translated and debate proceeds.

Sources:

Cohen, Shaye J. D. From the Maccabees to the Mishnah. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1987.

Cross, Frank Moore. The Ancient Library of Qumran. Minneapolis, Minn.: Fortress Press, 1995.

Ginsburg, Christian D. The Essenes: Their History and Doctrines. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1863.

Knibb, Michael A. The Qumran Community. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987.

Kraft, Robert A., and George W. E. Nickelsburg. Early Judaism and Its Modern Interpreters. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1986.

Simon, Marcel. Jewish Sects at the Time of Jesus. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1967.

est

Popular name for Erhard Seminars Training, a system of experiential philosophy developed by Werner Erhard. Through the 1960s Erhard explored a variety of self-help courses and spiritual disciplines, including Dale Carnegie, the Church of Scientology, Subud, Zen Buddhism, and Mind Dynamics. In 1971, he had an enlightenment experience, during the time he was a mind Dynamics instructor.

Erhard concluded he must take responsibility for his life. In the seminars, through lectures and various activities, he tried to assist people to understand that they were not the labels put on them by others, but the product of their own decisions. This act of insight was termed "getting it."

The est basic program consisted of some 60 hours of training over two weekends for which attendees were charged $250.00. Some 500,000 people took the course from Erhard or his assistants between 1971 and 1984. In 1984 est was discontinued and replaced with The Forum. In 1991 Erhard sold his corporation to a group of employees and retired from public life. He was at the time under attack from several points, including the IRS and a former employee who was suing him.

Sources:

Bartley, William Warren. Werner Erhard: The Transformation of a Man, the Founding of est. New York: C. N. Potter, 1978.

Hargrove, Robert A. est: Making Life Work. New York: Delacorte Press, 1976.

Estabrooks, George Hoban (1895–1973)

Professor of psychology. Estabrooks was born December 16, 1895, at St. John, New Brunswick, Canada, and educated at Acadid University, Wolfville, Nova Scotia. He was a Rhodes scholar at Oxford University (1921–24) and completed his Ph.D. at Harvard University in 1926. He was a professor of psychology at Springfield College in Massachusetts (1926–27) and then moved on to Colgate University, where he became chairman of the Department of Psychology in 1938.

Estabrooks was introduced to psychical research during his doctoral program at Harvard when he engaged in research on telepathy with William McDougall, Morton Prince, and Gardner Murphy, who had established the Boston Society for Psychic Research following a dispute within the American Society for Psychical Research. During his years of teaching at Colgate his interest in telepathy resulted in a number of books. He died December 30, 1973.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Estabrooks, George H. Hypnosis: Current Problems. New York: Harper, 1962.

———. Hypnotism. New York: Dutton, 1957.

———. Man, Mechanical Misfit. New York: Macmillan, 1941.

———. Spiritism. New York: Dutton, 1947.

Estabrooks, George H., and Nancy Gross. The Future of the Human Mind. New York: Dutton, 1961.

Estabrooks, George H., and Richard Lockbridge. Death in the Mind. New York: Dutton, 1947.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

ET

Extraterrestrial—a hypothetical, imagined or alleged being from outer space.

The concept of visiting extraterrestrials has grown and developed since the mid-nineteenth century. As early as June 1864, a French newspaper reported the discovery of a mummified humanoid body inside a hollow, egg-shaped structure by two American geologists. According to contemporary newspaper accounts an "air vessel belonging originally to some other planet" crashed on a riverbank in rural Nebraska in 1884.

These reports generated little attention in their time, but between November 1896 and May 1897 a wave of sightings of mysterious "airships" swept the United States and stirred widespread controversy. Most who proposed explanations favored delusions, misidentifications, hoaxes, or secret inventors; yet a small but vocal minority of theorists wondered if Martians were touring the Earth. A number of outlandish hoaxes played in this notion. A California man claimed that beautiful, naked space people, weighing less than an ounce each, had tried to abduct him into a waiting airship. In Kansas a rancher told a tongue-in-cheek tale in which alien creatures in an airship lassoed and stole a calf from his corral. A Dallas newspaper alleged that an airship collided with a windmill in a tiny north Texas village, killing its Martian pilot, who was then buried in the local cemetery.

Another "airship" wave, occurring in 1909 in New Zealand, inspired a letter to the editor of the Otago Daily Times arguing that "atomic- powered spaceships" from Mars were responsible for the reports. The first book to make a case for extraterrestrial visitation was Charles Fort's The Book of the Damned (1919). Fort (1874–1932), a talented writer with a keen sense of satire, had spent years in the New York Public Library collecting printed accounts of a wide range of human and natural oddities. Among them were worldwide reports of strange flying objects in the atmosphere. Fort was the first to become aware of what would be called in later decades the "UFO phenomenon." Previous to this, sightings seemed no more than isolated curiosities. In Damned and two subsequent books, Fort demonstrated that there was a pattern in such observations. He lampooned attempts to explain them conventionally and in the process argued, that beings from other worlds had Earth under observation. He also anticipated UFO-age speculation in linking extraterrestrials to ancient civilizations and to mysterious disappearances.

A year before his death, the Fortean Society was created to carry on Fort's studies of unexplained physical (as opposed to psychic) phenomena (sometimes known as "Fortean" phenomena), including aerial anomalies. Many Forteans were also interested in science fiction. In the mid-1940s two Ziff-Davis pulp fiction books, Amazing Stories and Fantastic Adventures, These books, edited by Ray Palmer, carried sensational, "true" articles and stories on the theme of ancient and current visitation from space.

A Boise, Idaho, private pilot's sighting of nine fast-moving discs over Mount Rainier, Washington, on the afternoon of June 24, 1947, brought "flying saucers" into popular consciousness. Overwhelmingly, Americans thought the saucers were American or Soviet weapons or natural phenomena. In 1948 a top secret "estimate of the situation" prepared by personnel at Project Sign, the U.S. Air Force's first UFO-investigative project, argued that the objects were probably of interplanetary origin. The Air Force Chief of Staff rejected that conclusion, however, and Project Sign was reorganized into Project Grudge, which sought to debunk UFO sightings.

The first seriously argued case for UFOs-as-spacecraft appeared in the January 1950 issue of a widely read men's magazine True. The article, "The Flying Saucers Are Real," contended that peaceable ETs were conducting surveillance of the Earth, probably for the purpose of eventual contact. Donald E. Keyhoe, the author, was a retired Marine Corps major heretofore known as an aviation journalist, but the True piece led to a paperback book of the same title, then a career for Keyhoe as the leading public advocate of UFOs as extraterrestrials. From 1957–1969, Keyhoe directed the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena (NICAP), which investigated UFO reports, criticized the Air Force's handling of them, and sought to make UFOs respectable.

In the 1950s, the terms UFOs and spacecraft became virtually synonymous in popular culture. UFO groups formed around the world, and books on the subject sometimes appeared on best-seller lists. Along with more conservative proponents of ET visitation, there were the "contactees" and their followers. Contactees claimed to have met physically, or communicated psychically, with angelic beings in saucers. The contactees believed the space people came to bring moral reforms and technological advances to the human race, which was viewed as primitive, warlike, and even dangerous by their more spiritually developed brothers and sisters in the cosmos.

Though rejecting contactee stories, conservative ufologists were receptive to other sorts of UFO-occupant reports, later called "close encounters of the third kind," or CE3s. In these cases the beings, typically described as humanoid and hardly angelic, had little to say and were encountered only briefly; moreover, the witnesses tended to fit the social and psychological profiles of witnesses to less exotic UFO events. Contactees, on the other hand, struck ufologists as fringe personalities whose esoteric interests long predated their supposed interactions with space people.

In the 1960s another kind of ostensible ET encounter rose to prominence—the abduction. In abduction cases witnesses reported being taken against their will into UFOs, meeting their humanoid crews, and usually being subjected to a physical examination. Most, though not all, of these incidents were recovered through hypnosis, after witnesses described a period of amnesia during a sighting. Over the years the phenomenon seemed to grow more complex. Witnesses related extended encounters, sometimes involving journeys to other worlds. Others claimed instances of sexual intercourse with human-like aliens. Some female abductees said they had experienced mysteriously terminated pregnancies, then later, while on board a spacecraft, been shown babies or children with both human and alien features—their own hybrid offspring.

In a number of abduction cases, stories took on the form of earlier contactee tales. While many abductees described their captors as cold and uncaring, others were certain of their benign intentions for the Earth and its inhabitants. Harvard psychiatrist John E. Mack became a leading advocate of this interpretation, whereas Budd Hopkins and David M. Jacobs argued that the abducting aliens do not have humanity's best interests in mind. Jacobs has stated that the aliens were creating hybrids to supplant the human race.

These sorts of issues have been controversial even within ufology, where many suspect the abductions to be a question of psychology, not of exobiology. Still, abductions and the aliens associated with them have become a staple of popular culture.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. The UFO Encyclopedia, Second Edition: The Phenomenon from the Beginning. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1998.

Curran, Douglas. In Advance of the Landing: Folk Concepts of Outer Space. New York: Abbeville Press, 1985.

Fort, Charles. The Books of Charles Fort. New York: Henry Holt, 1941.

Hopkins, Budd. Intruders: The Incredible Visitations at Copley Woods. New York: Random House, 1987.

Hynek, J. Allen. The UFO Experience: A Scientific Inquiry. Chicago: Henry Regnery Co., 1972.

Jacobs, David M. The Threat. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1998.

Keyhoe, Donald E. The Flying Saucers Are Real. New York: Fawcett Publications, 1950.

Lewis, James R., ed. The Gods Have Landed: New Religions from Other Worlds. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Mack, John E. Abduction: Human Encounters with Aliens. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1994.

Etain

In ancient Irish romance, the second wife of Midir the Proud. The sorceress Fuamnach, Midir's first wife, became jealous of her beauty and turned her into a butterfly, and she was blown out of the palace by a magic storm. For seven years she was tossed throughout Ireland, but then was blown into the fairy palace of Angus on the Boyne. He could not release her from the spell, but during the day she fed on honey-laden flowers, and by night in her natural form gave Angus her love. Fuamnach discovered her hiding place and sent a dreadful tempest that blew Etain into the drinking cup of Etar, wife of an Ulster chief. Etar swallowed her, but she was reborn as Etar's daughter, and as such married Eochy, high king of Ireland.

Ether

Late nineteenth-century hypothesis suggested by physicists as a means of accounting for the propagation of light as a wave motion through otherwise empty space. The idea of ether meshed with the teachings of the mesmerists and Theosophists, who spoke of subtle substructures of matter sometimes referred to as koilon—all-pervading, filling all space, and interpenetrating all matter. Ether was supposedly of very great density, 10,000 times more dense than water and with a pressure of 750 tons per square inch.

According to Theosophical teaching, ether was said to be capable of being perceived only by clairvoyants with the most highly developed powers. It was said to be filled with an infinitude of small bubbles, much like the air bubbles in treacle or some other viscid substance. The bubbles were supposedly formed at some ancient time by the infusion of the breath of the Logos into the ether. Of these bubbles—not of the ether—matter was said to be built, its density varying with the number of bubbles combined to form each objects.

Ether became the subject of one of the more famous experiments in physics, by Albert Abraham Michelson and E. W. Morley. Their experiment involved the splitting and reintegration of a light wave in such a manner that the presence of ether would slow one of the waves. They disproved the existence of ether and brought America its first Nobel Prize for physics. The experiment also contributed to the development of Einstein's theory of relativity. The abandonment of ether by science led to its eventual abandonment by Spiritualists and Theosophists.

Etheric Double

According to theosophical teaching, derived from ancient Hindu philosophy, the etheric double is an invisible part of the ordinary, visible, physical body, which it interpenetrates and beyond which it extends a little, forming with other finer bodies the aura. The etheric double is not made of the supposed omnipresent ether of space, but is composed of physical matter known as etheric, superetheric, subatomic, and atomic.

The term double is used because the etheric double is a replica of the denser physical body. The sense organs of the etheric double are the chakras, and it is through the chakras that the physical body is supplied with the vitality necessary for its existence and its well-being during life. The etheric double thus plays the part of a conductor, and a bridge between the physical and astral bodies, for without it humans could have no communications with the astral world and hence neither thoughts nor feelings.

Anesthetics are said to drive out the greater part of the double, and the subject is then impervious to pain. During sleep the double does not leave the physical body; indeed, in dreams the etheric part of the brain is extremely active, especially when, as is often the case, the dreams are caused by attendant physical circumstances, such as noise. Shortly after death, the etheric double finally quits the physical body though it does not move far away from the body, but is composed of the four subdivisions of physical matter alluded to earlier. With the decay of the physical body, the double reportedly also decays.

Those who have claimed experience of astral projection or out-of-the-body travel state that the etheric or astral body is connected to the physical body by a subtle, infinitely extensible cord. Aside from their specialized use in Theosophy, the terms etheric double and etheric body are often used synonymously with astral body.

Sources:

Mead, G. R. S. The Doctrine of the Subtle Body. London: John M. Watkins, 1919. Reprint, Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1967.

Powell, A. E. The Etheric Double. 1926. Reprint, Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1969.

Etheric Vision

According to theosophical teaching, the power of sight peculiar to the etheric double, a subtle counterpart of the physical body. Etheric vision is of considerably greater power than physical vision, and by its aid many of the phenomena of the physical world may be examined, as well as many creatures of a nonhuman nature that are ordinarily just outside the range of physical vision. It responds readily to stimuli of various kinds and becomes active under their influence.

Sources:

Powell, A. E. The Etheric Double. 1926. Reprint, Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1969.

Ethlinn

Daughter of Balor, king of the Fomorians of ancient Irish magic legend. She was Balor's only child, and because he had been informed by a Druid that he would be killed by his grandson, Balor had Ethlinn imprisoned in a tower and guarded by 12 women who were forbidden to tell her that such beings as men existed. Balor stole a magic cow from Kian, who in revenge obtained access, disguised as a woman, to Ethlinn. They had three children, whom Balor ordered to be drowned. But one of them fell from the napkin in which they were being taken to their doom and was carried off by the Druidess Birog to its father, Kian. This child became Lugh, the great sun god, who eventually fulfilled the prophecy and killed his grandfather Balor.

"Etteilla" (ca. 1790)

An eighteenth-century student of the tarot. By profession he was a hairdresser, his true name being Alliette, but on entering upon his occult studies he changed his name to read backward: "Etteilla." He had little education and was ill-acquainted with the philosophy of the initiates. Nevertheless, he possessed a profound intuition, and according to the famous occultist Éliphas Lévi, he came very near to unveiling the secrets of the tarot. Lévi stated that his writings, however, were "obscure, wearisome, and in style barbarous." Etteilla claimed to have revised the Book of Thoth (i.e., the tarot) but in reality obscured its meaning by regarding as blunders certain cards whose meaning he had failed to grasp.

It is commonly admitted that he failed in his attempt to elucidate the tarot and ended by transposing the keys, thus destroying the correspondence between the numbers and the signs. It is also said that he degraded the science of the tarot into mere fortune-telling by cards for credulous people. The publications of Etteilla include Manière de se récréer le jeu de cartes nommés Tarots (4 pts., 1783–85), Philosophie des hautes sciences (1785), and Science, Leçons Théoriques et pratiques du livre de Thot (1787).

Sources:

Douglas, Alfred. The Tarot: The Origins, Meaning, and Use of the Cards. New York: Taplinger, 1972.

Lévi, Éliphas. Transcendental Magic. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

European Journal of Parapsychology

Annual professional journal of the Koestler Parapsychology Unit, University of Edinburgh. Includes authoritative articles on experimental and theoretical aspects of parapsychology. Address: Koestler Chair of Parapsychology, Department of Psychology, University of Edinburgh, 7, George Square, Edinburgh EH8 9JZ, Scotland, UK.

Eva C. (1886– ?)

Famous French materialization medium, known also as "Marthe Béraud." Eva's real name was Eva Carrière (Waespé by marriage). She was the daughter of an officer and the fiancée of Maurice Noel, who died in the Congo before the marriage could take place. Her psychic powers were discovered by Noel's parents, General Noel and his wife.

General and Mrs. Noel were greatly interested in psychical research and, in the presence of invited mediums at the Villa Carmen, witnessed the materialization of a helmeted phantom, "Bien Boa," a Brahman Hindu said to have died some 300 years previously and who styled himself as the spiritual guide of the Noel family. A "sister" of the phantom, "Bergoglia," who also manifested, later hinted that "Bien Boa" was an assumed name of someone who had figured in Mrs. Noel's life in an earlier incarnation. Indeed, Mrs. Noel claimed a share of credit for Bien Boa's appearances and said that either by the séance table or by direct writing Bien Boa always declared that she was the true medium at early séances.

When the powers of Marthe Béraud were first discovered, a period of two years of experimentation commenced, and Mrs. Noel published many notes on the phenomena in Gabriel Delanne's Revue Scientifique et Morale du Spiritisme. Then the Noels and Béraud invited Charles Richet and Delanne to visit Algiers as their guests.

The séances were held in an isolated building over a stable behind bolted windows and doors. A curtain was thrown across one corner of the room to improvise a cabinet. As a rule a young black woman, Aischa, sat with Béraud behind the curtain, but Richet has said that in the more effective experiments Aischa was not present. Béraud was not tied and wore a thin dress. By making magnetic (i.e., mesmeric) passes to awaken her from her trance, Richet passed his hand all over her body and made sure that she had nothing hidden on her. The presence of Aischa, of which Mrs. Noel made a point, greatly annoyed the medium, who complained that in the tropical heat the odor of the woman was unbearable.

The materializations produced were very complete. Bien Boa appeared five or six times and offered opportunities for many important observations and experiments. Richet's report, published in the April 1906 issue of the Annales des sciences psychiques, created an immense sensation. He was satisfied that he had witnessed genuine phenomena and that Marthe Béraud could not have masqueraded in a helmet and sheet in the guise of Bien Boa. Besides, he asserts in the report, the medium and the phantom were also seen together when no stranger could have entered the room:

"I make a point of this, because of the assertions of Areski, an Arab coachman dismissed by General Noel for theft, who said that he 'played the ghost.' A certain starveling practitioner of Algiers, Dr. R., was ill-advised enough to entertain this man and to exhibit him in public at Algiers in a white mantle to play the ghost before spectators. That is the most that had been said against the experiments at the Villa Carmen. The general public blinded by ignoble newspaper tales, imagined that the fraud had been exposed. All that was really proved was that an Arab thief could lie impudently, that he could put on a sheet, could appear thus on a stage, and could get a doctor to endorse his lies. It is averred also that Marthe confessed fraud to an Algerian lawyer who took a pseudonym. But even if this anonymous allegation were true, we know the value to be placed on such revelations, which only show the mental instability of mediums."

Futhermore, according to a Dr. Z., Areski entered the séance room with the rest of the company, and when their attention was diverted by the examination of the furniture, he slipped behind the cabinet and hid behind the curtain. Richet replied to this specific charge, "Now, I declare formally and solemnly that during the séances—twenty in number—at which I was present, Areski was not once permitted to enter the séance room." The later "confession" of Marthe Béraud was alleged to contain a statement about a trapdoor. According to Richet, Béraud has never wrote or said that there was a trapdoor.

Besides the phantom of Bien Boa, a beautiful Egyptian girl also materialized and allowed Richet to cut a lock of her hair. "As I was about to cut a lock high up" stated the professor, "a firm hand behind the curtain lowered mine so that I cut only about six inches from the end. As I was rather slow about doing this, she said in a low voice 'quick, quick' and disappeared." The second important phase of Béraud's mediumship developed under the care of sculptor Juliette Bisson, to whom Béraud had been introduced in 1908. It has been suggested that Bisson and Béraud shared a lesbian relationship following the death of Bisson's husband in 1910. In any case, they lived and worked together.

Between 1909 and 1913 Béraud, by then known as "Eva C.," centered her mediumship on materializations. Joint experiments by Richet and Baron Schrenck-Notzing, with Bisson always present, built upon previous observations and elucidated several obscure points. The period also afforded an added opportunity for Richet to check his earlier findings. During her trances the medium appeared to suffer much, writhing like a woman in childbirth, and her pulse rose from 90 to 120. The materializations, under the control of an entity named "Berthe," were always slow and seemingly difficult. Very few forms were well developed or remained for a long time. All this was in striking contrast with the ease of former years. Perhaps the rigor of the control had to do with this. Eva C. had to put on special dresses. She was subject, both before and after the séance, to meticulous medical examination and often sat nude. A battery of eight photographic cameras, two of them stereoscopic, were trained on her, and 225 valuable photographs were secured when it was discovered that the séances could be held in comparatively good light, provided the medium was shielded from a sudden flash. At certain times the ectoplasmic mediumship alternated with remarkable phenomena of the intellectual type. She read automatically on an imaginary screen (like that of a cinema) pages of philosophy that greatly exceeded her normal knowledge and power.

Regarding a séance of April 15, 1912, held in the presence of Count Cesar de Vesme and Bisson, Richet is quoted as follows:

"The manifestations began at once. White substance appeared on the neck of the medium: then a head was formed which moved from left to right and placed itself on the medium's head. A photograph was taken. After the flashlight, the head reappeared by the side of Eva's head, about sixteen inches from it, connected by a long bunch of white substance. It looked like the head of a man, and made movements like bows. Some 20 appearances and reappearances of this head were counted; it appeared, retreated into the cabinet, and emerged again. A woman's head then appeared on the right, showed itself near the curtains, and went back into the cabinet, returned several times and disappeared."

Richet adds, "Marthe was examined and searched before and after the experiments. I never lost sight of her for a moment and her hands were always held and visible."

To eliminate every possibility of fraud Baron Schrenck-Notzing employed detectives for several months to watch for any suspicious circumstances in Eva's life. To answer the charge that the ectoplasm of Eva C. was regurgitated material, a strong emetic was administered on November 26, 1913, after the ectoplasmic flow reentered her mouth. Ten minutes later the experimenters were satisfied that the medium swallowed nothing with which the phenomena could have been produced.

Another important series of experiments took place in 1917–18 in the laboratories of Gustav Geley with Bisson's collaboration. About 150 representative individuals, including many scientists, witnessed the phenomena. In his From the Unconscious to the Conscious (1920), Geley observes:

"It is needless to say that the usual precautions were rigorously observed during the séances in my laboratory. On coming into the room where the séances were held, and to which I alone had previous access, the medium was completely undressed in my presence, and dressed in a tight garment, sewn up the back and at the wrists; the hair, and the cavity of the mouth were examined by me and my collaborators before and after the séances. Eva was walked backwards to the wicker chair in the dark cabinet; her hands were always held in full sight outside the curtains and the room was always quite well lit during the whole time. I do not merely say: There was no trickery; I say there was no possibility of trickery. Further, and I cannot repeat it too often, nearly always the materializations took place under my own eyes, and I have observed their genesis and their whole development."

He adds in a footnote:

"I am, moreover, glad to testify that Eva has always shown, in my presence, absolute experimental honesty. The intelligent and self-sacrificing resignation with which she submitted to all control and the truly painful tests of her mediumship, deserve the real and sincere gratitude of all men of science worthy of that name."

The results of these experiments were the subject of a conference at the College of France, published under the title La Physiologie dite Supranormale (Bulletin de l'Institut Physiologique, January–June 1918.

In 1920 Eva C. and Bisson spent two months in London. Of 40 séances given to the Society for Psychical Research, half were entirely blank, the rest very weak. As a result, the regurgitation theory was again put forward as a possible explanation. Of the London work, in his Thirty Years of Psychical Research (1923), Richet states:

"The official reports of the séances lead to very distinct inferences; it seems that though the external conditions were unfavorable to success, some results were very clear and that it is impossible to refer the phenomena to fraud. Nevertheless, our learned colleagues of the SPR came to no conclusion. They admit that the only possible trickery is regurgitation. But what is meant by that? How can masses of mobile substance, organized as hands, faces and drawings, be made to emerge from the oesophagus or the stomach? No physiologist would admit such power to contract those organs at will in this manner. How, when the medium's hands are tied and held, could papers be unfolded, put away, and made to pass, through a veil? The members of the SPR, when they fail to understand, say 'It is difficult to understand how this is produced.' Mr. Dingwall, who is an expert in legerdemain, having seen the ectoplasm emerge as a miniature hand, making signs before disappearing, says 'I attach no importance to this.' We may be permitted to remark that very great importance attaches to Mr. Dingwall's testimony."

In 1922, 15 sittings with Eva C. took place at the Sorbonne. Thirteen sittings were totally blank and the committee returned a negative report. After the death of Geley in 1924, there was a whispering campaign that some very suspicious photographs of Eva C. had been found among his papers, suggesting the possibility of fraud by the medium and contradicting Geley's published laudatory reports. In fact, his unpublished papers revealed that Bisson had been Eva C.'s active accomplice in fraud, and his pictures plainly showed wires attached to her hair that supported the materialized forms. However, Eva C.'s supporters countered with the published evidence of the 200 photographs and the careful reports of Schrenck-Notzing.

On the whole, the mediumship of Eva C. remains a matter of controversy. The materializations of Bien Boa in 1905 appear crude and suggest fraud, as do the Geley papers and pictures. On the other hand, the careful investigations and remarkable photographs of materialization obtained by Schrenck-Notzing cannot be so easily dismissed. In the end, Eva C. seems to be another clever fraud who was able to confound some of those who observed her séances and lacked the training or resolve to uncover her methods. The inability of Eva C. to manifest under tightly controlled conditions, along with the lack of supporting evidence for the existence of ectoplasm, make a most damning case against her.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Brandon, R. The Spiritualists. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1983.

Geley, Gustav. Clairvoyance and Materialisation: A Record of Experiments. London, 1927. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Houdini, Harry. A Magician Among the Spirits. New York: Harper, 1924. Reprinted as Houdini: A Magician Among the Spirits. New York: Arno Press, 1972.

Lambert, Rudolf. "Dr. Geley's Report on the Medium Eva C."

Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 37, no. 682 (November 1954).

Richet, Charles. Thirty Years of Psychical Research. London, 1923. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Schrenck-Notzing, Baron A. von. Phenomena of Materialisation: A Contribution to the Investigation of Mediumistic Teleplastics. London and New York, 1920. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Evans, Christopher (Riche) (1931–1979)

British psychologist and anthropologist who conducted research in parapsychology. Born May 29, 1931, in Aberdovey, Wales, Evans trained as a psychologist at University College, London, and the University of Reading, receiving a doctorate in psychology. He was a founder and secretary of the Brain Research Association and a member of the British Psychological Association, the Behavioral Psychotherapy Association, and the Ergonomics Research Society.

He took a special interest in computer technology and helped to develop the "computer doctor" Mickie, which elicited diagnostic information from patients by asking computerized questions. Evans was Principal Scientific Officer of the National Physical Laboratory, London, and a contributing editor to the U.S. magazine Omni. He acted as an investigative reporter and news correspondent at scientific conventions in Britain, Europe, and the United States.

As a member of the Society for Psychical Research, London, he conducted parapsychological investigations. Evans was responsible for a questionnaire that got 1,500 responses from readers about psychic phenomena. His conclusions were published in New Scientist January 25, 1973, and showed that 63 percent of the respondents possessed degrees, and of those 29 percent had advanced degrees. In February 1974 he conducted a survey of telepathic or ESP faculties on West German television. Over 50,000 viewers participated, and the results threw doubt on the sheep-goat hypothesis of parapsychologist Gertrude Schmeidler, which posits that believers in ESP score higher than disbelievers.

Evans published several books but is best remembered for his attack upon new religions, Cults of Unreason (1973), which examines a variety of newer religions and belief systems, including Scientology, UFOs, black boxes (devices for diagnosing disease), and some popular Eastern religions. Although mainly skeptical in tone, and while critical of some of the unfounded scientific claims, such as those supporting the black boxes, the book often veers into mere rhetoric directed against those holding religious ideas with which Evans disagrees. Evans died October 10, 1979.

Sources:

Evans, Christopher. Cults of Unreason. London: Harrap, 1974.

———. Cybernetics. Baltimore: University Park Press, 1968.

———. The Mighty Micro. London: Gollancz, 1979.

———. Psychology: A Dictionary of the Mind, Brain, and Behavior. London: Arrow Books, 1978.

———. Understanding Yourself. New York: A & W Visual Library, 1977.

Evans, Fred P. (1862– ?)

Slate-writing medium of San Francisco, California. Evans went to sea as a young man, and his mediumistic gifts developed while he was in marine service. He is most remembered for producing 30 different spirit messages in as many hands on a single slate at a public séance on June 21, 1885, in San Francisco. Many of the signatures were identified as correct. He demonstrated slate writing to British naturalist Alfred Russel Wallace, who testified to his abilities. On May 18, 1887, he produced five differently colored writings in the presence of Wallace and also colored portraits on paper between two slates.

Evans lived for many years in San Francisco, but in 1922 traveled to England, where he held séances. He stated that because he was impatient of the criticism that he had used his mediumship for making money, he had spent several years mining in California so that he could accumulate enough income to make him independent and give his services free.

Sources:

Owen, J. J. Psychography: Marvelous Manifestations of Psychic Power Given Through The Mediumship of Fred P. Evans. San Francisco, 1893.

Evans, Hilary (1929–)

British pictorial archivist and writer on paranormal and anomalous subjects. He was born in Shrewsbury, England, March 6, 1929, and attended Cambridge University (B.A.) and Birmingham University (M.A., English literature). He worked for 12 years as an advertising copywriter, first in agencies, then freelance. In 1964, with his wife, he founded the Mary Evans Picture Library, a historical illustration archive near London, and Evans now serves as the library curator. He has written several books about illustration and picture research. Evans's interest in anomaly research began during his student years, but he became actively involved in the late 1960s. He has been a council member of the Society for Psychical Research as well as a committee member. In 1981 he helped to found ASSAP (Association for the Scientific Study of Anomalous Phenomena). He lectures frequently in Europe and the United States.

Evans has taken a special interest in UFOs, largely for what science can learn from observing and investigating a widespread and ongoing anomaly. He has become a major exponent of the psychosocial hypothesis that explains UFO reports primarily as culturally shaped visionary experiences. He is a council member of BUFORA (British UFO Research Association) and has written widely on the subject of UFOs. His research has been one aspect of a larger concern with alleged visions of, and encounters with, otherworldly beings, which he has explored in several comparative studies.

He regards himself as rather skeptical but believes that many claims of the paranormal are based on fact and that scientific anomaly research may dramatically extend our knowledge of ourselves and the universe we inhabit.

Sources:

Clark, Jerry. UFOs in the 1980s. Vol. 1 of The UFO Encyclopedia. Detroit: Apogee Books, 1990.

Evans, Hilary. Alternate States of Consciousness: Unself, Otherself, and Superself. Wellingborough, Northampton, England: Aquarian Press, 1989.

———. Gods, Spirits, Cosmic Guardians. Wellingborough, Northampton, England: Aquarian Press, 1987.

———. Intrusions: Society and the Paranormal. London and Boston: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1982.

———. UFO's 1947–1987: The 40-year Search for an Explanation. London: Fortean Times, 1987.

———. Visions, Apparitions, Alien Visitors. Wellingborough, Northampton, England: Aquarian Press, 1984.

Evans, Hilary, and John Spencer, eds. Phenomena: Forty Years of Flying Saucers. New York: Avon Books, 1989.

Evans, John Wainwright (1883– ?)

Journalist and author who published various articles on parapsychological subjects. He was born October 13, 1883, in Alpena, Michigan. He studied at Princeton University (B.A., 1907), afterward becoming a reporter on the New York Herald (1908–10) and the St. Louis Globe-Democrat (1910). He then became an instructor in English at the University of Arkansas (1911–15), an assistant professor of journalism at the University of Kansas (1915–17), and a staff writer for Nation's Business (1917–19). In 1921 he became a freelance writer, the occupation he held for the rest of his life. Besides several books, including two written with Judge Ben B. Lindsey, The Revolt of Modern Youth (1925) and The Companionate Marriage (1928), he turned out numerous articles on occult subjects over the years for the American Weekly.

Sources:

Evans, John W. "Conan Doyle Still Lives." American Weekly, November 2, 1952.

———. "Haunted by the Ghost of Bernard Shaw." American Weekly, June 7, 1953.

———. "Patrice Munsel's Neon Ghost." American Weekly, November 8, 1953.

———. "The Phantom Model." American Weekly, April 4, 1954.

———. "When the Clocks Stood Still." American Weekly, June 13, 1954.

Evans, W. H. (1877– ?)

Trance and inspirational medium and exponent of the harmonial philosophy of Andrew Jackson Davis. A psychic from childhood, Evans began speaking at public meetings in 1898 and contributed many useful articles on the philosophy of Spiritualism to English and American Spiritualist periodicals. He was editor of the London monthly Beyond and published many books.

Sources:

Evans, W. H. Constructive Spiritualism. Manchester, England: Two Worlds, 1917.

———. Modern Spiritualism. Rochdale, England: British Spiritualists' Lyceum Union, 1923.

Evans, Warren Felt (1817–1889)

Warren Felt Evans, Swedenborgian minister and early practitioner of mind cure, was born December 23, 1817, at Rockingham, Vermont. He attended Dartmouth College but left after his junior year (1840) to become a Methodist minister. He served a number of different congregations in New England during the next 24 years. During these years he also began to read widely in the writings of seer Emanuel Swedenborg, and in 1863, he affiliated with the Church of the New Jerusalem. He formally left the Methodist Episcopal Church the following year.

At the time he was changing denominations, he was also experiencing some ill health described as "a nervous affection, complicated by a chronic disorder." He heard of healer Phineas Parkhurst Quimby and visited Quimby in Maine. Under Quimby's care he experienced a healing and adopted some of Quimby's ideas. He also became convinced that he could perform mental healing himself. He began work in Claremont, New Hampshire, later moved to Boston, Massachusetts, and in 1869 settled in Salisbury, a Boston suburb, where he would receive patients for the next twenty years.

In 1869 Evans also published his first book, The Mental Cure, an important work for several reasons. It introduced Quimby's ideas to the rest of world, Quimby having never published his writings. It was the first book in the field of mental healing and would become very popular as the century progressed. It would also provide a context for the publication of the writings of Mary Baker Eddy, whose books on healing would appear in the next decade.

Evans wrote five other books: Mental Medicine (1873), Soul and Body (1876), The Divine Law of Cure (1881), The Primitive Mind Cure (1885), and Esoteric Christianity and Mental Therapeutics (1886). As his thought matured, Evans took Quimby's healing practice into the Swedenborgian theology that dominated his thought. In the end he created a pantheistic system that provided a context for his healing work. His thought would later be seen as a precursor of New Thought metaphysics. He died in Salisbury on September 4, 1889.

Sources:

Evans, Warren Felt. The Divine Law of Cure. Boston: H. H. Carter, 1881.

———. Esoteric Christianity and Mental Therapeutics. Boston: H. H. Carter & Karick, 1886.

———. The Mental Cure. Boston: Colby & Rich, 1869.

———. Mental Medicine. Boston: H. H. Carter, 1873.

———. The Primitive Mind Cure. Boston: H. H. Carter & Karrick, 1885.

———. Soul and Body. Boston: H. H. Carter, 1876.

Leonard, William J. The Pioneer Apostle of Mental Science: A Sketch of the Life and Work of Rev. Warren Felt Evans, M.D. N.p.: The Author, n.d.

Teahan, John F. "Warren Felt Evans and Mental Healing: Romantic Idealism and Practical Metaphysics in Nineteenth-Century America." Church History 48, no. 1 (March 1979): 63–80.

Evans-Wentz, W(alter) Y(eeling) (1878–1965)

American scholar who became an authority on fairy lore and the mysticism of Tibet and India. Evans-Wentz was born February 2, 1878, in Trenton, New Jersey. Later he moved to La Mesa, California, where he lived with his family for several years. He studied at Stanford University, California (B.A. English, 1906; M.A., 1907). He traveled to Britain, where he studied social anthropology at Oxford University under Sir John Rhys, professor of Celtic.

Two other scholars had an important influence on him: William James, whose lectures on psychology Evans-Wentz had attended at Stanford and who had early encouraged his studies in fairy lore; and Andrew Lang, authority on folklore and psychical research, who was one of Evan-Wentz's examiners at Oxford University when he presented his thesis on fairy lore. From this thesis, supported by fieldwork in Wales, Ireland, Scotland, and Brittany, grew his major work, The Fairy-Faith in Celtic Countries (1911). After further expeditions in Brittany, Ireland, Wales, the Isle of Man, and Cornwall, he was awarded a D.S. at Oxford University in 1910.

His research into common traditions of fairy faith led to more detailed study of pagan and Christian religious beliefs and practices, and then to comparative religion. In 1917 he traveled in India, studying the mysticism and religious practices he believed were once closely connected in both East and West. In one account of those travels, he writes:

"I have spent more than five years in such research, wandering from the palm-wreathed shores of Ceylon, and thence through the wonderland of the Hindus, to the glacier-clad heights of the Himalayan Ranges, seeking out the Wise Men of the East. Sometimes I lived among city dwellers, sometimes in jungle and mountain solitudes among yogis, sometimes in monasteries with monks, sometimes I went on pilgrimages."

These travels took him throughout India and to Tibet, where he lived as a Buddhist monk and spent three years with Tibetan Lama Kazi Dawa-Sandup until the lama died in March 1922. As a result of these researches, Evans-Wentz published several important texts on Tibetan mysticism, including The Tibetan Book of the Dead (1927).

In 1931 Oxford University conferred upon him the degree of D.S. in comparative religion, a rare honor, because at that time he was one of only six persons, and the first American, to receive that degree.

A year later he attended meetings of the Self-Realization Fellowship in San Diego, California, under Paramahansa Yogananda, a famous yogi whom he had met in India. During his travels, Evans-Wentz had also met Sri Yitkeshwar Giri, a guru of Yogananda, in Puri, Orissa. In 1935 he visited the ashram of the famous Sri Ramana Maharishi at Tiruvannamalai in southern India. He also maintained close contact with Buddhist organizations and was welcome in many different religious groups; he hoped to unite East and West in mutual understanding and religious insight.

Toward the end of his life, he retired to San Diego, California, for 23 years. He was drawn to the Self-Realization Fellowship, which had a colony at Encinitas. In 1946 he wrote a warm tribute to Paramahansa Yogananda as a foreword to the yogi's Autobiography of a Yogi. At the Self-Realization Fellowship, Evans-Wentz worked with a secretary on his final book, Sacred Mountains of the World, which he completed before his death, in his 88th year, on July 17, 1965.

In his will he made generous bequests to various religious organizations. He also left 2,000 acres of land near Tecate to the state of California to be used as an experimental reforestation and recreational area; this estate included Coochama, a mountain sacred to Native Americans. He also assigned mineral rights in his property (some 5,000 acres) to Stanford University to establish a professorship in Oriental philosophy, religion, and ethics. Some of his Oriental manuscripts were left to the Bodleian Library at Oxford University, England; others he gave to Stanford.

At his cremation service on July 21, 1965, there was a reading in English from his own edition of The Tibetan Book of the Dead, invoking the Perfect Enlightenment of Pure Reality.

Sources:

Evans-Wentz, W. Y. The Fairy-Faith in Celtic Countries. 1911. Reprint, New York: Lemma, 1973.

———. The Tibetan Book of the Dead. 1927. Reprint, London: Oxford University Press, 1957.

———. The Tibetan Book of the Great Liberation. New York: Oxford University Press, 1954.

———. Tibetan Yoga and Secret Doctrines; or, Seven Books of Wisdom of the Great Path. 2d ed. London: Oxford University Press, 1958.

———. Tibet's Great Yogi . . . Milarepa. 2d ed. London: Oxford University Press, 1969.

Evergreens

The custom of decorating houses at Christmastide with evergreen plants—holly, ivy, box, laurel, mistletoe—is sometimes said to have originated when Christianity was introduced into Europe in order to typify the first British church, built of evergreen boughs. More probably it extends back into antiquity. In Druidic times, people decorated their houses with evergreen plants so that the sylvan spirits might come there to shelter from the severity of winter until their leafy bowers were renewed in the coming year. It was a widespread superstition that it was unlucky to remove evergreen Christmas decorations until after Twelfth Night.

Everitt, Mrs. Thomas (1825–1915)

One of the earliest and best British private mediums and the first to produce direct voice in England. She was the wife of a North London tailor. She began to give séances in 1855 but was little known to the public before 1867. She produced a variety of physical phenomena, raps, movement without contact, psychic lights, and direct writing, in addition to the direct voice of "John Watts" and of "Znippy," a South Sea Islander, who was heard through a cardboard tube. The earliest such record of "Znippy" dates from 1867 when, at a dark séance with Agnes Guppy-Volckman, Everitt was thrown for the first time into trance.

Many descriptions of Everitt's phenomena were published in Morell Theobald's Spirit Workers in the Home Circle (1887). The Theobald and Everitt families were close friends. The book describes how Everitt, on returning to consciousness, frequently told what she had seen in the spirit world, that cool breezes and scents were frequent phenomena, and that she had considerable powers of psychometry. On one occasion, in Cornwall, she placed a piece of rock to her forehead and entertained her friends by descriptions of antediluvian monsters, boiling masses, and upheaving rocks.

Theobald compared the sounds that accompanied her direct-writing phenomena to a quickly working electric needle. In close and legible characters he had seen 500 or more words produced in five or six seconds.

E. Dawson Rogers, in a letter to E. T. Bennett, states:

"The most completely proven cases of direct writing of which I know are those of Mrs. Everitt. As to many of them I can personally testify their genuineness is beyond dispute. My first séance with Mrs. Everitt was on May 3, 1870. I thought I would ask a question which Mrs. Everitt herself could not possibly answer. 'John Watts' spoke, and promised to give us some direct writing and I thereupon said 'Please give us a definition of the distinction between the Will and the Understanding.' Paper and pencil had been placed on the table and in eight seconds, or perhaps ten, on lighting up, we found a direct and intelligent answer to the question, containing over 150 words. Its phrasing was peculiar. I afterwards found it was an extract from one of Swedenborg's writings, with a few slight alterations, and an extract such as it would be extremely difficult for anyone to carry in his memory. Certainly Mrs. Everitt could never do it. One of Mrs. Everitt's spirit attendants is said to be a gentleman who had been a distinguished Swedenborg Minister."

Several other pieces of direct writing proved to be quotations from books, sometimes from ancient ones. Once, in the presence of Sir William Crookes and Edward William Cox, the following quotation was given in direct writing: "Religentum esse oportet Religiosum nefas. You will find the meaning in Incerti Autoris Aprice Aut. Gell." After considerable search, the passage was found in Autus Gellius, book 4, canto 9. (Gellius was a poet who lived in the reign of Adrian in the second century.)

Writing in Light, July 7, 1894, Mr. Everitt describes a cold wind and strange sounds that preceded the approach of the "influence" and states:

"Then the paper and pencil are whisked up into the air, a rapid tick-tick-ticking is heard, lasting barely a few seconds, paper and pencil fall to the table, and a light is called for. The writing is done. The speed of production varies from 100 to 150 words a second. The exceeding minuteness of the writing is striking, also the closeness together of the words and the lines. Crookes was the first to draw attention to the fact that no indentation whatever is produced by this writing. Even with the thinnest paper there is not the slightest perceptible mark on the back."

Everitt being a private medium, test conditions were not applied.

Sources:

Theobald, Morell. Spirit Workers in the Home Circle. Boston: Colby & Rich, 1887.

Evidence

The two main sources of evidence in psychical research and parapsychology, as in other sciences, are observation and experiment. The question of observation is a peculiarly difficult one. Because claimed paranormal phenomena of a spontaneous nature, often produced by human beings, are involved, it is difficult to devise conditions that will preclude fraud or a misreading of what is observed. The borderlines between preconception, expectation, and actual observation are often very fuzzy, and even well-trained scientific observers have been deceived by hoaxes or by their own conscious or subconscious desire to prove or disprove the reality of claimed phenomena. Even the best of scientific observers are but amateurs in the arts of conjuring and stage magic and may easily be deceived by the skillful tricks of amateur or professional conjurers, and it is often dangerous to trust the apparent evidence of one's senses. The special effects developed by the movie industry, and available at some levels to the general public, now make the observation of various kinds of psychic phenomena even more questionable.

It is also not surprising that the observations of believers tend to endorse the paranormal, while the observations of skeptics tend in the opposite direction. Skeptics will go out of their way to protect their comfortable world. However, psychical researchers are frequently less than rigorous in applying Occam's razor (i.e., the simplest of competing theories is the preferred) and seeking the most parsimonious explanation for what is observed.

Experimenting with the psychic also presents a unique set of problems. Paranormal phenomena are not producible at the experimenter's will as in a chemical laboratory, and the human element involves numerous difficulties. "One good experiment," said Humphrey Davy, "is of more value than the ingenuity of a brain like Newton's. Facts are more useful when they contradict, than when they support received theories." Because nearly all the facts that psychical research has tried to establish contradict received theories, the importance of experimental data cannot be overemphasized.

From Psychical Research to Parapsychology

Although many areas of psychical research and parapsychology are virtually identical, their main distinction is one of emphasis, with psychical research emphasizing observation and parapsychology focusing upon experiments under laboratory conditions. It has been the hope of parapsychology that paranormal realities might be demonstrated or disproved under control conditions and evaluated by quantitative statistical methods. This approach came to the fore in the 1930s when championed by J. B. Rhine (1895–1980) and his associates in the United States, although the groundwork for such an approach had been laid by such British psychical researchers as G. N. M. Tyrrell (1897–1952), W. W. Carington (1884–1947), and S. G. Soal (1889–1975). It has to be admitted, however, that after decades of thousands of laboratory experiments over a wide range of claimed paranormal faculties and phenomena, there is still little generally accepted scientific evidence. This does not mean that the paranormal is disproved, only that it remains difficult to capture within the rigorous demands of laboratory scientific method and evidence. Such a situation has led many to move toward more open methods used successfully in the various branches of psychology.

The search for scientific understanding of paranormal experiences such as spiritual healing, out-of-the-body travel, telepathy, clairvoyance, seeing phantoms, and various forms of mystical states of consciousness may seem irrelevant to some. In such personal instances, objective scientific evidence is inaccessible. However, the qualitative nature of the experience itself, often accompanied by special knowledge, exaltation, wonder, or inspiration, is convincing to the person having the experience, even if unsatisfactory to observers.

Although there are obvious dangers in overemphasizing subjective experience at the expense of objective evidence, they need not be mutually exclusive approaches. Too great an emphasis on experimental data glosses over the problem that scientists are often as prejudiced as the general public, and it is now possible to discuss the "experimenter effect," where the hostile skepticism or uncritical beliefs of scientific investigators may respectively inhibit or enhance paranormal phenomena. Moreover, there is disturbing evidence that scientists can also cheat; review of the evidence for the paranormal has disclosed some probable manipulation of data.

Sources:

Barrett, W. F. On the Threshold of a New World. London: Kegan Paul, 1908. Revised as On the Threshold of the Unseen: An Examination of the Phenomena of Spiritualism and of the Evidence for Survival After Death. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1971.

Dingwall, Eric J., and John Langdon-Davies. The Unknown—Is It Nearer? New York: New American Library, 1956.

Ducasse, C. J. Paranormal Phenomena, Science, and Life After Death. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1969.

Garrett, Eileen J. My Life As a Search for the Meaning of Mediumship. London: Rider, 1939. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Heywood, Rosalind. ESP: A Personal Memoir. London: Chatto & Windus, 1964. Reprint, New York: E. P. Dutton, 1964.

Leonard, Gladys Osborne. My Life in Two Worlds. London: Cassell, 1931.

Marbewick, Betty. "The Soal-Goldney Experiments with Basil Shackleton: New Evidence of Data Manipulation." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 56, no. 211 (May 1978).

Murchison, Carl A., ed. The Case For and Against Psychical Belief. Worcester, Mass.: Clark University, 1927. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Neff, H. Richard. Psychic Phenomena and Religion: ESP, Prayer, Healing, Survival. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1971.

Podmore, Frank. Studies in Psychical Research. New York: G. P. Putnam's and Son, 1897. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Prince, Walter Franklin. The Enchanted Boundary: Being a Survey of Negative Reactions to Claims of Psychic Phenomena, 1820–1930. Boston, Mass.: Boston Society for Psychic Research, 1930. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Rao, K. Ramakrishna. Experimental Parapsychology: A Review and Interpretation. Springfield, Ill.: Thomas, 1966.

Rhine, Louisa E. Mind Over Matter: Psychokinesis. New York: Macmillan, 1970. Reprint, New York: Collier, 1972.

Smythies, J. R., ed. Science and ESP. New York: Humanities Press, 1967.

Tuckett, Ivor L. The Evidence for the Supernatural. London, 1911.

Tyrrell, G. N. M. Science and Psychical Phenomena. New York: Harper, 1938. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Evil Eye

Belief in the malevolent effects of the evil eye is ancient and universal. A common form of this belief held that people with unusual eyes could cause harm by looking at other people, and such defects as squinting, a cast, or even cataracts were thought to be signs of an evil eye. Others attributed the evil eye to conscious malice on the part of witches or magicians.

The evil eye could, it was believed, bring about illness, poverty, or other afflictions and even death. An outgrowth of the evil eye notion was the belief that praise of children could have an adverse effect; hence, parents discouraged praise of their children's appearance or talents. Traditional ways of averting the evil eye were by wearing amulets or charms, or reciting counterspells.

Sources:

DiStasi, Lawrence. Mal Occhio (Evil Eye): The Underside Vision. San Francisco: North Point Press, 1981.

Elworthy, F. T. The Evil Eye. London, 1894. Reprint, New York: Julian Press, 1958.

MacLaglan, R. C. The Evil Eye in the Western Highlands. London: David Nutt, 1902.

Maloney, Clarence, ed. The Evil Eye. New York: Columbia University Press, 1976.

Evil Spirits

According to occultist and Spiritualist philosophy, evil spirits do exist. There are many intelligent entities in the higher and lower spheres that may not be of human origin and may not be benevolent. But the evil spirits commonly spoken of are the spirits of bad people and inhabit the lower spheres, from which, either owing to the locality to which they are earthbound or to the attraction of bad, immoral séance sitters, they may easily reach the medium. Their appearing may be accidental. They may see the "light" of the medium and attempt to oust the control. The controls, as a rule, are able to keep evil spirits away; but sometimes, for unknown reasons, their power fails. In such cases they urgently ask for the breaking of the circle and the suspension of the sitting.

On the other hand, if an evil spirit has already taken possession of the medium, it is considered imperative to maintain the circle unbroken until the invader can be ousted. Possession by evil spirits is usually manifested by fits, violent convulsions, and uncouth ravings, which may cause harm to the medium.

J. J. Morse, lecturing in trance, asserted in a speech later printed in Light (July 11, 1903):

"So long as evil men live on earth, pass from it at death, and live beyond, so long will it be possible for them to obtrude among you. What then is the preventive? The cultivation of your will power; the absolute determination to be master of yourself; the assertion of your unquestionable right to select your own associates among the people of either world. The exercise of your duty 'to try the spirits' as you do men before deferring to their advice or leading. And, most of all, in this connection to refuse entrance, or harbour, to unclean thoughts of any kind into your minds. The complete discontinuance of gross living, intoxicants and narcotics and a rigid obedience to personal cleanliness must also be adopted. Purity of mind must have its complement in purity of body. By aspiration, prayer and cleanliness men may not only ward off but prevent the influence of undesirable spirits and in conjunction with a steadfast will no better exorcism can be practised."

If, in spite of all, an evil spirit has gained possession, how should it be exorcised? A curious experiment was recorded by G. H. Lock in Light (November 28, 1903). It occurred to him that through the ages some mystic power had been associated with the Cross as a symbol, and that the very common belief in the virtue of the sign of the cross may have had its origin in the spirit world. He therefore tried the efficacy of this sign on the spirit plane with remarkable success. But, he affirmed, the mere wearing of a material cross upon the person is useless for the purpose. The medium—or, if the medium is in trance, the leader of the circle—must will the sign at or toward the spirit or draw the sign mentally upon the spirit, at the same time willing it or adjuring it to stand revealed, or to go.

Should the request be unavailing, the sign of the cross should be made firmly and deliberately upon the breast of the medium and on the back about the region of the shoulders. At a first attempt only a cringing may result, but, stated Lock, "I have never known failure at the third attempt."

An early case of control by an evil entity was recorded by Ernesto Bozzano from the mediumship of "L.D." The medium was controlled by his father, Luigi. Once he declared in terror that evil spirits were near the medium. Before the sitting could be closed, L.D. began to glare and, foaming at the mouth, assaulted a sitter and tried to strangle him while shouting, "I have found you at last, wretch. I was a soldier of the royal marines. Do you remember Oporto? You murdered me and I will avenge myself and strangle you." The sitter had to be rescued. His story was that he had killed a drunken sailor who attacked him in Oporto and was sentenced to six years' detention for the deed.

Willie Reichel, in his Occult Experiences (1906), described the sudden intrusion of a female spirit that went around the circle of 14 persons striking and spitting on nearly all of them and using horrible language.

Besides injuring the medium or the sitters, the danger of an enduring possession is possible. Such possession, or obsession, would be called demoniacal. As a rule, however, cases of obsession do not originate in the séance room. It would be unwise, however, to deny the possibility.

Regarding the issue of evil influences on this life from the other world, Andrew Jackson Davis, in commenting on a book, The Great Psychological Crime, is very emphatic:

"I deny utterly and for all time that individuals are led into evil and crimes by persons in the other world. I know the pranks and college-boy mischievousness of the Diakka but even for them and all such, I know that the police regulations of the other world are adequate and universally effective."

During the 1870s Spiritualist Carl Wickland and his wife began to treat evil spirits believed to be possessing mental patients. The publication of his book Thirty Years Among the Dead in 1924 led to the spread within Spiritualism of rescue circles, to which evil spirits were invited to attend and then sent toward the Spiritualist equivalent of heaven.

Sources:

Davis, Andrew Jackson. The Diakka, and Earthly Victims. Boston: Colby & Rich, 1880.

Wickland, Carl. Thirty Years Among the Dead. Los Angeles, 1924.

Evolution of Life

According to Theosophy, life began when the Logos, in the second aspect, sent forth the second life wave. This life wave descended from above through the various worlds, causing an increasing heterogeneity, and thereafter ascended, causing a return to its original homogeneity.

Our present state of knowledge of life in these worlds extends no further than the mental world. In the higher division of that world is ensouled the relatively fine matter appropriate thereto. If that matter is atomic it is known as "monadic essence"; if nonatomic, as "elemental essence," and this is the first elemental kingdom. What we may call the inhabitants of this kingdom are the higher order of angels.

Having functioned sufficiently long in the higher mental world, the life wave now presses down to the lower level of that world, where it appears as the second elemental kingdom, the inhabitants of which are some of the lower orders of angels, the form devas.

Again pressing down, the life wave manifests itself in the astral world, forming the third elemental kingdom, the inhabitants of which are the lowest orders of angels, the passion devas. It then enters the physical world and, in the fourth elemental kingdom, ensouls the etheric part of minerals with the elementary type of life that these possess. The middle of this kingdom represents the farthest descent of the life wave, and thereafter its course is reversed and it begins to ascend.

The next kingdom into which it passes is the fifth elemental kingdom, the vegetable world, whence it passes to the sixth elemental kingdom, the animal world, and lastly to the seventh elemental kingdom, humanity.

During its stay in each kingdom, the life wave progresses gradually from elementary to highly specialized types, and when it has attained these, it passes to the next kingdom. This means that successive currents of this great second life wave have come forth from the Logos, since otherwise there would be only one kingdom in existence at a time.

Also, in each kingdom the souls of the bodies that inhabit it differ from those of the other kingdoms. In the seventh kingdom, that of man, each individual has a soul. In the animal kingdom, on the contrary, one soul is distributed among different bodies, the number of which varies with the state of evolution. To one soul may be allotted countless bodies of a low type of development, but as the development increases the soul comes to have fewer bodies allotted to it until in the kingdom of man there is only one.

Sources:

Clodd, Clara M. The Ageless Wisdom of Life. Adyar, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1956.

Introductory Study Course in Theosophy. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Society of America, 1967.

Pearson, E. Norman. Space, Time and Self. Adyar, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1957.

EVP See Electronic Voice Phenomenon

Exceptional Human Experience (EHE)

Umbrella term coined by Rhea A. White to cover the full range of anomalous human experiences. When a person has potentiated the sensed but hidden meaning of an experience, consciously realizing it, this realization usually transforms the identity, lifeview, lifestyle, and worldview of that person. It is at this point that it becomes an EHE because the anomalous experience or anomaly of experience has enabled the person to actualize more of his or her hidden human potential than would have been possible without the experience. The end result of most EHEs is a greater sense of connectedness, with previous unknown parts of self, with other people, with other species, and with the universe. White has identified 240 specific types of EHEs and groups them into seven broad classifications: death-related, desolation/nadir, encounter, healing, mystical, peak, psychical.

Exceptional Human Experience (Journal)

Semiannual journal founded and edited by Rhea A. White. Its central subject matter is exceptional human experience, which consists of experiences that begin as anomalous ones or anomalies of experience (first-time experiences) and when they become transformative they are called exceptional human experiences. The journal consists of research reports; methodological, historical, and theoretical articles about EHEs; EHE autobiographies and accounts of specific EHEs; abstracts of books, journal and magazine articles; and dissertations on EHEs or subjects relevant to EHEs, such as altered states of consciousness and dissociation, transpersonal and humanistic psychology, qualitative research methodology; and works drawn from the disciplines of anthropology, folklore, religious studies, sociology, and women's studies. Autobiographical and biographical articles and books are also covered. Address: Exceptional Human Experience Network, Inc., 414 Rockledge Rd., New Bern, NC 28562.

Exceptional Human Experience Network, Inc.

Formerly known as the Parapsychology Sources of Information Center or PSI Center. It was established by noted librarian/parapsychologist Rhea A. White in 1984. It was organized as "a clearinghouse for information, research findings, theories, organizations, publications, and persons involved in parapsychology and its interface with psychology, psychiatry, physics, religion, medicine, mysticism, philosophy, and education."

The network publishes a semiannual journal Exceptional Human Experience, that covers abstracts of the contents of all parapsychology journals, some of which commenced publication in the nineteenth century, to date.

White also created Psiline Database System, a computerized database, to contain bibliographical citations, abstracts, and subjector descriptors for all important books in parapsychology and the major English-language journals from earliest times to date. Added as time and resources allow are English abstracts of many foreign language parapsychological journals; articles on parapsychology in monographs, non-parapsychological journals and magazines; proceedings, dissertations and chapters. Psiline also covers parapsychological newsletters, with selective abstracts. Address: 414 Rockledge Rd., New Bern, NC 28562. Website: http://www.ehe.org.

Exorcism

To exorcize, according to the received definitions, states Edward Smedley in The Occult Sciences (1855), is "to bind upon oath, to charge upon oath, and thus, by the use of certain words, and performance of certain ceremonies, to subject the devil and other evil spirits to command and exact obedience. Minshew calls an exorcist a conjuror; and it is so used by Shakespeare; and exorcism conjuration. It is in the general sense of casting out evil spirits, however, that the word is now understood."

The History of Exorcism

The trade of exorcism has probably existed from very early times. In Greece, Epicurus and Aeschines were sons of women who lived by this art, and each was bitterly reproached, the one by the Stoics, the other by Demosthenes, for having assisted his parent in her "dishonorable" practices. A reference in the biblical Acts of the Apostles (19:13) concerns the failure and disgrace of "certain of the vagabond Jews, exorcists," who, like the apostles, "took upon them to call over them that had evil spirits the Name of the Lord Jesus."

The ancient Jewish historian Josephus observed:

"God enabled Solomon to learn that skill which expels demons, which is a science useful and sanative to men. He composed such incantations also, by which distempers are alleviated, and he left behind him the manner of using exorcisms, by which they drive away demons, so that they never return. And this method of cure is of great force unto this day; for I have seen a certain man of my own country, whose name was Eleazar, releasing people that were demoniacal, in the presence of Vespasian and his sons, and his captains, and the whole multitude of his soldiers. The manner of the cure was this. He put a ring that had a root of one of those sorts mentioned by Solomon to the nostrils of the demoniac, after which he drew out the demon through his nostrils; and when the man fell down immediately, he adjured him to return unto him no more, making still mention of Solomon, and reciting the incantation which he composed. And when Eleazar would persuade and demonstrate to the spectators that he had such a power, he set, a little way off, a cup or basin full of water, and commanded the demon as he went out the man to overturn it, and thereby to let the spectators know that he had left the man."

Some alleged fragments of these incantations of Solomon appear in the Codex Pseudepigraphus of Fabricus, and Josephus himself has described one of the antidemoniacal roots, in a measure reminiscent of the perils attendant on gathering the mandrake. Another fragment of antiquity bearing on this subject is the exorcism practiced by Tobit, the father of the Jewish hero Tobias, upon which it is by no means easy to pronounce judgment. The seventeenth-century Dutch scholar Grotius, in a note on that history, states that the Hebrews attributed all diseases arising from natural causes to the influence of demons. (These facts are derived in great measure from the Dutch theologian Balthasar Bekker's ingenious, though forgotten, four volumes Le Monde Enchanté (1694), which discuss the necessity of exorcism.)

Belthasar Bekker related an instance of exorcism practiced by Jews to avert the evil influence of the demon Lilis (or Lilith), whom some rabbis claimed was the wife of Satan. During the 130 years (states Elias, in the Thisbi) that elapsed before Adam was married to Eve, he was visited by certain she-devils, of whom the four principal were Lilis, Naome, Ogére, and Machalas; these encounters produced a fruitful progeny of spirits. Lilis visited the bedroom of women recently delivered and endeavored to kill their babies, boys on the eighth day after their birth, girls on the twenty-first. To chase her away, the attendants drew circles on the walls of the room with charcoal and within each they wrote, "Adam, Eve, Lilis, avaunt!" On the door of the room they also wrote the names of the three angels who preside over medicine (Senoi, Sansenoi, and Sanmangelof), a secret that was apparently taught them, somewhat unwittingly, by Lilis herself.

A particular ecclesiastical order of exorcists does not appear to have existed in the Christian church until the close of the third century, and the eighteenth-century German theologian Johann Mosheim attributed its introduction to the prevalent fancies of the Gnostics. In the tenth canon of the Council of Antioch, held in 341 C.E., exorcists were expressly mentioned in conjunction with subdeacons and readers, and their ordination described by the fourteenth Council of Carthage. It involved delivery by the bishop of a book containing forms of exorcism and directions that the exorcists should exercise the office upon energumens, (demoniacs), whether baptized or only catechumens. The fire of exorcism, as St. Augustine termed it, always preceded baptism. Catechumens were exorcised for 20 days previous to the administration of this sacrament. In the case of catechumens who were not also energumens, these exorcisms were not directed against any supposed demoniacal possession. They were, as Cyril described them, no more than prayers collected and composed from Holy Writ to beseech God to break the dominion and power of Satan in new converts and to deliver them from his slavery by expelling the spirit of wickedness and error.

In the Greek Church, before baptism the priest blew three times on the child to displace the devil from his seat, and this may be understood as symbolic of the power of sin over the unbaptized, not as an assertion of their real or absolute possession.

The exorcists formed one of the minor orders of the Roman Catholic Church. At their ordination the bishop addressed them as to their duties, and concluded with these words: "Take now the power of laying hands upon the energumens, and by the imposition of your hands, by the grace of the Holy Spirit, and the words of exorcism, the unclean spirits are driven from obsessed bodies."

One of the most complete manuals for Roman Catholic exorcists ever compiled was a volume of nearly 1,300 pages entitled Thesaurus Exorcismorum et Conjurationum . . . (1608). It contained the following tracts: "Practica Exorcistarum" (two parts), "Flagellum Daemonum," "Fustis Daemonium," "Complementum Artis Exorcistiae," and "Fuga Satanae."

From the first of these treatises, it appears that the energumens were subjected to a very severe corporal as well as spiritual discipline. They first underwent "pre-exorcisms" consisting of confessions, postulations, protestations, concitations, and interrogations. The exorcisms themselves were eight in number.

All these were accompanied with appropriate psalms, lessons, litanies, prayers, and adjurations. Then followed eight "postexorcisms." The first three were to be used according to how determined the demon was to retain possession. If the demon was very obstinate, an effigy of it, vile and horrible, was to be drawn, with its name inscribed under it, and be thrown into the flames, after having been signed with the cross, sprinkled with holy water, and fumigated. The fourth and fifth were forms of thanksgiving and benediction after liberation. The sixth referred to incubi and succubi. The seventh was for exorcising a haunted house, in which the service varied during every day of the week. The eighth was to drive away demoniacal storms or tempests and called for throwing into a huge fire large quantities of various herbs.

The "Flagellum Daemonum" treatise contained in the Thesaurus Exorcismorum gave numerous cautions to the exorcist himself not to be deceived by the arts of the demon, particularly when dealing with possessed women. If the devil refused to tell his name, the demoniac was to be fumigated. If it was necessary to break off the exorcism before the evil spirits were wholly expelled, they were to be adjured to quit the head, heart, and stomach of the energumen and to abscond themselves from the lower parts of the body.

In the "Fustis Daemonum" the exorcist was directed to verbally abuse the evil spirit if it persisted in staying. After this railing latinity, redoubled precaution was necessary, and if the demon still refused to tell its name, the knowledge of which facilitates an exorcism, it was to be called the worst names imaginable and the demoniac fumigated. The seventh exorcism in this treatise called for, among other things, anointing the demoniac with holy oil, and if all adjurations failed, the possessed was to be strenuously exhorted to patience. In the last form, dumbness was attacked; a very effectual remedy against this infirmity was declared to be a draught of holy water with three drops of holy wax, swallowed on an empty stomach.

Father Zacharias Vicecomes, in his Complementum Artis Exorcistiae (1608), explains the signs of possession or bewitchment. He also discusses how to discern the evil spirit's departure; sometimes it puts out the light, now and then it issues like a flame, or a very cold blast, through the mouth, nose, or ears. Vicecomes then enumerates various prescriptions for emetics, perfumes, and fumigations calculated to promote these results. He concludes with a catalog of the names of some of the devils of commonest occurrence: Astaroth, Baal, Cozbi, Dagon, Aseroth, Baalimm, Chamo, Beelphegor, Astarte, Bethage, Phogor, Moloch, Asmodaeus, Bele, Nergel, Melchon, Asima, Bel, Nexroth, Tartach, Acharon, Belial, Neabaz, Merodach, Adonides, Beaemot, Jerobaal, Socothbenoth, Beelzebub, Leviathan, Lucifer, Satan, and Mahomet.

Petrus Stampa's "Fuga Satanae" treatise in the The Sauvus Exorcismorum is very brief and does not contain any significant additional information.

According to a treatise on practical exorcism entitled Histoire admirable de la possession et conversion d'une Penitente. . . . (1613), Sr. Madeleine de Demandolx de la Palud was exorcised over a four-month period. She was under the power of five princes of the devils—Beelzebub, Leviathan, Baalberith, Asmodeus, and Astaroth—as well as many lesser demons. Beelzebub lived in her forehead, Leviathan in the middle of her head, Astaroth in the back of it. Her head made unnatural, perpetual movements and pulsations. After the exorcism her head barely moved.

A second sister of the same convent, Louise Capeau, was also possessed by three devils of the highest degree: Vérin, Grésil, and Soneillon. Vérin, through the proceedings of the exorcists, appears to have turned state's evidence, for, in spite of the remonstrances and rage of Beelzebub, he gave important information and instruction to his enemies and appeared to sincerely repent that he was a devil. The daily Acts and Examinations, from November 27 to the following of April 23, were specially recorded by the exorcist himself, and all the conversations of the devils were recorded verbatim. The whole business ended in tragedy, and Louis Gaufridi, a priest from Marseilles who was accused of witchcraft on the occasion, was burned alive at Aix-en-Provence.

An exorcism case of almost unparalleled atrocity occurred at Loudun in 1634 when Urbain Grandier, cure and canon of that town, was mercilessly brought to the stake partly by the jealousy of some monks, partly to gratify the personal vengeance of Cardinal Richelieu, who had been persuaded that this ecclesiastic had lampooned him, an offense he never forgave. Some Ursuline nuns were tortured and confessed themselves possessed, and Grandier was the person accused of effecting their possession. A certain Tranquille, one of the exorcists, died within four years of the execution of his victim, in a state of reputed possession, perhaps distracted by self-accusations of remorse.

The last acknowledgment of exorcism in the Anglican Church during the progress of the Reformation occurs in the first liturgy of Edward VI, which gives the following form of baptism:

"Then let the priest, looking upon the children, say, 'I command thee, unclean spirit, in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, that thou come out and depart from these infants, whom our Lord Jesus Christ has vouchsafed to call to His holy baptism, to be made members of His Body and of His Holy congregation. Therefore, thou cursed spirit, remember thy sentence, remember thy judgment, remember the day to be at hand wherein thou shalt burn in fire everlasting prepared for thee and thy angels. And presume not hereafter to exercise any tyranny towards these infants whom Christ hath brought with His precious blood, and by this His holy baptism calleth to be of His flock.'"

On the remonstrance of Martin Bucer (1491–1551), arguing that exorcism was not originally used for any but demoniacs, and that it was uncharitable to imagine that all who came to baptism were demoniacs, it was thought prudent by reformers to omit it altogether in subsequent liturgies.

The seventy-second canon issued the following restriction on exorcism: "No minister shall, without the license of the bishop of the diocese, first obtained and had under his hand and seal . . . attempt upon any pretence whatever, either of obsession or possession, by fasting or prayer, to cast out any devil or devils: under pain of the imputation of imposture or cosenage, and deposition from the ministry."

Exorcism in the Modern World

Exorcism became news in modern times with the publication of William Peter Blatty's novel The Exorcist in 1971 and the subsequent Warner Brothers movie, scripted by Blatty and released in 1974. Much of the powerful background of Blatty's book and the film stem from authentic research, using as a source the classic study Possession: Demoniacal and Other, by T. K. Oesterreich (1930). Blatty's book was a best-seller, clearing 200,000 hardcover copies in the summer of 1971 and several million in paperback in the two following years.

The runaway success of the movie revived the interest in the role of the devil in Christian theology and created a industry of paperbacks on Satanism, black magic, and related topics. Devil possession became almost fashionable, and priests revived long-forgotten rites of exorcism. Many churchmen and psychologists were divided over whether treating devils as real entities aided the recovery of psychoneurotic individuals or actually encouraged the spread of hysterical possession.

In Britain, a 17-year-old boy claimed that he was possessed by evil after seeing the movie The Exorcist and afterward killed a girl, age 9. In 1975, 31-year-old Michael Taylor was exorcized at St. Thames Church, Barnsley, England, but went home "possessed with the devil" and brutally murdered his wife. He was found guilty but insane. Similar cases have been reported in other countries.

Christopher Neil-Smith, a London vicar, has performed more than three thousand exorcisms in Britain since 1949. In his book The Exorcist and the Possessed (1974), he claims that evil should be treated as an actual force rather than an abstract idea.

In 1963 the bishop of Exeter, England, convened a commission to consider the theology, techniques, and the place of exorcism in the life of the Christian Church. The commission's findings were published in 1972 and included suitable forms of prayer and exorcism. It was suggested that every diocesan bishop should appoint a priest as diocesan exorcist, and suitable training should be established. No exorcism should take place without the explicit permission of the diocesan bishop, nor should exorcism be performed until possible mental or physical illness had been excluded. A program of training and safeguards was drawn up by which the theological and liturgical questions could be properly evaluated without sensationalism.

Through the 1980s the subject of exorcism was kept alive within evangelical Christianity, especially Pentecostalism. Quite the contrary to the official oversight given exorcism within the Roman Catholic, Anglican, and mainline Protestant traditions, any minister (and on occasion layperson) could emerge as an exorcist, and exorcism services, such as those conducted by Bible teacher Derek Prince, became attractions at Pentecostal events. Exorcism services also became a part of missionary activity in places where either Spiritualism (Philippines) or polytheistic faiths (Africa) were widespread. Exorcism has become somewhat institutionalized in charismatic churches, where it is referred to as "spiritual warfare."

Sources:

Basham, Don. A Manual for Spiritual Warfare. Greensburg, Pa.: Manna Books, 1974.

Blatty, William Peter. The Exorcist. New York: Harper & Row, 1971.

Brooks, Pat. Out! In the Name of Jesus. Carol Stream, Ill.: Creation House, 1972.

Deutch, Richard. Exorcism: Possession or Obsession? London: Bachman & Turner, 1975.

Ebon, Martin, ed. Exorcism: Fact Not Fiction. New York: New American Library, 1974.

Huxley, Aldous. The Devils of Loudon. London: Chatto & Windus, 1952. Reprint, New York: Harper & Row, 1971.

Nauman, St. Elmo, Jr. Exorcism Through the Ages. New York: Philosophical Library, 1974.

Neil-Smith, Christopher. The Exorcist and the Possessed. Cornwall, England: James Pike, 1974.

Oesterreich, T. K. Possession: Demoniacal and Other. London: Kegan Paul; New York: R. R. Smith, 1930. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1966. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1974.

Petitpierre, Dom Robert. Exorcism: The Findings of a Commission Convened by the Bishop of Exeter. London: Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1972.

Shepard, Leslie. How to Protect Yourself Against Black Magic and Witchcraft. New York: Citadel, 1978.

Strachan, Françoise. Casting Out the Devils. London: Aquarian Press, 1972.

White, Elijah. Exorcism as a Christian Ministry. New York: Morehouse-Barlow, 1975.

Expanding Horizons (Organization)

British organization concerned with promoting lectures, seminars, workshops, and conferences on health, healing, self-development, and spiritual awareness. Founded by Celia Macnab, Expanding Horizons attempted to enlarge public awareness of healing, psychic development, meditation, fire walking, and psychophysical techniques. Speakers included a wide variety of British and American authorities on the entire range of New Age topics. Last known address: 95 Constantine Rd., Hampstead, London, NW3, England.

Expanding Human Awareness Directory

Publication listing individuals and organizations in the Illinois area. Last known address: EHA, Inc., P.O. Box 1533, Peoria, IL 61655.

Experimenter Effect

Term used by parapsychologists to indicate an experimental result that has been influenced by the conscious or unconscious attitudes or behavior of the experimenter, rather than by the characteristics or psi factors relating to the subject. Such an effect could involve the expectations (positive or negative) of the experimenter or the particular methods used in dealing with subjects.

Exploring the Supernatural (Magazine)

British monthly periodical inaugurated in 1986. It treats a wide range of subjects of popular interest, such as psychometry, healing, hypnosis, UFOs, earth mysteries, mind over matter, divination, astrology, tarot, and the afterlife. Useful features include a book review section and a news roundup covering lectures, courses, fairs, and products. Address: Aceville, Ltd., 89 East Hill, Colchester, Essex, C01, 20N, England.

Exteriorization of Motricity

Term used by early psychical researchers to denote action of the medium's motor force outside the periphery of the body. It was offered as an explanation of telekinesis (now known as psychokinesis). The term appears to have originated with Eugene Rochas in his book L'Exteriorisation de la motricité (1896) and was later adopted by other researchers, including Paul Joire. Evidence for Rochas's theory was derived from observation of the curious synchronization between the movements of the medium Eusapia Palladino and her physical phenomena. The extinguishing and relighting of a lamp, for instance, corresponded with a slight movement of the index finger of Palladino in the hollow of the hand of Italian researcher Cesare Lombroso. Many such sympathetic movements were recorded.

To prove that the motor nerves of mediums were at work, various apparatuses were constructed. The best known were the biometer of Hyppolite Baraduc and the sthenometer of Paul Joire. Others included the dynamoscope of Dr. Collongues, the magnetometer of Abbé Fortin, the galvanometer of Puyfontain, the spiritoscope of Robert Hare, the magnetoscope of Ruter, and the fluid motor of the Count de Tromelin.

These instruments show, wrote Charles Lancelin, "that there is a repulsive force generated from one side of the body and an attractive force from the other side. In normal human beings these forces should be equal. When they are not, odd things are likely to happen in their immediate environment. Their relative power may be tested by means of these instruments."

With the sthenometer, Joire claimed to have proved that the exteriorized nervous force could be stored for a short time, like heat, light, and electricity, in wood, water enclosed in bottles, linen, and cardboard. Objects were said to be charged with the force by simply holding them for a time in the hand. Placed near the sthenometer, they affected the needle in proportion to the intensity of the source that produced it. A British physician, Charles Russ, constructed an instrument, described in the Lancet (July 3, 1931), to demonstrate that energy radiates from the human eye.

The idea of psychic force is a difficult one to substantiate, as there is a significant difference between a force that might cause deviation in a delicately suspended needle and the energy required to move solid objects at a distance as in pychokinesis, or to cause stress and deformation in metals as in metal bending. It is not clear whether one force in different modalities or different forces are involved.

Exteriorization of Sensitivity

Term used to denote sensory power of the medium operating outside the periphery of the body. The term was used by Eugene Rochas as the title of his book on the subject in 1896, but it was Paul Joire who called broad attention to the phenomenon in his treatise on hypnology, Précis Théorique and pratique de neuro-hypnologie (1892).

The phenomenon was on the confines of hypnotic and psychical phenomena. Approaching his hypnotic subject with a pointed instrument, Joire found him sensitive a short distance from the skin. The distance at which the sensation was perceived and the range of the sensitive surface varied with the nervous sensibility of the subject on an average from one to ten centimeters. The sensibility of the skin itself disappeared. In deep hypnosis a series of sensitive layers appeared to be formed around the body, and the sensibility could also be transferred into various objects, such as a glass of water, glass plates covered with velvet, wood, or a ball of putty. Joire gave the putty the vague contour of the subject, and as he pricked parts of the putty that represented the parts of the subject's body, the subject experienced a corresponding sensation.

Some of the subject's hair was cut off while he was asleep and stuck into the putty. When they were later pulled, the patient strongly protested, saying his hair was being pulled out. When a glass of water, charged with sensibility, was held by the subject, the reaction to the pricking of the water was instantaneous. If it was held by an assistant, removed from the subject in a chain, there was an increasing slowness in the sensation. The delay between the pricking and the sensation was two seconds when five persons formed a chain.

Joire claimed that he could also transfer the sensibility to a living man or to the subject's shadow on the wall. Care was taken to prevent the working of suggestion. The exteriorization of sensation to this degree, however, was a very rare phenomenon.

Joire also found that the excitation produced at a distance in a subject whose sensibility had been externalized left a persistent painful trace, like a contusion or a mosquito sting. A few moments after the first movement the subject began to stroke the sensitive spot as though he still felt the sensation; and although he remembered nothing in the waking state, in the night he often dreamed that he was being pricked or pinched.

Rochas obtained similar results to those of Joire and described during the magnetizing process the formation of a series of equidistant layers separated by an interval of six or seven centimeters around the body of his subject. They extended sometimes as far as two or three meters, and their sensibility diminished in proportion to their distance from the body. He noticed that when a glass of water was placed across a zone of sensibility the layers beyond the glass were interrupted, whereas the water in the glass became rapidly luminous throughout its mass and later a sort of luminous mist was liberated from it. Taken to some distance, the glass of water retained its sensibility.

Experimenting further on these lines, Rochas found that sensibility appeared to be stored in those substances that store odors: liquids; viscous substances, especially those derived from animals, like gelatin and wax; wadding; and stuffs of loose or plushy texture, such as velvet.

As the emanations seemed to spread themselves in a manner analogous to light, he tried to focus them on a plate of gelatino-bromide film. The subject of these experiments was a Mrs. Lux. She was photographed awake, then asleep but not exteriorized, and afterward asleep and exteriorized. In the latter case the plate was briefly left for sensitivity inside her belt in contact with her body.

According to Rochas, "I observed that when I pricked the first plate with a pin Mme. Lux felt nothing, when I pricked the second she felt it slightly, and when I pricked the third she felt it sharply, and this was a few minutes after the operation." Three days later, "wishing to discover to what extent this plate was sensitive, I gave two sharp blows with the pin on the hand depicted in the picture in such a manner as to tear the film of gelatino-bromide. Lux, who was two metres distant from me, and could not see what part I had pricked, fell back at once with cries of pain. I had some difficulty in restoring her to her normal state; her hand hurt her, and a few seconds afterwards I saw appear on her right hand—the one I pricked in the photograph—some little red marks whose position corresponded to the pricks. Dr. P., who was present during the experiment, observed that the epidermis was not broken and the redness was in the skin." These experiments were verified by Jules Bernard Luys (1828–1897), a famous brain specialist.

According to Rochas, exteriorization of sensibility may be gradually pushed to the formation of two luminous phantoms on the left and right of the subject, and finally to their union. This is the exteriorization of the astral body. While the astral body of his subject was thus exteriorized, Rochas unintentionally struck the astral hand with his hand. In a few seconds the corporeal hand became very red. It is possible that the special hypnotic conditions may have been responsible for this result.

Among those refuting Rochas and Joire, Sylvan Muldoon, in his remarkable book The Projection of the Astral Body (cowritten with Hereward Carrington, 1929), describes his experiences in self-projection and declares that he never experienced sensitivity as described by the French experimenters. There is some point in his question: wouldn't an astral entity have to be constantly on the watch, dodging pointed material objects? If not, these pointed objects would make contact with the entity's sensibility. Muldoon felt certain that if repercussion of sensibility took place it did so while the phantom was within cord-activity range.

Elizabeth d'Esperance wrote of her phantom "Yolande":

"When she touches some object I feel my muscles contract as if it were my hands that touched it. When she put her hands into melted paraffin I felt my hands burn and when a thorn penetrated her finger I experienced great pain. When I touch the hands of Yolande I believe I am feeling my own, but perceive my error afterwards when I see four hands."

The psychical researcher Emile Boirac believed that there was no reason for supposing that exteriorization of sensibility is a rare, accidental, abnormal phenomenon that requires a particular hypnotic condition for its production. It might be a normal phenomenon but not in evidence because a special developer is necessary to note it.

In his book Psychic Science (1918) Boivac mentions some experiments with a glass of water that the experimenter held for a short time in his hand, then handed to the somnambulist subject in the first experiment and placed it on a table in the second. If the somnambulist plunged his fingers into the water and the experimenter was pinched, the somnambulist felt it in his own hand. If the experimenter held the somnambulist's hand and the glass of water was pricked by one of the spectators, the subject again declared the corresponding sensation. Everything happened as though the experimenter, and not the subject, had externalized his sensibility into a material object and remained in communication with this object by some kind of force so that every impression made on his nervous system was immediately experienced by the object and reciprocally every impression made on the object was immediately experienced in his nervous system.

Historically the beginning of the concept of exteriorized sensitivity may be traceable to the idea of sympathetic medicine in magic. In 1658 Sir Kenelm Digby published A Late Discourse . . . Touching The Cure of Wonders by The Powder of Sympathy, and even earlier, Sir Francis Bacon had discussed the subject in his book Sylva Slyvarum (1627). In Sir Walter Scott's Last Minstrel (1805) the Ladye of Branksome takes the broken lance from Deloraine's wound and treats the lance with a salve, instead of the wound, whereupon "William of Deloraine, in trance, whenever she turned it round and round, twisted as though she'd galled his wound."

Sources:

Joire, Paul. Précis Théorique and pratique de neuro-hypnologie. Paris, 1892.

Extispicy (or Extispicium)

Extispicy, divination by the reading of animal entrials, was a common practice in the ancient Mediterranean world. The history of the practice can be traced to ancient Chaldea and Babylonia and many incidents were recorded in the Greek and Roman literature. Across the region it rivaled and at times surpassed astrology as the primal means of fortune telling.

Among the most famous cases involving entrail reading involved Alexander the Great. Prior to his campaign in Babylonia, he was warned by his Chaldean soothsayers, following their readings, that he should not go. Upon his arrival at the gates of the city, he learned that the governor of Babylon had also sacrificed an animal whose signs confirmed Alexander's own diviners. Alexander is subsequently said to have degenerated mentally under a cloud of despair. He, of course, confirmed the direst warning of his soothsayers by catching a fever and dying. In the fourth century B.C.E., Xenophon recorded numerous incidents of extispicy in the Anabasis and even mentioned Socrates' making a joke concerning it as he lay dying.

The primary focus of extispicy was the liver. The Etruceans developed an elaborate understanding of the sheep's liver, it various parts being related to the heavens, and the outer edge of the liver was divided into the same 16 divisions as the sky. Special attention was paid to the lobe or head, the part described in modern anatomy books as the processus pyramidus, its absence or malformation was generally regarded as a bad omen.

The person doing the reading, called a bapu in Assyria, had to go through a lengthy process to complete the divinatory reading. Knowing the capricious nature of the Gods, and the manner in which a bored deity might play tricks and word games on humans, the question to be discerned had to be carefully constructed. The answer received might be literally true but otherwise leave a false impression. After the question was put, an appeal to the gods would b made. Prior to the process, an unblemished animal would have been selected for sacrifice. It would be killed with a knife and its intestines, gall bladder and liver extracted. These were the primary organs examined for irregularities.

Extispicy was an integral part of the divination process at Delphi and other oracle centers, even in those cases where mind-altering drugs or mediumship dominated. Modern discussions of the process have been limited, in spite of the extensive number of texts describing it, and its importance in the ancient world, due both to its having been abandoned and to negative reactions to the idea of the process in the modern world.

Sources:

Temple, Robert K. G. Conversations with Eternity: Ancient Man's Attempt to Know the Future. London: Rider, 1984.

Xenophon. Anabasis; or Expedition to Cyprus. Trans. by J. S. Watson. London: Bohn's Librayr, 1891.

———. Memorabilia (Recollections of Socrates). Trans. by Anna S. Benjamin. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1965.

Extra

A paranormally imposed face or figure on a photographic film or plate. Such extras were alleged to appear on pictures produced through psychic photography and spirit photography.

Extrasensory Perception (ESP)

A term used in parapsychology to denote awareness apparently received through channels other than the usual senses. The term was launched by J. B. Rhine in his book Extrasensory Perception (1934), published by the Boston Society for Psychic Research. The book attracted the interest of the science editor of the New York Times, who wrote a favorable notice. After that, public interest was aroused and the term extrasensory perception, or ESP, was firmly established. Phenomena related to ESP include clairvoyance, telepathy, and precognition. Prior to Rhine's popularization of the term, a German equivalent, außersinnliche Wahrnehmung, had been used by Gustav Pagenstecher and Rudolf Tishner in the 1920s.

Extraterrestrial Earth Mission

The organization known as the Extraterrestrial Earth Mission can be traced to March 3, 1986, when an extraterrestrial spirit named Avinash "walked into" the body of a person named John, according to the mission's literature. John was a channel and teacher of metaphysics in the Seattle, Washington, suburb of Bellevue. He had been channeling an entity named Elihu.

The concept of a "walk-in" was popularized by New Age author and channel Ruth Montgomery, who described situations in which the spirit of an individual would, for whatever reason, abandon a body and a disembodied spirit would walk in and take over. In that change, the memory of the person who left would be left behind, but the personality of the new entity would dominate. Thus it was that "Avinash" walked in and took over John's body. Shortly after Avinash appeared, the person that had been John moved to Hawaii. He was accompanied by a second walk in, a female named "Alezsha." In Hawaii they met a third walk-in, "Ashtridia." During the remainder of 1986, the primary teaching channeled by Avinash concerned the concept of mastery of limitation. The universe, he taught, tended to rearrange itself according to one's concept of reality. By changing one's reality, removing a sense of limitation, the world would change.

The three also have contact with a huge extradimensional space ship, which resulted in their becoming conscious of their ability to operate in other dimensions. Before the year was out, the three had decided to move to Sedona, Arizona. Soon after relocating they met a fourth walk-in, "Arthea." Avinash and Arthea soon discovered that they were divine design mates, i.e., a couple divinely created to work together. By 1987 the group of walk-ins grew to twelve but disbanded as each found his or her mission elsewhere. By October of that year, only Avinash, Arthea, and a third person, "Alana," remained.

The three remaining people experienced what was not a totally unique occurrence but certainly an uncommon one. Over the next years, a series of new entities walked into their bodies as others departed, thus the same body became known by different names. In this way, John, once known as Avinash, became known as Aktivar, Alarius, Savizar, and ZaviRah. Arthea became known as Akria, Polaria, Silarra, and Ziva'rah. Alana became known as Akrista and then as Tantra. It is believed that each of these names refers to an extraterrestrial person who inhabits the body of the Earth person. The emergence of Aktivar, Akria, and Akrista occurred at the end of the summer of 1987. During the last three months of 1987 and into 1988, these three entities toured the United States, during which time the Extraterrestrial Earth Mission began to make its initial public impact. The three made a videotape on humanity's role as a cocreator of heaven on Earth and a series of cassette tapes aimed at overcoming particular individual dysfunctions.

In March 1988 a new phase of work began when Aktivar, Akria, and Akrista left and were replaced by three new walk-ins, Alarius, Polaria, and Tantra. Shortly thereafter Tantra exited from the trio and began to work separately. Alarius and Polaria described their work as temporary, as preparing the way for Savizar and Silarra. Under the guidance of the couple known as Savizar and Silarra, the Extraterrestrial Earth Mission matured into a New Age organization announcing the planetary shift of humans from dense physical bodies into bodies of light. According to Savizar and Silarra, there are many masters present on Earth today. It was their job to awaken these masters to the nature of their true selves and to cooperate with them in the co-creation of a new Earth. Assisting in this process, the pair taught a technique, the superconscious technique, which allowed people to manifest their desires by altering their picture of reality.

In 1990, Savizar and Silarra were replaced by ZaviRah and Ziva'rah. Each change was believed to announce a new phase in the mission. In this case, the newcomers represented a change from an exclusive emphasis on opening and awakening to a stance of mobilization. Those who had awakened to their true nature began the process of creation and manifestation. In 1993 Zavirah and Ziva'rah were replaced by Drakar and Zrendar, and soon after their appearance the Extraterrestrial Earth Mission moved from Arizona to Hawaii. Included in the new phase of the mission was the ChristStar Project, the work of a group of people on Maui to build a prototype of the new civilization. Public events were developed to present techniques (usable technologies) of consciousness that assisted individuals to see the divinity in all life and to manifest their own roles as a co-creators of heaven on Earth.

In response to the lectures, workshops, and the printed, audio, and video materials published by the mission, groups formed around the United States and Canada to share in the mission's work. ChristStar Project Mastery Events were being held at which many extraterrestrial entities spoke through Drakar and Zrendar to the assembled group. Extraterrestrial Earth Mission had been chartered through the Universal Life Church in Arizona.

Last known address: P.O. Box 959, #0432, Kihei, HI 96753. The organization published a newsletter, ChristStar.

Sources:

Savizar and Silarra. Conscious Channeling. Sedona, Ariz.: Earth Mission, 1989.

———. Extraterrestrial Earth Mission. Book I: The Awakening. Sedona, Ariz.: Earth Mission, 1989.

———. The Superconscious Technique. Sedona, Ariz.: Earth Mission, 1989.

Eye-Biters

According to Reginald Scot in his The Discoverie of Witchcraft (1584), during the reign of Queen Elizabeth I an epidemic causing blindness afflicted the cattle of Ireland. This malevolence was attributed to witches, who were called eye-biters, and some of them were executed.

Sources:

Scot, Reginald. The Discoverie of Witchcraft. 1584. Reprint, New York: Dover Publications, 1972.

Eyeless Sight

The ability to see without using the eyes, also known as paroptic vision, dermo-optical perception (DOP), hyperesthesia, synesthesia, cutaneous vision (skin vision), extraretinal vision, and biointroscopy. The term eyeless sight was first popularized through the English translation of a book by the famous French author Jules Romains (Louis Farigoule) titled Vision Extra-Rétinienne (1920), which detailed Romains's research in developing the extraordinary and little-known faculty of seeing without the use of the eyes. The book was not well received, however, and was ridiculed by his colleagues. Refused access to subjects for further experiments, Romains abandoned his scientific research, turned his attention to the literary arts, and went on to become a world-famous poet, dramatist, and novelist.

Prior to Romains's book there had been scattered references to eyeless sight from the seventeenth century on. British scientist Robert Boyle referred to a doctor's report about a blind man who could distinguish colors by touch. In the eighteenth century, Jonathan Swift included a strange reference in Gulliver's Travels (1726) to a blind man who could distinguish paint colors by feeling and smelling. Throughout the nineteenth century there were occasional medical accounts of transposition of sight to different areas of the body.

Ten years after publication of Romains's book, Manuel Shaves of São Paulo, Brazil, tested four hundred blind patients and reported that about a dozen of them seemed to have the faculty of "skin vision," some being able to distinguish colors.

During the 1930s a Kashmiri fire-walking performer named Kuda Bux demonstrated what was claimed to be eyeless sight before a distinguished medical panel. Although heavily blindfolded, with lumps of dough over his eyes, and with metal foil, woollen bandages, and layers of gauze, Bux had no difficulty reading from books. He gave a similar demonstration in Montreal, Canada, in 1938, and in 1945 during a U.S. tour he rode a bicycle through Times Square, New York, while heavily blindfolded. However, much doubt has arisen concerning Kuda Bux's performances owing to claims such as those of stage magician Milbourne Christopher, who suggested there were defects in the blindfolding.

In 1963 Russian scientist I. M. Gol'dberg reported his experiments with Rosa Kuleshova in an article in Soviet Psychology and Psychiatry. During the previous September, Gol'dberg had demonstrated Kuleshova's ability to read ordinary printed text with the fingers of her right hand when normal vision was completely excluded. Rosa could also determine color tones on paper and objects. The term dermo-optical perception became established.

After publication of the experiments with Kuleshova, Richard P. Youtz, a psychologist at Barnard College, Columbia University, New York, experimented with a Mrs. P. Stanley, a 42-year-old housewife. Youtz concluded that color sensing through the fingertips was a real phenomenon and believed that some 10 percent of a female college population tested by him had the ability in rudimentary form.

Even before the reports on Kuleshova, an April 1965 story from the Associated Press reported that Vichit Sukhakarn of Bangkok was teaching blind people to see by hypnosis. Sukhakarn claimed that if volunteers concentrated deeply on the thought of "seeing through the cheeks," the nerve endings of the skin became so sensitive that impulses were transmitted to the brain and converted into visual images. Some of his blind subjects were reported able to "read" a newspaper or "watch" a movie with their cheeks. He opened an institution for blind children in Thailand and found 8- to 14-year-old subjects very susceptible to training. His findings were in line with Romains's experiments suggesting that some light hypnotic or suggestible factor assisted the development of eyeless sight.

In 1966 Yvonne Duplessis at the Centre D'Eclairagisme began reviving French research into eyeless sight with the aid of a grant from the Parapsychology Foundation. Duplessis trained blind volunteers to "see" objects both at a distance (paroptic perception) and by touch (dermo-optical perception). Volunteers also developed the faculty to distinguish colors by eyeless sight, which some investigators believe is capable of development mainly through use of the fingers, cheeks, or epigastric region, all sensitive skin areas. The faculty seems facilitated by light hypnotic suggestion.

The research of Duplessis was presented in a paper at the First International Conference on Psychotronics, held at Prague, Czechoslovakia, in 1974. At the conference, a small research group from Poland, headed by Lech Stefanski (founder of the International Section on Parapsychology), reported similar experiments. Although there have been counterreports suggesting that such results were obtained because of imperfect control or cheating, the significant number of positive results has encouraged some parapsychological researchers. (See also Stomach, Seeing with the)

Sources:

Duplessis, Yvonne. "Dermo-optical Sensitivity and Perception." International Journal of Biosocial Research 7, no. 2 (1985).

Goldberg, I. M. "On Whether Tactile Sensitivity Can be Improved by Exercise." Soviet Psychology and Psychiatry 2, no. 1 (1963).

Romains, Jules [Louis Farigoule]. Vision Extra-Rétinienne. 1920. Translated by C. K. Ogden as Eyeless Sight: A Study of Extra-Retinal Vision and the Paroptic Sense. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1924. Reprint, New York: Citadel Press, 1978.

Eysenck, H(ans) J(ürgen) (1916–1997)

Research psychologist whose specialized work in the fields of personality, neurosis, and experimental psychology has relevance to parapsychological research. He was born March 4, 1916, in Berlin, Germany. He was educated at the University of London (B.A., 1938; Ph.D., 1940) and did postgraduate work at the University of Dijon, France, and the University of Exeter, England.

From 1942 to 1945 Eysenck was a research psychologist at Mill Hill Emergency Hospital, England, and in 1945 moved to Maudsley Hospital's Institute of Psychiatry as a psychologist. In 1950 he became a reader in psychology and director of the department of the Institute of Psychiatry, University of London. In 1955 he was named professor of psychology, a position he held until his retirement, when he was named professor emeritus. Over the years he wrote more than 40 books and 800 articles on personality and its relation to various social phenomena.

Within parapsychological circles, Eysenck is known for his development of the Eysenck Personality Scale, a psychological test battery, still in wide use among parapsychologists. In 1967 he suggested that extroverts would produce higher ESP scores, a factor still noted by parapsychologists in setting up ESP tests. Through the 1980s Eysenck became more vocal on paranormal phenomena and argued that evidence for its existence is quite good. He also worked to improve the design of ESP tests.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Eysenck, Hans J. Astrology: Science or Superstition? London: Maurice Temple Smith, 1982.

———. Handbook of Abnormal Psychology: An Experimental Approach. New York: Basic Books, 1961.

———. "Personality and Extrasensory Perception." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 44 (1967).

Eysenck, Hans J., and C. Sargent. Explaining the Unexplained. London: Weidenfield and Nicholson, 1982.

———. Know Your Own PSI-IQ. New York: World Almanac Publications, 1983.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

F

F. Marion Crawford Memorial Society

Founded in 1975, dedicated to the study and appreciation of novelist F. Marion Crawford (1854–1909), author of the occult novel Mr. Isaacs (1882), and to other fantasy literature and postromanticism (see also occult English fiction). The society maintains the F. Marion Crawford Memorial Library of more than a thousand items (books, letters, autograph materials) and publishes a journal, The Romanticist. Address: c/o Jesse Knight, 2148 Avenida de los Flores, Santa Clara, CA 95054. (See also Mr. Jacobs of Simla)

Sources:

Sullivan, Jack, ed. The Penquin Encyclopedia of Horror and the Supernatural. New York: Viking Press, 1986.

Fabre, Pierre Jean (ca. 1590–1650)

French alchemist, a native of Castelnaudary in Languedoc. Fabre was a doctor of medicine and was renowned in his own time as a scholar of chemistry, a subject on which he compiled several treatises. Because he practiced in Montepellier, he has been confused with a painter named Fabre who was born in Montepellier and gave his name to the Musée Fabre in that town.

There is no evidence that Pierre Jean Fabre had any practical success in the field of alchemy, but he wrote numerous works dealing with that topic.

Of these the most important are Alchimista Christianus and Hercules Piochymicus, both published at Toulouse, the first in 1632. In the latter he maintains that the mythological "labors of Hercules" are allegories, embodying the arcana of hermetic philosophy. The philosophers' stone, he declares complacently, may be found in all compounded circumstances and is formed of salt, mercury, and sulphur.

Faculty of Astrological Studies

British astrological school. The Faculty of Astrological Studies was established in 1948 largely at the instigation of Charles E. O. Carter, for many years head of the Astrological Lodge of the Theosophical Society (now the Astrological Lodge of London). The lodge sponsored the founding of the school, and Carter served as its first principal (1948–54). He was succeeded in that task by Margaret Hone (1954–69). Hone had earlier been commissioned to produce The Modern Textbook of Astrology (1951), a basic text for students. Most of the school's coursework is by correspondence. Address: BM7470, London WC1N 3XX, England. Website: http://www.astrology.org.uk/.

Source:

Faculty of Astrological Studies. http://www.astrology.org.uk/. March 8, 2000.

Faculty X

A term coined by British author Colin Wilson in his book The Occult: A History (1971) to indicate a latent power in human beings enabling awareness of a higher reality beyond immediate sense perception. The term is synonymous with the more generally used ESP.

Sources:

Wilson, Colin. Mysteries: An Investigation into the Occult, the Paranormal, and the Supernatural. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1978.

———. The Occult: A History. New York: Random House, 1971.

Fagail

The "parting gift" of fairies of Gaelic origin. This could be of a pleasant or unpleasant nature—it might be death, or the transformation of a lazy, ugly, ill-spoken man into the best workman, the best looking man, and the best speaker in the village.

Fagan, Cyril (1896–1970)

Irish astrologer, born in Dublin on May 22, 1896, into a wealthy medical family. Fagan attended Belvedere and Castlenook Colleges. He wanted to become a physician but was hampered by a condition of almost total deafness. He tried several alternatives and finally became a professional astrologer after World War I. In 1930 he founded the Irish Astrological Society and served as its president for many years. During the late 1930s he began to study the historical aspects of astrological theory, which led him to propose and champion what is known as the "sidereal" zodiac.

Fagan was concerned with adjusting the horoscope chart to reflect the "procession of the equinoxes." The "tropical" zodiac, still used by most astrologers, begins each year at the point where the sun is located at the spring equinox. However, that position, in relation to the constellations that gave the 12 signs of the zodiac their names, changes slightly each year. Over the centuries the drift has been considerable, and the divisions of the zodiac no longer reflect the actual position of the constellations in the heavens. The sidereal zodiac adjusts for the actual position of the 12 signs.

Fagan presents his argument for the sidereal zodiac in several books, beginning with Fixed Zodiac Ephemeris for 1948. His argument is most persuasive in Zodiac Old and New (1950). Initially Fagan found few supporters, but among the few were three important figures: Donald Bradley, a young American astrological researcher; R. C. Firebrace, a British military leader and astrologer; and Rupert Gleadow, a popular astrologer and writer. Firebrace supported Fagan in his journal Spica (founded in 1961). Bradley conducted his significant statistical research using Fagan's ideas.

Fagan eventually moved to Tucson, Arizona, where Bradley had become editor of American Astrology, a leading astrological periodical. He died there on January 5, 1970. Unfortunately Bradley, Firebrace, and Gleadow all died in 1974. The loss of the four most prominent advocates of siderealist astrology led to its decline through the 1970s and 1980s, although it has shown some new life in the 1990s.

Sources:

Fagan, Cyril. Astrological Origins. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1971.

———. Fixed Zodiac Ephemeris for 1948. Washington, D.C.: National Astrological Library, 1948.

———. Zodiacs Old and New. Los Angeles: Llewellyn Publications, 1950.

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

Fahler, Jarl Ingmar (1925–)

Finnish psychologist, hypnotherapist, parapsychological researcher. Fahler was born December 27, 1925, in Mariehamn, Finland, and studied at the University of Helsinki (B.A., 1952; M.A., 1953). He served successively as a staff member of the Foreign Department and the Finnish Police (1950–54); as a visiting research fellow at the Parapsychology Laboratory, Duke University, and the Research Laboratory, Parapsychology Foundation (1957–58); and as a staff member of the Finnish Ministry of Home Affairs (1960–62). He served as president of the Society for Psychical Research, Finland (1951–62), and was a charter member of the Parapsychological Association.

Fahler experimented with ESP and psychokinesis, psychological aspects of ESP in hypnosis, and precognitive factors in relation to introspective awareness. He also studied spontaneous psi phenomena in Finland. Beginning in 1959 he concentrated his research on the states of awareness induced by mescaline, LSD, and psilocybin, about which he published several articles in Finnish and Swedish journals.

Sources:

Fahler, Jarl I. "ESP Card Tests With and Without Hypnosis." Journal of Parapsychology 21 (1957).

Fahler, Jarl I., and R. J. Cadoret. "ESP Card Tests of College Students With and Without Hypnosis." Journal of Parapsychology 22 (1958).

Fahler, Jarl I., and H. H. J. Keil. "Nina S. Kulagina: A Strong Case for PK Involving Directly Observable Movements of Objects Recorded on Cine Film." Research in Parapsychology, 1974. Edited by J. D. Morris, William G. Roll, and R. L. Morris. Metuchen, N.J: Scarecrow Press, 1975.

Fahler, Jarl I., and Karlis Osis. "Checking for Awareness of Hits in a Precognition Experiment with Hypnotized Subjects." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 60 (1966).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Fairchild, Helen

Nineteenth-century American materialization medium. Fairchild's mediumship was somewhat unconventional inasmuch as she stood outside her cabinet, from which a variety of phantom forms emerged, allegedly under the influence of her control. According to E. A. Brackett in his book Materialized Apparitions (1886), this forced "the skeptic or investigator to the conclusion that the forms are either genuine materializations or confederates." Brackett, who attended some of Fairchild's séances, reported that dematerialization of the phantom forms was sometimes witnessed before the cabinet in full view of the sitters.

Fairfax, Edward (d. 1635)

An English scholar of the sixteenth century, translator of Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata and author of Daemonologia: A Discourse on Witchcraft, in which he claims that in 1621 two of his daughters were bewitched through the malice of six witches. In his preface to the book Fairfax describes himself as neither a "fantastic Puritan nor a superstitious Papist, but so settled in conscience that I have the sure ground of God's word to warrant all I believe . . ."

Sources:

Dictionary of National Biography. London: Oxford University Press, 1953.

Fairfax, Edward. Daemonologia: A Discourse on Witchcraft. Harrogate, England: R. Ackrill, 1882. Reprint, New York: Barnes & Noble, 1971.

Fairies

A species of supernatural beings or nature spirits, one of the most beautiful and important of mythological concepts. Belief in fairies is ancient and widespread, and similar ideas concerning them are found in primitive as well as civilized societies. Fairies have been celebrated in folklore, stories, songs, and poems. The term fairy comes from the Latin fata and fatum (fate), and in Middle English implied enchantment, or an enchanted land and its inhabitants. Fairies were known as "fays" or "fées" in the British Isles and Europe.

Fairies were often said to be invisible, usually of smaller stature than humans. It was believed they could be helpful to humans, but might be dangerous and evil if offended. They were often considered just mischievous and whimsical in a childlike manner, but were believed to have magical powers.

The strongest traditions of fairies are those of the British Isles and Europe, but belief in fairies has also been found in Asia, America, and Africa. There are scores of characteristic fairies in the European tradition, but the main types include the trooping fairies, who are the aristocrats of the fairy world, living in palaces or dancing and feasting underground; the hobgoblin fairies of a rougher, workman type; nature spirits of rivers, gardens, and woods; and deformed monsters, like hags and giants. For a comprehensive listing of pixies, nixies, elves, fauns, brownies, dwarfs, leprechauns, bogies, banshees, and other fairies, see the excellent work A Dictionary of Fairies (1976), by Katharine Briggs, a modern authority on the subject.

Typical activities of fairies in relation to human beings include abducting babies and putting changelings in their place; helping plants and flowers to grow; sweeping floors; bestowing miraculous gifts for friendship (such as removing deformities or breaking the spells of witches); performing mischievous pranks like milking cows in the fields, soiling clothes put out to dry, curdling milk, and spoiling crops.

Fairyland was usually underground or in some magical other dimension. Here time became mystically changed—one night in fairyland might equal a lifetime in the human world. Some of the most romantic and poignant folktales concern mortals who fall in love with a fairy queen and are transported to the magical world of fairyland where all wishes come true, but through breaking some taboo or indulging in homesickness for earthly existence, the mortal is suddenly returned to his world, in which scores of years have passed.

In the seventeenth century, Rev. Robert Kirk investigated the fairies of Aberfoyle in Scotland, much as a visiting anthropologist might study a native tribe. In his book The Secret Commonwealth of Elves, Fauns, and Fairies (1691), Kirk confidently describes the life, occupations, and activities of the fairies in their subterranean world. Kirk's tomb is in Aberfoyle, but legend has it that he swooned away while crossing a fairy hill and after apparent death and burial appeared in a dream to a relative, stating that he was a prisoner in fairyland. He gave instructions for his release, but his cousin was too frightened to complete them, and Kirk was lost forever.

There are many folklore stories of fairies assisting humans, mainly in a bucolic setting. Household fairies were said to assist in everyday tasks like washing dishes, laying the fire, sweeping the floor, making bread bake properly, and so on but asked to be treated respectfully and given a cup of milk for their trouble.

Other fairies played mischievous pranks of a poltergeist nature, pelting mortals with stones, preventing bread from rising, blowing out candles, knocking pans off shelves, sending gusts of smoke, or annoying horses and cattle. Often this was deemed a punishment for lack of respectful treatment. In rural areas, fairies were often referred to in flattering terms as "the good people" to avoid offending them.

According to superstition, the fairies would sometimes steal a human baby and put a changeling fairy child in its place, often ugly and bad-tempered. The changeling might be tricked into a sudden admission of its fairy origin, but there was also a folk superstition that it should be set on fire for this purpose. Undoubtedly some temperamental babies were fatally burned because of this belief, which persisted until some two centuries ago in isolated peasant districts.

Fairy traditions have been strongest in Celtic countries. In Scotland and Ireland, fairies were called daoine sithe (men of peace) and it was believed that every year the devil carried off a tenth part of them. In Scotland and Ireland, Neolithic flint arrowheads were believed to be fairy weapons, and water in which they were dipped was said to be a cure for many ills. The Celts believed fairy music could be heard in certain spots, and it was usually described as sublime. Some folk music airs are said to have originated in fairy music.

"Fairy rings" are small dark green circles in the grass of meadows, fields, or lawns caused by a certain fungus. These rings were once said to be the dancing places of the fairies. In Ireland, mound burials were believed to be the haunts of fairies.

Theories of Fairies

There were many different beliefs concerning fairies. Peasant traditions said they were fallen angels who were neither good enough to be saved nor bad enough to be lost. Folklorists hypothesize that fairies are a folk recollection of an ancient pygmy race, are mythological personifications of natural phenomena, or are remnant figures from ancient religious beliefs. Household tales of folk heroes like Jack the Giant-Killer are probably transplanted from ancient Indo-European folklore, and folk traditions have been made sophisticated in the tales of the Countess d'Aulnoy and Hans Christian Andersen.

Different beliefs and folk memories have no doubt merged, but when all this is sifted and evaluated there remains a body of tradition and testimony, even today, of an elusive ghostly order of life on the borderland of mind and matter, usually depicted in the natural setting of wild and lonely places rather than in the skeptical materialistic bustle of towns and cities.

W. Y. Evans-Wentz, in his The Fairy-Faith in Celtic Countries (1911) presents a living testimony of fairies, the recorded traditions of Celtic literature and mythology, an examination of various theories for fairies, and a case for the reality of fairy life. In the final section, Evans-Wentz correlates fairy life with the ghosts and spirits of psychical phenomena, quoting the French researcher Camille Flammarion, who suggests in his book Mysterious Psychic Forces (1907):

"Either it is we who produce these phenomena, or it is spirits. But mark this well: these spirits are not necessarily the souls of the dead; for other kinds of spiritual beings may exist, and space may be full of them without our ever knowing anything about it, except under unusual circumstances. Do we not find in the different ancient literature, demons, angels, gnomes, goblins, sprites, spectres, elementals, etc.? Perhaps these legends are not without some foundation in fact."

Evans-Wentz concludes that "we can postulate scientifically, on the showing of the data of psychical research, the existence of such invisible intelligences as gods, genii, daemons, all kinds of true fairies, and disembodied men." In his assertions, Evans-Wentz goes far beyond the territory usually covered by his colleagues, who usually limit themselves to the study of folklore traditions.

In his foreword to the 1966 reissue of Evans-Wentz's book, Leslie Shepard cites the protean aspect of fairies (i.e., their ability to change form in accordance with the convention of the viewer) and says, "I have a strong suspicion that in the newer mythology of flying saucers some of those 'shining visitors' in spacecraft from other worlds might turn out to be just another form of fairies." Since then, similar views have been advanced by UFO commentators like Jacques Vallee and Brad Steiger. Other ufologists have suggested that fairies and flying saucer phenomena can be correlated with such miraculous religious apparitions as those of Fatima or Lourdes.

Real Fairies

Claims of contact with fairies are numerous. In 1907 Lady Archibald Campbell interviewed an old blind man and his wife living in an Irish glen who claimed to have caught a fairy and kept it captive for two weeks before it escaped (see Occult Review, 6, no. 5, November 1907). A friend of the couple claimed he had seen fairies on the Hill of Howth at early morning, "little men about three feet high, riding on donkeys to scale." Around the same time a reporter on Irish radio interviewed a woman in the west of Ireland who had been "infested with fairies" for several weeks after cutting down a fairy thornbush. The thornbushes believed to be jealously cherished by fairies are still sometimes left undisturbed in Irish fields.

The most famous case of alleged fairy contact came in 1917, when Elsie Wright, age 16, and Frances Griffiths, 10, who lived in the small Yorkshire village of Cottingley, England, claimed they saw and played with fairies near a brook in the local countryside. No one believed them, so they borrowed a camera and produced photographs of their fairies. These pictures later came to the attention of the author Sir Arthur Conan Doyle and became the basis of his book The Coming of the Fairies (1922). Doyle accepted the girls' story. The evidence for the genuineness of these photographs was quite strong, and a number of attempts were made to disprove them. Skeptics suggested a number of explanations (all of which proved wrong) and it was not until a thorough study of the photographs was made in the 1980s that the source and means of the hoax became known. Shortly before their deaths, the women admitted the hoax.

Doyle's book continues to be reprinted and circulated, primarily in theosophical circles. Many Theosophists became convinced of the truth of the girls' story after independent claims regarding the reality of the Cottingley fairies came from Theosophist Geoffrey Hodson, who visited the Cottingley glen with the two girls in 1921 and affirmed that he saw wood elves, gnomes, goblins, and other nature spirits.

In her book The Real World of Fairies (1977), theosophical leader Dora van Gelder, who grew up in Java, states that she played with fairies and later even saw them in New York's Central Park.

Other British psychics, including Vincent Turvey and Horace Leaf, also claimed to see fairies, and in 1927 the Fairy Investigation Society was formed in Britain to collate information on fairy sightings. The society eventually became inactive, largely as a result of unwelcome newspaper reports ridiculing the subject. Other organizations that take an interest in fairies include the Gnome Club of Great Britain and Gnome International.

Sources:

Arrowsmith, Nancy, and G. Moorse. A Field Guide to the Little People. New York: Macmillan, 1977.

Baring-Gould, S. A Book of Folk-Lore. London, [1913].
Briggs, Katharine M. The Anatomy of Puck: An Examination of Fairy Beliefs Among Shakespeare's Contemporaries and Successors. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1959.
———. A Dictionary of Fairies. London: Allen Lane, 1976. Reprint, London: Penguin, 1977.
———. The Personnel of Fairyland. Oxford, England: Alden Press, 1953. Reprint, Singing Tree Press, 1971.
———. The Vanishing People: A Study of Traditional Fairy Beliefs. London: B. T. Batsford, 1978.
Cooper, Joe. The Case of the Cottingley Fairies. London: Robert Hale, 1990.
Doyle, Arthur Conan. The Coming of the Fairies. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1922. 2nd ed., rev. and enl. London: Psychic Press, 1928. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.
Edwards, Gillian. Hobgoblin and Sweet Puck: Fairy Names and Natures. London: Geoffrey Bles, 1974.
Evans-Wentz, W. Y. The Fairy-Faith in Celtic Countries. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1911. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1966.
Froud, Brian, and Alan Lee. Faeries. London: Souvenir Press, 1978. Reprint, New York: Bantam Books, 1979. Reprint, London: Pan Books, 1979.
Gardner, Edward L. Fairies: The Cottingley Photographs and Their Sequel. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1945.
Haining, Peter. The Leprechaun's Kingdom. London: Souvenir Press, 1979.
Halliwell-Phillipps, J. O. Nursery Rhymes and Nursery Tales of England. London, 1853.
Hartland, Edwin, W. The Science of Fairy Tales: An Enquiry Into Fairy Mythology. London, 1891. Reprint, Detroit: Singing Tree Press, 1968.
Kirk, Robert. The Secret Commonwealth of Elves, Fauns, and Fairies. 1691. Reprint, London: D. Nutt, 1893.
Latham, M. W. The Elizabethan Fairies. New York: Columbia University Press, 1931.
Mac Manus, D. A. The Middle Kingdom: The Faerie World of Ireland. London: Max Parrish, 1959.
O'Donnell, Elliot. The Banshee. London: Sands, 1919.
Ritson, Joseph. Fairy Tales, Now First Collected: To Which Are Prefixed Two Dissertations: 1. On Pygmies; 2. On Fairies. London, 1831.
Sikes, Wirt. British Goblins. London, 1880. Reprint, Wakefield, England: EP Publishing, 1973.
Spence, Lewis. British Fairy Origins. London: Watts, 1946.
———. The Fairy Tradition in Britain. London: Rider, 1948.
Van Gelder, Dora. The Real World of Fairies. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1977.
White, Carolyn. A History of Irish Fairies. Ireland: Mercier Press, 1976.
Yearsley, Macleod. The Folklore of Fairy-Tale. London: Watts, 1924. Reprint, Detroit: Singing Tree Press, 1968.
Yeats, W. B., ed. Fairy and Folk Tales of the Irish Peasantry. London & New York, 1888.

Fairlamb, Annie See Annie Fairlamb Mellon

Fairy Investigation Society

Founded in Britain in 1927 by Sir Quentin Craufurd, M.B.E., to collate information on fairy sightings. Craufurd, claimed to have, himself, observed nature spirits, he claimed.

During its heyday, the society organized meetings, lectures, and discussions, collecting evidence of fairy life. With the outbreak of World War II, however, members were dispersed and the society's records were largely lost or destroyed by enemy action, and so the society became inactive. In 1955, with an energetic secretary, the society was revived and began to issue a regular newsletter, listing reports from members or other individuals. During the 1950s, there were some 50 members, including such famous persons as author Alasdair Alpin MacGregor, Hugh Dowding (of the Battle of Britain in World War II), Walter Starkie (of gypsy lore fame), and Walt Disney.

As the society grew and became known, newspaper articles ridiculing the study of fairies appeared, saying they were only a superstition of past centuries. As a result, the society once again became inactive.

Fairy Stroke

A strange enchantment, administered through touch or through blasting (raising a fairy eddy or wind), said to be practiced by fairies. A fairy stroke had a paralyzing effect, the victim being deprived of speech or movement. This spell might be broken by the use of certain flowers or herbs, such as foxglove, water lily, cow parsnip, or dock, but the latter might also predispose an individual to be fairy-struck.

One strangely impressive painting by the talented but troubled artist Richard Dadd (1817–1886) is titled The Fairy-Feller's Master Stroke. It hangs in the Tate Gallery, London.

Faith Healing

A general term for all nonmedical cures, ranging from suggestion to psychic and spiritual therapy. (See also Christian Science; Dentistry, Psychic; Harry Edwards; Healing by Faith; Healing by Touch; Healing, Psychic; Kathryn Kuhlman; Seventh Son)

Faithist Journal See The Searcher

Fakirs

Moslem religious mendicants. The term literally means "poor man" in Arabic. As with Hindu wandering holy men, many legends have grown up around alleged psychic miracles of fakirs. Most of these claimed miracles prove to be rumors or conjuring tricks, but there is an important element that suggests talents similar to those of Western psychics. Fakirs are distinguished by their disciplined attempt to obtain mastery over the physical body and control over psychic forces, as opposed to becoming passive instruments for the transmission of psychic power.

In 1870 a troup of fakirs from Algeria gave performances in London, but the public reacted negatively to their act, which included inflicting wounds upon their own bodies. Similar demonstrations were given at a Paris exhibition in 1900 by a troup of Aissauas—Algerian Moslems. A detailed description of their self-mutilations was published in the German newspaper Übersinnliche Welt in the following year by a Dr. Nagel, who, with two other doctors, witnessed and photographed the performance.

Later, the visit of Tarah Bey, Rahman Bey, and Hamid Bey attracted great attention in Europe and in the United States. Their chief demonstrations were of insensibility to pain, control over the physiological functions of the body, and survival of burial while alive but in a cataleptic state. They could inflict on their bodies deep wounds with long pins or daggers, stop the flow of blood at will, and cause the wounds to heal in a short time. They could desynchronize their pulse, making it different in each wrist and different again in the heart. They could voluntarily throw their bodies into a cataleptic state in which they could withstand being buried alive—remaining without a coffin, under the soil, without being the worse for the ordeal.

There was little doubt that these feats were genuine. They were witnessed by committees of journalists and physicians, who chose the ground for burial. The cataleptic states were real—the pulse ceased to beat, respiration appeared to be suspended, the ears and nose were stopped with cotton—yet the individuals emerged in the same condition. The body was completely dry and in five minutes the normal physiological functions were fully restored.

Hereward Carrington compared the cataleptic state of the fakirs to artificial hibernation. This similarity was first noticed by the hypnotist James Braid. The fakir concentrates upon the heart, slows its circulation by an effort of will, presses upon certain nerve centers on the head and neck, throws back his head, retracts his tongue, and, having cut the air supply off, falls into a cataleptic sleep. The time of return to consciousness is either impressed on his subconscious mind (which, as known from hypnotic experiments, has a remarkable appreciation of time) or the fakir relies upon his assistants to wake him.

Harry Houdini, who attempted to rival the live burial feat of Rahman Bey by normal means, succeeded in remaining in a large metal coffin under water for an hour and a half. He was in constant telephonic communication with his assistant and explained that his achievement was because of slow breathing.

Records of several well-attested earlier cases of living burials were published in a brief book, Observations on Trance: Or, Human Hibernation, by James Braid, in 1850. Braid traces the idea of these demonstrations to the following passage in the Dabistan, a learned Persian work on the religious sects in India:

"It is an established custom amongst the Yogis that, when malady overpowers them, they bury themselves. They are wont, also, with open eyes, to force their looks towards the middle of their eyebrows, until so looking they perceive the figure of a man; if this should appear without hands, feet or any member, for each they have determined that the boundaries of their existence would be within so many years, months or days. When they see the figure without a head, they know that there certainly remains very little of their life; on that account, having see the prognostic they bury themselves."

Braid comments,

"Now it appears to me no very improbable supposition to allege, that accident had revealed to them the fact, that some of those who were thus buried might be restored to life after exhumation—the action of the air restoring respiration and circulation, on an accidental disinterment of the body of someone thus interred, and the fact once observed would encourage others to try how much they could accomplish in this way, as the newest and most striking achievement which they would perform in token of the divine origin and efficacy of their religion over that of all others."

As interesting as these feats are, many Indian religious leaders have observed that there is nothing inherently spiritual about them and indeed they may become an obstacle to the realization of spiritual progress. In the treatise The Yoga Sutras of Patanjali (ca. 300 B.C.E.), various occult powers, such as levitation, invisibility, and mastery over the senses, are said to result from the practice of yoga. However, the author also warns that such powers should be ignored lest they prove an obstacle to spiritual progress.

Among the phenomenal feats attributed to fakirs, who operate in India as entertainers, is levitation, the so-called Indian rope trick. Reports of this phenomena emerged in England in the 1880s, and in 1919 the British Magic Circle, a professional association of stage magicians, offered a £500 reward to anyone who could perform the trick. No one accepted the offer. The Indian rope trick does exist but is rarely performed, as it is a difficult illusion to accomplish. The secret lies in doing it late in the day under poor lighting, using wires obscured by the poor illumination. The major skills required (e.g., climbing the rope with a boy hidden under a robe) account for the infrequent attempts.

There are some reports of levitation by fakirs, however, that are not so easily explained. For example, Harry Kellar, himself a magician, witnessed a performance in which an entranced fakir of Calcutta was placed upon the upturned blades of several swords. The swords were then removed, leaving the body floating in the air. The feat was performed outdoors, with people viewing it from all sides and angles.

Sources:

Braid, James. Observations on Trance: Or, Human Hibernation. N.p., 1850.

Jacolliot, Louis. Occult Science in India and Among the Ancients. London: William Rider, 1919.

Ormand, Ron, and Gill Ormond. Into the Strange Unknown. Hollywood, Calif.: Esoteric Foundation, 1959. Reprinted as Religious Mysteries of the Orient. New York: A. S. Barnes, 1976.

Rawcliffe, D. N. Illusions and Delusions of the Supernatural and Occult. Rev. ed. New York: Dover Publications, 1959.

Stein, Gordon. Encyclopedia of Hoaxes. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Falcomer, Marco Tullio (d. 1924)

Noted Italian researcher, Spiritualist, and professor of law in the Regio Instituto Tecnico e Nautico at Venice. In An Introduction to Modern Spiritualism, a 56-page pamphlet, Falcomer summarizes the development of the movement up to 1895. He dedicated the second edition of this pamphlet to the Third International Congress of Psychology, held at Munich in 1896. He intended to speak there on the subject of Spiritualism but his paper was not admitted. In a later brochure, Phenomenography (Paris, 1903), he describes a series of remarkable phenomena produced through the mediumship of Signorina Nilda Bonardi between 1900 and 1904.

Sources:

Falcomer, Marco T. An Introduction to Modern Spiritualism. [Venice], 1895.

———. Phenomenography. Paris, 1903.

Falconet, Noel (1644–1734)

French physician and medical writer. He was born at Lyons and became consulting physician to the king. Falconet's works included Letters and Remarks on the So-Called Potable Gold. Gold has been used medicinally since ancient times, and potable gold, often prepared by alchemists, was gold prepared in a drinkable form, usually through the addition of some volatile oil.

Falk, Samuel Jacob Chayyim (1710–1786)

Samuel Falk, a Kabbalistic magician, was a prominent figure in the occult community of London in the late eighteenth century. He had been born in Poland amid a community of followers of the Jewish messianic figure Sabbatai Zvi, and as a young man had learned the occult arts as perpetuated through the Kabbalah. Along the way he settled in Germany (Westphalia), where he ran into trouble for his beliefs and only narrowly escaped being executed as a heretic. He fled to Holland in the early 1730s and in 1742 took up residence in London.

Falk ran a secret occult group out of his home on London's East Side and had an alchemical laboratory in one of the houses on London Bridge. He led a colorful career as a magician and appeared as the teacher of a number of prominent people such as Theodore, the pretender to the throne of Corsica. Falk did various rituals to assist Theodore in his efforts to regain his royal inheritance. He also worked with the Duke of Orleans, also known as Philippe Egalité, to whom he gave a ring of lapis lazuri (some accounts suggest a talisman) to assist in the process of gaining the French throne. Though he did not succeed, supposedly he passed the ring to his son who in 1830 became the king of France as Louis Philippe.

Some have speculated that Falk met the Swedish seer Emanuel Swedenborg during his residency in Holland in the 1730s. Among Swedenborg's early books was On the Infinite (1734), which discusses his meetings with several referred to as "other minds." Swedenborg also settled in England in 1744, just two years after Falk moved there. In the 1770s, Falk also seemed to have joined the list of the associates of Alessandro Cagliostro, the Italian occultist.

While experiencing periods of poverty, Falk died in relative wealth. He owned a large home on Wellclose Square in London and is known to have given a silver Torah to the Great Synagogue of London. He died in the city in 1786.

Sources:

Godwin, Joscelyn. The Theosophical Enlightenment. Albany, N.Y.: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Schuchard, Marsha Keith. "Freemasonry, Secret Societies and the Continuity of the Occult Tradition in English Literature." Ph.D. diss., University of Texas, 1975.

Falls

The study of materials or objects falling onto the earth was first initiated by Charles Fort in his remarkable work The Book of the Damned (1919). Fort collected and correlated accounts of the most astonishing variety of falls, including black rain, red snow, butter, manna, large blocks of ice, frogs, periwinkles, and hailstones with portraits on them. He also distinguished selective falls in which different objects were apparently sorted before descent. Fort was not only concerned with the bizarre nature of authenticated falls, but also by the principle of selectivity that appeared to govern descent.

Since Fort's death, further data on falls and other Fortean phenomena have been collected by groups such as the Fortean Society and the International Fortean Organization and by such individuals as William R. Corliss and Robert J. M. Rickard, editor of the Fortean Times.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. Encyclopedia of Strange and Unexplained Phenomena. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Corliss, William R., ed. Handbook of Unusual Natural Phenomena. Glen Arm, Md.: The Sourcebook Project, 1977.

———. Tornados, Dark Days, Anomalous Precipitation, and Related Weather Phenomena: A Catalog of Geophysical Anomalies. Glen Arm, Md.: The Sourcebook Project, 1983.

Fort, Charles. The Books of Charles Fort. New York: Henry Holt, 1941.

False Memory Syndrome

False memory syndrome refers to a memory disorder in which the individual has come to believe fantasies, usually invoked during hypnotism or while undergoing psychotherapeutic counseling, are real. The term "false memory syndrome" has come to replace "survivor syndrome" or "incest survivor syndrome" as the name given the set of symptoms that led the individual to try hypnotism or therapy in the first place.

During the 1970s, two different but structurally similar stories began to be told by individuals. One story was related by individuals who claimed that at some point in the past they had been confronted by beings from outer space. They were taken aboard their spacecraft and physically examined. The examination was physically intrusive, personally embarrassing, and often painful. Afterward, they had no memory of what had occurred, though occasionally they had the sense that they had lost several hours of their life. One of the more famous cases concerned Barney and Betty Hill, who later under hypnosis told a very similar story of their abduction while driving home in the early morning hours on a New Hampshire highway. In some cases, such as the famous account by Whitley Strieber, further exploration revealed multiple accounts of abductions.

Then in the 1980s, beginning with the book Michelle Remembers (1980) by Michelle Smith, women began to emerge telling the story of their recovered memory of having been involved in a Satanic cult in their childhood. The stories claimed that parents were introducing their daughters into the cult and the child was being forced to participate in a variety of rituals and was sexually abused. After a period of time, usually a few years, the child was allowed to leave and continue her life as if nothing peculiar had ever happened to her. Their friends and peer group at school were never aware of their Satanic ritual abuse.

As the number of cases increased, their veracity was apparently bolstered by contemporary stories of children who were being forced into abusive situations with Satanic parents. The most famous case concerned the McMartin Dayschool in Manhattan Beach, California. Beginning from a single accusation of sexual abuse directed at one of the school's employees, the town's police chief sent out a letter to several hundred parents whose children were attending the school or had attended it in the past. The letter, leaked to the press, created a community-wide panic and eventually several hundred children were interviewed by psychologists, who diagnosed more than 300 as victims of abuse. During the interviews, as the story developed, it moved from a case of child abuse to a case of multiple child abuse to a case of ritual child abuse. A child questioned on a number of occasions would begin to agree with suggestions made by the psychologists and then elaborate on the story. Children told of being forced to participate in the making of child pornography movies, watching animal sacrifices, and being involved in Satanic rituals in an elaborate tunnel complex below the school. The accusations resulted in the longest criminal trial in California history and resulted in no convictions. However, the extended proceedings contributed greatly to the belief in the existence of widespread Satanism.

The stories of UFO abduction and Satanic ritual abuse grew up side by side but were rarely associated. The stories of abduction were initially pursued by UFO investigators, who were assisted by hypnotists. They were then joined by psychological professionals, some of whom had a prior interest in either UFOs or in past life therapy. They were also different from the Satanic cases in that the actual abduction event was ascribed to extraterrestrials and thus had no implications for law enforcement. The entities accused of doing what were unquestionably illegal acts were not available for arrest. Those who argued for the genuineness of the abductions had the additional task of convincing skeptics of the existence of UFOs.

Such was not the case with reports of Satanic abuse. While never a large phenomenon, Satanism undoubtedly existed. There were several quite public Satanist groups (such as the Church of Satan and the Temple of Set), and several incidents of small informal Satanist groups that had committed various violent acts, including murder. The more informal groups, whose existence was usually discovered when a crime was traced to them, also verified that Satanic groups were operating sub rosa in the society.

As the cases of Satanic ritual abuse multiplied, people were called out as the perpetrators of crimes, usually rape and/or child abuse. In the first cases, male parents were accused of abusing their now-grown daughter when she was a child. These were joined by ex-spouses accusing former mates who had retained custody of their children of abuse. Cases in which the accusation carried no occult content mixed with cases of ritual abuse. By the end of the 1980s the number of cases had grown into the thousands. From North America (the original case was Canadian), the idea migrated to the United Kingdom and Continental Europe, Australia, and New Zealand.

The idea of Satanic ritual abuse rested upon a series of hypotheses that had been suggested by psychologists operating within the larger child protection movement that was attempting to ferret out cases of child abuse and change public perceptions about its widespread existence in the culture. At the beginning of modern psychotherapy, Sigmund Freud had noted the existence of suppressed memories. As early as 1978, psychologist Roland Summit had authored a paper suggesting that children should be believed when they told stories of abuse, no matter how incredible they sounded. The spread of this opinion among child psychologists led credence to accounts of Satanic abuse when they were told by children.

The existence of Satanic groups and the belief in the accusations of children that they had been involved in Satanic rituals, made the stories of adult women of childhood involvement in a Satanic cult highly believable to many, especially among conservative Christians possessed of a strong personal belief in the existence of the Devil. Through the 1980s, psychologists emerged who specialized in treating people with what were believed to be repressed memories of childhood involvement in a Satanic cult. At the same time, police who had an interest in occult-related crime began to offer professional training seminars on Satanic crimes. Several cities, such as Los Angeles, California, organized groups to study and make recommendations for action on Satanic cult activity.

By the end of the 1980s thousands of cases of Satanic ritual abuse had emerged and observers realized that society was entering a major state of panic about the existence of Satanic groups throughout the English-speaking world. The panic was becoming visible in the spread of popular literature advocating the growth of Satanism, the reallocating of law enforcement funds to investigate accusations of Satanic activity, and a series of civil and criminal court cases with individuals standing trial for events that reputedly occurred several decades earlier. The primary evidence in these cases was the recovered memory of the accusing offspring. Where actual court cases did not occur, many families were torn apart by adult children accusing their parents of abuse, breaking relations with them and asking their siblings to join them.

The accusations of ritual abuse had a variety of problems. As the number of cases multiplied, they described the existence of a vast underground Satanic network that had existed for several generations, yet, prior to the 1980s was completely unknown. Other stories that emerged through the 1980s described rituals and activities largely based upon and similar to those described by Michelle Smith in her book. Then, it was discovered that her book was a hoax and that the rituals had actually been copied from some traditional African practices. The discovery of the Michelle Smith hoax followed the discovery of several other fictionalized accounts being offered by other self-confessed survivors—most notably Lauren Stratford and Rebecca Brown.

Most importantly, in the early 1990s, a series of reports on the investigations of accusations of Satanic abuse concluded that investigators had been unable to find any collaborating evidence. The lack of hard evidence to verify either ritual abuse or the existence of the Satanic network has made most police departments very skeptical of further reports of Satanism.

In the early 1990s, psychologists, especially those who had been called upon to counsel parents who had been accused of abuse by their children based upon recovered memories, became concerned over the practice of recovered memory therapy by their colleagues. They encouraged the formation of parent support groups and in 1992 led in the formation of the False Memory Syndrome Foundation. They proposed that the so-called survivors of ritual abuse were really suffering from a memory disorder that they termed the false memory syndrome. They suggested that recovered memory therapy was based upon a false understanding of memory and its malleability. Rather than recovering memories, they were by their therapy assisting their clients in the creation of false memories. Through the 1990s, a number of therapists whose patients had recovered memories of abuse and subsequently accused their parents of abuse, found themselves in court defending their actions.

The understanding of the false memory syndrome as it exists in Satanic cases has had a rebound affect on UFO abduction reports. Structurally they are very like the Satanic reports and like them, there is little collaborating hard evidence of the abduction accounts. In the wake of the action taken against therapists who promoted Satanic ritual abuse, psychologists have also criticized those of their colleagues who have championed therapy with UFO abductees as also generation of a false memory syndrome in their clients.

Sources:

Goldstein, E., and Kevin Farmer. Confabulations: Creating False Memories, Destroying Families. Boca Raton, Fla.: Upton Books, 1995.

Hicks, Robert. In Pursuit of Satan: The Police and the Occult. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1991.

Hochman, John. "Recovered Memory Therapy and False Memory Syndrome." Skeptic 2, 3 (1994): 58-61.

Loftus, Elizabeth, and Katherine Ketchum. The Myth of Repressed Memories: False Memories and Allegations of Sexual Abuse. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1996.

Nathan, Debbie, and Michael Snedeker. Satan's Silence: Ritual Abuse and the Making of a Modern American Witch Hunt. New York: Basic Books, 1995.

False Memory Syndrome Foundation

The False Memory Syndrome Foundation was founded in 1992 in response to the large number of reports by people that they had under hypnosis, dream revelry, or other related therapeutic technique have remembered experiences that in normal waking consciousness had previously been forgotten. These experiences were of such a traumatic nature that seemingly, one would not only remember them, but be unable to forget them. However, hundreds of patients were reporting incidents of childhood sexual abuse, participation in Satanic rituals, abductions aboard UFOs, and subjection to intimate and painful medical examinations, the memories of which were completely lost until some later date, often years or even decades later.

Those therapists who believed such accounts to be true also believed that traumatic experiences were frequently repressed immediately after their occurrence. The memories of these events would resurface at a later time through a variety of physical and mental symptoms that collectively became known as the survivor syndrome, or due to the frequent connection of the symptoms with a girl's memory of abuse by a father or other male relative, Incest Survivor Syndrome (ISS). Those afflicted with ISS were led to therapists who specialized in recovered memory therapy (RMT) that included a variety of techniques designed to bring forth the repressed memory. RMT rose to prominence in the late 1980s as it came to be associated with several widely publicized court cases, especially the McMartin Dayschool Case.

At the same time, therapists were witnesses to parents whose lives were being disrupted by the sudden accusation of their now adult children of abuse and involvement in Satanic ritual abuse, usually several decades in the past. Suddenly, seemingly happy families were torn apart by accusations of parental abuse and in some cases, the parents were arrested and tried on the basis of an offspring's supposed recovered memory.

In 1992, a group of families and therapists in the Philadelphia and Baltimore area created the False Memory Syndrome Foundation to document and study the phenomenon. The foundation emerged out of previously existing parent support groups that had formed in many cities. Soon after it formed, a network of parents and therapists formed across North America. Elizabeth Loftus, a psychologist at the University of Washington and specialist in the study of memory emerged as the most vocal defender of accused parents and exponent of the reality of the false memory syndrome. False memory syndrome suggests that during the attempt to recover memories, fantasies are misperceived by the patient who, through misguided therapy, comes to believe the fantasies are accurate memories.

Through the 1990s, the work of the False Memory Syndrome Foundation has been largely successful, and the tide of belief in repressed memory that includes both belief in UFO abductions and Satanic ritual abuse have been discredited, though strong pockets of belief in both remain. Several psychologists who supported belief in repressed memory have been successfully sued by former patients and at least two psychologists known for their work with abductees, Elizabeth Fiore and Richard Boylan, have been forced to give up their licenses. During the years of the foundation's existence, court cases have moved from a focus upon parents who reputedly abused their children to therapists, whose use of RMT, abused their patients. Recognition of Loftus' contribution came with her recent election as president of the American Psychological Association.

The foundation is located at 3401 Market St., Ste. 130, Philadelphia, PA 19104. It has an Internet site at http://www.fmsfonline.org/.

Sources:

False Memory Syndrome Foundation. http://www.fmsfonline.org/. May 16, 2000.

Loftus, Elizabeth and Katherine Ketchum. The Myth of Repressed Memories: False Memories and Allegations of Sexual Abuse. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1996.

Ross, Colin. Satanic Ritual Abuse: Principles of Treatment. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1995.

Falun Gong

Falun Gong is one of several groups based in China whose belief and practice is centered upon the practice of qigong, an exercise process not unlike yoga, believed to stimulate the flow of qi, or life energy, through the body. It was founded by Master Li Hongzi (1951–) in 1992, but had emerged as part of the support that the Chinese government had given to research on, and the practice of, qigong in the 1980s. Qigong practice has been perpetuated in China, with government approbation, through the National Qigong Federation. In 1992, Li Hongzi withdrew from the federation and through Falun Gong has spread his own peculiar teachings based upon the traditional practice.

Above and beyond the simple practice of the exercises, Master Li has emphasized the "cultivation of the XinXing," a path of life emphasizing the key virtues of truthfulness, benevolence, and forbearance. Practicing cultivation leads to enlightenment, a concept tied to the teachings of the Buddha. Followers believe strongly in reincarnation and karma, and Master Li teaches that passing through tribulations are a necessary part of relieving oneself of past karmic debts. He also teaches the existence of a pantheon of deities and spirit entities (including demonic ones) that interfere with life and history on Earth. Possibly most offensive to other qigong practitioners and the Chinese government, Master Li suggested that he was the only person who could lay out the exact course for the practice of the exercises and demanded that all of the secrets of the tradition be made available to the public. The basic concepts are laid out in a book, China Falun Gong, authored by Li.

Falun Gong also emphasizes the concept of the Falun, part of the invisible human anatomy assumed to exist in traditional Chinese teachings. The Falun is a center of energy located in the region of the lower abdomen. It is believed to be a microcosm of the universe and contain all of its secrets. The practice of qigong awakens the qi energy to flow more freely through the body, bringing good health and well-being.

Falun Gong spread quickly through China and Hong Kong, and then through the Chinese communities in diaspora worldwide. With almost no attention from the press, strong centers developed in Singapore, Taiwan, and throughout southeast Asia. Practitioners soon created centers across North America and Europe. In 1998 Master Li moved to New York City.

In 1999, China began a new campaign against unofficial religious movements that included Falun Gong prominently among its targets. The movement has millions of followers in China, though in spite of the spiritual aspect to the teachings concerning "cultivation" and the recognition of supernatural entities, the Falun Gong membership insists that it is not a religion. Nevertheless, the Chinese government has moved against it, arresting several hundred of its leaders, at least four of whom have died while in custody. The government has also insisted on the extradition of Li back to China to stand trial, but the United States government has responded by condemning the persecution of the group. In the meantime, Chinese government officials have enlisted the aid of Western anticultists, including the magician James Randi, known for his hostility to occult and minority religious practices, to assist them in developing a publicity campaign to justify their actions to Western nations.

In facing the authority of the Chinese government, Falun Gong leaders have shown remarkable commitment to their movement and insisted that it is not a challenge to the reigning authority. Outside of China, the massive coverage of the movement has led to its further growth, including the attraction of many non-Chinese. The Chinese government and the movement have also waged a war of words on the Internet. The primary Falun Gong sites are at http://www.falundafa.org and at http://minghui.ca/. The ongoing controversy is being monitored by several researchers, including Massimo Introviugne of the Center for Studies on New Religions in Turin, Italy, whose webpage on Falun Gong may be found at http://www.cesnur.org/. Falun Gong has no official headquarters in the United States. It operates through a set of volunteer contacts whose names and phone numbers are posted on the Internet sites.

Sources:

Falun Gong: The Real Story. Pamphlet informally published by American Falun Gong practitioners, 1999.

Li Hongzi. China Falun Gong. Hong Kong: Falun Fo Fa Publishing, 1992, 1998.

Familiars

Spirits that live with, travel with, and assist magicians, sorcerers, and witches. The idea seems to have emerged in the thirteenth or fourteenth century from the idea of fairies and kobolds, the mischievous spirits who could be paid or cajoled into assisting people in various ways. Familiars, it was believed, could take the form of animals or birds. The black dog of Cornelius Agrippa was one of the best-known familiars. His story rested on the authority of the sixteenth-century Italian biographer Paulus Jovius, and it was copied by Thevet, among others, in his Hist. des Hommes plus Illustres et Scavans.

Jovius relates that Agrippa was always accompanied by the devil in the shape of a black dog, and that, perceiving the approach of death, he took a collar that was ornamented with nails arranged in magical inscriptions from the neck of the animal and dismissed him with these memorable words, "Abi perdita Bestia quae me totum perdidisti" (Away, accursed beast, through whose agency I must now sink into perdition). The dog, it is said, ran hastily to the banks of the Saone, into which he plunged headlong and was never seen again.

According to Pierre Le Loyer,

"With regard to the demons whom they imprisoned in rings and charms, the magicians of the school of Salamanca and Toledo, and their master Picatrix, together with those in Italy who made traffic of this kind of ware, knew better than to say whether or not they had appeared to those who had been in possession or bought them. And truly I cannot speak without horror of those who pretend to such vulgar familiarity with them, even to speaking of the nature of each particular demon shut up in a ring; whether he be a Mercurial, Jovial, Saturnine, Martial, or Aphrodisiac spirit; in what form he is wont to appear when required; how many times in the night he awakes his possessor; whether benign or cruel in disposition; whether he can be transferred to another; and if, once possessed, he can alter the natural temperament, so as to render men of Saturnine complexion Jovial, or the Jovials [Saturnine], and so on. There is no end of the stories which might be collected under his head, to which if I gave faith, as some of the learned of our time have done, it would be filling my paper to little purpose. I will not speak therefore of the crystal ring mentioned by Joalium of Cambray, in which a young child could see all that they demanded of him, and which eventually was broken by the possessor, as the occasion by which the devil too much tormented him. Still less will I stay my pen to tell of the sorcerer of Courtray, whose ring had a demon enclosed in it, to whom it behoved him to speak every five days. In fine, the briefest allusion must suffice to what they relate of a gentleman of Poitou, who had playfully taken from the bosom of a young lady a certain charm in which a devil was shut up. Having thrown it into the fire, he was incessantly tormented with visions of the devil till the latter granted him another charm, similar to the one he had destroyed, for the purpose of returning to the lady and renewing her interest in him."

Sometimes the familiar attached itself voluntarily to a master, without any exercise of magic skill or invocation on the master's part, nor could such a spirit be disposed of without exorcism, as illustrated by the following story cited by Martin Antoine Del Rio:

"A certain man [paterfamilias, head of a family] lived at Trapani, in Sicily, in whose house it is said, in the year 1585, mysterious voices had been heard for a period of some months. This familiar was a daemon, who, in various ways, endeavoured to annoy man. He had cast huge stones, though as yet he had broken no mortal head; and he had even thrown the domestic vessels about, but without fracturing any of them. When a young man in the house played and sung, the demon, hearing all, accompanied the sound of the lute with lascivious songs, and this distinctly. He vaunted himself to be a daemon; and when the master of the house, together with his wife, went away on business to a certain town, the daemon volunteered his company. When they returned, however, soaked through with rain, the spirit went forward in advance, crying aloud as he came, and warning the servants to make up a good fire."

In spite of these "services," the father called in the aid of a priest and expelled the familiar, though not without some difficulty.

The Swiss alchemist Paracelsus was believed to carry a familiar about with him in the hilt of his sword. According to the seventeenth-century physician and historian Gabriel Naudé, Paracelsus never laid this weapon aside even when he went to bed, and he often got up in the night and struck it violently against the floor. Frequently when the night before he was without a penny, he would show a purseful of gold in the morning (Apologie pour les Grands Hommes soupconnez de Magie, xiv, p. 281). Although other alchemists attributed these events and other of Paracelsus's feats to the philosophers' stone, Naudé thought it more rational to believe that it was two or three doses of laudanum (opium) that Paracelsus never went without, and with which he effected many strange cures.

Familiars in Witchcraft

In the late thirteenth century, the idea of the fairy was demonized, and through the next century it became a popular belief that sorcerers and witches had spirit familiars. Among the earliest appearances of the familiar was in 1303 when Philip IV of France had Pope Boniface VIII deposed. Among other charges listed against Boniface, Philip accused him of sorcery and possession of a familiar.

In return for a pact with the devil, a witch was said to be given a personal demon in the form of a domestic animal that would assist the witch in carrying out malevolent magic. The Scottish witch Isobel Gowdie stated, "Each one of us has a spirit to wait upon us, when we please to call upon him." The most common form for a witch's familiar was a cat, and since so many old women kept cats as companions in their loneliness, it was not difficult for witch hunters to make accusations of sorcery. The familiars had pet names, again a characteristic of domestic cats and dogs.

During the witchcraft trials at Chelmsford, England, in March 1582, Ursula Kemp confessed that she "had four spirits, whereof two of them were hes, and the other two shes were to punish with lameness and other diseases of bodily harm. . . . One he, like a gray cat, is called Tittey; the second, like a black cat, is called Jack; one she, like a black toad, is called Pigin; and the other, like a black lamb, is called Tyffin." Elizabeth Bennet said she had a familiar called "Suckin, being black like a dog." Alice Manfield had four imps, Robin, Jack, William, and Puppet, "two hes and two shes, all like unto black cats." Agnes Heard had six familiars that were blackbirds, white-speckled and all black.

Sources:

Gleadow, Rupert. Magic and Divination. Wakefield, England: EP Publishing, 1976.

Maple, Eric. The Complete Book of Witchcraft and Demonology: Witches, Devils, and Ghosts in Western Civilization. South Brunswick, N.J: A. S. Barnes, 1966.

———. Dark World of Witches. New York: A. S. Barnes, 1964.

Russell, Jeffrey Burton. Witchcrft in the Middle Ages. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1972.

Valiente, Doreen. The ABC of Witchcraft Past and Present. New York: St. Martin's, 1973.

The Family

Founded in 1968 as Teens for Christ, the group now known as The Family adopted the name Children of God (COG), the name by which it became well-known, the following year. COG grew up around David Berg, a former minister in the Christian and Missionary Alliance. With several of his teenage children he began evangelistic work in Huntington Beach, California. In 1969 several of the group received revelations concerning possible earthquakes, and the entire group left to wander across the United States. During this exodus, Berg became known as Moses David and the group as the Children of God.

The group adopted fundamental Christian belief with an emphasis on the endtime, and Berg was accepted as the prophet of the endtime. They attained some initial fame after conducting a series of demonstrations warning people of the evils of American society. They dressed in sackcloths and covered their faces with ashes. Opposition to the youth participation in the group began to grow from parents who called COG a cult, and from their actions against the group the term "cult" began to take on the negative connotations it has today.

The COG soon parted from the other Jesus People groups that had arisen contemporaneously along the West Coast of the United States. The Jesus People objected to the role assigned Berg, and to the fact that he claimed contact with several spirits. As early as 1970, for example, he let it be known that he had come into contact with someone he termed a "spirit helper," named Abrahim, who described himself as a Bulgarian Christian gypsy who had been killed by the Turks. Subsequently, usually in dreams, he spoke with spirit beings, usually understood to be angel messengers. Also, Berg offered prophecies of the future that were used to guide the group.

By the mid-1970s, COG had largely left the United States, the few who remained having taken a very low profile. In 1976 they instituted their most controversial practice, "flirty fishing," the use of sexual allure to attract potential converts. Some of the people the group was trying to convert would be offered sexual favors as a symbol of the love of the person trying to win them to God. Several years later, sharing, the free sexual contact of adult members of the group became widely practiced.

The sexual freedoms and practices of COG were sharply curtailed in 1983 (by which time the group had assumed its present name) and several years later, it became known that during this period of sexual freedom some adult-minor sex had occurred in the group. In 1987, very strict guidelines concerning sexual behavior were introduced with severe penalties for infractions. The Family continues to practice the law of love, which, as they interpret it, permits some freedom of sexual contact between adult members, but have adopted strong regulations against any involvement of minors in sexual activities. After hearing about several alleged incidents of sexual child abuse, different governments moved against The Family in separate actions during the early 1990s. While giving The Family much bad publicity, in the end, the investigations produced no evidence of any ongoing abuse in The Family homes and no subsequent actions were taken against the group or any of its members.

The Family lives communally. David Berg died in 1994, and the group is now headed by his widow, Maria. Homes are found in a number of countries with significant numbers in South America and continental Europe. There are approximately 5,000 adult members working in 60 countries and out of 1,000 centers or communities. Website: http://www.thefamily.org/.

Sources:

The Family. http://www.thefamily.org/. March 8, 2000.

Lewis, James R., and J. Gordon Melton. Sex, Slander, and Salvation. Goleta, Calif.: Center for Academic Publication, 1994.

Pritchett, W. Douglas. The Children of God, Family of Love: An Annotated Bibliography. New York: Garland Publications, 1985.

Fancher, Mollie (1848–1910)

A Brooklyn girl who, because of two serious accidents, became blind and bedridden at age 17, yet lived another 44 years exhibiting remarkable phenomena of clairvoyance and multiple personality. Fancher became known as "the Brooklyn Enigma." She took no food for nine years and lay on her right side in a paralyzed state with twisted limbs; all the natural functions of her body ceased, at times no pulse was felt, and, except for the region of the heart, her body became entirely cold. In this state she was possessed by a different personality that executed delicate fancywork with her crippled hands, wrote beautifully, read books under her pillow clairvoyantly, saw colors in the dark, discovered lost articles, and exhibited astounding traveling clairvoyance. Henry M. Parkhurst, the eminent American astronomer, testified to her reading a torn-up letter that was fished out of a wastepaper basket and enclosed in a sealed envelope.

Fancher's original personality returned after nine years; the bodily rigidity relaxed and she became prey to frightful fits of convulsions. Between such fits, Fancher was possessed by various new invading personalities, called "Sunbeam," "Idol," "Rosebud," "Ruby," and "Pearl." Her personality changed five times in one night, the invaders keeping up a constant quarrel among themselves.

The story of her strange life was narrated by Judge Abram H. Dailey in Mollie Fancher, published in Brooklyn in 1894. The case was also reviewed by Walter Franklin Prince in Bulletin XI of the Boston Society for Psychic Research.

Fantasmagoriana

The title of a collection of popular stories in two volumes dealing mainly with apparitions and specters that was published in Paris in 1812. The contents were translated from the original German by Jean Baptiste Eyriès. Lord Byron read these stories aloud to Percy Shelley, Mary Wollstonecraft (later Mrs. Shelley), Claire Clairmont, and John William Polidori in the summer of 1816 at the Villa Diodati by Lake Geneva in Switzerland. Subsequently, Byron proposed that each member of the company, amid their ingestions of laudanum, attempt to write a ghost story. As a result Mary Wollstonecraft began her novel Frankenstein. Several years later Polidori expanded the story begun by Byron and turned it into the first modern vampire story, published as The Vampyr in 1819. These stories generated a whole genre of gothic literature with special reference to vampire themes.

Fantl, Kurt (1914–1994)

Psychiatrist and lecturer on parapsychology. Fantl was born January 25, 1914, in Vienna, Austria, educated at the University of Vienna, and did postgraduate work at St. Mary's Hospital, Racine, Wisconsin (1939). During World War II he worked at the American Hospital in Chicago (1939–41), St. Anthony's Hospital, Effingham, Illinois (1941–44), and the Los Angeles Tuberculosis Sanatorium, Duarte, California (1944–45). After the war he interned and did his residency in psychiatry at Bellevue Hospital, New York (1945–48). He served successively as an assistant in psychiatry, New York University, New York (1947–48); an instructor, University of Southern California (1948–50); a consultant in psychiatry at Los Angeles City Health Department (1948–51); Long Beach City Health Department (1951–53); U.S. Public Health Service, San Pedro, California (1952–53); and was a staff member at San Pedro Community Hospital and at Clearview Sanatorium, Gardena, California.

Fantl developed a special interest in psychokinesis, telepathy, clairvoyance, table-rapping, yoga, and evidence of survival after death. He lectured on parapsychology at Tokyo University and at Poona and Lucknow Universities in India. In 1960 he became president of the Consciousness Research Foundation, a position he held for a number of years.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Faraday, Michael (1791–1867)

Famous British physicist, born in London on September 22, 1791. He became an assistant to Sir Humphry Davy and later became celebrated for his brilliant discoveries relating to electricity and chemistry. Faraday's well-known saying, "Nothing is too amazing to be true," apparently was not meant to cover table turning. It was, for him, too amazing to be true. His noted theory that table movements were caused by unconscious muscular pressure was first advanced in a letter to the Times of June 30, 1853. To prove it, he prepared two small flat boards a few inches square, placed several glass rollers between them and fastened the whole together with a couple of rubber bands so that the upper board would slide under lateral pressure to a limited extent over the lower one. A light index fastened to the upper board would betray the least amount of sliding.

During experiments this is just what happened. The upper board always moved first, which demonstrated that the fingers moved the table and not the table the fingers. Faraday also found that when the sitters learned the meaning of the index and kept their attention fixed on it, no movement took place. When it was hidden from their sight it kept on wavering, although the sitters believed that they always pressed directly downward. However, the pressure of the hands was trifling and was practically neutralized by the absence of unanimity in the direction. The sitters never made the same movement at the same moment.

For this reason, and for the weightier one that tables moved without contact as well, his theory was soon found inadequate. According to Charles Richet, it was Michel Chevreul, the famous French chemist, who originally evolved the theory of unconscious muscular pressure. Chevreul's book, however, did not appear until 1854, a year after Faraday's explanation was published.

